"Some years ago," said Mr. Mullaly. "I went to hear Mendelssohn's "Scotch Symphony" played in London. It was a great event, because the leader was an internationally famous man. The irony of it is that I can't recall his name at the moment! But he was Wagner's copyist, and conducted at Berlin opera.

"I went, and I have never been so disappointed in my life. To begin with, they played in an amphitheatre, with the horns seated above the heads of the violins. The violins scratched; it was awful.

"And yet, as I left, I heard people saying to each other:

"'Wasn't it gorgeous! Perfect! Ah, he is a master.'

"That same evening I met a number of the musicians.

"'Well,' they said to me, 'how did you like it?'

"'Do you want me to answer that as a friend or as a musician?' I asked.

"They said they wanted my honest opinion. 'Well,' I said, 'I thought it was horrible! And as for being a great performance—why, we have 20 orchestras in America that could have done far better and thought nothing of it!'

"Of course, they said, they'd heard of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but——"

Mr. Mullaly paused. "The musicians weren't at fault, but the conductor. The man in question was not a symphony conductor. He was an opera man.

Blow Own Horn Only!

"That is the reason that I consider Toscanini the greatest conductor in the world today. He fails at nothing. As

Continued on Page 7, Section A

Post May 27

HARVARD NIGHT POP CONCERT

Glee Club Takes Part; Piston Conducts Own Prelude

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Few will deny that it is a change for the better, but there is no mistaking the altered atmosphere at the Pop Concerts in these temperate days.

At Symphony Hall last evening came the annual "Harvard Night," and only a "Harvard" in red electric lights, the participation of the Glee Club and the presence of a goodly number or undergraduates in the company that filled the hall served to differentiate this once so riotous an occasion from any other evening at the Pops. Gone beyond recall are those "Harvard Nights" at which several unruly members of the audience tried to take upon themselves the task of directing the "Cruiser Harvard March" or "Our Director," and that resounded with cheering, singing and general hilarity.

In the meantime the "Harvard Night" that was last evening's Pop Concert proved a distinctly pleasurable one, bringing besides a most attractive orchestral programme eight numbers by the Glee Club and, for special event, the performance under the composer's direction of a Prelude by Walter Piston, conductor of the University Orchestra.

Am May 28

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

The program for the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight follows:

Military Polonaise.....Chopin
Overture, "L'Italiana in Algeria"...Rossini
Waltz, "Je t'aime".....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Faust".....Gounod
Entrance of the Knights, "Parsifal".Wagner
Trumpet solo, "Romanza.....Koslowa
Kurt Schmeisser
Miniature March.....Tchaikovsky
Hymn to the Sun, "Iris".....Mascagni
Rhapsody, "Espana".....Chabrier
Afro-American Songs...Arranged by Jacchia
March, "El Capitan".....Sousa

"POP" CONCERT TRIBUTE TO VICTOR HERBERT

Victor Herbert, whose death is mourned by the musical public in America, was honored at the "Pop" concert in Symphony Hall last night. Before the second group on the program Agide Jacchia gave as an extra number, the late composer's "Indian Summer." This is one of the several numbers which have long been favorites at the "Pops." In the course of many "Pops" seasons, no less than 24 selections from Herbert's operettas have been played.

POPS TONIGHT

Agide Jacchia will present the following program at the Pops concert in Symphony hall tonight, at which the Boston Teachers' Club will be present:

Military Polonaise.....Chopin
Overture to "L'Italiana in Algieri" Rossini
Waltz, "Je t'aime".....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Faust".....Gounod
Entrance of the Knights into the Temple of the Grail, "Parsifal" (Act 1).....Wagner
Trumpet solo, "Romanza.....Koslowa
Kurt Schmeisser
Miniature March.....Tchaikovsky
Hymn to the Sun from "Iris," Night, Dawn, Sunrise.....Mascagni
Rhapsody, "Espana".....Chabrier
Afro-American Songs. Arranged by Jacchia.
(a) "You May Bury Me in de Eas' "
(b) "Musieu Banjo"
(c) "Nobody Knows de Trouble I've Seen"
March, "El Capitan".....Sousa

Tonight at the Pops

HARVARD NIGHT

Triumphal March, "Aida".....Verdi
Overture to "Rienzi".....Wagner
Fantasia, "Pagliacci"....Leoncavallo
Harvard Glee Club,
Dr. Archibald T. Davison, Conductor
"Scènes Pittoresques".....Massenet
Prelude .....Walter Piston '24
First Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
Songs by Harvard Glee Club
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812,"
Tschaikowsky
Waltz, "Madeleine".....Waldteufel
March, "Veritas" .....Densmore

AT THE POPS

Agide Jacchia will present the following program at the Pop concert in Symphony hall tonight:

Military Polonaise, Chopin; Overture to "L'Italiana in Algieri," Rossini; Waltz, "Je t'aime," Waldteufel; Fantasia, "Faust," Gounod; Entrance of the Knights into the Temple of the Grail, ((Parsifal," (Act 1), Wagner; trumpet solo, "Romanza," Koslowa, (Kurt Schmeisser); Miniature March, Tchaikovsky; Hymn to the Sun from "Iris," (Night, Dawn, Sunrise), Mascagni; Rhapsody, "Espana," Chabrier; Afro-American songs, arranged by Jacchia. (a) "You May Bury Me in de Eas'" (b) "Musieu Banjo." (c) "Nobody Knows de Trouble I've Seen;" march, "El Capitan," Sousa.

American May 28

POPS LEADER HONORS HERBERT'S MEMORY

Victor Herbert, whose death is mourned by the musical public in America, was honored at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall last night. Before the second group on the programme Agide Jacchia performed, as an extra number, the late composer's "Indian Summer." This is one of several numbers which have long been favorites at the Pops. In the course of many Pop seasons, no less than twenty-four selections from Herbert's operettas have been performed.

The program tonight will be as follows:

Military Polonaise.....Chopin
Overture to "L' Italiana in Algeri."..Rossini
Waltz, "Je t'aime".....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Faust".....Gounod

Entrance of the Knights into the Temple of the Grail ,"Parsifal," (Act I), Wagner
Trumpet solo—"Romanza".....Koslowa
Kurt Schmeisser
Miniature March.....Tchaikovsky
Hymn to the Sun from "Iris"....Mascagni
Night—Dawn—Sunrise

Rhapsody, "Espana".....Chabrier
Afro-American Songs. Arranged by Jacchia
a. "You may Bury Me in De Eas' "
b. "Musieu Banjo55
c. "Nobody Knows de Trouble I've Seen'
March, "El Capitan".....Sousa

Monitor May 28

Tonight at the Pops

Military Polonaise.....Chopin
Overture to "L'Italiana in Algeri" Rossini
Waltz, "Je t'aime".....Waldteufel
Fantasia "Faust".....Gounod
Holy Grail Music, "Parsival"..Wagner
Trumpet Solo, "Romanza" (Kurt Schmeisser).....Koslowa
Miniature March.....Tschaikowsky
Hymn to the Sun, from "Iris" Mascagni
Rhapsody, 'Espafia".....Chabrier
Afro-American Folk Songs Arranged by Jacchia
March, "El Capitan".....Sousa

Tr. May 29.

AT THE POPS TONIGHT.

The following program will be performed at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

Cortege, "Queen of Sheba" ..... Gounod
Overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor".Nicolai
Rondo Capriccioso ..... Mendelssohn
Fantasia, Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Finale, "Scheherazade" ... Rimsky-Korsakov
"Tacea la Notte Placida" ..... Verdi
Miss Iride Pilla.
Eili, Eili ..... Arranged by Jacchia
Bacchanale, "Samson and Delilah" Saint-Saens
Marche Slave.....Tschaikowsky
Waltz, "Estudiantina" ..... Waldteufel
Furlana from "La Gioconda" ... Ponchielli

POPS TONIGHT

The following program will be performed at the Pops concert in Symphony hall tonight, at which members of Agide Jacchia's Boston Conservatory of Music will be present:

Cortege from "The Queen of Sheba" Gounod
Overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor" Nicolai
Rondo Capriccioso.....Mendelssohn
Fantasia, "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Finale, "Scheherazade"...Rimsky-Korsakov
"Tacea la Notte Placida" from "Il Trovatore" .....Verdi
Miss Iride Pilla.
Eili, Eili.....Arranged by Jacchia
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah" .....Saint-Saens
Marche Slave.....Tschaikowsky
Waltz, "Estudiantina".....Waldteufel
Furlana from "La Gioconda"....Ponchielli

TONIGHT'S PROGRAM AT POP CONCERT

The following programme will be performed at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

Cortege from "The Queen of Sheba", Gound
Overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor." Nicolai
Rondo Capriccioso ..... Mendelssohn
Fantasia, "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Finale, "Scheherazada" ... Rimsky-Korsakov
"Tacea la Notte Placida" from "Il Trovatore", ... Verdi
Miss Iride Pilla
Eili, Eili ..... Arranged by Jacchia
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah" Saint-Saens
Marche Slave.....Tchaikowsky
Waltz, "Estudiantina".....Waldteufel
Furlana from "La Gioconda" ... Ponchielli

HOLIDAY BILL AT POPS.

The following program, featuring American works, will be performed at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

March, "Lorraine" ..... Ganne
Prelude, "Cavalleria Rusticana"..Mascagni
Solo horn—Willem Valkenier.
Viennese Waltz ..... Alden
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore" ..... Verdi
America
Polonaise, "Christmas Eve" Rimsky-Korsakov
Indian Summer ..... Herbert
The Lark ..... Glinka-Jacchia
Finale, Fourth Symphony ..... Tchaikowsky
The Star Spangled Banner
Overture, "William Tell" .....Rossini
Ave Maria ..... Bach-Gounod
March of the Doughboys ..... Dunham

Trans May 29

At the Pops Tonight

Procession from "The Queen of Sheba" Gounod
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" .....Nicolai
Rondo Capriccioso .....Mendelssohn
Fantasia, "Lohengrin" .....Wagner
Finale from the Suite "Scheherazade" Rimsky-Korsakov
Air from "Il Trovatore".....Verdi
Eili, Eili
Bacchanal from "Samson and Delilah" Saint-Saëns
Slavic March .....Chaikovsky
Waltz, "Estudiantina" .....Waldteufel
Furlana from "La Gioconda".Ponchielli

Conductor: A. Jacchia

Soloist: Iride Pilla

Monitor May 29

Tonight at the Pops

Cortège from "The Queen of Sheba" Gounod
Overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor".....Nicolai
Rondo Capriccioso Mendelssohn-Jacchia
Fantasia, "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Finale of "Schéhérazade" Rimsky-Korsakoff
Aria from "Il Trovatore".....Verdi
"Eili, Eili".....Arranged by Jacchia
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah".....Saint-Saëns
Marche Slave.....Tschaikowsky
Waltz, "Estudiantina"....Waldteufel
Furlana from "La Gioconda" Ponchielli

FRIDAY EVENING

March, "Lorraine".....Ganne
Prelude and Siciliana, "Cavalleria Rusticana".....Mascagni
Viennese Waltz.....Alden
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore".....Verdi
Polonaise, "Christmas Eve" Rimsky-Korsakoff
"Indian Summer," an American Idyll.....Herbert
Spanish Dance, "Cachuca"....Hadley
Finale, Fourth Symphony Tschaikowsky
Overture to "William Tell"...Rossini
"Ave Maria".....Bach-Gounod
"March of the Doughboys"..Dunham

POPS TONIGHT

The following program, featuring American composers, will be performed at the Pops concert in Symphony hall tonight:

March, "Lorraine" .....Ganne
Prelude and Siciliana, "Cavalleria Rusticana" .....Mascagni
Solo horn, Willem Valkenier
Viennese Waltz.....Alden
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore".....Verdi
Polonaise, "Christmas Eve"..Rimsky-Korsakov
"Indian Summer, An American Idyl"..Herbert
The Lark.....Glinka-Jacchia
Finale, Fourth Symphony.....Tschaikowsky
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Ave Maria.....Bach-Gounod
March of the Doughboys.....Dunham

Tonight at the Pops

Military March.....Saint-Saëns
Overture to "Mignon".....Thomas
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube".....Strauss
Procession to the Cathedral, from "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Overture to "The Pirates of Penzance" Fantasy, "Iolanthe"
"The Lost Chord"
Selection, "Pinafore"
Sir Arthur Sullivan
Conducted by John Mullaly
Dance of the Hours.....Ponchielli
Ave Maria.....Schubert-Wilhelmj
First Hungarian Dance.....Brahms

At the Pops Tonight

Military March.....Saint-Saens
Overture to "Mignon"..... Thomas
Waltz, "Blue Danube".....J. Strauss
Procession to the Cathedral from "Lohengrin" .....Wagner
Overture to "The Pirates of Penzance"—Fantasia from "Iolanthe" "The Lost Chord" for Trumpet—Selection from "Pinafore"...Sullivan
Dance of The Hours from "La Gioconda" .....Ponchielli
Ave Maria.....Schubert-Wilhelmj
(Violin, Organ, Harp, and Strings)
Hungarian Dance, No. 1.....Brahms

Conductors:

A. Jacchia and, for the numbers from Sullivan, John C. Mullaly.

Soloist: Kurt Schmeisser.

Post May 25

First Leader of the 'Pirates,' Hub Man, to Conduct Pops

John C. Mullaly, 77, Led Orchestra at 16---Gives New and Intimate Stories of Great Musicians

Shiver and shake and shimmy! . . . Wiggle and wobble and waltz! . . . That's the way NOT to conduct an orchestra.

John C. Mullaly of Dorchester, is 77 years old, plays regularly in the Boston Symphony Orchestra (and for 39 years past) and is its oldest member of the organization in years. Because he conducted its first performance of the "Pirates of Penzance" in America, he will conduct the Pops orchestra next Saturday when it plays selections from the Gilbert & Sullivan operas.

In an interview for the Sunday Post this accomplished veteran, whom Monteux considers one of the most valuable members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, tells of his experiences.

He has a fund of "yarns"—intimate, funny and idol-smashing.

By J. R. Milne

A glance at Mr. John C. Mullaly emphasizes the gradually growing conviction that a musician, to be a good musician, does not have to wear a queer floppy hat over long hair, nor a Bohemian tie, nor a baggy suit, nor betray any of the host of eccentricities that joke magazines insist a fiddler must possess.

True, he wears a bow tie, but you'll find one of these decorating the neck of many a banker, butcher, or shoe salesman even in this day of the flowing four-in-hand.

His face is not thin, pale, and "artistic." Just the opposite. It is an exceptional face, rough-hewn and strong, but it is not the sort of face commonly associated with a dreamer.

Mr. Mullaly is impressive on several counts. First of all, the face: it commands attention. The eyes sparkle and flash. And the eyebrows—striking, but not easily describable—tell of the power behind the flash.

PLAYED AT 15

Most impressive of all is his age, and his physical denial of that age. He was born in 1847, which makes him 77 or thereabouts. He doesn't look it. You'd give him 60, or 65, reluctantly, but you wouldn't believe the 77.

Mr. Mullaly came to America from Newcastle, England, when he was six years old. When he was fifteen years old he joined "Gilmore's Band," a Salem organization famous everywhere. At 16, first violin, he led the band.

When he joined Gilmore's Band he also had another job. He was orchestra leader at the Old Tremont, managed by Mrs. Julia Barrowes.

"I sat on a high stool," he said, "and played my violin as leader. Of course, it wasn't what you would call a symphony orchestra! The theatre didn't go in for opera; it was all comedy.

"Those were glorious days. In New York the world's most famous musicians were to be seen each season. There was the Italian opera, the French opera, and the German opera. The original productions, with the same singers who had sung the roles in Europe—Nielssen, Capoul, Mario—all the great names of the old days.

"In the early seventies I conducted the orchestras at the Globe (in Arthur Cheney's time), was first violin at the Boston Theatre for Nate Lothian, and at the Music Hall. For a long time I was at the Hollis. And I've played everything from Wagner to burlesque."

Mr. Mullaly was conductor of the Pops in their second season, 1886, when it ran for four months. He conducted the orchestra at the Newport Casion for 27 summers, and pleased the ears of the Vanderbilts, Havemeyers, and Belmonts of those days.

In 1885 he began his work with the Symphony Orchestra—work that he has played with, off and on, ever since.

The first American performance of "Pirates of Penzance" took place in 1888. An English troupe came to America, and Mullaly, first violin, was the only American in it.

Sullivan Great

In addition to himself there was an English conductor.

But he didn't stay. One day he said to Mr. Mullaly: "You can handle the job better than I can. No sense of my staying!" And back he went to England, leaving the first violin in command.

John C. Mullaly

note. But there is no need for his frenzy."

And he told me of the rehearsals. Here the conductor tells his men just how he wants them to play. When rehearsals are over, and the performance is on, the men are supposed to know themselves what to do. And why, therefore, is it necessary for a conductor to go into frenzies.

"I suppose," I broke in. "To any one with a knowledge of music and a sense of humor it must seem much the same as if the prompter in a theatre were set on the stage in full view of the audience."

That was was about it, he admitted. Music is for the ear, not for the eye. A conductor does not show his great work when his men play for an audience, but in the long, hard hours of rehearsals, when he instructs them.

"Muck was not a frenzied conductor," he said. "Nor Monteux, nor Gericke, nor Nikisch.

Lays Down Baton

"Many a time I have seen Dr. Muck lay down his baton while the orchestra was playing. He would just stand and look. His eyes would rove, and with his eyes he could direct that orchestra.

"It was the same with Bruno Walter. He did not need to use the baton. He did not work into a frenzy to make the audience believe that he was, himself, squeezing the last bit of power out of a man. He had done that already, in rehearsal.

"Gericke was a drill master. He was a hard man to work with, but he achieved results. And when he left he had built up a wonderful organization for the next man, Nikisch.

"Nikisch was not a drill master. But he was perhaps the best, most talented, and most natural leader of the orchestra. How much credit for the splendid performances the orchestra gave under his leadership is due to Gericke no one can estimate. Certainly the orchestra would not have done such good work under Nikisch if Gericke had not preceded him to build it up.

"Koussevitsky will come to succeed Mr. Monteux. And Mr. Koussevitzky will find a Boston Symphony Orchestra as fine as any of other years. He will find, I think, that he brings just one thing to us: Russian music. We have the rest; we have learned it."

Speaking of the frenzied conductor, Mr. Mullaly recalled one time when he had witnessed one in action, and had heard the comment of a player.

Leader Led!

While the conductor waved his hands, swung his baton, and shimmied his shoulders, making many of the audience believe that they were witnessing a masterpiece of orchestral directing, a violinist said:

"He's following the boys tip-top!"

And that is what many an orchestral player says about the frenzied conductor. Their playing is giving him a chance to show-off. He's not leading them, but following them, and drawing a fancy, fantastic decoration about their work.

The effect of a frenzied conductor on an audience is one thing. The ef-

Post May 27

HARVARD NIGHT POP CONCERT

Glee Club Takes Part; Piston Conducts Own Prelude

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Few will deny that it is a change for the better, but there is no mistaking the altered atmosphere at the Pop Concerts in these temperate days.

At Symphony Hall last evening came the annual "Harvard Night," and only a "Harvard" in red electric lights, the participation of the Glee Club and the presence of a goodly number or undergraduates in the company that filled the hall served to differentiate this once so riotous an occasion from any other evening at the Pops. Gone beyond recall are those "Harvard Nights" at which several unruly members of the audience tried to take upon themselves the task of directing the "Cruiser Harvard March" or "Our Director," and that resounded with cheering, singing and general hilarity.

In the meantime the "Harvard Night" that was last evening's Pop Concert proved a distinctly pleasurable one, bringing besides a most attractive orchestral programme eight numbers by the Glee Club and, for special event, the performance under the composer's direction of a Prelude by Walter Piston, conductor of the University Orchestra.

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

The program for the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight follows:

Military Polonaise.....Chopin
Overture, "L'Italiana in Algeria"...Rossini
Waltz, "Je t'aime".....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Faust".....Gounod
Entrance of the Knights, "Parsifal".Wagner
Trumpet solo, "Romanza".....Koslowa
Kurt Schmeisser
Miniature March.....Tchaikovsky
Hymn to the Sun, "Iris".....Mascagni
Rhapsody, "Espana".....Chabrier
Afro-American Songs...Arranged by Jacchia
March, "El Capitan".....Sousa

"POP" CONCERT TRIBUTE TO VICTOR HERBERT

Victor Herbert, whose death is mourned by the musical public in America, was honored at the "Pop" concert in Symphony Hall last night. Before the second group on the program Agide Jacchia gave as an extra number, the late composer's "Indian Summer." This is one of the several numbers which have long been favorites at the "Pops." In the course of many "Pops" seasons, no less than 24 selections from Herbert's operettas have been played.

POPS TONIGHT

Agide Jacchia will present the following program at the Pops concert in Symphony hall tonight, at which the Boston Teachers' Club will be present:

Military Polonaise.....Chopin
Overture to "L'Italiana in Algieri" Rossini
Waltz, "Je t'aime".....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Faust".....Gounod
Entrance of the Knights into the Temple of the Grail, "Parsifal" (Act 1).....Wagner
Trumpet solo, "Romanza".....Koslowa
Kurt Schmeisser
Miniature March.....Tchaikovsky
Hymn to the Sun from "Iris," Night, Dawn, Sunrise.....Mascagni
Rhapsody, "Espana".....Chabrier
Afro-American Songs. Arranged by Jacchia.
(a) "You May Bury Me in de Eas' "
(b) "Musieu Banjo"
(c) "Nobody Knows de Trouble I've Seen"
March, "El Capitan".....Sousa

American May 28

POPS LEADER HONORS HERBERT'S MEMORY

Victor Herbert, whose death is mourned by the musical public in America, was honored at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall last night. Before the second group on the programme Agide Jacchia performed, as an extra number, the late composer's "Indian Summer." This is one of several numbers which have long been favorites at the Pops. In the course of many Pop seasons, no less than twenty-four selections from Herbert's operettas have been performed.

The program tonight will be as follows:

Military Polonaise.....Chopin
Overture to "L' Italiana in Algeri."...Rossini
Waltz, "Je t'aime".....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Faust".....Gounod

Entrance of the Knights into the Temple of the Grail, "Parsifal," (Act I), Wagner
Trumpet solo—"Romanza".....Koslowa
Kurt Schmeisser
Miniature March.....Tchaikovsky
Hymn to the Sun from "Iris"....Mascagni
Night—Dawn—Sunrise

Rhapsody, "Espana".....Chabrier
Afro-American Songs. Arranged by Jacchia
a. "You may Bury Me in De Eas' "
b. "Musieu Banjo55
c. "Nobody Knows de Trouble I've Seen'.
March, "El Capitan".....Sousa

Monitor May 28

Tonight at the Pops

Military Polonaise.....Chopin
Overture to "L'Italiana in Algeri" Rossini
Waltz, "Je t'aime".....Waldteufel
Fantasia "Faust".....Gounod
Holy Grail Music, "Parsival"..Wagner
Trumpet Solo, "Romanza" (Kurt Schmeisser).....Koslowa
Miniature March.....Tschaikowsky
Hymn to the Sun, from "Iris" Mascagni
Rhapsody, 'Espafia".....Chabrier
Afro-American Folk Songs Arranged by Jacchia
March, "El Capitan".....Sousa

May 29.

AT THE POPS TONIGHT.

The following program will be performed at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

Cortege, "Queen of Sheba" ..... Gounod
Overture, "Merry Wives of Windsor".Nicolai
Rondo Capriccioso ..... Mendelssohn
Fantasia, Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Finale, "Scheherazade" ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
"Tacea la Notte Placida" ..... Verdi
Miss Iride Pilla.
Eili, Eili ..... Arranged by Jacchia
Bacchanale, "Samson and Delilah" Saint-Saens
Marche Slave ..... Tschaikowsky
Waltz, "Estudiantina" ..... Waldteufel
Furiana from "La Gioconda" ... Ponchielli

POPS TONIGHT

The following program will be performed at the Pops concert in Symphony hall tonight, at which members of Agide Jacchia's Boston Conservatory of Music will be present:

Cortege from "The Queen of Sheba" Gounod
Overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor" Nicolai
Rondo Capriccioso.....Mendelssohn
Fantasia, "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Finale, "Scheherazade"...Rimsky-Korsakov
"Tacea la Notte Placida" from "Il Trovatore" .....Verdi
Miss Iride Pilla.
Eili, Eili.....Arranged by Jacchia
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah" .....Saint-Saens
Marche Slave.....Tchaikovsky
Waltz, "Estudiantina".....Waldteufel
Furiana from "La Gioconda"....Ponchielli

Tribune May 29

At the Pops Tonight

Procession from "The Queen of Sheba" Gounod
Overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" .....Nicolai
Rondo Capriccioso .....Mendelssohn
Fantasia, "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Finale from the Suite "Scheherazade" Rimsky-Korsakov
Air from "Il Trovatore".....Verdi
Eili, Eili
Bacchanal from "Samson and Delilah" Saint-Saëns
Slavic March .....Chaikovsky
Waltz, "Estudiantina" .....Waldteufel
Furiana from "La Gioconda".Ponchielli

Conductor: A. Jacchia

Soloist: Iride Pilla

Monitor May 29

Tonight at the Pops

Cortège from "The Queen of Sheba" Gounod
Overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor".....Nicolai
Rondo Capriccioso Mendelssohn-Jacchia
Fantasia, "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Finale of "Schéhérazade" Rimsky-Korsakoff
Aria from "Il Trovatore".....Verdi
"Eili, Eili".....Arranged by Jacchia
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah".....Saint-Saëns
Marche Slave.....Tschaikowsky
Waltz, "Estudiantina"....Waldteufel
Furiana from "La Gioconda" Ponchielli

FRIDAY EVENING

March, "Lorraine".....Ganne
Prelude and Siciliana, "Cavalleria Rusticana".....Mascagni
Viennese Waltz.....Alden
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore".....Verdi
Polonaise, "Christmas Eve" Rimsky-Korsakoff
"Indian Summer," an American Idyll.....Herbert
Spanish Dance, "Cachuca"....Hadley
Finale, Fourth Symphony Tschaikowsky
Overture to "William Tell"...Rossini
"Ave Maria".....Bach-Gounod
"March of the Doughboys"..Dunham

May 31

POPS TONIGHT

The following program, featuring American composers, will be performed at the Pops concert in Symphony hall tonight:

March, "Lorraine" .....Ganne
Prelude and Siciliana, "Cavalleria Rusticana" .....Mascagni
Solo horn, Willem Valkenier
Viennese Waltz.....Alden
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore".....Verdi
Polonaise, "Christmas Eve"..Rimsky-Korsakov
"Indian Summer, An American Idyl"..Herbert
The Lark.....Glinka-Jacchia
Finale, Fourth Symphony.....Tschaikovsky
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Ave Maria.....Bach-Gounod
March of the Doughboys.....Dunham

Tonight at the Pops

HARVARD NIGHT

Triumphal March, "Aïda".....Verdi
Overture to "Rienzi".....Wagner
Fantasia "Pagliacci"....Leoncavallo
Harvard Glee Club,
Dr. Archibald T. Davison, Conductor
"Scènes Pittoresques".....Massenet
Prelude .....Walter Piston '24
First Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
Songs by Harvard Glee Club
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812," Tschaikowsky
Waltz, "Madeleine".....Waldteufel
March, "Veritas" .....Densmore

AT THE POPS

Agide Jacchia will present the following program at the Pop concert in Symphony hall tonight:

Military Polonaise, Chopin; Overture to "L'Italiana in Algieri," Rossini; Waltz, "Je t'aime," Waldteufel; Fantasia, "Faust," Gounod; Entrance of the Knights into the Temple of the Grail, ((Parsifal," (Act 1), Wagner; trumpet solo, "Romanza," Koslowa, (Kurt Schmeisser); Miniature March, Tchaikovsky; Hymn to the Sun from "Iris," (Night, Dawn, Sunrise). Mascagni; Rhapsody, "Espana," Chabrier; Afro-American songs, arranged by Jacchia, (a) "You May Bury Me in de Eas' " (b) "Musieu Banjo," (c) "Nobody Knows de Trouble I've Seen;" march, "El Capitan," Sousa.

TONIGHT'S PROGRAM AT POP CONCERT

The following programme will be performed at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

Cortege from "The Queen of Sheba".Gound
Overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor." Nicolai
Rondo Capriccioso .....Mendelssohn
Fantasia, "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Finale, "Scheherazade"....Rimsky-Korsakov
"Tacea la Notte Placida" from "Il Trovatore", ...Verdi
Miss Irida Pilla
Eili, Eili .....Arranged by Jacchia
Bacchanale from "Samson and Delilah" Saint-Saens
Marche Slave.....Tchaikowsky
Waltz, "Estudiantina".....Waldteufel
Furiana from "La Gioconda"....Ponchielli

HOLIDAY BILL AT POPS.

The following program, featuring American works, will be performed at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

March, "Lorraine" ..... Ganne
Prelude, "Cavalleria Rusticana"..Mascagni
Solo horn—Willem Valkenier.
Viennese Waltz ..... Alden
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore" ..... Verdi
America
Polonaise, "Christmas Eve" Rimsky-Korsakov
Indian Summer ..... Herbert
The Lark ..... Glinka-Jacchia
Finale, Fourth Symphony ..... Tchaikowsky
The Star Spangled Banner
Overture, "William Tell" .....Rossini
Ave Maria ..... Bach-Gounod
March of the Doughboys ..... Dunham

At the Pops Tonight

Military March.....Saint-Saens
Overture to "Mignon"..... Thomas
Waltz, "Blue Danube".....J. Strauss
Procession to the Cathedral from "Lohengrin" .....Wagner
Overture to "The Pirates of Penzance"—Fantasia from "Iolanthe" "The Lost Chord" for Trumpet—Selection from "Pinafore"...Sullivan
Dance of The Hours from "La Gioconda" .....Ponchielli
Ave Maria.....Schubert-Wilhelmj (Violin, Organ, Harp, and Strings)
Hungarian Dance, No. 1.....Brahms

Conductors:

A. Jacchia and, for the numbers from Sullivan, John C. Mullaly.

Soloist: Kurt Schmeisser.

"Pirates'" First Leader Conducts Pops at 77

Continued from Section A, page 1

for the violinist, there is none to match Kreisler. Ysaye, some think, is a rival; but Ysaye could not play the Beethoven, Mozart, and Brahms concertos as Kreisler plays them. In my opinion, Kreisler is the greatest violinist of all time."

Two more anecdotes, and the interview was over. One was of Gericke. It seems that there are conductors who like the horns to blow very, very hard. But Gericke, when he saw men doing it at the Boston Symphony, said to them:

"Do not play for two! Play for one. That is what you are paid for!"

And the other concerned Richard Strauss, who, leading an orchestra while playing the first violin—he had no interest in the baton—saw that several violinists worked like slaves at some passages, trying their hardest to follow the notes that had been written.

"Do not try to play those notes," Strauss said. "I did not mean them to be played when I wrote them. They cannot be played, as you know. So do not try. Just start at the top and come down to the bottom, anyway!"

The "shoot the chutes" on the violin! Whizz-bang!—from the highest note to the lowest.

"Well," said a music lover, not keen on Strauss, when I told him the story, "I've often wondered how he got these effects. But I'm not surprised. They don't sound like music!"

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

Herald May 31

MULLALY TO CONDUCT POPS

The specialty at the Pop concert in Symphony hall tonight will be a group of selections from the music of Sir Arthur Sullivan, to be conducted by John C. Mullaly, the veteran viola player of the orchestra, who was the principal conductor of the famous operettas when they were first heard in America. The program follows:

Military March, Saint-Saens; Overture to "Mignon," Thomas; Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube," Strauss; Procession to the Cathedral, "Lohengrin," Wagner; Overture to "The Pirates of Penzance, Sir Arthur Sullivan; Fantasy, "Iolanthe," Sir Arthur Sullivan; The Lost Chord, trumpet solo (Kurt Schmeisser), Sir Arthur Sullivan; Selection, Pinafore," (conducted by JoJhn C. Mullaly) Sir Arthur Sullivan; Dance of the Hours from "a Gioconda," Ponchielli; Ave Maria (solo violin, organ, harp and strings), Schubert-Wilhelmj; First Hungarian Dance, Brahms.

Herald

Special "Pop" Programs in Next Week's Bills

The only important music in Boston at this season of the year is at the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall. Agide Jacchia and the Pops orchestra furnish music for every degree of taste. During the coming week there will be a special group of Norwegian numbers on Wednesday and a Wagner program on Sunday, June 8. Tonight's program follows:

Military march ..... Saint-Saens
Overture to "Mignon" ..... Thomas
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" ..... Strauss
Procession to the Cathedral "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Overture to "The Pirates of Penzance"; fantasy, "Iolanthe"; "The Lost Chord"; solo trumpet, Kurt Schmeisser; selection "Pinafore" ..... Sir Arthur Sullivan
Conducted by John C. Mullaly.
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda" ..... Ponchielli
Ave Maria ..... Schubert-Wilhelmj
Solo violin, organ, harp and strings.
First Hungarian Dance ..... Brahms

Post June

FIFTH WEEK OF THE POPS

On Friday evening of this week the Pop Concert becomes the exclusive pleasure of the National Foreign Trade convention. All the other evenings are as usual open to the public, and for them Mr. Jacchia has made an attractive array of programmes. Conspicuous on Monday's list are excerpts from Tchaikovsky's charming "Nutcracker" suite, and a selection from the late Victor Herbert's tuneful operetta, "Orange Blossoms." On Tuesday the choir of the Boston Square and Compass Club will sing, and among the orchestral pieces are Verdi's lusty overture to "The Sicilian Vespers" and the compelling dances from Borodin's Tartar opera, "Prince Igor." A "Scandinavian programme" on Wednesday brings pieces by Grieg, Halvorsen and Svendsen. On Thursday's programme may be noted Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries" and the delightful scherzo from Chadwick's Sinfonietta. And the programme of Saturday evening brings such worthwhile numbers as Auber's overture to "Masaniello," Smetena's "Bartered Bride" overture and the waltzes from Richard Strauss' "Der Rosenkavalier."

Jacchia's Latest Pop Concert Features

AT the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall, Agide Jacchia's full-sized orchestra provides music for all tastes. Refreshments and sociable intercourse make the Pops the musical life of the Summer, par excellence.

Tomorrow night's program will feature Metra's "Spanish Waltz," Fantasia from "Thais," "Nutcracker" suite and Liszt's First Hungarian Rhapsody. Tuesday's program, Verdi's "Sicilian Vespers," fantasias from "Eugen Onegin" and "Lucia," Wagner's "Magic Fire Music," and Borodin's "Prince Igor" dances; Wednesday, special Norwegian music, with Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite, "Sigurd Jorslafar" and Svendsen's "Rhapsody and Romance"; Thursday, the "Oberon" Overture, "Iris" fantasia, "Rhapsody Espana," and Chadwick's "Scherzino."

Friday night will be monopolized by the National Foreign Trade Council convention. Saturday's program includes the "Rosencavalier" waltzes, Glinka's "Lark," "Bartered Bride" overture and other popular numbers. Next Sunday will bring a Wagner program.

TONIGHT'S POPS

The Pops Symphony Orchestra, under Agide Jacchia, will be heard in the following programs in Symphony hall tonight:

March, "The Favorite Regiment," Ertel; overture, "Morning, Noon and Night in Vienna," Suppe; waltz, "Spanish Serenade," Metra; fantasia, "Thais," Massenet; ballet suite, "Nutcracker," Tchaikovsky; Misere from "Il Trovatore," Verdi; prelude, Rachmoninov; First Hungarian Rhapsody, Liszt; selection, "Orange Blossoms," Herbert; Afro-American songs, arranged by Jacchia, (a) "You May Bury Me in de Eas'," (b) "Musicu Banjo," "Nobody Knows de Trouble I've Seen;" introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin," Wagner; Alma Mater.

Herald June 6

POPS TONIGHT SOLD OUT

The entire house for the Pops concert in Symphony hall tonight has been taken by the National Foreign Trade convention. There will be no tickets available for the public.

Chr June 2

BROWN NIGHT AT POPS.

Brown University grads will celebrate at the Pops tonight. The program follows:

March, "Favorite Regiment" ..... Ertel
Overture, "In Vienna" ..... Suppe
Walt, "Spanish Serenade" ..... Metra
Fantasia, "Thais" ..... Massenet
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker"... Tchaikovsky
Miserere, "Il Trovatore" ..... Verdi
Prelude ..... Rachmaninov
First Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Liszt
Brown Football Songs.
Selection, "Orange Blossoms" .... Herbert
Afro-American Songs..Arranged by Jacchia
Prelude, Act 3. "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Alma Mater.

American June 2

TONIGHT'S PROGRAM AT POPS CONCERT

The "Pops" Symphony Orchestra, under Agide Jacchia, will be heard in the following program in Symphony Hall tonight:

March, "The Favorite Regiment" ..... Ertel
Overture, "Morning, Noon and Night in Vienna" ..... Suppe
Waltz, "Spanish Serenade" ..... Metra
Fantasia, "Thais" ..... Massenet
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker" ..... Tchaikovsky
Miserere from "Il Trovatore" ..... Verdi
Prelude ..... Rachmaninov
First Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Liszt
Selection, "Orange Blossoms" ..... Herbert
Afro-American Songs...Arranged by Jacchia
(a) "You May Bury Me in de Eas'."
(b) "Musieu Banjo."
(c) "Nobody Knows de Trouble I've Seen."
Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner

Monitor June 2

Tonight at the Pops

March, "The Favorite Regiment," Ertel
Overture, "Morning, Noon and Night in Vienna" ..... Suppé
Waltz, "Spanish Serenade" ..... Metra
Fantasia, "Thaïs" ..... Massenet
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker," Tschaikowsky
Miserere from "Il Trovatore" ..... Verdi
Prelude ..... Rachmaninoff
First Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Liszt
BROWN FOOTBALL SONGS
Selection, "Orange Blossoms," Herbert
Afro-American Songs, Arranged by Jacchia
Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin," Wagner
ALMA MATER

POPS TONIGHT

The following program will be presented by the Pops Symphony Orchestra, under Agide Jacchia, in Symphony hall, tonight:

Coronation March ..... Svendsen
Overture to "The Sicilian Vespers" ..... Verdi
Fantasia, "Eugen Onegin" ..... Tchaikovsky
Boston Square and Compass Club Choir.
Magic Fire Music from "The Valkyrie" ..... Wagner
Serenade ..... Bruneau
Indian Dirge ..... Seydel
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor" ..... Borodin
Selection, "Lucia di Lammermoor" ..... Donizetti
Waltz, "Voices of Spring" ..... Strauss
Farandole ..... Bizet

Herald June 3

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

Coronation March ..... Svendsen
Overture to "The Sicilian Vespers" ..... Verdi
Fantasia, "Eugen Onegin" ..... Tschaikowsky
Boston Square and Compass Club Choir
Magic Fire Music from "Walküre" ..... Wagner
Serenade ..... Bruneau
Indian Dirge ..... Seydel
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor" ..... Borodin
Selection, "Lucia di Lammermoor" ..... Donizetti
Waltz, "Voices of Spring" ..... Strauss
Farandole ..... Bizet

AT THE POPS ONIGH.

Agide Jacchia has made up the following program for the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

Coronation March ..... Svendsen
Overture, "Sicilian Vespers" ..... Verdi
Fantasia, "Eugen Onegin" ..... Tschaikovsky
Boston Square and Compass Club Choir.
Magic Fire Music, "The Valkyries" ..... Wagner
Serenade ..... Bruneau
Indian Dirge ..... Seydel
Polovtsian Dances, "Prince Igor" ..... Borodin
Selection, "Lucia di Lammermoor" ..... Donizetti
Waltz, "Voices of Spring" ..... Strauss
Farandole ..... Bizet

Mr. Monteux in Paris

He Reappears as Conductor for the Russian Ballet

WITHIN a fortnight after his return to Paris, Mr. Monteux is at work again and, for the first time through five years, in the theatre. Mr. Diaghylev's Russian Ballet is making its annual visit to that city from the end of May to the end of June. There, at the Théâtre des Champs-Elysées, it is appearing, among other pieces, in three of Stravinsky's mimo-dramas: "Petruschka," "Le Sacre du Printemps" and "Les Noces." Of old, Mr. Monteux was conductor for it in "Petruschka" and "Le Sacre." Hearing of his return from Boston, Stravinsky and Mr. Diaghylev asked him to resume both and to take over, besides, "Les Noces," the composer's singular peasant-piece of last year. Mr. Monteux, pleased to return to the theatre—and in music in which he shines—promptly agreed. Already the Parisians have heard and applauded him. Presumably, he will also go to London in July with the Russian Ballet.

At the Pops Tonight

Coronation March ..... Svendsen
Overture to "The Sicilian Vespers" ..... Verdi
Fantasia, "Eugen Onégin" ..... Chalkovsky
Choral Numbers
Fire-Music from "Die Walküre" ..... Wagner
Serenade ..... Bruneau
Indian Dirge ..... Seydel
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor" ..... Borodin
Selection, "Lucia di Lammermoor" ..... Donizetti
Waltz, "Voices of Spring" ..... J. Strauss
Farandole ..... Bizet

Conductor: A. Jacchia
Assisting:
Boston Square and Compass Club Choir

THE POPS

The following program will be played this evening at Symphony hall:

"Coronation March," Svendsen; Overture to "The Sicilian Vespers," Verdi; Fantasia, "Eugen Onegin," Tchaikovsky; Boston Square and Compass Club Choir; Magic Fire Music from "The Valkyries," Wagner; Serenade, Bruneau; Indian Dirge, Seydel; Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor," Borodin; Selection, "Lucia di Lammermoor," Donizetti; Waltaz, "Voices of Spring," Strauss; Farendole, Bizet.

Monitor June 6

Tonight at the Pops

Entrance of the Boyards..Halvorsen
Overture to "Fingal's Cave" ..... Mendelssohn
Waltz, "Artist's Life" ..... Strauss
Fantasia, "La Bohème" ..... Puccini
Suite, "Peer Gynt" ..... Grieg
Romance, Violin Solo ..... Svendsen
Julius Theodorowicz
Waltz in A minor ..... Grieg-Jacchia
Norwegian Rhapsody, No. 2 ..... Svendsen
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda" ..... Ponchielli
Serenade ..... Pierné
Triumphant March, "Sigurd Jorsalfar" ..... Grieg

Her June 4

POPS CONCERT

Music of Scandinavian composers will be the feature at the Pops concert in Symphony hall tonight. The numbers follow:

Entrance of the Boyards ..... Halvorsen
Overture to "Fingal's Cave" ..... Mendelssohn
Waltz, "Artist's Life" ..... Strauss
Fantasia, "La Boheme" ..... Puccini
Suite, "Peer Gynt" ..... Grieg
Romance, Violin Solo ..... Svensen
Julius Theodorowicz
Waltz in A minor ..... Grieg-Jacchia
Norwegian Rhapsody, No. 2 ..... Svendsen
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda" ..... Ponchielli
Serenade ..... Pierne
Triumphant March, "Sigurd Jorsalfar" ..... Grieg

Globe June 4

AT THE POPS

Music of Scandinavian composers will be the feature at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight. The numbers follow:

Wednesday June 4. Scandinavian Program—Entrance of the Boyards, Halvorsen; Overture to "Fingal's Cave," Mendelssohn; Waltz, "Artist's Life," Strauss; Fantasia, "La Boheme," Puccini; Suite, "Peer Gynt," Greig; Romance, Violin Solo, Svendsen; Waltz in A minor Grieg-Jacchia; Norwegian Rhapsody, No. 2, Svendsen; Dance of the Hours, from "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; Serenade, Pierne; Triumphant March, "Sigurd Jorsalfar," Grieg.

At the Pops Tonight

Scandinavian Programme

Entrance of the Boyards ..... Halvorsen
Overture, "Fingal's Cave" ..... Mendelssohn
Waltz, "Artists' Life" ..... J. Strauss
Fantasia, "La Bohème" ..... Puccini
Suite, No. 1, from the Music to "Peer Gynt" ..... Grieg
Violin Solo, "Romance" ..... Svendsen
Waltz in A minor ..... Grieg-Jacchia
Norwegian Rhapsody, No. 2 ..... Svendsen
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda" ..... Ponchielli
Serenade ..... Pierne
Triumphal March from "Sigurd Jorsalfar" ..... Grieg

Conductor: A. Jacchia
Soloist: J. Theodorowicz

At the Pops Tonigh

Procession of Bacchus ..... Deli
Overture to "Oberon" ..... We Waltz, "Gay Butterfly" ..... Haw
Fantasia, "Iris" ..... Masca
Suite from the Ballet "Nutcracker" ..... Chaikovsky
Dream of Angels ..... Rubinstein
Scherzino from The Sinfonietta ..... Chadwick
Ride of the Valkyrs ..... Wagner
Rhapsody, "España" ..... Chabrier
Gavotte, "Camellia" ..... Jacchia
Invitation to the Dance ..... Weber-Berlios

Conductor: A. Jacchia

AT THE POPS TONIGHT.

Agide Jacchia has compiled the following program for the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

Procession of Bacchus ..... Delibes
Overture, "Oberon" ..... Weber
Waltz, "Gay Butterfly" ..... Hawley
Fantasia, "Iris" ..... Mascagni
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker" ..... Tschaikovsky
"Reve Angelique" ..... Rubinstein
Scherzino from "Sinfonietta" ..... Chadwick
Ride of the Valkyries ..... Wagner
Rhapsody, "Espana" ..... Chabrier
Camellia Gavotte ..... Jacchia
Invitation to the Dance ..... Weber Berlioz

Tribune June 6

Lovers of Good Music Should Take In the "Pops."

When Agide Jacchia and his band of 80 symphony players let loose on such classics as Strauss' "Blue Danube Waltz," the overture to Thomas' "Mignon" or the "Dance of the Hours" from Ponchielli's "La Gioconda" there is real music in the air. For a nominal fee those who cherish old and new compositions worthy of a symphony orchestra, most assuredly can obtain their fill at any of the Pop concerts being given nightly at Symphony hall, Boston. Last Saturday evening's program, besides the three numbers already mentioned, contained Saint-Saens' Military March, the wonderful cathedral procession music from Wagner's "Lohengrin," Schuberts' "Ave Maria," Brahms' First Hungarian Dance, and a group of Sir Arthur Sullivan numbers, including the overture to "The Pirates of Penzance," "Iolanthe" fantasy, "Pinafore" selection and "The Lost Chord." The Sullivan group was conducted by John C. Mullaly. The following sketch, of Mr. Mullaly's career, reprinted from the program, may be of interest to those who remember the Gilbert and Sullivan epoch and regret its passing and probably may be of interest to those of the younger generation who can sense the worth of Gilbert's lyrics and Sullivan's music:

"To all those who remember music and the theatre in Boston in the eighties, the name of John C. Mullaly will be familiar. The oldest living member of the Boston Symphony orchestra, his service as violinist from 1885 to 1890, and from 1905 to 1913 is but one aspect of his varied career. Born in Newcastle in 1847 of an Irish father and a Scotch mother, he came to the United States and to Boston as a small boy. As a remarkably talented youth of 16 he attracted public attention in the Civil war days, leading Gilmore's band. In the early 70s he first became known as conductor of the orchestras in the Boston theatre and in the Globe theatre, which stood on the corner of Essex and Washington streets. In these theatres and in the old Music hall on Hamilton place, he conducted the finest orchestras and orchestras of very indifferent ability, from the latter he had a reputation of inspiring remarkable results. He directed everything from 'Tannhauser' or 'The Dutchman,' with the greatest stars of the day, to a burlesque show, and all the intermediate gradations. He conducted the Pops in their second season, 1886, when they ran continuously for four months. For 29 summers he was the idol of Newport as the director fo the Casino orchestra there. But Mr. Mullaly's name is primarily connected with the operettas of Gilbert and Sullivan. When the craze for 'Patience,' 'Iolanthe,' 'Pinafore,' 'The Yeomen of the Guard,' 'The Gondolier,' and 'Mikado' seized everyone, Mr. Mullaly was at the fore of the movement, conducting all of them in many cities. He presided over the first American production of 'The Pirates of Penzance,' in 1888."

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of Brown University

March, "Favorite Regiment" ..... Ertel
Overture, "Morning, Noon and Night in Vienna" ..... Suppé
Waltz, "Spanish Serenade" ..... Metra
Fantasia, "Thais" ..... Massenet
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker" ..... Chaikovsky
Miserere from "Il Trovatore" ..... Verdi
Prelude ..... Rakhmanov
First Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Liszt
Brown Football Songs.
Selection, "Orange Blossoms" ..... Herbert
Afro-American Folk-Songs.
Introduction to Act III., "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

THE POPS

The following program will be played this evening at Symphony hall:

"Coronation March," Svendsen; Overture to "The Sicilian Vespers," Verdi; Fantasia, "Eugen Onegin," Tchaikovsky; Boston Square and Compass Club Choir; Magic Fire Music from "The Valkyries," Wagner; Serenade, Bruneau; Indian Dirge, Seydel; Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor," Borodin; Selection, "Lucia di Lammermoor," Donizetti; Waltaz, "Voices of Spring," Strauss; Farendole, Bizet.

Monitor June 6

Tonight at the Pops

Entrance of the Boyards..Halvorsen
Overture to "Fingal's Cave" ..... Mendelssohn
Waltz, "Artist's Life" ..... Strauss
Fantasia, "La Bohême" ..... Puccini
Suite, "Peer Gynt" ..... Grieg
Romance, Violin Solo ..... Svendsen
Julius Theodorowicz
Waltz in A minor ..... Grieg-Jacchia
Norwegian Rhapsody, No. 2 ..... Svendsen
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda" ..... Ponchielli
Serenade ..... Pierné
Triumphant March, "Sigurd Jorsalfar" ..... Grieg

Tonight at the Pops

Procession of Bacchus ..... Delibes
Overture to "Oberon" ..... Weber
Waltz, "Gay Butterfly" ..... Hawley
Fantasia, "Iris" ..... Mascagni
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker" ..... Tschaikowsky
"Rêve Angélique" (with organ) ..... Rubinstein
Scherzino from the Sinfonietta ..... Chadwick
Ride of the Valkyrs ..... Wagner
Rhapsody, "España" ..... Chabrier
Camellia Gavotte ..... Jacchia
"Invitation to the Dance" ..... Weber-Berlioz

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

Music by Scandinavian composers will be featured at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight. The program follows:

Entrance of the Boyards ..... Halvorsen
Overture, "Fingal's Cave" ..... Mendelssohn
Waltz, "Artist's Life" ..... Strauss
Fantasia, "La Boheme" ..... Puccini
Suite, "Peer Gynt" ..... Grieg
Romance, Violin Solo ..... Svendsen
Julius Theodorowicz
Waltz in A minor ..... Greig-Jacchia
Norwegian Rhapsody, No. 2 ..... Svendsen
Dance of the Hours ..... Ponchielli
Serenade ..... Pierne
March, "Sigurd Jorsalfar" ..... Grieg

MULLALY TO CONDUCT POPS

The specialty at the Pop concert in Symphony hall tonight will be a group of selections from the music of Sir Arthur Sullivan, to be conducted by John C. Mullaly, the veteran viola player of the orchestra, who was the principal conductor of the famous operettas when they were first heard in America. The program follows:

Military March, Saint-Saens; Overture to "Mignon," Thomas; Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube," Strauss; Procession to the Cathedral, "Lohengrin," Wagner; Overture to "The Pirates of Penzance, Sir Arthur Sullivan; Fantasy, "Iolanthe," Sir Arthur Sullivan; The Lost Chord, trumpet solo (Kurt Schmeisser), Sir Arthur Sullivan; Selection, Pinafore," (conducted by JoJhn C. Mullaly) Sir Arthur Sullivan; Dance of the Hours from "a Gioconda," Ponchielli; Ave Maria, (solo violin, organ, harp and strings), Schubert-Wilhelmj; First Hungarian Dance, Brahms.

Special "Pop" Programs in Next Week's Bills

The only important music in Boston at this season of the year is at the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall. Agide Jacchia and the Pops orchestra furnish music for every degree of taste. During the coming week there will be a special group of Norwegian numbers on Wednesday and a Wagner program on Sunday, June 8. Tonight's program follows:

Military march ..... Saint-Saens
Overture to "Mignon" ..... Thomas
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" ..... Strauss
Procession to the Cathedral "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Overture to "The Pirates of Penzance"; fantasy, "Iolanthe"; "The Lost Chord"; solo trumpet, Kurt Schmeisser; selection "Pinafore" ..... Sir Arthur Sullivan
Conducted by John C. Mullaly.
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda" ..... Ponchielli
Ave Maria ..... Schubert-Wilhelmj
Solo violin, organ, harp and strings.
First Hungarian Dance ..... Brahms

FIFTH WEEK OF THE POPS

On Friday evening of this week the Pop Concert becomes the exclusive pleasure of the National Foreign Trade convention. All the other evenings are as usual open to the public, and for them Mr. Jacchia has made an attractive array of programmes. Conspicuous on Monday's list are excerpts from Tchaikovsky's charming "Nutcracker" suite, and a selection from the late Victor Herbert's tuneful operetta, "Orange Blossoms." On Tuesday the choir of the Boston Square and Compass Club will sing, and among the orchestral pieces are Verdi's lusty overture to "The Sicilian Vespers" and the compelling dances from Borodin's Tartar opera, "Prince Igor." A "Scandinavian programme" on Wednesday brings pieces by Grieg, Halvorsen and Svendsen. On Thursday's programme may be noted Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries" and the delightful scherzo from Chadwick's Sinfonietta. And the programme of Saturday evening brings such worthwhile numbers as Auber's overture to "Masaniello," Smetena's "Bartered Bride" overture and the waltzes from Richard Strauss' "Der Rosenkavalier."

BROWN NIGHT AT POPS.

Brown University grads will celebrate at the Pops tonight. The program follows:

March, "Favorite Regiment" ..... Ertel
Overture, "In Vienna" ..... Suppe
Walt, "Spanish Serenade" ..... Metra
Fantasia, "Thais" ..... Massenet
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker" ... Tchaikovsky
Miserere, "Il Trovatore" ..... Verdi
Prelude ..... Rachmaninov
First Hungarian Rhapsody ..... Liszt
Brown Football Songs.
Selection, "Orange Blossoms" .... Herbert
Afro-American Songs..Arranged by Jacchia
Prelude, Act 3. "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner
Alma Mater.

TONIGHT'S PROGRAM AT POPS CONCERT

The "Pops" Symphony Orchestra, under Agide Jacchia, will be heard in the following program in Symphony Hall tonight:

March, "The Favorite Regiment".....Ertel
Overture, "Morning, Noon and Night in Vienna" ..... Suppe
Waltz, "Spanish Serenade".....Metra
Fantasia, "Thais".....Massenet
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker"... Tchaikovsky
Miserere from "Il Trovatore"..... Verdi
Prelude ..... Rachmaninov
First Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
Selection, "Orange Blossoms".....Herbert
Afro-American Songs...Arranged by Jacchia
(a) "You May Bury Me in de Eas'."
(b) "Musieu Banjo."
(c) "Nobody Knows de Trouble I've Seen."
Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner

Tonight at the Pops

March, "The Favorite Regiment," Ertel
Overture, "Morning, Noon and Night in Vienna" ..... Suppé
Waltz, "Spanish Serenade" ....Metra
Fantasia, "Thais" ..... Massenet
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker," Tschaikowsky
Miserere from "Il Trovatore"..Verdi
Prelude ..... Rachmaninoff
First Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
BROWN FOOTEALL SONGS
Selection, "Orange Blossoms," Herbert
Afro-American Songs, Arranged by Jacchia
Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin," Wagner
ALMA MATER

POPS TONIGHT

The following program will be presented by the Pops Symphony Orchestra, under Agide Jacchia, in Symphony hall, tonight:

Coronation March ..... Svendsen
Overture to "The Sicilian Vespers" ..... Verdi
Fantasia, "Eugen Onegin" ..... Tchaikovsky
Boston Square and Compass Club Choir.
Magic Fire Music from "The Valkyrie" .. Wagner
Serenade ..... Bruneau
Indian Dirge ..... Seydel
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor" .. Borodin
Selection, "Lucia di Lammermoor" ... Donizetti
Waltz, "Voices of Spring" ..... Strauss
Farandole ..... Bizet

Jacchia's Latest Pop Concert Features

AT the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall. Agide Jacchia's full-sized orchestra provides music for all tastes. Refreshments and sociable intercourse make the Pops the musical life of the Summer, par excellence.

Tomorrow night's program will feature Metra's "Spanish Waltz," fantasia from "Thais," "Nutcracker" suite and Liszt's First Hungarian Rhapsody. Tuesday's program, Verdi's "Sicilian Vespers," fantasias from "Eugen Onegin" and "Lucia," Wagner's "Magic Fire Music," and Borodin's "Prince Igor" dances; Wednesday, special Norwegian music, with Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite, "Sigurd Jorslafar" and Svendsen's "Rhapsody and Romance"; Thursday, the "Oberon" Overture, "Iris" fantasia, "Rhapsody Espana," and Chadwick's "Scherzino."

Friday night will be monopolized by the National Foreign Trade Council convention. Saturday's program includes the "Rosencavalier" waltzes, Glinka's "Lark," "Bartered Bride" overture and other popular numbers. Next Sunday will bring a Wagner program.

TONIGHT'S POPS

The Pops Symphony Orchestra, under Agide Jacchia, will be heard in the following programs in Symphony hall tonight:

March, "The Favorite Regiment," Ertel; overture, "Morning, Noon and Night in Vienna," Suppe; waltz, "Spanish Serenade," Metra; fantasia, "Thais," Massenet; ballet suite, "Nutcracker," Tchaikovsky; Miserere from "Il Trovatore," Verdi; prelude, Rachmoninov; First Hungarian Rhapsody, Liszt; selection, "Orange Blossoms," Herbert; Afro-American songs, arranged by Jacchia, (a) "You May Bury Me in de Eas'," (b) "Musieu Banjo," "Nobody Knows de Trouble I've Seen; introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin," Wagner; Alma Mater.

POPS TONIGHT SOLD OUT

The entire house for the Pops concert in Symphony hall tonight has been taken by the National Foreign Trade convention. There will be no tickets available for the public.

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of Brown University

March, "Favorite Regiment".....Ertel
Overture, "Morning, Noon and Night in Vienna" ..... Suppé
Waltz, "Spanish Serenade".....Metra
Fantasia, "Thais" ..... Massenet
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker"..Chaikovsky
Miserere from "Il Trovatore".....Verdi
Prelude ..... Rakhmanov
First Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
Brown Football Songs.
Selection, "Orange Blossoms"...Herbert
Afro-American Folk-Songs.
Introduction to Act III., "Lohengrin" ..... Wagner

Conductor: A. Jacchia.

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

Coronation March ..... Svendsen
Overture to "The Sicilian Vespers" ..... Verdi
Fantasia, "Eugen Onégin" ..... Tschaikowsky
Boston Square and Compass Club Choir.
Magic Fire Music from "Walküre" ..... Wagner
Serenade ..... Bruneau
Indian Dirge ..... Seydel
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor" ..... Borodin
Selection, "Lucia di Lammermoor" ..... Donizetti
Waltz, "Voices of Spring"....Strauss
Farandole ..... Bizet

AT THE POPS ONIGH.

Agide Jacchia has made up the following program for the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

Coronation March ..... Svendsen
Overture, "Sicilian Vespers"..... Verdi
Fantasia, "Eugen Onegin"....Tschaikovsky
Boston Square and Compass Club Choir.
Magic Fire Music, "The Valkyries"..Wagner
Serenade ..... Bruneau
Indian Dirge ..... Seydel
Polovtsian Dances, "Prince Igor"..Borodin
Selection, "Lucia di Lammermoor"..Donizetti
Waltz, "Voices of Spring"..... Strauss
Farandole ..... Bizet

Mr. Monteux in Paris

He Reappears as Conductor for the Russian Ballet

WITHIN a fortnight after his return to Paris, Mr. Monteux is at work again and, for the first time through five years, in the theatre. Mr. Diaghylev's Russian Ballet is making its annual visit to that city from the end of May to the end of June. There, at the Théâtre des Champs-Elysées, it is appearing, among other pieces, in three of Stravinsky's mimo-dramas: "Petruschka," "Le Sacre du Printemps" and "Les Noces." Of old, Mr. Monteux was conductor for it in "Petruschka" and "Le Sacre." Hearing of his return from Boston, Stravinsky and Mr. Diaghylev asked him to resume both and to take over, besides, "Les Noces," the composer's singular peasant-piece of last year. Mr. Monteux, pleased to return to the theatre—and in music in which he shines—promptly agreed. Already the Parisians have heard and applauded him. Presumably, he will also go to London in July with the Russian Ballet.

At the Pops Tonight

Coronation March ..... Svendsen
Overture to "The Sicilian Vespers" ..... Verdi
Fantasia, "Eugen Onégin"..Chaikovsky
Choral Numbers
Fire-Music from "Die Walküre..Wagner
Serenade ..... Bruneau
Indian Dirge ..... Seydel
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor" ..... Borodin
Selection, "Lucia di Lammermoor" ..... Donizetti
Waltz, "Voices of Spring"....J. Strauss
Farandole ..... Bizet

Conductor: A. Jacchia
Assisting:
Boston Square and Compass Club Choir

THE POPS

The following program will be played this evening at Symphony hall:

"Coronation March," Svendsen; Overture to "The Sicilian Vespers," Verdi; Fantasia, "Eugen Onegin," Tchaikovsky; Boston Square and Compass Club Choir; Magic Fire Music from "The Valkyries," Wagner; Serenade, Bruneau; Indian Dirge, Seydel; Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor," Borodin; Selection, "Lucia di Lammermoor," Donizetti; Waltaz, "Voices of Spring," Strauss; Farendole, Bizet.

Tonight at the Pops

Entrance of the Boyards..Halvorsen
Overture to "Fingal's Cave" ..... Mendelssohn
Waltz, "Artist's Life".....Strauss
Fantasia, "La Bohême".....Puccini
Suite, "Peer Gynt".....Grieg
Romance, Violin Solo.....Svendsen
Julius Theodorowicz
Waltz in A minor.....Grieg-Jacchia
Norwegian Rhapsody, No. 2..Svendsen
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda" ..... Ponchielli
Serenade ..... Pierné
Triumphant March, "Sigurd Jorsalfar" ..... Grieg

POPS CONCERT

Music of Scandinavian composers will be the feature at the Pops concert in Symphony hall tonight. The numbers follow:

Entrance of the Boyards..... Halvorsen
Overture to "Fingal's Cave"..... Mendelssohn
Waltz, "Artist's Life"..... Strauss
Fantasia, "La Boheme"..... Puccini
Suite, "Peer Gynt"..... Grieg
Romance, Violin Solo..... Svensen
Julius Theodorowicz
Waltz in A minor..... Grieg-Jacchia
Norwegian Rhapsody, No. 2..... Svendsen
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda" ..... Ponchielli
Serenade ..... Pierne
Triumphant March, "Sigurd Jorsalfar"...Grieg

AT THE POPS

Music of Scandinavian composers will be the feature at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight. The numbers follow:

Wednesday June 4, Scandinavian Program—Entrance of the Boyards, Halvorsen; Overture to "Fingal's Cave," Mendelssohn; Waltz, "Artist's Life," Strauss; Fantasia, "La Boheme," Puccini; Suite, "Peer Gynt," Greig; Romance, Violin Solo, Sverdsen; Waltz in A minor Grieg-Jacchia; Norwegian Rhapsody, No. 2, Svendsen; Dance of the Hours, from "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; Serenade, Pierne; Triumphant March, "Sigurd Jorsalfar," Grieg.

At the Pops Tonight

Scandinavian Programme

Entrance of the Boyards.....Halvorsen
Overture, "Fingal's Cave"..Mendelssohn
Waltz, "Artists' Life".....J. Strauss
Fantasia, "La Bohème".....Puccini
Suite, No. 1, from the Music to "Peer Gynt" ..... Grieg
Violin Solo, "Romance"..... Svendsen
Waltz in A minor.....Grieg-Jacchia
Norwegian Rhapsody, No. 2...Svendsen
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda" ..... Ponchielli
Serenade ..... Pierné
Triumphal March from "Sigurd Jorsalfar" ..... Grieg

Conductor: A. Jacchia
Soloist: J. Theodorowicz

At the Pops Tonight

Procession of Bacchus.....Delibes
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Waltz, "Gay Butterfly".....Hawley
Fantasia, "Iris".....Mascagni
Suite from the Ballet "Nutcracker" ..... Chaikovsky
Dream of Angels.....Rubinstein
Scherzino from The Sinfonietta..Chadwick
Ride of the Valkyrs.....Wagner
Rhapsody, "España".....Chabrier
Gavotte, "Camellia".....Jacchia
Invitation to the Dance...Weber-Berlioz

Conductor: A. Jacchia

AT THE POPS TONIGHT.

Agide Jacchia has compiled the following program for the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

Procession of Bacchus.....Delibes
Overture, "Oberon" ..... Weber
Waltz, "Gay Butterfly" ..... Hawley
Fantasia, "Iris" ..... Mascagni
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker"...Tschaikovsky
"Reve Angelique" ..... Rubinstein
Scherzino from "Sinfonietta"....Chadwick
Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner
Rhapsody, "Espana" ..... Chabrier
Camellia Gavotte ..... Jacchia
Invitation to the Dance.....Weber Berlioz

Tonight at the Pops

Procession of Bacchus.....Delibes
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Waltz, "Gay Butterfly".....Hawley
Fantasia, "Iris".....Mascagni
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker" ..... Tschaikowsky
"Rêve Angélique" (with organ) ..... Rubinstein
Scherzino from the Sinfonietta ..... Chadwick
Ride of the Valkyrs.....Wagner
Rhapsody, "España".....Chabrier
Camellia Gavotte .....Jacchia
"Invitation to the Dance" ..... Weber-Berlioz

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

Music by Scandinavian composers will be featured at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight. The program follows:

Entrance of the Boyards.....Halvorsen
Overture, "Fingal's Cave.....Mendelssohn
Waltz, "Artist's Life".....Strauss
Fantasia, "La Boheme".....Puccini
Suite, "Peer Gynt".....Grieg
Romance, Violin Solo.....Svendsen
Julius Theodorowicz
Waltz in A minor.....Greig-Jacchia
Norwegian Rhapsody, No. 2.....Svendsen
Dance of the Hours.....Ponchielli
Serenade ..... Pierne
March, "Sigurd Jorsalfar".....Grieg

Lovers of Good Music Should Take In the "Pops."

When Agide Jacchia and his band of 80 symphony players let loose on such classics as Strauss' "Blue Danube Waltz," the overture to Thomas' "Mignon" or the "Dance of the Hours" from Ponchielli's "La Gioconda" there is real music in the air. For a nominal fee those who cherish old and new compositions worthy of a symphony orchestra, most assuredly can obtain their fill at any of the Pop concerts being given nightly at Symphony hall, Boston. Last Saturday evening's program, besides the three numbers already mentioned, contained Saint-Saens' Military March, the wonderful cathedral procession music from Wagner's "Lohengrin," Schuberts' "Ave Maria," Brahms' First Hungarian Dance, and a group of Sir Arthur Sullivan numbers, including the overture to "The Pirates of Penzance," "Iolanthe" fantasy, "Pinafore" selection and "The Lost Chord." The Sullivan group was conducted by John C. Mullaly. The following sketch, of Mr. Mullaly's career, reprinted from the program, may be of interest to those who remember the Gilbert and Sullivan epoch and regret its passing and probably may be of interest to those of the younger generation who can sense the worth of Gilbert's lyrics and Sullivan's music:

"To all those who remember music and the theatre in Boston in the eighties, the name of John C. Mullaly will be familiar. The oldest living member of the Boston Symphony orchestra, his service as violinist from 1885 to 1890, and from 1905 to 1913 is but one aspect of his varied career. Born in Newcastle [illegible] of an Irish father and a [illegible] mother, he came to the Unit[illegible]es and to Boston as a small [illegible]s a remarkably talented youth [illegible]e attracted public attention [illegible] Civil war days, leading Gil[illegible] band. In the early 70s he [illegible] came known as conductor of [illegible]estras in the Boston theatre [illegible]he Globe theatre, which stood [illegible]orner of Essex and Washing[illegible]ets. In these theatres and in [illegible]old Music hall on Hamilton [illegible]e conducted the finest orches[illegible]and orchestras of very indif[illegible]t ability, from the latter he had [illegible]eputation of inspiring remarkable [illegible]ults. He directed everything [illegible]om 'Tannhauser' or 'The Dutch[illegible]man,' with the greatest stars of the day, to a burlseque show, and all the intermediate gradations. He conducted the Pops in their second season, 1886, when they ran continuously for four months. For 29 summers he was the idol of Newport as the director fo the Casino orchestra there. But Mr. Mullaly's name is primarily connected with the opera[illegible] of Gilbert and Sullivan. When [illegible]fer 'Patience,' 'Iolanthe,' [illegible]e Yeomen of the [illegible]ondolier,' and 'Mikado' [illegible] Mr. Mullaly was at [illegible]ovement, conduct[illegible]n many cities. He [illegible]he first American [illegible]The Pirates of Pen-

Monitor June 9

At the Pops Tonight

Evening of Technology

Stars and Stripes Forever.....Sousa
Overture to "Phedre".....Massenet
Waltz, "Blue Danube".....Strauss
Tech Songs
Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana"
Mascagni
Serenade .....Schubert-Wilhelm
Marche Slave .....Tchaikovsky
Tech Songs
Selection, "Wildflower"
Youmans-Stothart
Largo .....Handel
American Patrol.....Meacham

Conductor: A. Jacchia

Adv June 9.

TECH NIGHT AT POPS

Tech will celebrate at the Pops tonight. The concert is open to the public. The program follows:

Stars and Stripes Forever.....Sousa
Overture, "Phedre".....Massenet
Waltz "Blue Danube".....Strouss
Tech Songs.
Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana"..Mascagni
Serenade .....Schubert-Wilhelmj
Marche Slave .....Tchaikovsky
Tech Songs.
Selection, "Wildflower"...Youmans-Stothart
Largo .....Handel
American Patrol .....Meacham

Transcript June 7

PROGRESS OF THE POPS

The Turn of the Series—Sunday for a "Wagner Evening"—New Numbers of Many Kinds on the Programmes for Next Week

WITH only four weeks more to run, the Pop Concerts afford increasing interest and pleasure. The orchestra remains at full summer strength; Mr. Jacchia, conducting, spares not in pains; while the audience has the satisfaction of the music and of such incidentals as good things to eat, drink and smoke. In particular, the programmes for next week are agreeably diversified. They begin tomorrow, Sunday, with a "Wagner Evening," at which these numbers from his operas, early, middle and late, will be played:

Overture to "The Fairies"
Closing Scene from "Tristan and Isolde"
Entrance of the Gods into Valhalla from "Das Rheingold"
Fire-Music from "Die Walküre"
Introduction, Dance of Apprentices, Homage to Sachs, from "Die Meistersinger" (Act III.)
Scene of the Grail-Knights from "Parsifal"
Procession to The Cathedral from "Lohengrin"
Overture to "Rienzi"

In the course of the week Monday brings the annual evening of the Institute of Technology, with two groups of "Tech Songs" and Mr. Speyer playing a solo for English horn. On Tuesday the orchestra will sing the Quartet from "Rigoletto" and be heard also in a Fantasia from Wagner's "Die Walküre." On Wednesday Mr. Jacchia will mark a "Southern Night" by his own arrangement of the song, "Old Kentucky Home" and a "Southern Rhapsody" by Hosmer. On Thursday comes a notable addition to the repertory, Casella's ornate and vivid version for orchestra of Balakirev's tumultuous piano-piece, "Islamey."

Telegram June 9.

THE NIGHT AT POPS

The annual Technology night at the Pops will take place in Symphony Hall tonight. This concert which is open to the public, will have the following program:

"Stars and Stripes Forever," Sousa; overture to "Phedre," Massanet; waltz, "Blue Danube," Strauss; Tech songs; fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mascagni; "Serenade," Schubert-Wilhelmj; "Marche Slave," Tchaikovsky; Tech songs; selection, "Wildflower," Youmans-Stothart; "Largo," Handel; "American Patrol," Meacham.

Monitor June 9

Tonight at the Pops

TECH NIGHT

"Stars and Stripes Forever"..Sousa
Overture to "Phedre".....Massenet
Waltz, "Blue Danube".....Strauss
Tech Songs
Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana,"
Mascagni
Serenade .....Schubert-Wilhelmj
Marche Slave.....Tschaikowsky
Tech Songs
Selection, "Wildflower,"
Youmans-Stothart
Largo .....Handel
American Patrol.....Meacham

American June 11

SOUTHERN AIRS ON PROGRAM AT POPS

Music from the South will be the feature of the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight. The numbers follow:

Overture to "Orpheus".....Offenbach
Waltz, "Tales from the Vienna Woods"
Strauss
a. "Old Kentucky Home".....Foster
Orchestrated by Agide Jacchia
b. "Dixie".....Emmett
Fantasia, "Pagliacci".....Leoncavallo
Southern Rhapsody .....Hosmer
Aragonaise from "Carmen".....Bizet
The Rosary .....Nevin
Solo trumpet—Georges Mager
Hymn to the Sun from "Iris".....Mascagni
Night—Dawn—Sunrise
Prelude to 'Lohengrin".....Wagner
March of the Little Lead Soldiers.....Pierne
Selection of Southern Airs.....Bendix

Trans June 11

At the Pops Tonight

Overture to "Orpheus"..Offenbach
Waltz,
"Tales from the Vienna Woods"
Strauss
a. "Old Kentucky Home"....Foster
Orchestrated by Agide Jacchia
b. "Dixie" .....Emmett
Fantasia, "Pagliacci"..Leoncavallo
Southern Rhapsody .....Hosmer
Aragonaise from "Carmen"...Bizet
The Rosary .....Nevin
Solo trumpet, Georges Mager
Hymn to the Sun from "Iris"
Mascagni
Night—Dawn—Sunrise
Prelude to "Lohengrin" ..Wagner
March of the Little Lead Soldiers,
Pierne
Selection of Southern Airs..Bendix

Conductor: A. Jacchia

Monitor June 11

Tonight at the Pops

Overture to "Orpheus"....Offenbach
Waltz, "Tales from the Vienna Woods" .....Strauss
(a) "My Old Kentucky Home,"
Foster-Jacchia
(b) "Dixie" .....Emmett
Fantasia, "Pagliacci" ...Leoncavallo
Southern Rhapsdy.....Hosmer
Aragonaise from "Carmen"....Bizet
"The Rosary" (Solo Trumpet)..Nevin
Hymn to the Sun from "Iris,"
Mascagni
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
March of the Little Lead Soldiers,
Pierné
Selection of Southern Airs...Bendix

Herald June 12

TONIGHT'S POPS

Agide Jacchia has made the following program for the Pop concert in Symphony hall tonight, at which members of Euclid lodge will be present in numbers:

March, "Freedom".....Curry
Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream"
Mendelssohn
Spanish Serenade .....Glazounov
Fantasia, "Rigoletto".....Verdi
Capriccio—Pastorale—Burlesca
Scarlatti-Jacchia
Selection from "The Caddie Girl"
Harlow and Young
1924 Filene Show
Conducted by Ralph L. Harlow
Serenade, "Chorus of the Night".....Dennee
"Islamey," Oriental Fantasy
Balakirev-Casella
Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner
Volga Bargemen's Song
Arranged by Agide Jacchia
Waltz, "Pomone".....Waldteufel

Adv June 12

TONIGHT'S POP PROGRAM.

Agide Jacchia offers the following program for the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight, at which members of Euclid Lodge will be present:

March, "Freedom" .....Curry
Overture, "Midsummer Night's Dream"
Mendelssohn
Spanish Serenade .....Glazounov
Fantasia, "Rigoletto" .....Verdi
Capriccio-Pastorale-Burlesca.
Scarlatti-Jacchia
Selection from "The Caddie Girl"
Harlow and Young
1924 Filene Show, conducted by Ralph L. Harlow.
Serenade, "Chorus of the Night"....Dennee
"Islamey," Oriental Fantasy
Balakirev-Casella
Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner
Volga Boat Song.....Arr. by Jacchia
Waltz, "Pomone" .....Waldteufel

Ind June 11

AT THE POPS

Music from the South will be the feature of the Pop concert in Symphony hall tonight. The numbers follow:

Overture to "Orpheus," Offenbach; Waltz, "Tales from the Vienna Woods," Strauss; a. "Old Kentucky Home," Foster; b. "Dixie," Emmett; Fantasia, "Pagliacci," Leoncavallo; Southern Rhapsody, Hosmer; Aragonaise from "Carmen," Bizet; The Rosary, Nevin; Solo trumpet—George Mager; Hymn to the Sun from "Iris," Mascagni; Night-Dawn-Sunrise; Prelude to "Lohengrin," Wagner; March of the Little Lead Soldiers, Pierne; Selection of Southern Airs, Bendix.

American June 12

LODGE NIGHT AT POP CONCERT

Agide Jacchia has made the following programs for the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight, at which members of Euclid Lodge will be present in numbers:

March, "Freedom" ..... Curry
Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" ..... Mendelssohn
Spanish Serenade ..... Glazounov
Fantasia, "Rigoletto" ..... Verdi
Capriccio, Pastorale, Burlesca,
Scarlatti-Jacchia.
Selection from "The Caddie Girl," 1924
Filene Show ..... Harlow and Young
Conducted by Ralph L. Harlow.
Serenade, "Chorus of the Night" ....Dennee
"Islamey," Oriental Fantasy,
Balakirev-Casella.
Ride of the Valkyries ..... Wagner
Volga Bargemen's Song, arranged by Agide Jacchia
Waltz, "Pomone" ..... Waldteufel

Monitor June 13

Tonight at the Pops

"Washington Post" .....Sousa
Overture to "La Gazza Ladra,"
Rossini
Waltz, "Girls of Baden"....Komzak
Fantasia, "Carmen" .....Bizet
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker,"
Tschaikowsky
"Ave Maria" .....Schubert-Wilhelmj
"Midsummer" .....MacDowell
Overture, "Tannhäuser" ....Wagner
Selection, "I Lombardi" .....Verdi
Kammenoi Ostrow (with Organ),
Rubenstein
Slavonic Dance No. 8.....Dvořák

Ind June 12

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

The Pops Symphony Orchestra, under Agide Jacchia, will present the following program in Symphony Hall tonight:

March, "Washington Post".....Sousa
Overture, "La Gazza Ladra".....Rossini
Waltz, "Girls of Baden".....Komzak
Fantasia, "Carmen".....Bizet
Ballet suite, "Nutcracker"....Tchaikovsky
"Ave Maria" ..... Schubert-Wilhelmj
"Midsummer" .....MacDowell
Overture, "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner
Selection, "I Lombardi".....Verdi
Kammenio Ostrow .....Rubinstein
Eighth Slavonic Dance.....Dvorak

Ind June 12

TONIGHT'S POPS

Agide Jacchia has made the following program for the Pop concert in Symphony hall tonight, at which members of Euclid lodge will be present in numbers:

March, "Freedom," Curry; Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Mendelssohn; Spanish Serenade, Glazounov; Fantasia, "Rigoletto," Verdi; Capriccio—Pastorale—Burlesca, Scarlatti-Jacchia; Selection from "The Caddie Girl," Harlow and Young; 1924 Filene Show, conducted by Ralph L. Harlow; Serenade, "Chorus of the Night," Dennee; "Islamey," Oriental Fantasy, Balakirev-Casella; Ride of the Valkyries, Wagner; Volga Bargemen's Song, arranged by Agide Jacchia; Waltz "Pomone," Waldteufel.

Trans June 12

At the Pops Tonight

March, "Washington Post".....Sousa
Overture to "La Gazza Ladra"..Rossini
Waltz, "Girls of Baden".....Komzak
Fantasia, "Carmen".....Bizet
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker".Tchaikovsky
a. Miniature Overture
b. Dance of the Sugar Fairy
c. Trépak
Ave Maria.....Schubert-Wilhelmj
Solo violin, organ, harp and strings
Midsummer ..... MacDowell
Overture, "Tannhäuser".....Wagner
Selection, "I Lombardi".....Verdi
Kammenoi Ostrow (with organ)
Rubenstein
Eighth Slavonic Dance.....Dvorak

Agide Jacchia, Conductor

American June 13

TONIGHT'S PROGRAM AT POP CONCERT

The Pops Symphony Orchestra under Agide Jacchia will present the following program in Symphony Hall tonight:

March, "Washington Post" ..... Sousa
Overture to "La Gazza Ladra" ... Rossini
Waltz, "Girls of Baden" ..... Komzak
Fantasia, "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Ballet Suite "Nutcracker" .. Tchaikowsky
a.—Miniature Overture.
b.—Dance of the Sugar Fairy.
c.—Trepak.
Ave Maria ..... Schubert-Willhelmj
Solo violin, organ, harp and strings.
Midsummer ..... McDowell
Overture, "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner
Selection, "I Lombardi" ..... Verdi
Kammenoi Ostrow (with organ), Rubinstein
Eighth Slavonic Dance ..... Dvorak

Trans June 16

At the Pops Tonight

THE whole of Symphony Hall has been taken for this [Monday] evening by the students and friends of Boston University. The Pop Concert is, therefore, closed to the public.

Globe June 13

EUCLID NIGHT AT THE POPS A SUCCESS

Euclid Lodge Night at the Pop concert will be especially remembered by Masons, for it partook somewhat of the nature of a craft affair. In the first place, Mr Jacchia, conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, is a member of the famed daylight organization, which, as a matter of fact, is made up largely of the professional class, skilled instrumentalists and vocalists included.

Besides Mr Jacchia, not a few of the members of the orchestra are members of Euclid, and the program last evening, quite appropriately, included compositions by Euclid's own family of artists.

Mr Charles Dennee of the New England Conservatory, who is a past master of the lodge, was heard in pianoforte numbers; Mr Ralph L. Harlow, also a former master of Euclid, presented some of the successes of the Filene employes' production, "The Caddie Girl," and Arthur Curry entertained with an original march.

There was a large attendance of Euclid members and others of the Masonic fraternity, occupying especially reserved places. Mr Stuart Mason, present master, and most of the officers of the lodge were among those present.

Appreciation was shown of the special as well as the general features of the fine program. Mr Jacchia frequently bowed his acknowledgments and those who contributed the extras shared in the approval generously bestowed.

Herald June 14

POPS TONIGHT

Music of the late Victor Herbert, always a favorite at the Pops' concerts, will be a feature of tonight's program at Symphony hall. The numbers follow:

"Stars and Stripes Forever".....Sousa
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Waltz, "To Thee".....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Aida".....Verdi
Indian Summer, An American
Selection, "Mlle. Modiste"....
Prelude to Act III, "Natoma"..
Indian Summer, An American Idyll ..... } Victor Herbert 1859-1924
Irish Rhapsody.....
Prelude to "The Mastersingers".....Wagner
Petite Serenade.....Palmer
Rakoczy March.....Berlioz

Adv June 14

VICTOR HERBERT NIGHT AT THE POP CONCERTS

Music of the late Victor Herbert, always a favorite at the Pops, will be a feature of tonight's concert in Symphony Hall. The numbers follow:

Stars and Stripes Forever ..... Sousa
Overture to "William Tell" ..... Rossini
Waltz, "To Thee" ..... Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Aida" ..... Verdi
Selection, "Mlle. Modiste"....
Prelude to Act III., "Natoma"
Indian Summer, An American Idyll ..... } Victor Herbert
Irish Rhapsody .....
Prelude to "The Mastersingers"....Wagner
Petite Serenade ..... Palmer
Rakoczy March.....Berlioz

Tel June 14

HERBERT NIGHT AT POPS

Music of the late Victor Herbert, always a favorite at the Pops, will be a feature of tonight's concert in Symphony hall. The numbers follow:

Stars and Stripes Forever, Sousa; Overture to "William Tell", Rossini; Waltz, "To Thee," Waldteufel; Fantasia, "Aida," Verdi; Selection, "Mlle. Modiste," Prelude to Act III, "Natoma," Indian Summer, An American Idyll, Irish Rhapsody, Victor Herbert 1859-1924; Prelude to "The Mastersingers," Wagner; Petite Serenade, Palmer; Rakoczy March, Berlioz.

Monitor June 14

Tonight at the Pops

"Stars and Stripes Forever"..Sousa
Overture to "William Tell"..Rossini
Waltz, "To Thee" .....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Aida" .....Verdi
Selection, "Mlle. Modiste,"
Prelude to Act III, "Natoma,"
Indian Summer, an American Idyll,
Irish Rhapsody
Victor Herbert, 1859-1924
Prelude to "Maestersinger"..Wagner
Petite Serenade .....Palmer
Hungarian March, "Rakoczy," Berlioz

Trans June 12

At the Pops Tonight

March, "Freedom".....Curry
Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" .....Mendelssohn
Spanish Serenade .....Glazunov
Fantasia, "Rigoletto" .....Verdi
Capriccio—Pastorale—Burlesca
Scarlatti-Jacchia
Selection from "The Caddie Girl," 1924
Filene Show.....Harlow and Young
Conducted by Ralph L. Harlow
Serenade, "Chorus of the Night".Dennée
"Islamey," Oriental Fantasy
Balakirev-Casella
Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner
Volga Bargemen's Song
Arranged by Agide Jacchia
Waltz, "Pomone" .....Waldteufel

SEVENTH WEEK OF POPS

Three more weeks remain of the present season of Pop concerts at Symphony hall, where the music provided by Mr. Jacchia of the Pops Symphony orchestra is combined with the sociability inseparable from this institution. Tomorrow's concert has been entirely taken by Boston University. The program of the week folow:

TUESDAY

March, National Emblem.....Gately
Overture to "The Barber of Seville....Rossini
Waltz, "Gold and Silver".....Lehar
Fantasia, "La Boheme".....Puccini
Northern Rhapsody.....Hosmer
Ave Maria.....Bach-Gounod
(Solo violin, harp, organ and strings)
Indian War Dance.....Skilton
Overture Solenelle, "1812".....Tchaikovsky
Boston College Medley.....Carey Martin
Intermezzo from "Pagliacci".....Leoncavallo
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube"
Strauss

WEDNESDAY

Spanish Program
March, "Los Benderilleros".....Volpatti
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"..Mozart
Spanish Serenade.....Glazounov
Fantasia, "Don Carlos".....Verdi
A Night in Seville.....Albeniz
Intermezzo from "Goyesca".....Granados
"Clavelitos".....Valverde-Jacchia
Rhapsody, "Espana".....Chabrier
Suite from "Carmen".....Bizet
Spanish Waltz, "El Turia".....Granado
March, "La Mattchiche".....Borel-Clerc

THURSDAY

Pomp and Circumstance.....Elgar
Overture to "Sakuntala".....Goldmark
Waltz, "Tendresse".....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Faust".....Gounod
Roumanian Rhapsody.....Enesco
Gipsy Dance from "Carmen".....Bizet
Liebeslied.....Kreisler
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"
Wagner
Selection, "Wildflower"..Youmans-Stothart
Afroc-American Songs.....Arr. by Jacchia
(a) You May Bury Me in de Eas'
(b) Musieu Banjo
(c) Nobody Knows de Trouble I've Seen
American Fantasy.....Herbert

FRIDAY

Military March.....Schubert
Overture to "Poet and Peasant"....Suppé
Viola d'Amore Solo: Gavotte.....Bach
Paul Shirley
Fantasia, "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Ballet Suite, "Sylvia".....Delibes
Phantomes.....Chalov
By the Waters of Minnetonka
Lieurance-Jacchia
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor"
Borodin
The Willow Plate.....Herbert
The Mardarin's Garden
The Little Garden House
Chang the Lover
King Shee
A Wedding Procession
Waltz, "Estudiantina".....Waldteufel
Procession of the Sardar
Ippolitov-Ivanov

SATURDAY

Overture to "La Forza del Destino".....Verdi
Entr'acte Valse.....Hellmesberger
Macushla (Trumpet—Georges Mager)
MacMorough-Jacchia
Dance of the Hours, from "La Gioconda".....Ponchielli
Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin"....Tchaikovsky
Violin solo, "Carmen" Fantasia..Bizet-Sarasate
Nicholai Kassman
Deep River.....Burleigh-Jacchia
Overture to "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner
Fantasia, "Lucia di Lammermoor"....Donizetti
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song".....Strauss
March, "Liberty Bell".....Sousa

SUNDAY, JUNE 22

Russian Program
Polonaise.....Liadov
Kamarinskaya.....Glinka
Eili, Eili.....Arr. by Jacchia
Preiude.....Rachmaninov
Islamey.....Balakirev-Casella
Finale, "Scheherazade".....Rimsky-Korsakov
Spanish Serenade.....Glazounov
Kammenoi Ostrov.....Rubinstein
Orientale.....Cui-Jacchia
Marche Slave.....Tchaikovsky

POPS PROGRAM

The following program will be performed at the Pop Concert in Symphony hall tonight, members of Boston College being present:

March, "National Emblem".....Gately
Overture to "The Barber of Seville"..
Rossini
Waltz, "Gold and Silver".....Lehar
Fantasia, "La Boheme".....Puccini
Northern Rhapsody.....Hosmer
Ave Maria.....Bach-Gounod
Solo, violin, harp, organ and strings.
Indian War Dance.....Skilton
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"..Tchaikovsky
Boston College Medley.....Carey-Martin
Intermezzo from "Pagliacci"..Leoncavallo
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube".....Strauss

Many Novelties in Next Week's "Pop" Program

The Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall are about to open their seventh week and will come to an end with the beginning of next month. Much music of interest is promised for the coming week by Agide Jacchia and the Pops Orchestra. There will be unusual variety and interest in a Spanish program next Wednesday and the Friday program will bring a viola d'amore solo. The Saturday bill will yield a trumpet solo, as well as a violin solo by Nicholai Kassman. Tonight's program follows:

"Stars and Stripes Forever".....Sousa
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Waltz, "To Thee".....Waldteufel
Fantasia "Aida".....Verdi
Selection, "Mlle. Modiste"; prelude to Act III, "Natoma"; "Indian Summer," "An American Idyll," "Irish Rhapsody," (1850-1924).....Victor Herbert
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg".....Wagner
"Petite Serenade".....Palmer
"Rakoczy March".....Berlioz

Programs of the Week

SYMPHONY HALL—"The Pops," Agide Jacchia, conductor. Evenings at 8:15. There is no concert tonight, and the concert tomorrow night is sold out to Boston University, thus not open to the public.

Tuesday—March, "National Emblem," Gately; overture to "The Barber of Seville," Rossini; waltz, "Gold and Silver," Lehar; fantasia, "La Boheme," Puccini; "Northern Rhapsody," Hosmer; "Ave Maria," Bach-Gounod, solo violin, harp, organ and strings; "Indian War Dance," Skilton; ouverture solennelle, "1812," Tchaikovsky; "Boston College Medley," Carey Martin; intermezzo from "Pagliacci," Leoncavallo; waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube," Strauss.

Wednesday—Spanish program. March, "Los Benderilleros," Volpatti; overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart; "Spanish Serenade," Glazounov; fantasia, "Don Carlos," Verdi; "A Night in Seville," Albeniz; intermezzo from "Goyesca," Granados; "Clavelitos," Valverde-Jacchia; rhapsody, "Espana," Chabrier; suite from "Carmen," Bizet; Spanish waltz, "El Turia," Granado; march, "La Mattchiche," Borel-Clerc.

Thursday—"Pomp and Circumstance," Elgar; overture to "Sakuntala," Goldmark; waltz, "Tendresse," Waldteufel; fantasia, "Faust," Gounod; "Roumanian Rhapsody," Enesco; gypsy dance from "Carmen," Bizet; "Liebeslied," Kreisler; overture to "The Flying Dutchman," Wagner; selection, "Wildflower," Youmans-Stothart; Afro-American songs, arranged by Jacchia, "You May Bury Me in de Eas'," "Musieu Banjo," "Nobody Knows de Trouble I've Seen," "American Fantasy," Herbert.

Friday—"Military March," Schubert; overture to "Poet and Peasant," Suppe; viola d'Amore solo, Gavotte, Bach, Paul Shirley; fantasia, "Lohengrin," Wagner; ballet suite, "Sylvia," "Delibes; "Phantomes," Chaloff; "By the Waters of Minnetonka," Lieurance-Jacchia; "Polovtsian Dances," from "Prince Igor," Borodin; "The Willow Plate," Herbert; waltz, "Estudiantina," Waldteufel; "Procession of the Sardar," Ippolitov-Ivanov.

Saturday—Overture to "La Forza del Destino," Verdi; "Entr'acte Valse," Hellmesberger; "Macushla," MacMorough-Jacchia; "Dance of the Hours," from "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; polonaise from "Eugen Onegin," Tchaikovsky; violin solo, "Carmen," fantasia, Bizet-Sarasate; "Deep River," Burleigh-Jacchia; overture to "Tanhauser," Wagner; fantasia, "Lucia di Lammermoor," Donizetti; waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song," Strauss; march, "Liberty Bell," Sousa.

Sunday, June 22, Russian Program—"Polonaise," Liadov; Kamarinskaya, fantasy on two Russian folk songs, Glinka; "Eili, Eili," arranged by Jacchia; prelude, Rachmaninov; "Islamay," Oriental fantasy, Balakirev-Casella; finale, "Scheherazade," Rimsky-Korsakov; "Spanish Serenade," Glazounov; "Kammenoi Ostrov," Rubenstein; "Orientale," Cui-Jacchia; "Marche Slave," Tchaikovsky.

SPANISH MUSIC BILLED AT THE POPS TONIGHT

Spanish music will be featured on the program at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight. The numbers as arranged by Agide Jacchia follow:

March, "Los Banderilleros".....Volpatti
Overture, "Marriage of Figaro".....Mozart
Spanish Serenade.....Glazounov
Fantasia, "Don Carlos".....Verdi
A Night in Seville.....Albeniz
Intermezzo, "Goyesca".....Granados
"Clavelitos".....Valverde-Jacchia
Rhapsody, "Espana".....Chabrier
Suite from "Carmen".....Bizet
Spanish Waltz, "El Turia".....Granado
March, "La Mattchiche".....Borel-Clerc

POPS TONIGHT

Music by Spaniards or about Spain will comprise the program at the Pops concert in Symphony hall tonight. The numbers, as arranged by Agide Jacchia, follow:

March, "Los Banderilleros".....Volpatti
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro,,
Mozart
Spanish Serenade.....Glazounov
Fantasia, "Don Carlos".....Verdi
A Night in Seville.....Albeniz
Intermezzo from "Goyesca".....Granados
"Clavelitos".....Valverde-Jacchia
Rhapsody, "Espana".....Chabrier
Suite from "Carmen".....Bizet
a. Aragonaise; b. Los Dragones d'Alcala; c. Los Toreros.
Spanish Waltz, "El Turia".....Granado
March, "La Mattchiche".....Borel-Clerc

SPANISH PROGRAM AT POPS TONIGHT

Music by Spaniards or about Spain will comprise the program at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight. The numbers as arranged by Agide Jacchia follow:

March, Los Banderilleros".....Volpatti
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro,"
Mozart
Spanish Serenade.....Glazounov
Fantasia, "Don Carlos".....Verdi
A Night in Seville.....Albeniz
Intermezzo from "Goyesca".....Granados
"Clavelitos".....Valverde-Jacchia
Rhapsody, "Espana".....Chabrier
Suite from "Carmen".....Bizet
(a) Aragonaise.
(b) Los Dragones d'Alcala.
(c) Los Toreros.
Spanish Waltz, "El Turia".....Granado
March, "La Mattchiche".....Borel-Clerc

B. C. NIGHT AT THE POPS

Boston College will celebrate at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight. The program follows:

March, "National Emblem".....Gately
Overture, "Barber of Seville".....Rossini
Waltz, "Gold and Silver".....Lehar
Fantasia, "La Boheme".....Puccini
Northern Rhapsody.....Hosmer
Ave Maria.....Bach-Gounod
Solo violin, harp, organ and strings.
Indian War Dance.....Skilton
Overture, "1812".....Tchaikovsky
Boston College Medley.....Carey-Martin
Intermezzo from "Pagliacci".....Leoncavallo
Waltz, "Blue Danube".....Strauss

Features of the Week at the "Pop" Concerts

With a "Spanish" program tomorrow, a "Russian" program Sunday, and a "Symphonic" program (a new experiment) next Monday, the Pop-goer of particular tastes may easily choose his favorite of music among the "Pop" nights of the near future. The selections tonight will include the March, "National Emblem", Bagley; Overture to "The Barber of Seville", Rossini; Waltz, "Gold and Silver", Lehar; Fantasia, "La Boheme", Puccini; "Northern Rhapsody", Hosmer; "Ave Maria", Bach-Gounod; "Indian War Dance", Skilton; Overture Solennelle, "1812", Tchaikovsky; Boston College Medley, Carey Martin; Intermezzo from "Pagliacci", Leoncavallo; Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube", Strauss.

Tonight at the Pops

SPANISH PROGRAM

March, "Los Banderilleros"..Volpatti
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro".....Mozart
Spanish Serenade.....Glazounoff
Fantasia, "Don Carlos".....Verdi
"A Night in Seville".....Albeniz
Intermezzo from "Goyesca," Granados
"Clavelitos".....Valverde-Jacchia
Rhapsody, "España".....Chabrier
Suite from "Carmen".....Bizet
Spanish Waltz, "El Turia".Granados
March, "La Mattchiche"..Borel-Clerc

SPANISH PROGRAM AT POPS

Music by Spaniards or about Spain will comprise the program at the Pop concert in Symphony hall tonight. The numbers as arranged by Agide Jacchia follow:

March, "Los Banderilleros," Volpatti; Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Mozart; Spanish Serenade, Glazounov; Fantasia, "Don Carlos," Verdi; A Night in Seville, Albeniz; Intermezzo from "Goyesca," Granados; "Clavelitos," Valverde-Jacchia; Rhapsody, "Espana," Chabrier; Suite from "Carmen," Bizet; a. Aragonaise b. Los Dragones d'Alcala c. Los Toreros; Spanish Waltz, "El Turia," Granado; March, "La Mattchiche," Borel-Clerc.

At the Pops Tonight

Spanish Programme

March, "Los Banderilleros"...Volpatti
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"
Mozart
Spanish Serenade.....Glazounov
Fantasia, "Don Carlos".....Verdi
A Night in Seville.....Albeniz
Intermezzo from "Goyesca"...Granados
"Clavelitos".....Valverde-Jacchia
Rhapsody, "Espana".....Chabrier
Suite from "Carmen".....Bizet
a. Aragonaise.
b. Los Dragones d'Alcala.
c. Los Toreros.
Spanish Waltz, "El Turia"....Granado
March, "La Mattchiche".....Borel-Clerc

POPS PROGRAM

The following program will be given at the Pop concert in Symphony hall tonight:

March, "Father of Victory".....Ganne
Overture to "Light Cavalry".....Suppe
Waltz, "Myosotis".....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "The Valkyrie".....Wagner
Suite, "Peer Gynt".....Grieg
a. Morning Mood. b. Aase's Death.
c. In the Hall of the Mountain King.
Quartet from "Rigoletto".....Verdi
Tarantelle (solo flute—Pasquale Amerena)
Jacchia
Ouverture Solonelle, "1812" Tchaikovsky
Selection, "Orange Blossoms".....Herbert
Deep River.....Burleigh-Jacchia
Pomp and Circumstance.....Elgar

TONIGHT'S PROGRAM AT POP CONCERT

The following program will be given at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

March, "Father of Victory".....Ganne
Overture to "Light Cavalry".....Suppe
Waltz, "Myosotis".....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "The Valkyrie".....Wagner
Suite, "Peer Gynt".....Grieg
a. Morning Mood b. Aase's Death
c. In the Hall of the Mountain King
Quartet from "Rigoletto".....Verdi
Tarantelle (Solo flute—Pasquale Amerena)
Jacchia
Overture Solennelle, "1812".....Tchaikovsky
Selection, "Orange Blossoms".....Herbert
Deep River.....Burleigh-Jacchia
Pomp and Circumstance.....Elgar

Why Not Jazz at the Pops?

Why not jazz at the Pops? Probably some of every audience during the season ask themselves that question. There are several reasons why Mr Jacchia does not put jazz on his programs. One is that unlike many European musicians and such Americans as Dr Davison he dislikes jazz and sees nothing worth while in it.

Unquestionably the concensus of opinion among musicians is still on Mr Jacchia's side in this matter. Only the young, the forward looking, the curious seekers after some new thing have as yet begun to sound the praises of what Mr Gilbert Seldes, late of "The Dial" has called "The Seven Lively Arts."

There is a serious practical difficulty which would have to be overcome if jazz were to be added to the Pops repertory. Irving Berlin and George Gershwin, and Zez Confrey, whose music would deserve representation if anybody's got it do not write for symphony orchestra. How could their music be re-scored so as to find substitutes for the saxaphones and the banjos? What to do with the numerous instruments which they do not employ at all?

Where there is a will a way may proverbially be found. No doubt the composers in question would themselves be willing and some of them at least would be able to revise their music for the Pops orchestra if they were requested so to do.

People Like the Pops

The public unquestionably likes jazz, whatever those who disapprove may say, and the better it is played the better they like it. But to this Mr Jacchia might well retort that the public also unquestionably likes his Pops programs. This is proved by the increased attendance at the Pops during his conductorship, despite the Prohibition law, which some people thought would make these concerts impossible. Why give up a sure thing for an unknown quantity?

Mr Jacchia's programs, try as he obviously does to vary them, often are a bit monotonous. The repetition of certain very familiar pieces, "1812," "Largo," and such like, is inevitable and by no means undesirable from the point of view of most of the audience. The programs can include only numbers which either have already been or seem likely to be received enthusiastically by the audience.

The Pops conductors have never had the freedom of choice in program making that the regular Symphony conductors, with all seats sold for the season have had. If people did not like Mr Jacchia's programs they would not keep coming to hear them, and the management would look for a new conductor as soon as they could.

The really monotonous thing about Mr Jacchia's programs is the undue prominence given on them to the work of composers like Leoncavallo, Massenet, Tchaikovsky, Mascagni, and Puccini. The sticky sonorities of these now somewhat antiquated composers, few of whom seem likely to be "classics" a century hence annoy the listener who likes his classics and likes his moderns but objects to music neither new nor truly great.

Better jazz than so much of this sort of thing, speaking from the point of view of a reviewer of music. Not of course whole programs of jazz, but say one jazz piece to every four of the other kinds. If it could be done the audience would be pleased, and the Globe reviewer would be pleased too.

Why Not Jerome Kern?

Mr Jacchia has shown ability as an arranger of all sorts of music. Better the worst jazz than such a piece as "Macushla," as far as the music goes. One may safely leave discussion of the merits of the poem to the reviewers of literature.

If he was going to make a concession to popular taste why did not Mr Jacchia turn to the music of Jerome Kern instead of to "Macushla"? Mr Kern's best tunes are so orchestrated as to be readily usable by the Pops orchestra, if one's memory may be trusted. They are graceful and delicate light music with a sentiment never cloying and never banal. Many of Mr Jacchia's operatic numbers are both cloying and banal, as memory of his recent Harvard Night program avers.

After all, why not give jazz a chance? It is a poor thing, but our own. Except for Stephen Foster and Sousa what other really American music have we, excluding the negro and the Indian? Certainly not MacDowell, who is of the school of Raff. Certainly not any of our many lesser high-brow imitators of Continental models. Griffes, he had lived, perhaps. But who else?

Jazz can no doubt be tamed. Indeed Paul Whiteman and Leo Reisman have already shown us the taming process at work. When well played it is not especially noisy and far from lacking in subtleties, especially subtleties of rhythm and of tone color.

Finally, in jazz lies our one hope as far as one can now see of bridging the yawning gulf between popular music and highbrow music in this country. Until that gap is bridged we shall not have any American music worth the name. Every country that has now its own native school of great composers had first its own popular or folk music, out of which the classics to a surprising extent grew.

Therefore should not the regular Symphony concerts, as well as the Pops encourage jazz by playing some of it

"SPANISH" NIGHT AT POPS CONCERT

Large Audience, Much Applause and More Castanets

The Pops concert at Symphony hall last night was called "a Spanish program." We like the idea of special nights. Mr. Jacchia certainly succeeds in creating programs that arouse interest when perused. And so far so good.

There was a large audience, as usual; there was applause, as usual. And then there were castanet rhythms, as usual when music is labeled "Spanish" (the castanets always much in evidence), and yet more castanets. No more than two or three pieces escaped them. Surely that is not all Spanish music has to offer!

Perhaps the general effect of monotony might have been avoided had the program been made up of pieces by Spanish composers, instead of merely so-called Spanish music by composers of Italy, France, Germany, Russia, besides those of Spain, who wrote in Spanish idiom.

To label last night's music "A Spanish Programme" gives an impression of impoverishment which seems unfair to Spanish musical talent. We may be wrong. The few pieces by Spanish composers included were not memorable, and one, in fact, was quite uninteresting.

However, we think a program by all Spanish composers might give a fair idea of the music of Spain, even as do Mr. Jacchia's Russian programs, or Italian programs, or German programs present the music of these respective countries and not what comprises the musical ideas, sometimes quite feeble, of assorted composers who have or think they have, absorbed the "atmosphere" of a nation—in the instance last night, mainly castanet beats.

H.L.

AT THE POPS

Agide Jacchia and the Pops Symphony orchestra will be heard in the following program at the Pop concert in Symphony hall tonight:

Pomp and Circumstances, Elgar; Overture to "Sakuntala," Goldmark; Waltz, "Tendresse," Waldteufel; Fantasia, "Faust," Gounod; Roumanian Rhapsody, Enesco; Gipsy Dance from "Carmen," Bizet; Liebeslied, Kressler; Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," Wagner; Selection, "Wildflower," Youman-Stothart; Afro-American songs, arranged by Jacchia, a. You may bury me in de Eas'; b. Musieu Banjo; c. Nobody knows de trouble I've seen; American Fantasy, Herbert.

At The Pops Tonight

Pomp and Circumstance.....Elgar
Overture to "Sakuntala"....Goldmark
Waltz, "Tendresse".....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Faust".....Gounod
Roumanian Rhapsody.....Enesco
Gipsy Dance from "Carmen".....Bizet
Liebeslied.....Kreisler
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"..
Wagner
Selection, "Wildflower".....
Youman-Stothart
Afro-American Songs.....
Arranged by Jacchia
a.—You may bury me in de Eas'.
b.—Musieu Banjo.
c.—Nobody knows de Trouble I've Seen.
American Fantasy.....Herbert

Seventh Week for the Pops

The Pop concerts in Symphony hall are about to open their seventh week and will come to an end with the beginning of next month. Much music of interest is promised for the coming week by Agide Jacchia and the Pops Symphony orchestra.

Next Wednesday there will be unusual variety and interest in a Spanish program. Friday will bring a viola d'amore solo and Saturday a trumpet solo, as well as a violin solo by Nicholai Kassman. Sunday, June 22, the closing Sunday concert of the season will be given, with a Russian program. Tonight's program follows: "Stars and Stripes Forever" (Sousa), overture to "William Tell" (Rossini), waltz, "To Thee" (Waldteufel), fantasia, "Aida" (Verdi), selection, "Mlle. Modiste," Prelude to Act III, "Natoma," Indian Summer, An American Idyll, Irish Rhapsody (Victor Herbert, 1859-1924); Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" (Wagner), Petite Serenade (Palmer), Rakoczy March (Berlioz).

Features of the Week at the "Pop" Concerts

Features of the week's programs of "Pop" concerts in Symphony Hall include a number of Southern selections for tomorrow night; a selection from the Filene Show, "The Caddie Girl," Thursday, to be conducted by Ralph Harlow, the composer, and, Saturday, a group of selections from music by the late Victor Herbert.

Conductor Agide Jacchia will present the following program tonight:

March, "Father of Victory," Ganne;

Monitor June 19.

Tonight at the Pops

"Pomp and Circumstance".....Elgar
Overture to "Sakuntala"..Goldmark
Waltz, "Tendresse".....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Faust".....Gounod
Rumanian Rhapsody.....Enesco
Gypsy Dance from "Carmen"..Bizet
"Liebeslied".....Kreisler
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," Wagner
Selection, "Wildflower," Youman-Stothart
Afro-American Songs, Arranged by Jacchia
American Fantasy.....Herbert

Adv June 20

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

The program for the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight follows:

Military march.....Schubert
Overture, "Poet and Peasant".....Suppe
Viola d'Amore solo.....Bach
Paul Shirley
Fantasia, "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Ballet suite, "Sylvia".....Delibes
Phantomes.....Chaloff
By the Waters of Minnetonka.....
Lieurance-Jacchia
Polovtsian dances.....Borodin
The Willow Plate.....Herbert
Waltz, "Estudiantina".....Waldteufel
Procession of Sardar.....Ippolitov-Ivanov

Herald June 19

Gustave Monteux

Word has been received of the death of Gustave Monteux, father of Pierre Monteux, recent conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Monteux was 89 years old. He died on May 30 after a short illness and within two weeks of his son's return to France from Boston at the completion of his term as conductor.

Adv June 19.

At the Pops Tonight

(Evening of Victor Herbert)

Stars and Stripes Forever.....Sousa
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Waltz, "To Thee".....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Aida".....Verdi
Selection, "Mlle Modiste".....
Prelude to Act III, "Natoma".....
Indian Summer, An American Idyll.....
Irish Rhapsody.....
Victor Herbert 1859-1924
Prelude to "The Mastersingers".Wagner
Petite Serenade.....Palmer
Rakoczy March.....Berlioz

Herald June 19

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

Agide Jacchia and the Pops Symphony Orchestra will offer the following program tonight:

Pomp and Circumstance.....Elgar
Overture, "Sakuntala".....Goldmark
Waltz, "Tendresse".....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Faust".....Gounod
Roumanian Rhapsody.....Enesco
Gipsy Dance, "Carmen".....Bizet
Liebeslied.....Kreisler
Overture, "Flying Dutchman".....Wagner
Selection, "Wildflower"....Youman-Stothart
Afro-American Songs...Arranged by Jacchia
a. "You May Bury Me in de Eas' "
b. Musieu Banjo.
c. "Nobody Knows de Trouble I've Seen."
American Fantasy.....Herbert

Herald June 19

AT THE POPS

Agide Jacchia and the Pops Symphony orchestra will be heard in the following program at the Pop concert in Symphony hall tonight:

Pomp and Circumstance.....Elgar
Overture to "Sakuntala".....Goldmark
Waltz, "Tendresse".....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Faust".....Gounod
Roumanian Rhapsody.....Enesco
Gipsy Dance from "Carmen".....Bizet
Liebeslied.....Kreisler
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," Wagner
Selection, "Wildflower"....Youman-Stothart
Afro-American Songs..Arranged by Jacchia
(a) You May Bury Me in de Eas'
(b) Musieu Banjo
(c) Nobody Knows de Trouble I've Seen
American Fantasy.....Herbert

Globe June 19

TONIGHT'S PROGRAM AT POP CONCERT

Agide Jacchia and the Pops Symphony Orchestra will be heard in the following program in Symphony Hall tonight:

Pomp and Circumstance.....Elgar
Overture to "Sakuntala".....Goldmark
Waltz, "Tendresse".....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Faust".....Gounod
Roumanian Rhapsody.....Enesco
Gipsy Dance from "Carmen".....Bizet
Liebeslied.....Kreisler
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman" Wagner
Selection, "Wildflower"....Youman-Stothart
Afro-American Songs.....Arranged by Jacchia
(a) You May Bury Me in de Eas'.
(b) Musieu Banjo.
(c) Nobody Knows de Trouble I've Seen.
American Fantasy.....Herbert

Herald June 20

POPS TONIGHT

The program for the Pop concert in Symphony hall tonight follows:

Military March.....Schubert
Overture to "Poet and Peasant".....Suppe
Viola d'Amore solo: Gavotte.....Bach
(Paul Shirley)
Fantasia, "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Ballet Suite, "Sylvia".....Delibes
(a) Les Chasseresses; (b) Cortege de Bacchus
Phantomes.....Chaloff
By the Waters of Minnetonka
Lieurance-Jacchia
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor".Borodin
The Willow Plate.....Herbert
The Mandarin's Garden, The Little Garden House, Chang the Lover, King Shee, A Wedding Procession.
Waltz, "Estudiantina".....Waldteufel
Procession of the Sardar.....Ippolitov-Ivanov

SPAIN SWAYS THE POPS

The Rhythms, the Color, the National Eloquence of the Music of Granada and Madrid, Finely Controlled by Jacchia to the Delight of an Applausive Audience

Is there any music of such effectively national character as the music of Spain? Suppose a concert of typical but not widely known French, German, Italian and Russian works should be given without any programme to announce either the names or composers of the pieces played. Experienced listeners would no doubt recognize the French numbers as French, the German as German, the Italian as offspring of Rome, Bologna or Naples, the Russian of Moscow or Petrograd—though perhaps of Poland or Finland. But would an American audience in general feel these distinctions? It is much to be questioned. Not so, however, when the rhythms of Spain are heard. Let a Castillian dance beat its first pulsations, or a serenade from Granada speak its least melody of Moorish Iberia, and straightway all of us are transported to Spain, unquestioningly, excitedly, body and mind.

With this certainty of wide and keen appeal Mr. Jacchia made last evening the programme of "Spanish Night" at the Pops—a programme strong and vivid in its unity, yet intelligently saved from all risk of monotony. If there were the completely familiar strains of Chabrier's "Espana" and of the Albeniz "Night in Seville," their familiarity was not alone warmly welcomed in interpretations full of fresh vigor and spirit, but also it was well balanced against the less known charm of the Intermezzo written by Granados for his "Goyescas." The haunting melody and poetic movement of this number so caught the audience that it clamored long and eagerly for a second playing. Mr. Jacchia's notably competent and understanding orchestration of Valverde's "Clavelitos"—especially done for this Spanish Night—brought to the programme a delightful composition wholly new to the Pops, as indeed to orchestra concerts the world over. In the suite from "Carmen" one felt again that here is music of such merit of beauty as to stay ever new. And for subtle means of contributing variety to a concert essentially unified, one could not have done better than to turn, as Mr Jacchia did, to Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" and to Verdi's "Don Carlos" for music not Spanish at all, yet perfectly well associated with Spain through the literary tradition both of the Don and of the Barber of Seville

It may of course be remarked that the "Spanish" music of Bizet or Chabrier is, in fact, the work of Frenchmen and is very evidently decked out by them in a French manner and feeling. Likewise, the "Spanish Serenade" heard in Symphony Hall last night is the work of a Russian, Glazounov. But it would be absurd to deny the essentially Spanish character of these compositions. Indeed, the very fact that Spain possesses a national music so intensely and ruggedly its own that even when given in Italian versions, French versions or Russian versions, its essential spirit and substance still remain eloquently dominant, is only further proof of the distinctive force and value of the Spanish tradition.

Scant wonder, then, that the audience so greatly and fully enjoyed the concert given it by the admirable Jacchia last evening. The occasion was but the second "Spanish Night" in the history of the Pops, the first having been offered last year upon the helpful initiative of certain leaders of Spanish culture in Boston. Let the young custom become a tradition, with one of the best conductors and one of the best bands ever known at the Pops to maintain its merits as they did last night! J. E. K.

POPS PROGRAMME

The following program will be given at the Pop concert in Symphony hall tonight:

March, "Father of Victory," Ganne; Overture to "Light Cavalry," Suppe; Waltz, "Myosotis," Waldteufel; Fantasia, "The Valkyrie," Wagner; Marseillaise.
Suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg; a. Morning Mood; b. Aase's Death; c. In the Hall of the Mountain King; Quartet from Rigoletto," Verdi; Tarantelle (Solo flute-Pasquale Amerena), Jacchia; Overture Solennelle. "1812," Tchaikovsky; Italian Royal March.
Selection, "Orange Blossoms," Herbert; Deep River, Burleigh-Jacchia; Pomp and Circumstance, Elgar; The Star Spangled Banner.

Adv June 20

POPS AND POLITICS

The first League of Women Voters' night at the Pop concerts will be on Thursday, June 19. The league states that it will take over the entire floor.

"In order not in any way to interfere with the unique atmosphere of the Pops—but to make the most of every possible occasion to bring those seeking public office before the people, we are combining Pops and politics. The candidates for nomination for Governor will give a brief word of greeting during one of the two intermissions, which take place at 9 and at 10 o'clock."

The Hon. James M. Curley and the Hon. James Jackson have already accepted the invitation to speak.

The musical program will be as follows:

Pomp and Circumstance.....Elgar
Overture to "Sakuntala".....Goldmark
Waltz, "Tendresse".....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Faust".....Gounod
Rumanian Rhapsody.....Enesco
Gipsy Dance from "Carmen".....Bizet
Liebesfreud.....Kriesler
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"..
Wagner
Selection, "Wildflower"..Youmans-Stothart
Afro-American Songs.....Arr. by Jacchia
a. You may bury me in de Eas'.
b. Musieu Banjo.
c. Nobody knows de trouble I've seen.
American Fantasy.....Herbert

FAELTEN SCHOOL

The closing exercises of the Faelten pianoforte school will be held in Steinert hall next Thursday evening at 8 o'clock. The program will be as follows:

Ensemble: Graduates of the college course
Three Poems, op. 20.....MacDowell
Ballad
Night by the Sea
A Tale from Knightly Times
Address by Reinhold Faelten
Awarding of diplomas by the director
Ensemble: Graduates of the college course
Characteristic Pieces, op. 50....Rubinstein
Capriccio
Barcarolle
Marche
Reception to the graduates after the exercises

There are 16 graduates of the college course; 20 of the preparatory course.

THE POP CONCERTS

At the Pop concerts in Symphony hall, Agide Jacchia and his large symphony orchestra will continue to provide each night during the week music of many sorts in generous array. The programs follow:

SUNDAY, JUNE 8
WAGNER PROGRAM

March.....Huldigung
Die Feen ("The Fairies").....Overture
Tristan and Isolde....."Love-Death"
The Rhine Gold.....
Apparition of the rainbow and entrance of the Gods into Valhalla.
The Valkyrie.....Magic Fire Music
The Mastersingers of Nuremberg....
(Act III) Introduction—Dance of the Apprentices—Homage to Hans Sachs.
Parsifal.....
March of the knights into the Temple of the Holy Grail (Act I).
Lohengrin.....
Procession to the Cathedral (Act II).
Rienzi.....Overture

MONDAY—Technology Night
Stars and Stripes Forever.....Sousa
Overture to "Phedre".....Massenet
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube".....Strauss
Tech Songs.
Fantasia, "Cavalleria Rusticana..Mascagni
Serenade (English horn).Schubert-Jacchia
Louis Speyer
Marche Slave.....Tchaikovsky
Tech Songs.
Selection "Wildflower"..Youmans-Stothart
Largo.....Handel
Solo violin, harp, organ and strings.
American Patrol.....Meacham
Stein Song.

TUESDAY
March, Father of Victory.....Ganne
Overture, "Light Cavalry".....Suppe
Waltz, "Myosotis".....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "The Valkyrie".....Wagner
Suite, "Peer Gynt".....Grieg
Quartet from "Rigoletto".....Verdi
Tarantelle.....Jacchia
Solo flute, P. Amerena.
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"..Tchaikovsky
Selection, "Orange Blossoms".....Herbert
Deep River.....Burleigh-Jacchia
Pomp and Circumstance.....Elgar

WEDNESDAY—Southern Night
Overture to "Orpheus".....Offenbach
Waltz, "Roses from the South"...Strauss
Fantasia, "Pagliacci".....Leoncavallo
"Old Kentucky Home"....Arr. by Jacchia
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
Aragonaise from "Carmen".....Bizet
The Rosary.....Nevin
Solo trumpet, G. Mager.
Hymn to the Sun, from "Iris"....Mascagni
Southern Rhapsody.....Hosmer
March of the Little Lead Soldiers...Pierne
Eighth Slavonic Dance.....Dvorak

THURSDAY
March, "Freedom".....Curry
Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream".....Mendelssohn
Spanish Serenade.....Glazounov
Fantasia, "Rigoletto".....Verdi
Capriccio—Pastorale—Burlesa.....
Scarlatti-Jacchia
Selection from "The Caddie Girl".....
Harlow and Young
1924 Filene show, conducted by Ralph L. Harlow.
Serenade, "Chorus of the Night"..Dennee
Islamey, "Oriental Fantasy".....
Balakirev-Cascia
Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner
Volga Bargemen's Song....Arr. by Jacchia
Waltz, "Pomone".....Waldteufel

FRIDAY
March, "Washington Post".....Sousa
Overture to "La Gazza Ladra".....Rossini
Waltz, "Girls of Baden".....Komak
Fantasia, "Carmen".....Bizet
Ballet Suite, "Nutcracker"...Tchaikovsky
Ave Maria.....Schubert-Wilhelmj
Solo violin, organ, harp and strings.
Midsummer.....MacDowell
Overture, "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner
Selection, "I Lombard".....Verdi
Kammenoi Ostrow.....Rubinstein
With organ.
Eighth Slavonic Dance.....Dvorak

SATURDAY
Stars and Stripes Forever.....Sousa
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Waltz, "To Thee".....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Aida".....Verdi
Selection, "Mlle. Modiste"...Victor Herbert
Prelude to Act III, "Natoma".....
Victor Herbert
Indian Summer, an American Idyll...
Victor Herbert
Irish Rhapsody.....Victor Herbert
1859-1924
Prelude to "The Mastersingers"....Wagner
Petite Serenade.....Palmer
Rakoczy.....Berlioz

American June 7

MANY SPECIAL NIGHTS AT 'POPS'

Coming Week Will Show Orchestra in Novelty Programs

There will be numbers of particular interest at each of the Pop Concerts to be given during the coming week in Symphony Hall by Agide Jacchia and his orchestra. Tomorrow night will bring a Wagner program with overtures and selections from his principal music dramas; Monday will be the annual Technology Night, which is open to the public; Wednesday night's program will feature the music of the South, with an arrangement of "My Old Kentucky Home," made for the occasion by Mr. Jacchia; Thursday will bring a selection from the Filene Show, "The Caddie Girl," and Balakirev's brilliant fantasy, "Islamey," drawn from the Winter concerts, and on Saturday the middle group of the program will be devoted to the music of Victor Herbert, in memory of the late American composer, including selections from "Mlle. Modiste," the opera "Natoma," also "Indian Summer" and the "Irish Rhapsody."

DIXIE MUSIC AT POPS.

Music from the South will be featured at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight. The numbers follow:

Overture, "Orpheus".....Offenbach
Waltz, "Tales from Vienna Woods."Strauss
"Old Kentucky Home".....Foster-Jacchia
"Dixie".....Emmett
Fantasia, "Pagliacci".....Leoncavallo
Southern Rhapsody.....Hosmer
Aragonnaise from "Carmen".....Bizet
"The Rosary".....Nevin
Solo trumpet, Georges Mager.
Hymn to the Sun, "Iris".....Mascagni
Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
March of Little Lead Soldiers.....Pierne
Selection of Southern airs.....Bendix

LOUISVILLE, KY.
POST

324

Music Via Radio.

A tenor who need not be named (because of the presumptuousness of his boosters) is mentioned in at least one newspaper as having "something of the quality and spirit of the immortal Caruso in his singing." And he is a radio singer.

Now, there is no person I have heard who has "something of the quality" of the immortal Caruso. When such an artist appears (if indeed that ever happens—which is most unlikely) he will not, in all probability, be discovered over the radio.

Thus far there seems to be a disinclination on the part of many established musicians to broadcasting their efforts. They feel that the results often do not constitute a faithful reproduction of what they accomplish.

A few days ago Efrem Zimbalist came forward as one of the exceptions, and it is to be regretted that his achievement did not impress one newspaper reviewer to write about it. Some day the radio and superior musicians may work together frequently in a common cause. Two things must happen, however, before that is brought about: radio transmission and reception must reach a satisfactory state, and the radio broadcasting companies must pay for the services of the artist or organization broadcast.

My Paris representative communicates the recent success gained in the French capital by Albert Spalding. And in a cabled account received elsewhere the American violinist appears to have played the new Respighi Concerto Gregoriano altogether to the liking of the audience which attended the concert—given by an orchestra under the conductorship of Koussevitsky, who is to be the new head of the Boston Symphony.

This particular audience grew enthusiastic over Spalding's playing and "yelled excitedly" for him when he had finished his task.

When the violinist resumes his activities in the United States he will offer, among other works, the Respighi concerto. The composer granted Spalding the right to play it for the first time in this country.

79 New York Times June 9

The Composers of Great Symphonies And the Men Who Interpret Them

By OLIN DOWNES.

A CELEBRATED symphony is performed by two different conductors. They give it different interpretations. Critics disagree about these interpretations, and there is that enlivening discussion without which stagnation might overtake the musical art.

In London there were performances of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony by Kussewitsky and Weingartner. Dyneley Hussey of The Saturday Review found Kussewitsky's interpretation of the symphony very personal in character and not faithful to the letter or spirit of the score. "There are," he wrote, "broadly two ways in which an executant may approach the work he wishes to interpret. He may bend it to his own will and make it again in his own image. That is the way of Kussewitsky and Busoni. * * * The second way is to keep strictly to the score and give the music as it is written," which Mr. Hussey described as the way of Weingartner and Emil Sauer.

Ernest Newman in The London Times held different opinions. He raised the question of what constituted a "classical" interpretation and what a "classic" composition might be. "The facile phrase has been going about that Weingartner's was the more 'classical' reading and Kussewitsky's the more 'romantic.' What is really meant is that Weingartner was quiet and Kussewitsky was passionate, that Weingartner conformed to tradition and Kussewitsky made a personal matter of the work. And the question arises: Which of the two methods is the better, the one that does the more justice to, and pays more respect to, the intentions of the composer? * * *

"Let us ask ourselves," continued Mr. Newman, "what a 'classic' is and what a 'classical' performance is. The noun and the adjective are often used to give a wrapping of dignity to the commonplace or the dull. * * * You cannot turn the village grocer into Cato by simply draping a toga about him; and you do not necessarily get the real Beethoven or the real Bach by passing him through the mind of some player who has been untouched by all the modern developments of music."

Mr. Hussey favored the objective standpoint. "It takes," he said, "a finer perception to appreciate the sensitive balance and the true expression of the composer's ideas through the observience of the executant than to be captured by sensational contrasts and new readings."

To this Mr. Newman made a rather crushing rejoinder. He proved, by Weingartner himself, that that conductor's reading of the Ninth Symphony was at variance with many of the original directions in Beethoven's score, that certain of the changes made by Weingartner had previously been advocated by Richard Wagner, and, finally, that in at least one important passage of the symphony Kussewitsky had kept more strictly to Beethoven's original tempo than his "classically" disposed colleague. "Mr. Hussey's article would give the unwary reader the impression that Weingartner stuck loyally to the Ninth Symphony as Beethoven wrote it. * * * Weingartner does nothing of the kind. This is not a matter of opinion. It is a matter of fact. In support of it I can call a witness whom even Mr. Hussey would regard as unimpeachably veracious—Weingartner himself. For Weingartner's views on what he conceives to be the right way of performing the Ninth Symphony (as well, by the way, as others) are set down where all may read them, in a book of some 200 pages, published eighteen years ago, and entitled "Ratschläge für Aufführungen der Symphonien Beethovens."

Enumerating in detail some of many changes of tempo and instrumentation advised by Weingartner, Mr. Newman concluded: "I offer no opinion whatever upon Weingartner's suggested alterations. I only venture to suggest, in my turn, that if it is legitimate for Weingartner to reject Beethoven's plain markings and to play the work as he feels it, it cannot be illegitimate for Kussewitsky also to look at the work through his own eyes. Which of the two readings we shall prefer is, as I have already said, a matter of taste about which it is not worth while arguing. But if Weingartner's reading is to be commended at the expense of Kussewitsky's, at any rate let it [illegible] for the one virtue that it does possess—a scrupulous and reverent keeping to the score and giving the music as it is written."

* * *

What is the test of a "classic" composition, and where is the guide to its proper interpretation? There are of course no such things. The passage of time throws certain lights about a master-work, although the history of music is too brief and too recent for its revelations to have a very conclusive quality. We know that the Ninth Symphony, one hundred years after it was written, is, if anything, more important to the world than when it was first performed. We draw certain broad inferences from a study of its form and character, but most of our conclusions are debatable, and the real secret of its greatness we shall never comprehend. One thing, however, is hardly to be disputed, which is that the Ninth Symphony, in common with all great masterpieces, assumes different values to individuals and generations as they pass.

If it were otherwise, the symphony would not live. The art work which [illegible] its period has the two characteristics of a certain stability which resists change, and an inner responsiveness to the fluctuations of taste and feeling that the years bring. The first of these characteristics is due to the presence of form. This is the logical arrangement and development of the composer's ideas. He may employ an old form or a new one, a conventional tonal pattern or a structural plan which proves revolutionary. But form there will be, rock-ribbed and four-square to the universe. Yet even this form, immutable in essentials, will show a certain degree of elasticity to the impulses of the interpreter. It will "give" to the impact of a temperament, as a steel-framed edifice "gives" to the force of the wind, and is the more durable and steadfast because it can do so.

The form, however, is not the life of the music. The life of the music remains a complete mystery to the composer as to every one else. This latter individual has known the travail and ecstasy of creation. He has harnessed his inspiration and put it into a shape as proportionate and enduring as possible. He created with a measure of conscious purpose. But music springs from a source so much deeper than conscious purpose that its originator can neither control nor comprehend its destiny. Once the score is completed the composer's work is done. The composition is no longer even his possession. It is the property of every one for whom it has a meaning. The music came, as a matter of fact, not from an individual, but from generations behind him. It has a past deep in the consciousness of the race, and an incalculable future. It is the symbol of forces and dreams beyond the understanding of any men.

Explanations of the visible diagram of the work which the composer has put on paper, theories concerning the audible material of it, do not go to its root. "Polyphony," "form," "melody," "harmony," "rhythm" or "the logical development of ideas" or "depth of feeling"—the secret of great art is nearer and further than all that. These are names of its component elements, but they would not in themselves constitute a living, organic creation. "It is not the sounds that move me," said Whitman, "but their exquisite meanings." The masterpiece is in some sort a reflection of that truth, eternal as the universe, which flashes in the void with a different color and meaning for every man.

The interpreter of a musical masterpiece could not, if he would, give the music as he has received it from the composer, or, rather, from the printed page which is anything but a precise indication of the composer's wishes. If he attempts to do so, his so-called "interpretation" will be imitative, therefore unoriginal and essentially lifeless. The music has real meaning only to those who know it and recreate it for themselves as they listen, or who, by intuition, can bridge the gap that the performer has left between them and the composer. If, on the other hand, there are vitality and conviction in the performance, the symphony is sounded as the sum of two creative agencies—the composer and the executive artist. The value of the interpretation will be in proportion to his sincerity, vision and technical ability. But he must show subjective, creative power.

Still a new element enters into the occasion—the attitude of the listener. Every musical performance, in short, is the sum of so many factors, present in such different proportions that there is no fixed centre or form by which to judge the result. It is a universe of relativities, of which the permanent law is change! Which is to say that if Weingartner and Kussewitsky had not played the Ninth Symphony differently, they would not be the musicians that they are, and that had the composition not appeared differently to each of them, it would not have been a symphony by Beethoven.

From SUN

Address New York City

Date JUN 20 1924

RUSSIAN BALLET'S LATEST SUCCESS

'Les Biches' Centers Around a Blue Sofa.

PARIS, June 10.—The production of Les Biches (ballet in one act); music by Francis Poulenc; choreography by Mme. Nijinska, has been one of the chief events of M. Serge Diaghilev's Russian ballet season, which opened at the Theatre des Champs-Elysees. Together with M. Georges Auric's Les Facheux, Les Biches must be counted a fresh success for the ballet company and a most interesting addition to its repertory; it is, moreover, a new and convincing proof of the talent and originality of M. Poulenc.

Of the subject of Les Biches it is enough to say that it is "atmospheric" and allusive and provocative as any of Mme. Marie Laurencin's well known pictures, with their "jeunes filles" surrounded by shadowy horses, enigmatic dogs or fantastic fawns, enveloped in a pale cloud of pinks and grays or faded blues. In Les Biches we see all these strange "filles fleurs" come to life, and follow the course of their amorous adventures centering around a pale blue sofa, which is sat upon, jumped on, peeped over or pushed about by everyone concerned from one end of the ballet to the other.

Mme. Nijinska's choreographic setting is ingenious, and M. Poulenc's music full of irresistible good spirits and delicious tunes. It is diatonic to a degree, which will surprise those who are accustomed to consider a strong flavoring of polytony inseparable from music written by any member of the "Six," but this does not prevent it from being delightfully spontaneous and full of invention and happy inspiration. A small choir seated in the orchestra comments the action from time to time, singing fragments which are of a definitely "popular" character and which serve to heighten the bustling intensity of the music, which never flags from beginning to end. Les Biches is certainly M. Poulenc's largest and most sustained effort up to the present, and marks out its author as one of the most gifted of the younger French composers.

The first performance of Stravinsky's new piano concerto (with the composer as soloist) has been the outstanding feature of the Kussevitzky concerts at the Opera. The concerto (composed this spring) is an eloquent and majestic work. Classical in form, it combines a grandeur worthy of Bach with that fantasy and richness of invention which are characteristic of Stravinsky at his best.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST

BOSTON, MASS.
CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR
JUN 16 1924

Koussevitzky Conducts Stravinsky Program

PARIS, June 6 (Special Correspondence)—At the Opéra M. Koussevitzky has given a whole program of Stravinsky. The latest device of M. Stravinsky is frequently to banish from the orchestra the string instruments. On this basis he has constructed a concerto for piano in which violins, altos and cellos are suppressed. Only the double basses from time to time moan. The concerto was remarkably played by M. Stravinsky himself.

Among other composers in recent programs of M. Koussevitzky figured Florent Schmitt and Prokofieff. "Les Mirages" of Florent Schmitt show an eagerness for frantic rhythms and violent colors, above all in the second part, "Tragique Chevauchée," which carries one away in its bewildering race. But Florent Schmitt does not renounce the soft accents of melody—witness "Tristan de Pan" on a theme by Paul Fort, very lyrical and quiet; and the contrast is most effective.

As for M. Prokofieff, he has illustrated a strange poem of Constantin Belmont after an inscription on the wall of an Akkadian temple showing seven demons, represented as the authors of humanity's miseries. The solo tenor sings an incantation of the priest trying to exorcise the demons, with a crowd as chorus. It is a very curious musical illustration, which lacks neither descriptive power nor animation. And the technique is not after all so anarchic as it looks.

CHICAGO, ILL.
JOURNAL
JUN 17 1924

Lucien Muratore, formerly chief tenor of the Chicago Opera, has been singing the role of Ulysses in Paris performances of Gabriel Faure's "Penelope." . . . Henry Theophilus Finck, for forty-three years a critic of music in New York, has retired and will devote the rest of his life to writing more books. His list, now seventeen in number, is largely known to music lovers. . . . Albert Spalding recently gave in Paris the first hearing of Ottorino Respighi's Gregorian concerto for violin and orchestra. There was much praise of the composition, the soloist and the conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. The Chicago violinist will play the work in America next season.

CLEVELAND, OHIO
TIMES
JUN 19 1924

Sergei Kussevitsky, who will come to America in the fall to take up the baton with the Boston Symphony orchestra, has strange ideas regarding the American public. From some undefined source he has got the impression that only the tried and true orchestra numbers meet with success in the United States.

In Paris at the present time he is giving programs of a catholic order on which are represented every school and type of music. But when he comes to this country, he assures everyone, he will do away with some of his more "advanced" orchestral findings. Still, he hopes that when he attempts something a bit sophisticated it will meet with a certain following over here.

All this is brought out in an article in the New York Times by Olin Downes who has gone to Europe for purposes of musical exploration.

When one considers the ultra-modern compositions Conductor Monteux brought out in the city of knowledge, it would seem Mr. Kussevitsky will have free rein in the matter of program making.

FRENCH AUDIENCE CHEERS AMERICANS

An American has at last broken the apathy of the French audiences to foreign talent in the recent Koussevitsky concert at the Paris opera with Albert Spalding, solo violinist. Koussevitsky is to direct the musical destines of the Boston Symphony next year.

The occasion for the outburst was the playing of the "Concerto Gregoriano," written by Otterino Respighi and heard for the first time. Koussevitsky conducted the orchestra and Spalding succeeded so admirably in interpreting the Gregorian chants and mediaeval harmonies to the complicated modern form that the tribute became Spalding's even more than the conductor's.

Paris audiences are not reluctant to express their feelings but it is well-known fact that their enthusiasm is quickened more readily for their own than for any foreigner. On this occasion it amounted to complete acceptance of an Italian concerto, a Russian leader and an American soloist. Previous to the acclaim of Spalding, the audience had dissented violently to a Honegger composition with hissing as nasty as the cheering was lusty for their favorites. Koussevitsky made graceful acknowledgment of Spalding's accomplishment in spontaneous handshaking with the young artist and repeated over and over again for the insistent audience.

POPS TONIGHT

The program for the Pop concert in Symphony hall tonight follows:

Military march, Schubert; overture to "Poet and Peasant," Supper; Viola d'Amore solo: Gavote (Paul Shirley); fantasia, "Lohengrin," Wagner; Ballet Suite, "Sylvia," Delibes; a—"Les Chasseseresses," b—"Cortege de Bacchus; "Phantomes," Chaloff; "By the Waters of Minnetonka," Lieurance-Jacchia; Polovtsian dances from "Prince Igor," Borodin; "The Willow Plate," Herbert; "The Madarin's Garden—The Little Garden House—Chang the Lover—King Shee—A Wedding Procession"; waltz, "Estudiantina," Waldteufel; "Procession of the Sardar," Ippolitov-Ivanov.

Tonight at the Pops

Military March .....Schubert
Overture to "Poet and Peasant."
Suppé
Viola d'Amore solo: Gavotte...Bach
(Paul Shirley)
Fantasia, "Lohengrin" .....Wagner
Ballet Suite, "Sylvia" .....Délibes
"Phantomes" .....Chaloff
"By the Waters of Minnetonka,"
Lieurance-Jacchia
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor" .....Borodin
The Willow Plate.....Herbert
Waltz, "Estudiantina" ...Waldteufel
Procession of the Sardar,
Ippolitoff-Ivanoff

At The Pops Tonight

Military March .....Schubert
Overture to "Poet and Peasant"..Suppé
Viola d'Amore solo: Gavotte.....Bach
Paul Shirley
Fantasia, "Lohengrin" .....Wagner
Ballet Suite, "Sylvia".....Délibes
a. Les Chasseresses.
b. Cortège de Bacchus.
Phantomes .....Chaloff
By the Waters of Minnetonka
Lieurance-Jacchia
Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor"
Borodin
The Willow Plate.....Herbert
The Mandarin's Garden—The Little Garden House—Chang the Lover—King Shee—A Wedding Procession
Waltz, "Estudiantina" .....Waldteufel
Procession of the Sardar
Ippolitov-Ivanov

Agide Jacchia, Conductor

TONIGHT'S POPS

The following program, featuring Nicholai Kassman as the soloist, will be performed at the Pop Concert in Symphony hall tonight:

Overture to "La Forga del Destino"....Verdi
Entra'acte Valse ..... Hellmesberger
Macushla (Trumpet solo, George Mager)
MacMorough-Jacchia
Dance of the Hours, "La Gioconda"..Ponchielli
Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin"..Tchaikovsky
Violin solo, "Carmen" Fantasia
Bizet-Sarasate
Nicholai Kassman
Deep River ..... Burleigh-Jacchia
Overture to "Tannhauser"..... Wagner
Fantasia, "Lucia di Lammermoor"..Donizetti
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song".....Strauss
March, "Liberty Bell" ..... Sousa

BUT TWO MORE WEEKS

Next to the Last Week of the Pops Season—A Varied Programme of Varied Interest—The Russian Favorites —Annual Request Night

THE last week but one of the Pops' season in Symphony Hall will begin Sunday evening with the last Sunday concert and the last Russian programme of the season. Mr. Jacchia will include Glinka's Kamarinskaya, Elli, Balakirev's "Islamey," Finale of "Scheherazade," the Marche Slave, and other Russian favorites. Monday will bring a symphonic programme, which is an entirely new experiment at the Pops. Movements from the following symphonies are to be played: Schubert's "Unfinished," Beetthoven's "Eroica," Dvorak's "New World" Symphony, Tchaikovsky's Fourth and Brahms's Second. There will also be the Prelude to "The Mastersingers," "Espana," and other popular symphonic numbers. From the programme for Tuesday there may be mentioned the "William Tell" Overture, Hindu Song, "Rigoletto" Fantasia, Schubert's Ave Maria, Mascagni's "Hymn to the Sun," Strauss's "Artist's Life" Waltz, etc.

Wednesday will bring the annual Request Programme of the season which will be announced in the Pops programme Monday, the ballots having been counted. On Thursday there will be an International Programme, with eleven or more nations represented—the third movement of "Scheherazade," "Flying Dutchman" Overture, First "L'Arlesienne" Suite, MacDowell's Suite, "Goyescas" Intermezzo, may be mentioned among other numbers. For Friday, which is Rotary Club night, likewise open to the public, there will be Handel's Largo, "1812" Overture, Herbert's American Fantasy, etc. On Saturday's programme, "Tannhauser" March, Glinka's "The Lark," "Samson and Delilah" Fantasia, Casella's "Italia," Gounod's "Ave Maria" are among the numbers.

"Pops" On 2 Final Weeks At Symphony Hall

Two mere weeks remain of the Pops season at Symphony Hall. Features of the coming week will be the last Russian programme of the season at the Sunday concert tomorrow night. A new departure at the Pops will be a symphonic programme which will take place on Monday, with movements from four symphonies and other popular symphonic numbers. Wednesday will bring the annual Request Night, programme for which is to be announced on Monday. Thursday will bring a programme of all nations, each number representing a different country.

TONIGHT'S POP PROGRAM

Teh following program will be performed at the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

Overture, "La Forza del Destino"....Verdi
Entr'acte Valse .....Hellmesberger
Macushla (trumpet solo), George Nagger
MacMorough-Jacchia
Dance of the Hours, "La Giodona".Ponchelli
Polonaise, "Eugen Onegin"....Tchaikovsky
Violin solo "Carmen" Fantasia, Nicholai Kassman .....Bizet-Sarasate
Overture, "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Fantasia, "Lucia di Lammermoor".Donizetti
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song"..Strauss
March, "Liberty Bell".....Sousa

TWO MORE WEEKS OF POPS

Two more weeks remain of the Pops season at Symphony hall. Features of the coming week will be the last Russian program of the season at the last Sunday concert of the season tomorrow night. A new departure at the Pops will be a symphonic program which will take place on Monday, with movements from four symphonies and other popular symphonic numbers. Wednesday will bring the annual Request Night, program for which is to be announced on Monday at the Pops, the ballots having then been counted. Thursday will bring a program of all nations, each number representing a different country.

Tonight's program follows:

Overture to "La Forza del Destino," Verdi. Entr'acte Valse. Hellmesberger. Macushla (trumpeta—Georges Mager), MacmoroughJachi. Dance of the Hours, "La Gioconda." Ponchielli. Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin," Tchaikovsky. Violin solo, "Carmen Fantasia," Bizet-Sarasate. Nicholia Kassman. Deep River, Burleigh-Jacchia. Overture to "Tannhauser," Wagner. Fantasia, "Lucia di Lammermoor," Donizetti. Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song," Strauss. March, "Liberty Bell," Sousa.

Week-end Pops Programs

TONIGHT

Overture to "La Forza del Destino," Verdi
Entr'acte Valse .....Hellmesberger
Macushla .....MacMorough-Jacchia
(Trumpet Solo—Georges Mager)
Dance of the Hours, "La Gioconda" Ponchielli
Polonaise from "Eugen Onegin," Tschaikowsky
"Carmen," Fantasia..Bizet-Sarasate
(Violin Solo—Nicholai Kassman)
"Deep River" .....Burleigh-Jacchia
Overture to "Tannhäuser"...Wagner
Fantasia, "Lucia di Lammermoor" Donizetti
Waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song," Strauss
March, "Liberty Bell".....Sousa

SUNDAY EVENING
Russian Program

Polonaise .....Liadoff
"Kamarinskaya" .....Glinka
"Elli, Elli".....Arranged by Jacchia
Prelude .....Rachmaninoff
Islamey, Oriental Fantasy..Balakireff
Arranged by Alfredo Casella
Finale, "Schéhérazade," Rimsky-Korsakoff
Spanish Serenade .....Glazounoff
"Kammenoi Ostrow" .....Rubinstein
"Orientale" .....Cui-Jacchia
Marche Slave.....Tschaikowsky

LAST SUNDAY POP CONCERT TONIGHT

The last Sunday Pop concert and the last Russian program of the season will be a feature tonight at Symphony Hall.

Tomorrow will bring a symphonic program, the first of its kind at the Pops. On the Tuesday program are the "William Tell" overture, Hindu Song, "Rigoletto" fantasia, Schubert's "Ave Maria," Mascagni's "Hymn to the Sun" and Strauss' "Artist's Life" waltz.

Wednesday will bring the annual request program. On Thursday there will be an international program. Friday will be Rotary Club Night, but open to the public, with a popular program.

Saturday night's bill includes the "Tannhauser" march, Glinka's

POPS CONCERTS

The coming week will be the second last of the Pops season at Symphony hall. Features of this week will be the last Sunday concert, and also the last Russian program tonight, a symphonic program, which is a new experiment at the Pops, tomorrow night, on Wednesday the annual request program, which is to be announced Monday night at the Pops, the ballots having been counted, and an international program on Thursday, each number representing a different nation.

The programs of the week follow:

LAST SUNDAY CONCERT, JUNE 22
RUSSIAN PROGRAM

Polonaise .....Liadov
Kamarinskaya, Fantasy on two Russian Folk Songs.....Glinka
"Elli, Elli".....Arr. by Agide Jacchia
Prelude .....Rachmaninov
Islamey, Oriental Fantasy
Balawirev-Casella
Finale of "Scheherazade"
Rimsky-Korsakov
Spanish Serenade.....Glazounov
Kammenoi Ostrow.....Rubinstein
Orientale .....Cui-Jacchia
Marche Slave.....Tchaikovsky

MONDAY

First Symphonic Program at the Pops
Berlioz, Hungarian March, "Rakoczy"
Schubert, Symphony in B minor (unfinished), First Movement, Allegro Moderato
Beethoven, Symphony No. 3, in E Flat Major, "Eroica," Third Movement, Scherzo, Allegro Vivace
Wagner, Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"
Chabrier, Rhapsody, "Espana"
Dvorak, Symphony No. 5, in E Minor, "From the New World," Second Movement (Largo)
Mendelssohn, Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream"
Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 4, in F Minor, Finale, Allegro con fuoco
Sibelius, "Finlandia," Symphonic Poem, op. 26, No. 7
Brahms, Symphony No. 2, in D Major, op. 73, Third Movement, Allegretto Grazioso
Weber-Berlioz, "Invitation to the Dance"

TUESDAY

Procession of the Sardar..Ippolitov Ivanov
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Hindu Song from "Sadko" Rimsky-Korsakov
Fantasia, "Rigoletto".....Verdi
A Fairy Tale.....Nagel
Ave Maria.....Schubert-Wilhelmj
Volga Bargemen's Song....Arr. by Jacchia
Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner
Hymn to the Sun from "Iris"...Mascagni
Song Without Words.....Tschaikovsky
Waltz, "Artist's Life".....Strauss

WEDNESDAY

Annual Request Night
Program to be announced Monday, June 23.

THURSDAY

International Program
Scandinavia
Swedish Coronation March.....Svendson
Germany
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," Wagner
Spain
Intermezzo from "Goyescas"....Granados
Italy
Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut".....Puccini
France
Suite, "L'Arlesienne," No. 1.....Bizet
Russia
Third Movement, "Scheherazade," Rimsky-Korsakov
England
Salut d'Amour.....Elgar
Hungary
First Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
America
Woodland Sketches.....MacDowell
Austria
Waltz, "Vienna Blood".....Strauss
Finland
"Finlandia" .....Sibelius

FRIDAY

Stars and Stripes Forever.....Sousa
Overture to "The Mastersingers"..Wagner
"Elli, Elli".....arr. by Jacchia
Fantasia "Mefistofele".....Boito
Egyptian Ballet.....Luigini
"We are from New England"....Carleton
Largo .....Handel
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812".Tchaikovsky
Pomp and Circumstance.....Elgar
Waltz, "La Barcarolle".....Waldteufel
American Fantasy.....Herbert

SATURDAY

March from "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner
Overture, "Durochka".....McLain
The Lark.....Glinka
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah,"
Saint-Saens
Prelude to "Traviata".....Verdi
Suite from "Carmen".....Bizet
Spanish Dance, "Panaderos"....Glazounov
Rhapsody, "Italia".....Casella
Selection of Irish Airs, "Shamrock," Myddleton
Ave Maria.....Bach-Gounod
Waltz, "Voices of Spring".....Strauss

AT THE POPS TONIGHT

A new departure at the Pop concerts—a symphonic program—will be offered at Symphony Hall tonight. The numbers follow:

Hungarin March, "Rakoczy" .....Berlioz
First Movement, "Unfinished" Sym. phony .....Schubert
Third Movement, Symphony No. 3, "Eroica" .....Beethoven
Prelude, "Mastersingers of Nuremberg."
Rhapsody, "Espana" .....Chabrier
Symphnoy No. 5, "From the New World," Dvorak
(Second movement—Largo)
Scherzo, "Midsummer Night's Dream" Mendelssoan
Symphony No. 4, Finale .....Tschaikowsky
"Finlandia," Symphonic Poem, ...Sibelius
Symphony No. 2 in D Major, Op. 73 Brahms
(Third movement)
"Invitation to the Dance".....Weber-Berlioz

SYMPHONIC POPS

A new departure at the pop concerts—a symphonic program—will take place in Symphony hall tonight. The numbers follow:

Hungarian March, "Rakoczy".....Berlioz
First Movement, "Unfinished" Symphony, Schubert
Third Movement, Symphony No. 3, "Eroica" .....Beethoven
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" .....Wagner
Rhapsody, "Espana" .....Chabrier
Symphony No. 5, "From the New World" (Second Movement—Largo) .....Dvorak
Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream" .....Mendelssohn
Symphony No. 4 in F Minor—Finale .....Tchaikovsky
"Finlandia," Symphonic Poem Op. 26, No. 7.....Sibelius
Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 73 (Third Movement).....Brahms
"Invitation to the Dance"..Weber-Berlioz

Programs of the Week

SYMPHONY HALL—The Pops, Agide Jacchia, conductor. Evenings at 8:15, June 22, Russian program—Polonaise, Liadov; Kamarinskaya, Fantasy on two Russian Folk Songs, Glinka; "Eili, Eili," arranged by Agide Jacchia; prelude, Rachmaninov; Islamey, Oriental Fantasy, Balakirev-Casella; Finale of "Scheherazade," Rimsky - Korsakov; Spanish Serenade, Glazounov; Kammenoi Ostrow, Rubinstein; Orientale, Cui-Jacchia; Marche Slave, Tchaikovsky.

Monday, Symphonic Program—Berlioz, Hungarian March, "Rakoczy"; Schubert, Symphony in B minor (Unfinished), first movement, Allegro moderato; Beethoven, Symphony No 3, in E flat major, "Eroica," third movement, Scherzo, Allegro vivace; Wagner, Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"; Chabrier, Rhapsody, "Espana"; Dvorak, Symphony No. 5, in E minor, "From the New World," second movement (Largo); Mendelssohn, Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; Tchaikovsky, Symphony No 4, in F minor, finale; Allegro con fuoco; Sibelius, "Finlandia," symphonic poem, op 26, No 7; Brahms, Symphony No 2, in D major, op 73, third movement, allegretto grazioso; Weber-Berlioz, "Invitation to the Dance."

Tuesday—Procession of the Sardar, Ippolitov Ivanov; Overture to "William Tell," Rossini; Hindu Song from "Sadko," Rimsky-Korsakov; Fantasia, "Rigoletto," Verdi; A Fairy Tale, Nagel; Ave Maria, Schubert-Wilhelmj; Volga Bargemen's Song, arranged by Jacchia; Ride of the Valkyries, Wagner; Hymn to the Sun from "Iris," Mascagni; Song Without Words, Tchaikovsky; Waltz, "Artist's Life," Strauss.

Wednesday—Annual request night, program to be announced Monday, June 23.

Thursday, International Program—Scandinavia, Swedish Coronation March, Svendsen; Germany, overture to "The Flying Dutchman," Wagner; Spain, intermezzo from "Goyescas," Granados; Italy, Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut," Puccini; France, Suite, "L'Arlesiennc," No. 1, Bizet; Russia, 3d movement, "Scheherazade," Rimsky-Korsakov; England, Salut d'Amour, Elgar; Hungary, First Hungarian Rhapsody, Liszt; America, Woodland Sketches, MacDowell; Austria, waltz, "Vienna Blood," Strauss; Finland, "Finlandia," Sibelius.

Friday—"Stars and Stripes Forever," Sousa; overture to "The Mastersingers," Wagner; "Eili, Eili," arranged by Jacchia; fantasia "Mefistofele," Boito; Egyptian Ballet, Luigini; "We are from New England," Carleton; "Largo," Handel; Overture Solennelle, "1812," Tchaikovsky; Pomp and Circumstance, Elgar; waltz, "La Barcarolle," Waldteufel; "American Fantasy," Herbert;

Saturday—March from "Tannhauser," Wagner; overture, "Durochka," McLain; "The Lark," Glinka; fantasia, "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; prelude to "Traviata," Verdi; suite from "Carmen," Bizet; spanish dance, "Panaderos," Glazounov; rhapsody, "Italia," Casella; selection of Irish airs," Shamrock," Myddleton; "Ave Maria," Bach-Gounod; waltz, "Voices of Spring," Strauss.

NEW DEPARTURE AT POP CONCERT

A new departure at the Pop Concerts—a symphonic programme—will take place in Symphony Hall tonight. The numbers follow:

Hungarian March, "Rakoczy".....Berlioz
First Movement, "Unfinished" Symphony Schubert
Third Movement, Symphony No. 3, "Eroica" Beethoven
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" .....Wagner
Rhapsody, "Espana" .....Chabrier
Symphony No. 5, "From the New World" Dvorak
(Second Movement—Largo)
Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's

Tonight at the Pops

SYMPHONIC PROGRAM

Hungarian March, "Rakoczy," Berlioz
First Movement, Unfinished Symphony .....Schubert
Third Movement, Symphony No. 3, "Eroica" .....Beethoven
Prelude to "Meistersinger"..Wagner
Rhapsody, "España" .....Chabrier
Largo, Symphony No. 5, "From the New World" .....Dvořák
Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream" .....Mendelssohn
Finale, Symphony No. 4 in F minor Tschaikowsky
"Finlandia" .....Sibelius
Third Movement, Symphony No. 2 in D major .....Brahms
"Invitation to the Dance." Weber-Berlioz

At the Pops Tonight

Hungarian March, "Rakoczy"...Berlioz
First Movement, "Unfinished Symphony" .....Schubert
Third Movement, Symphony No. 3, "Eroica" .....Beethoven
Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" .....Wagner
Rhapsody, "Espana" .....Chabrier
Symphony No. 5, "From the New World" .....Dvorak
(Second Movement—Largo)
Scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream" .....Mendelssohn
Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Finale Chaikovsky
Symphonic Poem, "Finlandia"..Sibelius
Symphony No. 2 in D major....Brahms
(Third Movement)
"Invitation to the Dance".Weber-Berlioz

Agide Jacchia, Conductor

72 NEW YORK Times JUN 23 1927

Music of the Locomotive

Serge Koussevitzky, who comes to conduct the Boston Symphony in the Autumn (TIME, Sept. 17), electrified Paris by a performance at the Opéra of M. Arthur Honegger's symphonic movement called Pacific (231)—a musical glorification of the modern American locomotive. Reports have it that Honegger, who is one of Eric Satie's famed "Group of Six" modernists, passionately loves locomotives. To him they are living beings, especially the big ones, like Pacific (231), which draw heavy loads at high speeds.

The composition, while it does not imitate the noise of the machine, attempts to make audible the spirit of the monster of the steel roadway, and thereby to reflect the tremendous dash and energy of modern life. One critic described the effect as follows:

"It opens with the slow and majestic pulsation of the engine. Then the movement, like the speed of the train, accelerates until it becomes a thunderous trepidation. Then it reaches the lyrical state, the pathetic solitude of a train of 300 tons launched in the dead of night at 100 miles an hour. Then with gradually decreasing power the movement slows down, the brakes subdue all this dynamism, the monster triumphantly arrives on a broad and sumptuous tune."

Tonight at the Pops

Procession of the Sardar
Ippolitoff Ivanoff
Overture to "William Tell"..Rossini
Hindu Song from "Sadko"
Rimsky-Korsakoff
Fantasia, "Rigoletto" .....Verdi
A Fairy Tale .....Nagel
"Ave Maria" ....Schubert-Wilhelmj
Volga Bargemen's Song
Arranged by Jacchia
Ride of the Valkyrs.....Wagner
Hymn to the Sun from "Iris"
Mascagni
Song Without Words..Tschaikowsky
Waltz, "Artist's Life" .....Strauss

At The Pops Tonight

Procession of the Sardar
Ippolitov-Ivanov
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Hindu Song from "Sadko"
Rimsky-Korsakov
Fantasia, "Rigoletto" .....Verdi
A Fairy Tale.....Nagel
Ave Maria.....Schubert-Wilhelmj
Solo violin, harp, organ and strings
Song of the Volga Bargemen
Arranged by Jacchia
Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner
Hymn to the Sun from "Iris"..Mascagni
Night—Dawn—Sunrise
Song without Words.....Chaikovsky
Waltz, "Artist's Life".....Strauss

A. Jacchia: Conductor

TONIGHT'S POPS

The following program will be given at the Pops concert in Symphony hall tonight:

Procession of the Sardar.....Ippolitov-Ivanov
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Hindu Song from "Sadko"...Rimsky-Korsakov
Fantasia, "Rigoletto" .....Verdi
A Fairy Tale.....Nagel
Ave Maria.....Schubert-Wilhelmj
Solo violin, harp, organ and string.
Song of the Volga Bargemen...Arr. by Jacchia
Ride of the Valkyries .....Wagner
Hymn to the Sun from "Iris".....Mascagni
Night, Dawn, Sunrise.
Song without Words.....Tchaikovsky
Waltz, "Artist's Life" .....Strauss

Last Week But One of Symphony Hall "Pops"

Only this week and next remain of the season of "Pop" concerts in Symphony Hall. Special nights this week are the annual Request Night tomorrow, program of which has been determined by the vote of the "Pops" public, and an international program Thursday, at which different Nations are represented.

The program tonight follows: "Procession of the Sardar," Ippolitov-Ivanov; overture to "William Tell," Rossini; Hindu song from "Sadko," Rimsky-Korsakov; Fantasia, "Rigoletto," Verdi; "A Fairy Tale," Nagel; "Ave Maria," Schubert-Wilhelmj; "Song of the Volga Bargemen," arranged by Jacchia; "Ride of the Valkyries," Wagner; "Hymn to the Sun, from "Iris," Mascagni; "Song Without Words," Tchaikovsky; waltz, "Artist's Life," Strauss.

TONIGHT'S POP PROGRAM

The following program will be given at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

Procession of the Sardar, Ippolitov-Ivanov
Overture, "William Tell" ..... Rossini
Hindu Song "Sadko" ... Rimsky-Korsakov
Fantasia, "Rigoletto" ..... Verdi
A Fairy Tale ..... Nagel
Ave Maria ..... Schubert-Wilhelm
Song of Volga Bargemen,
Arranged by Jacchia
Ride of the Valkyries ..... Wagner
Hymn to the Sun, "Iris" ..... Mascagni
Song Without Words ..... Tchaikovsky
Waltz, "Artist's Life" ..... Strauss

TONIGHT'S POPS

The following program will be given at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight:

"Procession of the Sardar," Ippolitov-Ivanov; overture to "William Tell," Rossini; Hindu song from "Sadko," Rimsky-Korsakov; Fantasia, "Rigoletto," Verdi; "A Fairy Tale," Nagel; "Ave Maria," Schubert-Wilhelm, solo violin, harp, organ and strongs; "Song of the Volga Bargemen," arranged by Jacchia; "Ride of the Valkyries," Wagner; hymn to the sun from "Iris," Mascagni, Night—Dawn—Sunrise; Song without Words, Tchaikovsky; waltz, "Artist's Life," Straus.

Something New at the Pops

Arriving at Symphony Hall last night in the course of the second number, one got the impression of assisting in the lobby at a "regular" symphony concert. For there was the usual group of latecomers standing about, gazing resentfully at doors closed tight and guarded by an implacable usher. And through the cracks in the forbidden doors came tantalizingly the strains of the first movement of Schubert's Unfinished Symphony.

But it was only an illusion. The time was really late June, as one had supposed, and the occasion was not a symphony concert but a "Symphonic program" at the familiar Pops.

A most successful innovation it proved. Mr. Jacchia, with his customary discernment, had chosen his symphonic excerpts with a proper regard for the tastes of summer concertgoers. His program escaped being forbidding. A modicum of "heavy" music was well diluted with lighter stuff. Among single movements from symphonies by Beethoven, Brahms, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Tschaikowsky and Dvorák were interspersed such trifles as Berlioz's "Rakoczy" March, Chabrier's "España" and the Weber-Berlioz "Invitation to the Dance." And even the symphonic excerpts were of the more easily apprehended order—Dvorák's contribution was the Largo of the "New World." Thus both really-and-truly music lovers, of whom a considerable number were visible, and mere pleasure-seekers were gratified.

Altogether an admirable departure in Pops programs. Possibly Mr. Jacchia will be encouraged to try it again next year; and perhaps then he will set his symphonic program down for one of the Sunday evening concerts, when the more musical music may be heard without the clink of glasses.

Last night's concert opened the last week but one of the Pops season. Tomorrow night brings the annual request program, and Thursday evening an international program, with composers representing Scandinavia, Germany, Spain, Italy, France, Russia, England, Hungary, America, Austria and Finland. All concerts will be open to the public.

Tonight at the Pops

REQUEST NIGHT

Ride of the Valkyrs.....Wagner
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" .....Strauss
"Rêve Angélique" .....Rubinstein
Fantasia, "Carmen" .....Bizet
Second Hungarian Rhapsody...Liszt
"Eili, Eili" ....Arranged by Jacchia
"The Lark" .....Glinka-Jacchia
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"
Tschaikowsky
Suite, "Peer Gynt" .....Grieg
"Ave Maria" .....Schubert-Wilhelmj
Marche Slave.....Tschaikowsky

At the Pops Tonight

Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" .....Strauss
Rêve Angelique .....Rubinstein
Fantasia, "Carmen" .....Bizet
Second Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
Eili, Eili.....Arranged by Jacchia
Solo Trumpet, Georges Hager
The Lark .....Glinka-Jacchia
Overture, "Solennelle, 1812".Chaikovsky
Suite, "Peer Gynt".....Grieg
a. Morning Mood. b. Aase's Death.
c. In the Troll King's Grotto.
Ave Maria .....Schubert-Wilhelmj
Solo Violin, Harp, Organ and Strings
Marche Slave .....Chaikovsky

Conductor: A. Jacchia

REQUEST NIGHT AT POPS

The annual request night program will be offered at the Pops concert in Symphony hall tonight. Determined entirely by popular vote, the numbers follow:

Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" Strauss
Reve Angelique .....Rubinstein
Fantasia, "Carmen" .....Bizet
Second Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
Eili, Eili.....Arranged by Jacchia
Solo trumpet, Georges Mager
The Lark .....Glinka-Jacchia
Overture, Solennelle, "1812"..Tchaikovsky
Suite, "Peer Gynt".....Grieg
(a) Morning Mood. (b) Aase's Death
(c) In the Troll King's Grotto.
Ave Maria .....Schubert-Wilhelmj
Solo violin, harp, organ and strings
Marche Slave .....Tchaikovsky

'REQUEST'' PROGRAM AT TONIGHT'S POP CONCERT

The annual "request" program will be featured at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight. The numbers have been chosen entirely by public vote.

Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner
Waltz, "Blue Danube" .....Strauss
Reve Angelique .....Rubenstein
Fantasia, "Carmen" .....Bizet
Second Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
Eili, Eili.....Arranged by Jacchia
Solo Trumpet, Georges Mager
The Lark .....Glinka-Jacchia
Overture, "1815" .....Tchaikovsky
Suite, "Peer Gynt" .....Grieg
Ave Maria .....Schubert-Wilhelmj
Solo violin, harp, organ and Strings
Marche Slave .....Tchaikovsky

Tonight at the Pops

INTERNATIONAL PROGRAM

SCANDINAVIA: Swedish Coronation March .....Svendsen
GERMANY: Overture to "The Flying Dutchman" .....Wagner
SPAIN: Intermezzo from "Goyescas" Granados
ITALY: Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut" Puccini
FRANCE: Suite, "L'Ariésienne," No. 1 .....Bizet
RUSSIA: Third Movement, "Schéhérazade" .....Rimsky-Korsakoff
ENGLAND: "Salut d'Amour"..Elgar
HUNGARY: First Hungarian Rhapsody .....Liszt
AMERICA: Woodland Sketches MacDowell
AUSTRIA: Waltz, "Vienna Blood" Strauss
FINLAND: "Finlandia" ....Sibelius

INTERNATIONAL PROGRAM AT POPS

Eleven different nations and more will be represented on the International program at the Pops in Symphony hall tonight. The numbers follow:

Scandinavia, Swedish Coronation March, Svendson; Germany, Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," Wagner; Spain, Intermezzo from "Goyescas." Granados; Italy, Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut," Puccini; France, Suite "L'Arlesienne" No. 1, Bizet; Russia Third Movement "Scheherazade," Rimsky-Korsakov; England, Salut d'Amour, Elgar; Hungary First Hungarian Rhapsody, Liszt; America, Woodland Sketches, MacDowell; Austria, Waltz, "Vienna Blood," Strauss; Finland, Symphonic Poem, "Finlandia," Sibelius.

At The Pops Tonight

International Programme

Scandinavia: Swedish Coronation March, Svendsen
Germany: Overture to "The Flying Dutchman" .....Wagner
Spain: Intermezzo from "Goyescas," Granados
Italy: Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut," Puccini
France: Suite, "L'Arlesienne" No. 1, Bizet
Russia: Third Movement, "Scheherazade" .....Rimsky-Korsakov
England: Salut d'Armour.....Elgar
Hungary: First Hungarian Rhapsody, Liszt
America: Woodland Sketches. MacDowell
Austria: Waltz, "Vienna Blood".Strauss
Finland: Symphonic Poem, "Finlandia," Sibelius

Conductor: A. Jacchia

INTERNATIONAL MUSIC AT THE POPS TONIGHT

Here is the international program to be played at the Pops in Symphony Hall tonight:

Scandinavia, Coronation March.....Svendsen
Germany, Overture, "Flying Dutchman" Wagner
Spain, Intermezzo, "Goyescas".....Granados
Italy, Fantasia, "Manon Lescaut"....Puccini
France, Suite, "L'Arlesienne".....Bizet
Russia, Third Movement, "Scheherazade" .....Rimsky-Korsakov
England, Salut d'Amour .....Elgar
Hungary, First Hungarian Rhapsody...Liszt
America, Woodland Sketches ...MacDowell
Austria, Waltz, "Vienna Blood" ....Strauss
Finland, Symphonic Poem, "Finlandia." Sibelius

At The Pops Tonight

Evening of Rotary Clubs

Stars and Stripes Forever.....Sousa
Overture to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" ..... Wagner
Eili, Eili.....Arranged by Jacchia
Trumpet solo—Georges Mager.
Fantasia, "Mefistofele".....Boito
Egyptian Ballet .....Luigini
"We're from New England."
Dr. Francis G. Carleton,
Member Rotary Club of Boston.
Largo (solo violin, harp, organ and strings) .....Handel
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"
Tschaikovsky
Pomp and Circumstance.....Elgar
Waltz, "La Barcarolle"....Waldteufel
American Fantasy .....Herbert

Conductor: A. Jacchia

ROTARY CLUB AT THE POPS TONIGHT

Agide Jacchia has arranged the following program for the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight, at which the Rotary Club will be present:

Stars and Stripes Forever.....Sousa
Overture to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" .....Wagner
Eili, Eili.....Arranged by Jacchia
Trumpet Solo—Georges Mager
Fantasia, "Mefistofele".....Boito
Rotary Club Songs
Egyptian Ballet .....Luigini
"We're from New England"
Dr. Francis G. Carleton, Member Rotary Club of Boston
Largo (solo, violin, harp, organ and strings) .....Handel
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812".....Tchaikovsky
Pomp and Circumstance.....Elgar
Waltz, "La Barcarolle".....Waldteufel
American Fantasy .....Herbert

POPS TONIGHT

Agide Jacchia has made the following program for the Pops concert in Symphony hall tonight, at which Rotary club members will be present:

Stars and Stripes Forever.....Sousa
Overture to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" .....Wagner
Eili, Eili.....Arranged by Jacchia
Trumpet solo, George Mager
Fantasia, "Mefistofele".....Boito
Rotary Club Songs
Egyptian Ballet.....Luigini
"We're from New England,"
Dr. Francis G. Carleton
Largo (solo, violin, harp, organ and strings) .....Handel
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"..Tchaikovsky
Pomp and Circumstance.....Elgar
Waltz, "La Barcarolle".....Waldteufel
American Fantasy.....Herbert

Tonight at the Pops

"Stars and Stripes Forever"...Sousa
Overture to "Meistersinger".Wagner
"Eili, Eili" ....Arranged by Jacchia
Fantasia, "Mefistofele" .....Boito
Rotary Club Songs
Egyptian Ballet .....Luigini
"We're From New England"
Dr. Francis G. Carleton, member Rotary Club of Boston
Largo .....Handel
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"
Tschaikowsky
"Pomp and Circumstance"....Elgar
Waltz, "La Barcarolle"..Waldteufel
American Fantasy .....Herbert

ROTARY NIGHT AT POPS.

The Rotary Club will celebrate at the Pops tonight. The program follows:

Stars and Stripes Forever.....Sousa
Overture, "Mastersingers" .....Wagner
Eili, Eili.....Arr. by Jacchia
Trumpet solo, George Mager.
Fantasia, "Mefistofele" .....Bolto
Rotary Club Songs.
Egyptian Ballet .....Luigini
"We're from New England"
Dr. Francis G. Carleton, Rotary Club of Boston
Largo (solo violin, harp, organ and strings) Handel
Overture, "1812" .....Tchaikovsky
Pomp and Circumstance .....Elgar
Waltz, "La Barcarolle" .....Waldteufel
American Fantasy .....Herbert

POPS PROGRAM

Agide Jacchia has made the following program for the Pop concert in Symphony hall tonight, at which the Rotary club will be present in numbers.

Stars and Stripes Forever, Sousa; Overture to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," Wagner; Eili, Eili, Trumpet solo—Georges Mager, Arranged by Jacchia; Fantasia, "Mefistofele," Bolto; Rotary clug songs; Egyptian Ballet, Luigini; "We're from New England," Dr. Francis G, Carleton; Member Rotary club of Boston; Largo (solo violin, harp, organ and strings), Handel; Overture Solennelle, "1812" Tchaikovsk; Pomp and Circumstance, Elgar; Waltz, "La Barcarolle," Waldteufel; American Fantasy, Herbert

Adv June 28.

POP PROGRAM TONIGHT

At the Pop concert in Symphony Hall tonight the following program will be played:

"Tannhauser" Selection ..... Wagner
Overture, "Durochka" ..... McLean
The Lark (Arr. by Jacchia) ..... Glinka
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah" ..... Saint-Saens
Suite from "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Prelude to "Traviata" ..... Verdi
Spanish Dance, "Panaderos" ..... Glazounov
Rhapsody, "Italia" ..... Casella
Irish Airs ..... Middleton
Ave Maria ..... Bach-Gounod
Waltz, "Voices of Spring" ..... Strauss

AMUSEMENTS

Gazzetta Trans June 28

TEATRI E CONCERTI

PROGRAMMA DI MUSICA ITALIANA AI CONCERTI "POPS" DELLA SYMPHONY HALL

Sotto la direzione di Agide Iacchia il noto direttore di questi notissimi Concerti Pops, sarà eseguito, martedì 1o. luglio, un programma interamente di musica italiana.

AGIDE IACCHIA

Questo programma, che il Maestro Iacchia ha concretato, sciegliendolo tra gli autori più in voga e prediletti dal popolo italiano, non solo formerà l'ammirazione di tutti gli assidui, che in quel ritrovo convengono senza distinzioni di nazionalità perchè insieme alla buona musica classica vi godono speciali comodità e prerogative, ma specialmente di tutta o almeno della maggioranza della nostra colonia. Ecco intanto per esteso, il programma della serata:

Prologo dei "Pagliacci", Leoncavallo; Ouverture della "Giovanna di Arco", Verdi; Minuetto, Boccherini; Fantasia, "Tosca", Puccini; Danza delle ore dalla "Gioconda", Ponchielli; Romanza, Martucci-Jacchia; Addio di Georges Mager, Tosti; Overture di "Guglielmo Tell', Rossini; Selection, "Mefistofele", Boito; Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana", Mascagni, Waltz, "Il Bacio", Arditi

American June 25

Pop Concerts Enter Final Week of Season

Six nights remain of the present season of Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall. Agide Jacchia of the Pops Orchestra will present special program on each of these nights. Monday there will be a Polish program, Tuesday an Italian program, Wednesday a Wagner program, Thursday an operatic program, Friday, the Request program will be repeated, and Saturday will have a popular program for the closing night.

Monitor June 28

Tonight at the Pops

Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg, "Tannhäuser"..Wagner
Overture, "Durochka" ..... McLean
"The Lark" ..... Glinka
(Arranged by Jacchia)
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah" ..... Saint-Saëns
Suite from "Carmen" ..... Bizet
Prelude to "Traviata" ..... Verdi
Spanish Dance, "Panaderos" ..... Glazounoff
Rhapsody, "Italia" ..... Casella
Selection of Irish Airs, "Shamrock" ..... Middleton
"Ave Maria" ..... Bach-Gounod
Waltz, "Voices of Spring"...Strauss

Trans June 28.

At The Pops Tonight

Entrance of the Guests into the Wartburg, "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Overture, "Durochka".....McLean
The Lark (Arranged by Jacchia)..Glinka
Fantasia, "Samson and Delilah"....
Saint-Saëns
Suite from "Carmen".....Bizet
Prelude to "Traviata".....Verdi
Spanish Dance, "Panaderos".Glazounov
Rhapsody, "Italia" .....Casella
Selection of Irish Airs, "Shamrock"...
Middleton
Ave Maria (solo violin, harp, organ and strings) .....Bach-Gounod
Waltz, "Voices of Spring".....Strauss

Conductor: A. Jacchia

Herald June 28

LAST NIGHTS OF THE POPS

Six nights remain of the present season of Pop conerts at Symphony hall.

Agide Jacchia of the Pops orchestra will present special programs on each of these nights. Monday there will be a Polish program, Tuesday an Italian program, Wednesday a Wagner program, Thursday an operatic program, Friday the "Request" program will be repeated, and Saturday will have a popular program for the closing night.

Tonight's program follows:

Entrance of the guests into the Wartburg, from "Tannhauser," Wagner; overture, "Durochka," McLean; "The Larg" (afranged by Jacchia), Glinka; fantasia, "Samson and Delilah," Saint-Saens; suite from "Carmen"—(a) "March of the Smugglers," (b) "Habanera," (c) "Toreador's Song," Bizet; prelude to "Traviata," Verdi; Spanish dance, "Panaderos," Glazanov; rhapsody, "Italia," Casella; selection of Irish airs, "Shamrock," Middleton; "Ave Maria" (solo violin, harp, organ and strings), Bach-Gounod; Waltz, "Voices of Spring," Strauss.

Music Notes and Comment

Koussevitzky lately informed a delegation of American reviewers of music in Paris, including Olin Downes of the New York Times and F. D. Perkins of the New York Herald Tribune that the fear that his Boston Symphony programs next season will contain nothing but modern and archaic music is unfounded.

"I love classical music and romantic music. But movement is the principal thing in art; one cannot live forever with Beethoven, Brahms, Schumann, Mendelssohn, etc. Such music is basic, and we must play it from time to time, but there is something beautiful in modern music which cannot be passed by." He added that there will be one or two modern works in each of his programs, many of which he has already arranged.

Koussevitzky is apparently only taking the stand which Monteux, Muck, Gericke and Nikisch have taken in the past about programs. Muck and Gericke in particular used to perform modern music by Debussy. Strauss and others then deemed radical as Stravinsky now is whether or not they happened to like it personally and regardless of its immediate popularity with audiences, for the reason stated above by Koussevitzky. There seems no reasonable objection to programs thus constituted. The Boston Symphony has always and ought always to continue to play all kinds of orchestral music which have any claims to be taken seriously as music, whether or not the audiences or the reviewers or the players at the moment like or understand novel and unfamiliar works. Only thus can music remain a growing art.

Boston has been more fortunate hitherto than New York in its opportunities to hear the best new and old orchestral music, because in the metropolis programs have tended to follow a stereotyped formula Beethoven, Liszt, Tschaikovsky or something of the sort.

It is [illegible] announced that Stravinsky will serve as guest conductor at several concerts of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra next season, with programs featuring his own works.

Koussevitzky has secured the exclusive rights for American first performances of several important musical novelties including Honegger's "Pacific 231," Prokofiev's "Scythian Suite," and Ravel's orchestral arrangement of Musorgsky's piano pieces, "Pictures from an Exposition."

Adv June 29

LAST WEEK OF POP CONCERTS

Six nights remain of the season of Pop Concerts at Symphony Hall. Agide Jacchia has arranged a special program for each of them.

Monday there will be a Polish program; on Tuesday an Italian program; on Wednesday a Wagner program; on Thursday an operatic bill.

On the Fourth of July the request program will be repeated for the benefit of the thousands who were unable to gain admission last Wednesday. On Saturday the Pops will close their season with the "Rakoczy" March, Schenck's "Arrow Maker," "Aida" Fantasia, "Sylvia" Suite. Holy Grail Music from "Parsifal," Liszt's First Hungarian Rhapsody, "Dubinushka" for Trumpet Solo, and other favorites.

Italian News June 28.

"ITALIAN NIGHT" AT THE POPS

Lovers of good music and music that is well played should take advantage of "Italian Night" that Signor Agide Jacchia, able conductor of the Pops Concerts, has planned for next Tuesday at Symphony Hall.

"Italian Night" has come to be an annual event with the Pops and there are scores—not of Italian blood—who look forward to listening only to Italian airs such as will be the order on next Tuesday night. If people of other nationalities can appreciate Italian music, surely, the least Italians hereabouts can do is to help perpetuate this annual event by attending it.

Gazzetta Trans June 28

TEATRI E CONCERTI

LA SERATA ITALIANA ALLA SYMPHONY HALL

Ancora due sole settimane rimangono per la chiusura della stagione dei Concerti Pops, alla Symphony Hall.

Programmi speciali di carattere e interesse vario sono stati tracciati dal direttore di questi popolari concerti, il maestro Agide Iacchia; ma quello che maggiormente desta la aspettazione della colonia italiana è appunto il concerto dedicato tutto alla musica dei più noti autori italiani. Questo Concerto è fissato per martedì prossimo e si prevede che tutta la colonia vi accorrerà per sentirsi rievocare la nostalgia delle melodie della patria.

Molti sono stati i direttori di questi popolari concerti "Pops" ma siamo affermare che forse nessuno ha raggiunto la popolarità schietta dal maestro Agide Iacchia che ha trovato la via giùsta per entrare in diretta comunicazione con il suo pubblico. E questa è anche la ragione precipua per cui egli è rimasto a quel posto di direzione per ben sette consecutive stagioni, apportando a ciascuna di esse sempre maggiori innovazioni e attrattive. Di tal chè può affermarsi, senza tema di smentita, che il maestro Iacchia è il più popolare e compreso direttore che i "Pops" abbiano avuto fin dal loro nascere.

Il maestro Iacchia è nativo di Pesaro e studiò musica sotto la guida di Mascagni nel conservatorio di quella città. Quando Mascagni compose la sua "Cavalleria Rusticana" ne affidò la direzione in varie città appunto ad Agide Iacchia, che della opera fu sempre un verace interprete. Ancora giovine Agide Iacchia ebbe la bacchetta direttoriale di parecchi teatri di Italia.

Venuto in America egli seguitò a mantenere alto l'onore italiano e diresse le opere da una sponda alla altra dell'America, dal Canadà alla America Centrale, e sempre con compagnie di fama mondiale. Nella stagione 1914-1915 egli fu uno dei principali direttori al Century Theatre di New York. Dopo quell'anno fu asunto dalla Boston National Opera Company nella tornee per gli Stati Uniti nella stagione 1915-1916.

Agide Iacchia è il fondatore e il direttore del Conservatorio di Musica di Boston. Nel 1920 diresse lo storico Coro della Cecilia Society di Boston, di dove passò, poi, alla direzione dei popolari Concerti 'Pops"

Sotto la sua direzione, i membri dell'Orchestra hanno raggiunto il numero di 80. Ripetiamo qui il programma della serata italiana di martedì prossimo:

Prologo dei "Pagliacci", Leoncavallo; Ouverture di "Giovanna di Arco", Verdi; Minuetto, Boccherini; Fantasia, "Tosca", Puccini; Danza delle ore dalla "Gioconda", Ponchielli; Romanza, Martucci-Iacchia; Addio (con Solo di trompetta- Georges Mager), Tosti; Ouverture di "William Tell", Rossini; Selezione dal "Mefistofele' Boito: intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana", Mascagni; Waltz, "Il bacio", Arditi.

Adv—June 29.

Programs for Final Week of Pop Concerts

SYMPHONY HALL—The Pops, Agide Jacchia, conductor. Evenings at 8:15. Monday, Russian program — March, "Sigurd Jorsalfar," Grieg; overture to "Mignon," Thomas; waltz, "Espana," Waldteufel; fantasia, "Il Trovatore," Verdi; mazurka from "Halka," Moniuszko; violin solo, Julius Theodorowicz, Polonaise No. 2 in D major, Wienawski; Nocturne, op 48, No. 1, Glinka; fantasia, "Manru," Paderewski; selection of Polish songs, arr by Katz; "The Lost Chord," trumpet solo, Georges Mager, Sullivan; Taniec Goralski from "Balka," Moniuszko.

Tuesday, Italian Program—Prologue to "Pagliacci," Leoncavallo; overture to "Giovanna d'Arco," Verdi; minuet, Boocherini; fantasia, "Tosca," Puccini; Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; Romanza, Martucci-Jacchia; "Goodby," trumpet solo, Georges Mager, Tosti; overture to "William Tell," Rossini; selection, "Mefistofele," Bolo; intermezzo, "Cavelleria Rusticana," Mascagni; waltz, "Il Bacio," Arditi.

Wednesday, Wagner Program—First Hungarian Dance, Brahms; overture to "Sakuntala," Goldmark; waltzes from "Der Rosencavalier," Strauss; excerpts from "The Mastersingers," "Tannhauser," "Lohengrin," "Dreams" (violin, Julius Theodorowicz) and "The Valkyrie," Wagner; selection, "Martha," Flotow; largo, Handel; "Charge of the Hussars," Spindler.

Thursday, Operatic Program—"Eugen Onegin," polonaise. Tchaikovsky: "The Bartered Bride," overture, Smetana; "Pagliacci," intermezzo, Leoncavallo; "Faust," fantasia, Gounod; "Lohengrin," prelude, Wagner; "Carmen," Gypsy dance, Bizet; "Othello Ave Maria," Verdi; "Samson and Delilah," bacchanale, Saint-Saens; "Madame Butterfly," selection, Puccini; "Tales of Hoffman," barcarolle, Offenbach; "The Prophet," coronation march, Meyerbeer.

Friday, Request Program, repeated—"Ride of the Valkyries," Wagner; waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube," Strauss; "Reve Angelique," Rubinstein; fantasia, "Carmen," Bizet; second Hungarian rhapsody, Liszt; Eili, Eili, solo trumpet, Georges Mager, arranged by Jacchia; "The Lark," Glinka-Jacchia; Overture Solennelle, "1812," Tchaikovsky; suite, "Peer Gynt," Grieg; "Ave Maria," Schubert-Wilhelm; "Marche Slave," Tchaikovsky.

Saturday, Closing Night—March, "Rakoczy," Berlioz; overture, "The Arrow Maker," Schenck; waltz, "1001 Nights," Strauss; fantasia, "Aida," Verdi; ballet suite, "Sylvia," Delibes; entrance of the knights into the Temple of the Holy Grail, "Parsifal," Wagner; lilt from "College Life," Lewis; first Hungarian rhapsody, Liszt; "Dance of the Hours," from "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; "Dubinushka," trumpet, Georges Mager, arranged by Agide Jacchia; "In the Troll King's Grotto," Grieg.

LAST WEEK OF THE POPS

With the concert of next Saturday evening the present season of Pops will come to an end, and both on the score of attendance and of musical interest this season, which has offered an unusual number of interesting "special" nights, has been a notable one.

Tomorrow evening's concert will bring the first Polish programme, upon which, as typical Polish composers, stand the names of Moniuszki, Wieniawski, Chopin and Paderewski.

The programme for Tuesday evening is made wholly of pieces by Italians and, strikingly enough, there is no duplication of names, each of the 11 pieces representing a different composer.

On Wednesday, Richard Wagner will be the composer of the evening, with five compositions bearing his name, while his compatriots Brahms, Strauss, Flotow, Handel and Spindler, with the Hungarian Goldmark, provide the remainder of the programme.

An operatic programme on Thursday again lists 11 different composers, representative of Russia, Bohemia, Italy, France and Germany, with the overture to Smetana's "Bartered Bride" and the "Ave Maria" from Verdi's "Otello," as numbers of unusual interest.

Finally on Friday, the Fourth, last Wednesday's "Request Programme" will be repeated, assuring another crowded house; and for the concluding programme on Saturday Mr. Jacchia has assembled an attractive list of pieces that includes the entrance of the knights into the Temple of the Holy Grail, from "Parsifal"; the "Dance of the Hours," from "La Gioconda," and Mr. Jacchia's own arrangement of the Russian song "Dubinushka."

Herald June 29

LAST WEEK OF POP CONCERTS

Six nights remain of the season of Pop concerts at Symphony hall. Agide Jacchia has arranged a special program for each of them. The numbers are listed as follows:

Monday, June 30
POLISH PROGRAM

March, "Sigurd Jorsalfar".....Grieg
Overture to "Mignon".....Thomas
Waltz, "Espana".....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore".....Verdi
Mazurka from "Halka".....Moniuszko
Violin solo, Polonaise No. 2 in D major .....Wieniawski
Julius Theodorowicz
Nocturne, Op. 48, No. 1.....Glinka
Fantasia, "Manru".....Paderewski
Polskie Kwiaty, selection of Polish songs, arranged by Katz.
The Lost Chord (trumpet solo, Georges Mager) .....Sullivan
Taniec Goralski from "Halka" .....Moniuszko

Tuesday, July 1
ITALIAN PROGRAM

Prologue to "Pagliacci".....Leoncavallo
Overture to "Giovanna d'Arco".....Verdi
Minuet .....Boccherini
Fantasia, "Tosca".....Puccini
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda" .....Ponchielli
Romanza.....Martucci - Jacchia
Good-by .....Tosti
Trumpet solo, Georges Mager
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Selection, "Mefistofele".....Boito
Intermezzo, "Cavelleria Rusticana" Mascagni
Waltz, Il Bacio ("The Kiss").....Arditi

Wednesday, July 2
WAGNER PROGRAM

First Hungarian Dance.....Brahms
Overture to "Sakuntala".....Goldmark
Waltzes from "Der Rosencavalier" Strauss
Excerpts from "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," Act III.....Wagner
Introduction, Dance of the Apprentices—Homage to Hans Sachs.
Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" Richard Wagner
Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin" Richard Wagner
Dreams (violin—Julius Theodorowicz) Richard Wagner
Magic Fire Music, "The Valkyrie" Richard Wagner
Selection, "Martha".....Flotow
Largo, Solo violin, harp, organ and strings .....Handel
Charge of the Hussars.....Spindler

Thursday, July 3
OPERATIC PROGRAM

Eugen Onegin, Polonaise.....Tchaikovsky
The Bartered Bride, Overture....Smetana
Pagliacci, Intermezzo.....Leoncavallo
Faust, Fantasia.....Gounod
Lohengrin, Prelude.....Wagner
Carmen, Gipsy Dance.....Bizet
Othello, Ave Maria.....Verdi
Samson and Delilah, Bacchanale, Staint-Saens
Madame Butterfly, selection.....Puccini
The Tales of Hoffman, Barcarolle Offenbach
The Prophet, Coronation March, Meyerbeer

Friday, July 4
REQUEST PROGRAM (Repeated)

Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" .....Strauss
Reve Angelique.....Rubinstein
Fantasia, "Carmen".....Bizet
Second Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
Eili, Eili (Solo trumpet, Georges Mager) .....Arranged by Jacchia
The Lark.....Glinka-Jacchia
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812"..Tchaikovsky
Suite, "Peer Gynt".....Grieg
(a) Morning Mood
(b) Aase's Death
(c) In the Troll King's Grotto
Ave Maria (Solo violin, harp, organ and strings).....Schubert-Wilhelmj
Marche Slave.....Tchaikovsky

Saturday, July 5
CLOSING NIGHT

March, "Rakoczy".....Berlioz
Overture, "The Arrow Maker"....Schenck
Waltz, "1001 Nights".....Strauss
Fantasia, "Aida".....Verdi
Ballet Suite, "Sylvia".....Delibes
(a) Les Chasseresses
(b) Cortege de Bacchua
Entrance of the Knights into the Temple of the Holy Grail, "Parsifal"..Wagner
Lilt from "College Life".....Lewis
First Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
Dance of the Hours, from "La Gioconda" .....Ponchielli
Russian Folk Song, "Dubinushka," Arranged by Agide Jacchia (Trumpet, Georges Mager)
In the Troll King's Grotto.....Grieg

TONIGHT'S POPS PROGRAM

March, "Sigurd Jorsalfar" ..... Grieg
Overture to "Mignon" ..... Thomas
Waltz, "Espana" .....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore" ..... Verdi
Mazurka from "Halka" ..... Moniuszko
Violin Solo, Polonaise No. 2 in D Major Wieniavski
Julius Theodorowicz
Nocturne, Op. 48, No. 1.....Chopin
Arranged by Agide Jacchia
Fantasia, "Manru" ..... Paderewski
Polskie Kwiaty, Selection of Polish Songs
Arranged by Katz
The Lost Chord ..... Sullivan
Trumpet, Georges Mager
Taniec Goralski from "Halka"...Moniuszko

Tonight at the Pops

POLISH PROGRAM

March, "Sigurd Jorsalfar" .....Grieg
Overture to "Mignon" .....Thomas
Waltz, "Espana" .....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore" .....Verdi
Mazurka from "Halka" ..Moniuszko
Violin solo—Polonaise No. 2 in D major .....Wieniawski
Julius Theodorowicz
Nocturne, Op. 48, No. 1.....Chopin
Arranged by Agide Jacchia
Fantasia, "Manru" .....Paderewski
"Polskie Kwiaty," Selection of Polish Songs .....Arranged by Katz
The Lost Chord" .....Sullivan
Taniec Góralski from "Halka" Moniuszko

Transcript June 30

At The Pops Tonight

Polish Programme

March, "Sigurd Jorsalfar".....Grieg
Overture to "Mignon".....Thomas
Waltz, "España" .....Waldteufel
Fantasia, "Il Trovatore".....Verdi
Mazurka from "Halka".....Moniuszko
Violin solo—Polonaise No. 2 in D major .....Wieniavski
Julius Theodorowicz
Nocturne, Op. 48, No. 1.....Chopin
Arranged by Agide Jacchia.
Fantasia, "Manru" .....Paderewski
Polskie Kwiaty, Selection of Polish Songs,
Arranged by Katz.
The Lost Chord.....Sullivan
Trumpet—Georges Mager.
Taniec Góralski from "Halka," Moniuszko

Conductor: A. Jacchia

ITALIAN MUSIC AT POPS

Italian melodies will be featured at the Pops tonight. The program:

Prologue, "Pagliacci".....Leoncavallo
Overture, "Giovanna d'Arco".....Verdi
Minuet .....Boccherini
Fantasia, "Tosca".....Puccini
Dance of Hours, "La Gioconda."...Ponchielli
Romanza .....Martucci-Jacchia
Good-bye .....Tosti
Trumpet solo: Georges Mager
Overture, "William Tell".....Rossini
Selection, "Mefistofele".....Boito
Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana." Mascagni
Waltz, "Il Bacio".....Arditi

Tonight at the Pops

ITALIAN PROGRAM

Prologue to "Pagliacci"..Leoncavallo
Overture to "Giovanna d'Arco".Verdi
Minuet .....Boccherini
Fantasia, "Tosca".....Puccini
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda" .....Ponchielli
Romanza .....Martucci-Jacchia
Good-bye .....Tosti
Trumpet Solo—Georges Mager
Overture to "William Tell"..Rossini
Selection, "Mefistofele" .....Boito
Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana" Mascagni
Waltz, "Il Bacio" (The Kiss)..Arditi

Final Week of Pops

The Pop concerts at Symphony Hall entered on their final week last evening, when a Polish program was played by Agide Jacchia and his orchestra. Tonight's program consists of Italian music. Tomorrow night, Wagner's music will be featured, Thursday night there will be an operatic program, Friday night the request program will be repeated, and a revised program has been provided for the closing night Saturday.

ITALIAN PROGRAM AT POPS

The following program, consisting of operatic and other music from Italy, will be presented by Agide Jacchia, Italian conductor of the Pops, at Symphony hall tonight.

Prologue to "Pagliacci," Leoncavallo; Overture to "Giovanna d'Arco," Verdi; Minuet, Boccherini; Fantasia, "Tosca," Puccini; Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda," Ponchielli; Romanza, Martucci-Jacchia; Good-bye (Trumpet solo by Georges Mager), Tosti; Overture to "William Tell," Rossini; Selection, "Mefistofele," Boito; Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana," Mascagni; Waltz, "Il Bacio" ("The Kiss"), Arditi.

At The Pops Tonight

Italian Programme

Prologue to "Pagliacci"....Leoncavallo
Overture to "Giovanna d'Arco"...Verdi
Minuet .....Boccherini
Fantasia, "Tosca".....Puccini
Dance of the Hours from "La Gioconda" .....Ponchielli
Romanaza .....Martucci-Jacchia
Goodbye .....Tosti
Trumpet solo: Georges Mager
Overture to "William Tell".....Rossini
Selection, "Mefistofele".....Boito
Intermezzo, "Cavalleria Rusticana" Mascagni
Waltz, "Il Bacio" ("The Kiss").Arditi

Agide Jacchia, conductor

Herald July 2

POPS TONIGHT

Excerpts from the music dramas of Richard Wagner will be featured at the Pop concert in Symphony hall tonight. The program follows:

First Hungarian Dance.....Brahms
Overture to "Sakuntala".....Goldmark
Waltzes from "Der Rosencavalier," Strauss
Excerpts from "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," Act III.....Wagner
Introduction—Dance of the Apprentices.
Homage to Hans Sachs
Bacchanale from "Tannhauser"..Wagner
Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin," Wagner
Dreams .....Wagner
Violin, Jules Theodorowicz
Magic Fire Music, "The Valkyrie," Wagner
Selection, "Martha".....Flotow
Largo .....Handel
(Solo violin, harp, organ and strings)
Charge of the Hussars.....Spindler

American July 2.

WAGNER PROGRAM AT 'POPS' TONIGHT

Excerpts from the music dramas of Richard Wagner will be featured at the Pop Concert in Symphony Hall tonight. The program follows:

First Hungarian Dance.....Bhams
Overture to "Sakuntala".....Goldmark
Waltzes from "Der Rosencavalier," Strauss
Excerpts from "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," Act III.....Wagner
Introduction—Dance of the Apprentices
Homage to Hans Sachs.
Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," R. Wagner
Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin," R. Wagner
Dreams—Violin, Julius Theodorowicz, R. Wagner
Magic Fire Music, "The Valkyrie" R. Wagner
Selection, "Martha" ..... Flotow
Largo (solo violin, harp, organ and strings) ..... Handel
Charge of the Hussars.....Spindler

Monitor July 2

Tonight at the Pops

WAGNER PROGRAM

First Hungarian Dance.....Brahms
Overture to "Sakuntala"..Goldmark
Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier" Strauss
Excerpts from "Meistersinger," Act III .....Wagner
Bacchanale from "Tannhäuser"
Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin"
"Dreams"
(Violin—Julius Theodorowicz)
Magic Fire Music, "Walkyre" Wagner
Selection, "Martha" .....Flotow
"Charge of the Hussars"....Spindler

Trans July 4

At The Pops Tonight

Wagnerian Programme

First Hungarian Dance.....Brahms
Overture to "Sakuntala".....Goldmark
Waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier" Strauss
Excerpts from "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," Act III.....Wagner
Introduction—Dance of the Apprentices
Homage to Hans Sachs
Bacchanale from "Tannhauser".Wagner
Introduction to Act III, "Lohengrin" Wagner
Dreams .....Wagner
Violin—Julius Theodorowicz
Magic Fire Music, "The Valkyrie" Wagner
Selection, "Martha".....Flotow
Largo .....Handel
(Solo violin, harp, organ and strings)
Charge of the Hussars.....Spindler

Agide Jacchia, conductor

Her July 3

TONIGHT AT THE POPS

Operatic excerpts will fill the program tonight at the Pops concert in Symphony hall, of which only three remain. The numbers follow:

Eugen Onegin, polonaise.....Tchaikovsky
The Bartered Bride, overture.....Smetana
Pagliacci, intermezzo.....Leoncavallo
Faust, fantasia.....Gounod
Lohengrin, prelude.....Wagner
Carmen, Gipsy Dance.....Bizet
Othello, Ave Maria.....Verdi
Samson and Delilah, Bacchanale...Saint-Saens
Madame Butterfly, selection.....Puccini
The Tales of Hoffmann, Barcarolle...Offenbach
The Prophet, Coronation march.....Meyerbeer

Adv July 3

OPERATIC NIGHT AT POPS

Operatic music will fill the program tonight at the Pop concerts in Symphony Hall.

Polonaise, "Eugen Onegin" ....Tchaikovsky
Overture, "Bartered Bride" .....Smetana
Intermezzo, "Pagliecci" .....Leoncavallo
Fantasia, "Faust" .....Gounod
Prelude, "Lohengrin" .....Wagner
Gipsy Dance, "Carmen" .....Bizet
"Othello," "Ave Maria" .....Verdi
Bacchanale, "Samson and Delilah" .....
Selection, "Madame Butterfly" .....Saint-Saens
Barcarolle, "Tales of Hoffman" ....Puccini
Cornation March, "The Prophet," Meyerbeer

American July 3.

OPERATIC PROGRAM AT "POPS" TONIGHT

Operatic excerpts will fill the program tonight at the Pop Concerts in Symphony Hall. The numbers follow:

Eugen Onegin Polonaise .....Tchaikovsky
The Bartered Bride Overture .....Smetana
Pagliacci Intermezzo .....Leoncavallo
Faust Fantasia .....Gounod
Lohengrin Prelude .....Wagner
Carmen, Gipsy Dance .....Bizet
Othello Ave Maria .....Verdi
Samson and Delilah Bacchanale, Saint-Saens
Madame Butterfly Selection .....Puccini
The Tales of Hoffmann Barcarolle
The Prophet Coronation March. Offenbach Beyerbeer

Monitor July 3

Tonight at the Pops

OPERATIC PROGRAM

Polonaise, "Eugen Onegin" Tschaikowsky
Overture, "The Bartered Bride" Smetana
Intermezzo, "Pagliacci".Leoncavallo
Fantasia, "Faust" .....Gounod
Prelude, "Lohengrin" .....Wagner
Gypsy Dance, "Carmen" .....Bizet
Ave Maria, "Otello" .....Verdi
Bacchanale, "Samson and Delilah" Saint-Saëns
Selection, "Madam Butterfly" Puccini
Barcarolle, "The Tales of Hoffmann" Offenbach
Coronation March, "The Prophet" Meyerbeer

Tomorrow Night

REQUEST PROGRAM (Repeated)

"Ride of the Valkyrs".....Wagner
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" .....Strauss
"Reve Angélique" .....Rubinstein
Fantasia, "Carmen" .....Bizet
Second Hungarian Rhapsody...Liszt
"Eili, Eili".....Arranged by Jacchia
(Solo Trumpet—Georges Mager)
"The Lark" .....Glinka-Jacchia
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" Tschaikowsky
Suite, "Peer Gynt" .....Grieg
Ave Maria .....Schubert-Wilhelmj
Marche Slave .....Tschaikowsky

Trans, July 3

At The Pops Tonight

Operatic Programme

Eugen Onegin, Polonaise....Tchaikovsky
The Bartered Bride, Overture...Smetana
Pagliacci, Intermezzo.....Leoncavallo
Faust, Fantasia.....Gounod
Lohengrin, Prelude.....Wagner
Carmen, Gipsy Dance.....Bizet
Othello, Ave Maria.....Verdi
Samson and Delilah, Bacchanale Saint-Saëns
Madame Butterfly, Selection.....Puccini
The Tales of Hoffman, Barcarolle Offenbach
The Prophet, Coronation March.... Meyerbeer

Agide Jacchia, conductor

Tomorrow

Repeated Request Programme

Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner
Waltz, "On the Beautiful Blue Danube" .....Strauss
Reve Angelique.....Rubinstein
Fantasia, "Carmen".....Bizet
Second Hungarian Rhapsody.....Liszt
Eili, Eili....Arranged by Agide Jacchia
Solo trumpet—Georges Mager
The Lark.....Glinka-Jacchia
Overture Solennelle, "1812".Tchaikovsky
Suite, "Peer Gynt": a, Morning Mood; b, Aase's Death; c, In the Troll King's Grotto.....Grieg
Ave Maria.....Schubert-Wilhelmj
Marche Slave.....Tchaikovsky

Agide Jacchia, conductor

Adv July 4

REQUEST PROGRAM AT POP CONCERT TONIGHT

At the Pop concert in Syhphony Hall tonight the request program will be repeated. It follows:

Ride of the Valkyries.....Wagner
Waltz, "Blue Danube".....Strauss
Reve Angelique .....Rubinstein
Fantasia, "Carmen" .....Bizet
Second Hungarian Rhapsody.....Lisst
Eili, Eili.....Arranged by Agide Jacchia
Solo trumpet, George Mager.
The Lark .....Glinka-Jacchia
Overture, "1812".....Tschaikowsky
Suite, "Peter Gynt".....Grieg
Ave Marie.....Schubert-Wilhelmj
Marche Slave .....Tschaikowsky

Her July - 5.

LAST POPS TONIGHT

The Pops concert season in Symphony hall will end tonight with the following program:

March, "Rakoczy".....Berlioz
Overture, "The Arrow Maker"..Schenck
Waltz, "1001 Nights".....Strauss
Fantasia, "Aida".....Verdi
Procession of Bacchus, "Sylvia"..Delibes
Largo from the "New World" Symphony.....Dvorak
Lift from "College Life".....Lewis
Overture to "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Military march.....Saint-Saens
Russian folk song, "Dubinushka"
Arranged by Agide Jacchia
Finale of the Fourth Symphony,
Tchaikovsky

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TRIBUNE
JUN 2 2 1924

Pianists and Sing... As Pro...

of music.

It is to be hoped that some of them may have read what Mr. Koussevitzky said the other day in Paris to a delegation of American writers on music, as quoted by Mr. Olin Downes in "The Times" and by our own Mr. Perkins in The Herald Tribune. Music, observed Mr. Koussevitzky, is not a static art. It exhibits a continual and necessary movement. It is an expression of its period. He declared his affection and admiration for the classics and the romantics, and his realization of their indispensability. But one cannot live only, as he remarked simply and truly, with Beethoven, Brahms, Schumann and the rest of the gods and half-gods. "It is as necessary for us to know what is being done as it is to know and admire what has been done." The music of the past is basic, as he pointed out. We must keep it alive and warm in our consciousness, vivid to our imaginations. But we have also an imperative duty toward the present.

* * *

We wish that Mr. Koussevitzky's words might be pasted in the hat of every concert-giver in the international world of music—every conductor, pianist, singer, fiddler, 'cellist and soloist upon the double bass. Especially would we like to force them upon the attention of eminent pianists, eminent singers. The young and unknown concert-givers will, if they are wise, take Mr. Newman's advice. The elderly and distinguished ones would probably pay no attention to it if he had offered it to them, for the excellent reason that they do not have to. They can go on exploiting the hackneyed repertoire until they drop in their tracks, and the public will continue to flock to hear them, and make its desired contribution to their bank accounts.

Who cares a hoot what Pade-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW HAVEN,
CONN.
~~TIMES-LEADER~~
JUN 2 2 1924

If a recent letter we have from Paris is to be believed, an American has at last broken the apathy of French audiences to foreign talent in the recent Koussevitsky concert at the Paris Opera with Albert Spalding, solo violinist. Interest is heightened in this unusual procedure by the fact that Mr. Koussevitsky is to direct the musical destinies of the Boston Symphony next year.

The occasion for the outburst which is said to have been real to the point of tears and shoutings by the audience was the playing of the "Concerto Gregoriano", written by Otterino Respighi and heard for the first time on this occasion. Kousevitsky conducted the orchestra and Spalding succeeded so admirably in interpreting the Gregorian chants and mediaevol harmonies to the complicated modern form that the tribute became Spalding's even more than the conductor's we hear.

Paris audiences are not reluctant to express their feelings but it is a well known fact that their enthusiasm is quickened more readily for their own than for any foreigner. On this occasion it amounted to complete acceptance of an Italian concerto, a Russian conductor and an American soloist. Previous to the acclaim of Spalding, the audience had dissented violently to a Honegger composition with hissing as nasty as the cheering was lusty for their favorites. Koussevitsky made graceful acknowledgement of Spalding's accomplishment by spontaneous shaking hands with the young artist, and repeated over and over again for the insistent audience. His concerts are given eight times a year at the Opera and his followers

SYRACUSE
NEW YORK
HERALD
JUN 2 9 1924

FAMOUS 'POPS,' OF BOSTON, NOW IN 39TH SEASON

Unique Summer Musical Institution Retains Today Charm That Distinguished Its Early Days.

FIRST OF KIND EVER GIVEN IN AMERICA

Provide Education as Well as Pleasure to Thousands of Music Lovers at Very Moderate Expense.

By GEORGE SMITH
Professor of Piano, Syracuse University.

The Boston Evening Transcript recently wrote that "We cannot all be optimists, but under the inspiration of Mr. Jacchia's blithe orchestra, happily we can all be pop-timists." A bright little pun, and back of it a very deserved tribute to an institution long standing in America's so-called Athens.

This is the end of the 39th season of the "Pop" concerts, which are given by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during June. The word "Pop," it hardly seems necessary to explain, is simply short for "popular." The Boston "Pop" concerts were undoubtedly the first of the sort to be given in the United States and even to-day are unique. A description of the general plan of the concerts might be of interest to anyone who has not had the actual experience.

Symphony Hall is oblong and rather large. For the "Pop" season, the theater seats are removed from the ground floor and the whole space then devoted to tiny tables, for groups of from two to six persons where soft drinks and ices may be enjoyed during the performance. The seats in the first balcony are reserved for those who find that arrangement suitable, and the seats in the second balcony are free for all—first come, first serve. It so happens that the acoustics of the hall are so splendid that from any part of the house the music is perfectly audible. There are usually two intermissions of about 10 minutes each during which one may step into the broad corridors to smoke and stroll. A large room at the rear is also open where light refreshments may be obtained while standing at the counter.

The indifferent sum of 25 cents admits one to the "Pops" and entitles one to sit in the second balcony, thus throwing the affair open to folks with pinched purses, and especially to poor students. But even the more desirable locations in the hall are comparatively inexpensive and cost much less than it would to attend the average trashy musical show.

There are programs devoted to Russian music, programs of Italian music, of Scandinavian music, German music, in fact all kinds of specialized nights. There are nights when certain colleges go in a body, and nights when certain large business houses send all of their employes for a good time.

The music played is popular, that is to say popular in the better sense. The better liked symphonic works are played, such as the "Marche Slav" of Tschaikowsky and the "Largo" from Dvorak's "New World" symphony. Old Strauss waltzes are done, and such light but well written music as Victor Herbert's. In short, the programs are made up of the more tuneful compositions from the classics and the more deserving bits from lighter fields of endeavor.

This is a splendid thing for a city to possess, and the public takes very pointed advantage of the opportunity. The tables are often all sold out the day before and even the reserved seats go rapidly, despite hot weather. Education, amusement and society are all mingled in this idea and those who attend come away cooler and better mentally refreshed also than they would from most other indoor forms of entertainment. All cities owning an orchestra should have a short season of "Pops" in the summer.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JUN 2 9 1924

Igor Stravinsky, Russian composer and conductor, will be one of the guest conductors for the New York Philharmonic Society this spring by Koussevitzky, the composer as soloist. It is only reasonable to suppose that Koussevitzky, when he taken up his work as conductor of the Boston Symphony, will have Stravinsky repeat his concerto with that organization In that case, the work may possibly b

THIRD SECTION.

BOSTON, MASS.
GLOBE
JUN 2 9 1924

Koussevitzky is apparently only taking the stand which Monteux, Muck, Gericke and Nikisch have taken in the past about programs. Muck and Gericke in particular used to perform modern music by Debussy, Strauss and others then deemed radical as Stravinsky now is whether or not they happened to like it personally and regardless of its immediate popularity with audiences, for the reason stated above by Koussevitzky. There seems no reasonable objection to programs thus constituted. The Boston Symphony has always and ought always to continue to play all kinds of orchestral music which have any claims to be taken seriously as music, whether or not the audiences or the reviewers or the players at the moment like or understand novel and unfamiliar works. Only thus can music remain a growing art.

BOSTON, MASS.
GLOBE
JUN 2 9 1924

Koussevitzky lately informed a delegation of American reviewers of music in Paris, including Olin Downes of the New York Times and F. D. Perkins of the New York Herald Tribune that the fear that his Boston Symphony programs next season will contain nothing but modern and archaic music is unfounded.

"I love classical music and romantic music. But movement is the principal thing in art; one cannot live forever with Beethoven, Brahms, Schumann, Mendelssohn, etc. Such music is basic, and we must play it from time to time, but there is something beautiful in modern music which cannot be passed by." He added that there will be one or two modern works in each of his programs, many of which he has already arranged.

HARTFORD,
CONN.
TIMES
JUN 2 8 1924

* * *

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give its first concert of the season in New York on November 27.

* * *

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION
JUN 2 8 1924

During its 44th (1924-25) season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play at Carnegie Hall, New York, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, on five Thursday evenings, November 27, January 1, January 29, March 12, April 9; and on five Saturday afternoon matinees, November 29, January 3, January 31, March 14 and April 11.

The Boston "Pop" concerts are now the center of that city's musical activities. They date back to 1885 and are nearly as old as the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Agide Jacchia is conducting his eighth season. The concerts are given to the accompaniment of light refreshments.

SAN FRANCISCO,
CAL.
CHRONICLE
JUN 2 2 1924

American Violinist Scores Hit in Europe

Albert Spalding, the distinguished American violinist, has been meeting with success in Europe this spring and summer. On April 3, he began his Continental tour in Amsterdam, appearing as soloist with the Concertgebouw Orchestra under the direction of Karl Muck. After giving twenty recitals in Holland, he went to France.

On May 10 he gave the first performance in Paris of Ottorino Respighi's "Gregorian" concerto with the Opera orchestra under the direction of Sergei Kussevitski, who has been engaged as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season. It is planned to have Spalding introduce this concerto in the United States with Kussevitski and the Boston orchestra. Before returning home late in the summer, Spalding will visit Italy.

BOSTON,
MASS.
HERALD
JUN 2 7 1924

Children's Concerts

Mr. Ernest Schelling, pianist and composer, has been talking in New York about concerts for children that he purposes to give next season in Boston. Not that Boston is unacquainted with concerts of this nature. A good many years ago, piano recitals with explanatory remarks were given for the musical benefit of young Augustus and little Mary Ann. Of late years the Boston Symphony Orchestra has given concerts for the school children.

Mr. Schelling's object is to aid in forming the taste of the young; to teach them "to have respect for the inheritance they possess in the classic master works." For the furtherance of this praiseworthy object—praiseworthy in spite of the fact that many mature persons in the Symphony audiences regard the music of Beethoven, Haydn and Mozart as "old hat"—Mr. Schelling will employ an orchestra, lantern slides, note books to be handed in as in school, and thus "fancy and intellect" will be stimulated. Nothing is said about a spring-board or some other mechanical appliance.

What conclusions were arrived at by those who studied the behavior of the children at their concerts for two seasons? The greater portion of "classic master works" did not interest the young ones. They were evidently bored. They were greatly interested, in some instances excited, by pieces strongly rhythmed and full of color, as by the "March to the Scaffold" from Berlioz's "Fantastic" Symphony, and by certain pieces of modern composers. As a rule, the programs were not happily chosen with reference to the desired purpose. Programs chosen for similar concerts in England showed a better acquaintance with children's musical receptiveness.

The word "education" should not be emphasized in connection with those concerts. The education should come incidentally. After all, the best music is emotional, not cerebral, and hearing music should be a pleasure, not a school task. A lecturer is out of place, however encouraging he may be, however simple in his talk. Let the children judge for themselves; they should not be guided; they should not be swayed by the opinions of others. Learning to hear for themselves, when they grow up and attend Symphony concerts they may then be able to form individual opinions about compositions, and not rely on what the professional critics may say the day after.

REDUCTION

RATIO

15x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

A3

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

2.0

2.2

2.5

2.8

3.2

3.6

4.0

4.5

5.0

5.6

6.3

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

BOSTON, MASS.
GLOBE

JUN 29 1924

Koussevitzky has secured the exclusive rights for American first performances of several important musical novelties, including Honegger's "Pacific No. 231," Prokofiev's "Scythian Suite," and Ravel's orchestral arrangement of Mussorgsky's piano pieces, "Pictures from an Exposition."

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE

JUN 29 1924

ABOUT will season, ha accepted borough.
turned ho
Music at happening
Before sa
the placin

BLOOMINGTON,
ILL.

JUN 28 1924

ORCHESTRAS OF NOTE HAVE OUTLINED THEIR SCHEDULES FOR SEASON

Several of the leading orchestras of the country have already arranged their schedules for the coming season, and are announcing that the artists engaged are unusually fine, and their offerings an advance over other seasons. Such announcements, while savoring of the sterotyped are saved when such names as Igor Stravinsky, and Ignace Paderwski are mentioned in connection.

The New York Philharmonic Orchestra announces that Stravinsky, the noted Russian composer, will conduct several of their concerts next season. Regularly the Philharmonic will be conducted by Willem Mengelberg and Willem van Hoogstraten, with Henry Hadley as associate director. The Philharomnic orchestral society will present eleven pianists and six violinists as soloists next season. The entire number reaches twenty-four and beginning with the pianists are: Alfred Cortot, William Bachaus, Carl Friedberg, Heinrich Gedhard, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Myra Hess, Nicholas Medtner, Wanda Landowska, Yolanda Mero, Elly Ney and Guiomar Novaes. The violinists so far as Efrem Zimbalist, Carl Flesch, Samuel Gardner, Scipione Guidi, Cecilia Hansen, Erna Rubinstein; 'cellists, Pablo Casals, Leo Schultz and Cornelius van Vliet; flute, John Amans; singers, Sophie Braslau, Mme. Charles Cahier and Marie Sundelius.

Walter Damrosch will again conduct the New York Symphony orchestra which will give thirty-five concerts in Carnegie Hall and sixteen Sunday afternoon concerts in Aeolian Hall. The list of soloists engaged so far to appear with the orchestra include Dusolina Giannini, Wanda Landowska, Fritz Gange, Mischa Mischakoff, Frederick Schorr, Sigrid Onegin, Adela Verne, Renee Chemet, Florence Easton, Sergei Rachmaninoff, Alfred Cortot, Ossip Gabrilowitsch and Albert Spalding.

Paul Kochanski and Felix Salmond will play the Bach double concerto for violin and 'cello and Samuel Dushkin and Lionel Tertis will be heard in the Mozart double concerto for violin and viola.

Walter Damrosch will present a Wagner program and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. Bruno Walter and Vladimir Golschmann have been engaged as guest conducfors.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be enjoying its forty-fourth season, will give ten concerts at Carnegie Hall in New York during the winter. These appearances will be under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

Many single concerts of especial interest have been announced, and the offerings for the season will find particular appeal among the lovers of good music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE FALL RIVER
MASS.
GLOBE
JUL 1 1924

Paris Lauds Spalding.

By the way, a cable to the New York Herald Tribune from Paris refers to the remarkable reception given Spalding's performance of Respighi's "Concerto Gregoriano," played in Paris for the first time, with Koussevitsky, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, conductor of the orchestra, and Spalding the artist.

The cable reads: "Rarely does one witness in Paris the highly edifying spectacle of a French audience moved to tears by an American. Rarely does one see a huge throng of patriotic and intelligent Parisians neglecting to throw their usual rapturous fit over indigenous products and then throwing a proper one over an Anglo-Saxon. And to use the word 'rarely' is stretching the thing a bit.

"All this happened, however, to Albert Spalding. When he finished the third movement of a very beautiful, very successful effort to adapt Gregorian chants and mediaeval harmonies to the requirements of a complicated and modern form of musical expression, Paris accepted him immediately as a great artist. There was no doubt about it; people who five minutes before had hissed Honegger's ingenious attempt to put his impression of a huge locomotive running at full speed into music, yelled excitedly for Spalding. People who had yelled excitedly for Honnegger were none the less exuberant for Spalding.

"Koussevitzky shook the violinist's hand twice on his own account, and then was compelled to repeat a couple of times more on account of his insistent audience. Naturally, both were pleased, the audiences at Koussevitzky concerts, of which eight are given yearly at the opera, and nowhere else, being presumably the most censorious audiences on earth.

"It isn't going so very far to say (inasmuch as it is often said in Paris) that if somebody succeeds in satisfying Koussevitzky's followers he can please the most critical and devastatingly musical person anywhere else. Of course that is the French viewpoint, since M. Koussevitzky has been more or less adopted by the French capital."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SAN FRANCISCO,
CAL.
CHRONICLE

JUL 6 1924

Must Put New Music On Programs

By RAY C. B. BROWN

duty to the art of music.

"It is to be hoped that some of them may have read what Koussevitski said the other day in Paris to a delegation of American writers on music. Music, he observed, is not a static art. It exhibits a continual and necessary movement. He declared his affection and admiration for the classics and the romantics, and his realization of their indispensability. But one cannot live only, as he remarked simply and truly, with Beethoven, Brahms, Schumann and the rest of the gods and half-gods. 'It is as necessary for us to know what is being done as it is to know and admire what has been done,' he said.

"We wish that Kussevtiski's words might be pasted in the hat of every concert-giver in the international world of music—every conductor, pianist, singer, fiddler, cellist and soloist upon the double bass. Especially would we like to force them upon the attention of eminent pianists, eminent singers. The young and unknown concert-givers will, if they are wise, take Newman's advice. The elderly and distinguished ones would probably pay no attention to it if he had offered it to them, for the excellent reason that they do not have to. They can go on exploiting the hackneyed repertoire until they drop in their tracks, and the public will continue to flock to hear them, and make the desired contributions to their bank accounts.

[illegible] upon Paderewski's

Tel. Chelsea 8800

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON,
MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
JUL 5 - 1924

Kussevitsky as He Appears At a Concert

A Graphic Account of the Last Concert Given in Paris by the New Leader of the Boston Symphony, Made Famous by Karl Muck and Enhanced by Monteux

IT is probable that Sergei Kussevitsky, when he comes to America next season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will not give programmes of the extremely brilliant and ultra-modern quality that he has been giving this spring in Paris. Mr. Kussevitsky has been told that Americans do not like too much pepper where orchestral music is concerned, and he is inclined to be cautious in this direction. Moreover, he himself is a man of very catholic tastes, who is not by nature an exponent of any one school, past or present, or clique, wherever it may be. Here he arranges lists calculated to appeal to a highly sophisticated public, alert for the latest musical sensation, and composers who, whatever their eventual importance in history, are representatives of the most "advanced" tendencies in this art. In America Mr. Kussevitsky plans carefully balanced programmes of classic and modern music, with a good admixture of new compositions, only a few of which he is willing to announce before he reaches Boston; it is not only in Paris that conductors strive to anticipate each other in the production of new works. He hopes, however, that when he does perform unknown compositions in America he will find a following for them. This was said in a conversation with a certain wistfulness and naivete. Mr. Kussevitsky has yet to discover that in Boston it is customary to keep abreast of everything of importance that is produced in the field of orchestral music, and that the public in New York often accepts what it gets when it finds no means of becoming articulate as to what it wants. But these are things that concern the future. Let us consider a typical Kussevitsky concert in Paris, such as the final concert of his spring series, which took place at the Opéra on the evening of May 29.

In this city Kussevitsky is the conductor of the hour. He is, of course, a storm centre of friends and enemies, of the intrigues and rivalries of the various sections of the musical community of Paris. A man of considerable financial resource as well as of commanding personality, his concerts are now packed to the doors. Each one of them, apparently, provides an irresistible sensation or two for an ordinarily surfeited public. Successful men being envied and hated in this sparkling metropolis as much as or more than anywhere else in the world, it follows that each Kussevitsky concert is attended by a considerable number of polished malcontents who do their utmost to secure tickets without paying for them and are very indignant when they cannot do so; and who, having secured seats either by astonishing ingenuity and effrontery or by most reluctantly parting with money for them, greatly relish the privilege of "roasting" the conductor while the music is being played with that peculiar Gallic wit and venom which distinguish the choicer spirits of the capital. The others are supporters of Stravinsky, of various stripes. Some are self-interested in the matter. Others will do anything to see and be seen on important public occasions. Then there is the host of foreign visitors—who cannot, however, rob the Parisian audience of that peculiar theatrical flare and glitter which still distinguishes it at the height of the season—and there are the genuine musical enthusiasts, thickest in the uppermost reaches of the house, where they still honor tradition by making voluble comments upon the performance or any other matter which happens to interest them. Thus the individual who leaned over the rail of the highest gallery while Kussevitsky was bowing and bowing again to the applause. "Hurry up," he yelled, "with the music, so that we poor people can hear it all before the last subway"—sensible advice, duly heeded. In a word, it is a Paris audience. Even the applause and "bravos" have certain distinctive timbre, that mixture of sudden enthusiasm and theatrical pretense that no other circumstances provide; and Mr. Kussevitsky, with a triumvirate of composers who are likewise prominent in the public gaze, is monarch of what he surveys.

The three composers, all present in loges, are Florent Schmitt, Sergi Prokofieff and Igor Stravinsky. Stravinsky is to appear as composer and pianist. He will play for the second time, by general request, his piano concerto which he introduced at the Kussevitsky concert of May 22, and which he will personally interpret, providing arrangements for his proposed tour are satisfactorily completed, next season in America. Prokofieff is represented by an extraordinary work for full chorus and orchestra. "Sept, ils sont sept," after an invocation of the seven gods of evil found in a cuneiform inscription of the pre-Babylonian era. Schmitt has two new compositions, short orchestral pieces, the first of which is "La Tristesse de Pan," an orchestral version of the piano piece which he, in common with Stravinsky, Dukas, Malapiero, Bartols and others, composed when Debussy died under the collective title of "Tombeau de Debussy," and a second piece, "La Tragique Chevauchée," a modern French musical fantasy inspired by the ride of Byron's "Manfred." Of other times and tastes, and also for music of a simplicity and beauty very grateful by contrast to the ear, are Corelli's first "concerto grosso" for strings; the three nocturnes of Debussy, including the last, the "Sirènes," for voices and orchestra, and the superb dances from Borodine's "Prince Igor," in which, again, the chorus is employed.

A half hour or thereabouts after the time announced for the beginning of the concert Kussevitsky enters, steps quickly through the orchestra to his stand, raps for attention and commences without more ado the Corelli concerto. There are strong divisions of opinion here, as there will be in America, concerning his conducting; but there can be no question of his arousing keen public interest as man and musician; and, whether or not one agrees with his conceptions, it is hardly possible, after listening and talking to him, to doubt his sincerity. On the conductor's stand he is a figure to watch as well as to hear. Tall, with dark hair which is graying, with nervous hands and face which sensitively reflects his mood, and with a degree of bodily command that pertains to few conductors, Kussevitsky plays, obviously but not the less effectively, on his orchestra. He has no mannerism or particular gestures that a single concert fixes in the mind, but does appear to embody in every movement what he finds in the music. With a chorus of some good qualities and others by no means so good, and an orchestra which Mr. Kussevitsky will not prefer to the Boston Symphony, he secured the most expressive and, at times, volcanic response to his wishes.

And at such times the conductor was a figure to remember—erect, mperious, his face working with his own emotions; a hand of which the fingers themselves are eloquent suddenly bringing out an outburst of tone from the chorus; a glance which, sweeping over the orchestra, brings equally sudden and dramatic results. Kussevitsky has the stamp of a leader. As a musician he is evidently endowed with a temperament that can on occasion sweep everything before it. There is an authority, a quenchless enthusiasm and a big sweep in all that he does, which, if he were less sincere and individual as a musician than he is, would be a compelling force for public success. It is even predictable now that Mr. Kussevitsky will be a formidable rival in America in more ways than one for a conductor whose name also contains the letters "s" and "k" in its final syllable, no more than that conductor is he in the habit of allowing an audience or an orchestra to stagnate under him.

To return to the concert and the programme: Florent Schmitt's evocation of Pan, as it is hardly necssary to say, is a musical reincarnation of a certain Faun, who wakens from his slumber, not in a Debussyan heydey of his existence, but some quarter of a century later. His amorousness has a sensuous beauty which appropriately and no doubt intentionally leans more to Debussy rather than to the more mordant character of the talent of Schmitt. But it is a good piece of music, and the original composition stands orchestral transformation so well that one suspects Mr. Schmitt of thinking for orchestra when he wrote for the piano and finding relief in at last casting his conception in the orchestral mold which his creative nature intended. But the ride of Manfred, in spite of some very handsome dissonances and extremely well contrived instrumentation, sounds old-style and artificially stimulated.

"Sept Ils Sont Sept."

"Sept, ils sont sept," the violent and undeniably effective composition of Prokofieff, followed. It would have sent an audience accustomed to New York orchestral programmes scurrying for the doors. For this Prokofieff is a bold and bad young man. How his music will sound ten years hence is an open question. How it would have sounded under a conductor less temperamental and less sympathetc to its nature than Kussevitsky it is hard to say. But on the evening in question and under the circumstances the work made a powerful impression. It is huge and rather horrible and primitive.

In an Akkadian temple discovered in Mesopotamia is a cuneiform inscription describing the attributes of seven fearful demons, originators of all earthly evils. This famous inscription, which has excited the attention of many Assyriologists, among them Winkler, has been made the basis of a poetic incantation by the Russian, Constantin Balmont. It is the inspiration of Prokofieff's music, scored for tenor solo, chorus and orchestra. The meaning of the poem, translated into French in the programme, may be roughly indicated as follows:

'Telal! Telal! Telal! Telal!
Seven, they are seven!
In the depths of the abyss
Their number is seven.
In the heavens of azure,
Seven, they are seven.
When they gather in the west
They are seven.
When they loom in the east
They are seven • • •
They know neither kindness or mercy,
They feel neither regret nor remorse,
They are deaf to prayers or supplications • • •
Men are mowed down by them as men mow down grain.

And more to the same purpose. This is the most effective composition of Prokofieff that we have heard. Composed as early as 1917, the score remained in Russia until recently recovered, forwarded to Paris and performed by Kussevitsky for the first time anywhere. It is music which would have delighted Hector Berlioz, and perhaps it is more than that. There is the sensation of the atavistic. Man trembles before the terrible and the unknown. The chorus is one seething tumult of outcries and supplications, reinforced by exceptional orchestral combinations and harmonies as jagged and unbeautiful as the gargoyles on Notre Dame. The task of the solo tenor, admirably executed by H. Fabert of the Opera, is really frightful. He must intone his lines in a manner sometimes verging on speech, or yells, instead of song, and this with a dramatic intensity that will tax him physically as as well as emotionally, to say nothing of maintaining rhythm and pitch complicated opposing forces. The voict glides through intervals that cannot be reduced to notation, and with a barbaric wildness difficult to describe. Few could have equalled M. Fabert in his task. The orchestra thuds and seethes and erupts. A strange piece with a physiognomy all its own, and a remarkable conclusion.

One listened to that crude, savage, half-articulate music and glanced upward at the loge where Prokofieff was sitting—Prokofieff, the front of whose head is bald, whose face, nevertheless, seems incredibly young and very cerebral, like a being who has come from another age or planet, groomed and dressed in the style of today—come to examine a world upon which he may have sinister designs! A queer fellow, who seems to be delving, musically, in a certain hinterland of the human consciousness, listening to what he has discovered there, with as much calmness and detachment as if he had been a scientist discussing the theory of evolution.

He rose from his seat and bowed as amiably as you please to enormous applause, as the composition came to an end—a sudden hush that falls over chorus and orchestra, an effect of utter prostration and helpfulness in the presence of unfathomable mystery. The murmurs of the chorus are heard distantly, from far off, through the exordium of the orchestra. A curious business!

Now came Stravinsky, a small man, extremely self-possessed, who played his concerto exactly as we knew he would before he even entered the hall, with a clean-cut, electrical vigor that had no softness or sentiment in it, with a precision and rhythmical force inseparable from the composer of "The Rites of Spring." His finger technic was as clean as a steel blade, and his musical thinking, as composer and performer, was as clean as that, too. Again, in his concerto, he has done a new thing, and this by means of a style that is essentially classic. There is an opening theme in the manner of a chorale. It is developed frugally, with great vigor and life, and with many a fine grinding dissonance, broadly speaking, after the manner of Bach. The treatment is lengthy and elaborate, incisive and full of contrapuntal resource. The slow movement has more lyrical qualities, though not very much of sensuous beauty. The finale resumes contrapuntal procedure. Toward the last the composer makes bold employment of syncopation somewhat in the manner of American ragtime, in which, as we know, Stravinsky, with other leading European composers, has been much interested. With more and more rhythmical force and accumulation of healthy power the concerto comes to an end. It had an electrifying performance, particularly on the part of Stravinsky himself, who played with unending technic and endurance, attacking great chords in a manner veritably suggestive of the paws of a Russian bear, though always with a poise which is one of the astounding qualities of his musical nature. The concerto is one of many new departures of Stravinsky. The "Symphonies pour instruments de vent," which Stokowski played last year in New York, was another. The concerto bears out the supposition that Stravinsky has become more and more capricious in his musical output since "Sacre du printemps," and less and less aware of his own artistic destiny. From "Oiseau de feu" to "Sacre du printemps," via the incomparable "Petrouchka," his way seems perfectly clear, after which this humble commentator cannot follow the singular and unpredictable divagations of Stravinsky's muse. He said as much—the commentator—to M. Kussevitsky, who made this reply: "There is a clear line of development, but if you try to trace it by traditional formulae you will not lose your way. The case, as I see it, is that Stravinsky in 'Sacre du printemps' reached the limit of rhythmical force and energy. He has to turn in another direction. He is seeking here and there for a further outlet, and wherever he seeks he finds something new. Meanwhile, however, there is a threat of consistency through all of Stravinsky's music. It does not lie in exterior appearances, but in the element which is at the basis of everything that he composes. Rhythm, always the evolution is rhythmical, and not linear in the sense of the classic masters. That is a fact to be understood before there can be any fair estimate of Stravinsky's compositions, particularly of his present period."

Words of M. Kussevitsky, outlining his attitude on the subject of orchestral programmes, modern and classical music, will be of interest to those who attend his concerts next winter. "I would like to make it clear," said the conductor, "that I am neither modernist nor classicist in my musical preferences. The works of the great classic masters are absolutely indispensable to me, as musician and in my life. No one would less willingly be without them than I. But music is not a static art. Music is continually being made which is an expression of the period in which it appears. It is as necessary for us to know what is being done as it is to know and admire what has been done. As for the value of new works, the conductor uses his best judgment in producing them. He must leave the rest to the judgment of time.

"I shall take particular care in my New York concerts not to perform a disproportionate number of compositions of the Russian schools. Art is cosmopolitan in the sense that it comes from all countries and, if it is important, has meaning for all peopies.

"I have a considerable number of novelties for America. I have Honneger's 'Pacific' symphony, for example, which has been extremely successful here, so that I had to repeat it. (This is the symphony, 'Pacific, 231,' of which the composer has said, 'I have always loved locomotives passionately, since, for me, they are living beings which I cherish as others cherish women or horses.' 'Pacific No. 231' is a locomotive of the heaviest and fastest type.) I have Ravel's instrumentation of Moussorgsky's 'Tableau d'une Exposition.' I have music by modern Austrian and Hungarian composers which is yet to be announced. I shall soon have completed my Boston programmes for five concerts. I shall wait until I get there and have a glimpse of the state of affairs musical before I arrange in detail the programmes for New York.

"As for interpreting the classics, I will tell you at once that often I cannot accept with sincerity traditional practices. I think tradition has often been destructive to masterpieces of earlier periods than ours. I have known, for example, more than one great German conductor to deliberately make changes of instrumentation in Beethoven which were not proportionate or characteristic of the score. I will give you an example. It has been for many years in Germany the custom with conductors to double the horns in the trio of the scherzo of the 'Eroica' symphony, and to double the brass in the finale of the Fifth Symphony.'

"Now, in the last instance I agree, because the character of the music is massive and powerful, and there is need of more sonority than that which satisfied the ear in Beethoven's time. I also, by the way, take a slower tempo in this finale than some others, because I think that the tempo usually taken makes the music more trivial than the composer intended, whereas the opening motive of the movement, particularly, needs breadth and nobility of announcement. I mention these details to illustrate my statements.

"But in the case of the trio of the scherzo of the 'Eroica,' I do not agree at all. It is not in tonal proportion to the rest of that mysterious and joyous movement for six horns to lumber through the fanfares which Beethoven thought, and wrote, for three. These are details. I do other things which may be further from accepted conventions. After careful study of a score I can only express my convictions in my performances."

OLIN DOWNES

(Reprinted from the New York Times).

76

BOSTON, MASS.
GLOBE

JUN 29 1924

Koussevitzky has secured the exclusive rights for American first performances of several important musical novelties, including Honegger's "Pacific No. 231," Prokofiev's "Scythian Suite," and Ravel's orchestral arrangement of Musorgsky's piano pieces, "Pictures from an Exposition."

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE

JUN 29 1924

ABOUT Brooklyn composer:

Serge Koussevitski, the much discussed Russian conductor who will lead the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season, has conferred distinction upon a Brooklyn composer. He has accepted for performance a ballet score by Aaron Copland, of this borough. Young Mr. Copland (he is but twenty-three) has recently returned home after three years study abroad at the American School of Music at Fonainebleau, bringing with him the latest news of musical happenings in Paris, where Koussevitski is just now a musical lion. Before sailing for home, Mr. Copland made successful arrangements for the placing of his ballet suite in the Boston Orchestra repertoire.

BLOOMINGTON,
ILL.

JUN 28 1924

ORCHESTRAS OF NOTE HAVE OUTLINED THEIR SCHEDULES FOR SEASON

Several of the leading orchestras of the country have already arranged their schedules for the coming season, and are announcing that the artists engaged are unusually fine, and their offerings an advance over other seasons. Such announcements, while savoring of the sterotyped are saved when such names as Igor Stravinsky, and Ignace Paderwski are mentioned in connection.

The New York Philharmonic Orchestra announces that Stravinsky, the noted Russian composer, will conduct several of their concerts next season. Regularly the Philharmonic will be conducted by Willem Mengelberg and Willem van Hoogstraten, with Henry Hadley as associate director. The Philharomnic orchestral society will present eleven pianists and six violinists as soloists next season. The entire number reaches twenty-four and beginning with the pianists are: Alfred Cortot, William Bachaus, Carl Friedberg, Heinrich Gedhard, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Myra Hess, Nicholas Medtner, Wanda Landowska, Yolanda Mero, Elly Ney and Guiomar Novaes. The violinists so far as Efrem Zimbalist, Carl Flesch, Samuel Gardner, Scigione Guidi, Cecilia Hansen, Erna Rubinstein; 'cellists, Pablo Casals, Leo Schultz and Cornelius van Vliet; flute, John Amans; singers, Sophie Braslau, Mme. Charles Cahier and Marie Sundelius.

Walter Damrosch will again conduct the New York Symphony orchestra which will give thirty-five concerts in Carnegie Hall and sixteen Sunday afternoon concerts in Aeolian Hall. The list of soloists engaged so far to appear with the orchestra include Dusolina Giannini, Wanda Landowska, Frieda Gange, Mischa Mischakoff, Frederick Schorr, Sigrid Onegin, Adela Verne, Renee Chemet, Florence Easton, Sergei Rachmaninoff, Alfred Cortot, Ossip Gabrilowitsch and Albert Spalding.

Paul Kochanski and Felix Salmond will play the Bach double concerto for violin and 'cello and Samuel Dushkin and Lionel Tertis will be heard in the Mozart double concerto for violin and viola.

Walter Damrosch will present a Wagner program and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. Bruno Walter and Vladimir Golschmann have been engaged as guest conductors.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be enjoying its forty-fourth season, will give ten concerts at Carnegie Hall in New York during the winter. These appearances will be under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

Many single concerts of especial interest have been announced, and the offerings for the season will find particular appeal among the lovers of good music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE FALL RIVER
MASS.
GLOBE
JUL 1 1924

Paris Lauds Spalding.

By the way, a cable to the New York Herald Tribune from Paris refers to the remarkable reception given Spalding's performance of Respighi's "Concerto Gregoriano," played in Paris for the first time, with Koussevitsky, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, conductor of the orchestra, and Spalding the artist.

The cable reads: "Rarely does one witness in Paris the highly edifying spectacle of a French audience moved to tears by an American. Rarely does one see a huge throng of patriotic and intelligent Parisians neglecting to throw their usual rapturous fit over indigenous products and then throwing a proper one over an Anglo-Saxon. And to use the word 'rarely' is stretching the thing a bit. However, to Alexander Kussevitski, who finished the very beautiful, adapt Gregorian harmonies complicated musical expression immediately was no doubt minutes before 's ingenious session of a at full speed excitedly for Spalding. People who had yelled excitedly for Honnegger were none the less exuberant for Spalding.

"Koussevitzky shook the violinist's hand twice on his own account, and then was compelled to repeat a couple of times more on account of his insistent audience. Naturally, both were pleased, the audiences at Koussevitzky concerts, of which eight are given yearly at the opera, and nowhere else, being presumably the most censorious audiences on earth.

"It isn't going so very far to say (inasmuch as it is often said in Paris) that if somebody succeeds in satisfying Koussevitzky's followers he can please the most critical and devastatingly musical person anywhere else. Of course that is the French viewpoint, since M. Koussevitzky has been more or less adopted by the French capital."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SAN FRANCISCO,
CAL.
CHRONICLE

JUL 6 -1924

Must Put New Music On Programs

By RAY C. B. BROWN

duty to the art of music.

"It is to be hoped that some of them may have read what Kussevtiski said the other day in Paris to a delegation of American writers on music. Music, he observed, is not a static art. It exhibits a continual and necessary movement. He declared his affection and admiration for the classics and the romantics, and his realization of their indispensability. But one cannot live only, as he remarked simply and truly, with Beethoven, Brahms, Schumann and the rest of the gods and half-gods. 'It is as necessary for us to know what is being done as it is to know and admire what has been done,' he said.

"We wish that Kussevtiski's words might be pasted in the hat of every concert-giver in the international world of music—every conductor, pianist, singer, fiddler, cellist and soloist upon the double bass. Especially would we like to force them upon the attention of eminent pianists, eminent singers. The young and unknown concert-givers will, if they are wise, take Newman's advice. The elderly and distinguished ones would probably pay no attention to it if he had offered it to them, for the excellent reason that they do not have to. They can go on exploiting the hackneyed repertoire until they drop in their tracks, and the public will continue to flock to hear them, and make the desired contributions to their bank accounts.

Tel. Chelsea 8800

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON,
MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

JUL 5 - 1924

Kussevitsky as He Appears At a Concert

A Graphic Account of the Last Concert Given in Paris by the New Leader of the Boston Symphony, Made Famous by Karl Muck and Enhanced by Monteux

IT is probable that Sergei Kussevitsky, when he comes to America next season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will not give programmes of the extremely brilliant and ultra-modern quality that he has been giving this spring in Paris. Mr. Kussevitsky has been told that Americans do not like too much pepper where orchestral music is concerned, and he is inclined to be cautious in this direction. Moreover, he himself is a man of very catholic tastes, who is not by nature an exponent of any one school, past or present, or clique, wherever it may be. Here he arranges lists calculated to appeal to a highly sophisticated public, alert for the latest musical sensation, and composers who, whatever their eventual importance in history, are representatives of the most "advanced" tendencies in this art. In America Mr. Kussevitsky plans carefully balanced programmes of classic and modern music, with a good admixture of new compositions, only a few of which he is willing to announce before he reaches Boston; it is not only in Paris that conductors strive to anticipate each other in the production of new works. He hopes, however, that when he does perform unknown compositions in America he will find a following for them. This was said in a conversation with a certain wistfulness and naivete. Mr. Kussevitsky has yet to discover that in Boston it is customary to keep abreast of everything of importance that is produced in the field of orchestral music, and that the public in New York often accepts what it gets when it finds no means of becoming articulate as to what it wants. But these are things that concern the future. Let us consider a typical Kussevitsky concert in Paris, such as the final concert of his spring series, which took place at the Opéra on the evening of May 29.

In this city Kussevitsky is the conductor of the hour. He is, of course, a storm centre of friends and enemies, of the intrigues and rivalries of the various sections of the musical community of Paris. A man of considerable financial resource as well as of commanding personality, his concerts are now packed to the doors. Each one of them, apparently, provides an irresistible sensation or two for an ordinarily surfeited public. Successful men being envied and hated in this sparkling metropolis as much as or more than anywhere else in the world, it follows that each Kussevitsky concert is attended by a considerable number of polished malcontents who do their utmost to secure tickets without paying for them and are very indignant when they cannot do so; and who, having secured seats either by astonishing ingenuity and effrontery or by most reluctantly parting with money for them, greatly relish the privilege of "roasting" the conductor while the music is being played with that peculiar Gallic wit and venom which distinguish the choicer spirits of the capital. The others are supporters of Stravinsky, of various stripes. Some are self-interested in the matter. Others will do anything to see and be seen on important public occasions. Then there is the host of foreign visitors—who cannot, however, rob the Parisian audience of that peculiar theatrical flare and glitter which still distinguishes it at the height of the season—and there are the genuine musical enthusiasts, thickest in the uppermost reaches of the house, where they still honor tradition by making voluble comments upon the performance or any other matter which happens to interest them. Thus the individual who leaned over the rail of the highest gallery while Kussevitsky was bowing and bowing again to the applause. "Hurry up," he yelled, "with the music, so that we poor people can hear it all before the last subway"—sensible advice, duly heeded. In a word, it is a Paris audience. Even the applause and "bravos" have certain distinctive timbre, that mixture of sudden enthusiasm and theatrical pretense that no other circumstances provide; and Mr. Kussevitsky, with a triumvirate of composers who are likewise prominent in the public gaze, is monarch of what he surveys.

The three composers, all present in loges, are Florent Schmitt, Sergi Prokofieff and Igor Stravinsky. Stravinsky is to appear as composer and pianist. He will play for the second time, by general request, his piano concerto which he introduced at the Kussevitsky concert of May 22, and which he will personally interpret, providing arrangements for his proposed tour are satisfactorily completed, next season in America. Prokofieff is represented by an extraordinary work for full chorus and orchestra. "Sept, ils sont sept," after an invocation of the seven gods of evil found in a cuneiform inscription of the pre-Babylonian era. Schmitt has two new compositions, short orchestral pieces, the first of which is "La Tristesse de Pan," an orchestral version of the piano piece which he, in common with Stravinsky, Dukas, Malapiero, Bartols and others, composed when Debussy died under the collective title of "Tombeau de Debussy," and a second piece, "La Tragique Chevauchée," a modern French musical fantasy inspired by the ride of Byron's "Manfred." Of other times and tastes, and also for music of a simplicity and beauty very grateful by contrast to the ear, are Corelli's first "concerto grosso" for strings; the three nocturnes of Debussy, including the last, the "Sirènes," for voices and orchestra, and the superb dances from Borodine's "Prince Igor," in which, again, the chorus is employed.

A half hour or thereabouts after the time announced for the beginning of the concert Kussevitsky enters, steps quickly through the orchestra to his stand, raps for attention and commences without more ado the Corelli concerto. There are strong divisions of opinion here, as there will be in America, concerning his conducting; but there can be no question of his arousing keen public interest as man and musician; and, whether or not one agrees with his conceptions, it is hardly possible, after listening and talking to him, to doubt his sincerity. On the conductor's stand he is a figure to watch as well as to hear. Tall, with dark hair which is graying, with nervous hands and face which sensitively reflects his mood, and with a degree of bodily command that pertains to few conductors, Kussevitsky plays, obviously but not the less effectively, on his orchestra. He has no mannerism or particular gestures that a single concert fixes in the mind, but does appear to embody in every movement what he finds in the music. With a chorus of some good qualities and others by no means so good, and an orchestra which Mr. Kussevitsky will not prefer to the Boston Symphony, he secured the most expressive and, at times, volcanic response to his wishes.

And at such times the conductor was a figure to remember—erect, mperious, his face working with his own emotions; a hand of which the fingers themselves are eloquent suddenly bringing out an outburst of tone from the chorus; a glance which, sweeping over the orchestra, brings equally sudden and dramatic results. Kussevitsky has the stamp of a leader. As a musician he is evidently endowed with a temperament that can on occasion sweep everything before it. There is an authority, a quenchless enthusiasm and a big sweep in all that he does, which, if he were less sincere and individual as a musician than he is, would be a compelling force for public success. It is even predictable now that Mr. Kussevitsky will be a formidable rival in America in more ways than one for a conductor whose name also contains the letters "s" and "k" in its final syllable. no more than that conductor is he in the habit of allowing an audience or an orchestra to stagnate under him.

To return to the concert and the programme: Florent Schmitt's evocation of Pan, as it is hardly necssary to say, is a musical reincarnation of a certain Faun, who wakens from his slumber, not in a Debussyan heydey of his existence, but some quarter of a century later. His amorousness has a sensuous beauty which appropriately and no doubt intentionally leans more to Debussy rather than to the more mordant character of the talent of Schmitt. But it is a good piece of music, and the original composition stands orchestral transformation so well that one suspects Mr. Schmitt of thinking for orchestra when he wrote for the piano and finding relief in at last casting his conception in the orchestral mold which his creative nature intended. But the ride of Manfred, in spite of some very handsome dissonances and extremely well contrived instrumentation, sounds old-style and artificially stimulated.

"Sept Ils Sont Sept."

"Sept, ils sont sept," the violent and undeniably effective composition of Prokofieff, followed. It would have sent an audience accustomed to New York orchestral programmes scurrying for the doors. For this Prokofieff is a bold and bad young man. How his music will sound ten years hence is an open question. How it would have sounded under a conductor less temperamental and less sympathetc to its nature than Kussevitsky it is hard to say. But on the evening in question and under the circumstances the work made a powerful impression. It is huge and rather horrible and primitive.

In an Akkadian temple discovered in Mesopotamia is a cuneiform inscription describing the attributes of seven fearful demons, originators of all earthly evils. This famous inscription, which has excited the attention of many Assyriologists, among them Winkler, has been made the basis of a poetic incantation by the Russian, Constantin Balmont. It is the inspiration of Prokofieff's music, scored for tenor solo, chorus and orchestra. The meaning of the poem, translated into French in the programme, may be roughly indicated as follows:

'Telal! Telal! Telal! Telal!
Seven, they are seven!
In the depths of the abyss
Their number is seven.
In the heavens of azure,
Seven, they are seven.
When they gather in the west
They are seven.
When they loom in the east
They are seven • • •
They know neither kindness or mercy,
They feel neither regret nor remorse.
They are deaf to prayers or supplications • • •
Men are mowed down by them as men mow down grain.

And more to the same purpose. This is the most effective composition of Prokofieff that we have heard. Composed as early as 1917, the score remained in Russia until recently recovered, forwarded to Paris and performed by Kussevitsky for the first time anywhere. It is music which would have delighted Hector Berlioz, and perhaps it is more than that. There is the sensation of the atavistic. Man trembles before the terrible and the unknown. The chorus is one seething tumult of outcries and supplications, reinforced by exceptional orchestral combinations and harmonies as jagged and unbeautiful as the gargoyles on Notre Dame. The task of the solo tenor, admirably executed by H. Fabert of the Opera, is really frightful. He must intone his lines in a manner sometimes verging on speech, or yells, instead of song, and this with a dramatic intensity that will tax him physically as as well as emotionally, to say nothing of maintaining rhythm and pitch complicated opposing forces. The voict glides through intervals that cannot be reduced to notation, and with a barbaric wildness difficult to describe. Few could have equalled M. Fabert in his task. The orchestra thuds and seethes and erupts. A strange piece with a physiognomy all its own, and a remarkable conclusion.

One listened to that crude, savage, half-articulate music and glanced upward at the loge where Prokofieff was sitting—Prokofieff, the front of whose head is bald, whose face, nevertheless, seems incredibly young and very cerebral, like a being who has come from another age or planet, groomed and dressed in the style of today—come to examine a world upon which he may have sinister designs! A queer fellow, who seems to be delving, musically, in a certain hinterland of the human consciousness, listening to what he has discovered there, with as much calmness and detachment as if he had been a scientist discussing the theory of evolution.

He rose from his seat and bowed as amiably as you please to enormous applause, as the composition came to an end—a sudden hush that falls over chorus and orchestra, an effect of utter prostration and helpfulness in the presence of unfathomable mystery. The murmurs of the chorus are heard distantly, from far off, through the exordium of the orchestra. A curious business!

Now came Stravinsky, a small man, extremely self-possessed, who played his concerto exactly as we knew he would before he even entered the hall, with a clean-cut, electrical vigor that had no softness or sentiment in it, with a precision and rhythmical force inseparable from the composer of "The Rites of Spring." His finger technic was as clean as a steel blade, and his musical thinking, as composer and performer, was as clean as that, too. Again, in his concerto, he has done a new thing, and this by means of a style that is essentially classic. There is an opening theme in the manner of a chorale. It is developed frugally, with great vigor and life, and with many a fine grinding dissonance, broadly speaking, after the manner of Bach. The treatment is lengthy and elaborate, incisive and full of contrapuntal resource. The slow movement has more lyrical qualities, though not very much of sensuous beauty. The finale resumes contrapuntal procedure. Toward the last the composer makes bold employment of syncopation somewhat in the manner of American ragtime, in which, as we know, Stravinsky, with other leading European composers, has been much interested. With more and more rhythmical force and accumulation of healthy power the concerto comes to an end. It had an electrifying performance, particularly on the part of Stravinsky himself, who played with unending technic and endurance, attacking great chords in a manner veritably suggestive of the paws of a Russian bear, though always with a poise which is one of the astounding qualities of his musical nature. The concerto is one of many new departures of Stravinsky. The "Symphonies pour instruments de vent," which Stokowski played last year in New York, was another. The concerto bears out the supposition that Stravinsky has become more and more capricious in his musical output since "Sacre du printemps," and less and less aware of his own artistic destiny. From "Oiseau de feu" to "Sacre du printemps," via the incomparable "Petrouchka," his way seems perfectly clear, after which this humble commentator cannot follow the singular and unpredictable divagations of Stravinsky's muse. He said as much—the commentator—to M. Kussevitsky, who made this reply: "There is a clear line of development, but if you try to trace it by traditional formulae you will not lose your way. The case, as I see it, is that Stravinsky in 'Sacre du printemps' reached the limit of rhythmical force and energy. He has to turn in another direction. He is seeking here and there for a further outlet, and wherever he seeks he finds something new. Meanwhile, however, there is a threat of consistency through all of Stravinsky's music. It does not lie in exterior appearances, but in the element which is at the basis of everything that he composes. Rhythm, always the evolution is rhythmical, and not linear in the sense of the classic masters. That is a fact to be understood before there can be any fair estimate of Stravinsky's compositions, particularly of his present period."

Words of M. Kussevitsky, outlining his attitude on the subject of orchestral programmes, modern and classical music, will be of interest to those who attend his concerts next winter. "I would like to make it clear," said the conductor, "that I am neither modernist nor classicist in my musical preferences. The works of the great classic masters are absolutely indispensable to me, as musician and in my life. No one would less willingly be without them than I. But music is not a static art. Music is continually being made which is an expression of the period in which it appears. It is as necessary for us to know what is being done as it is to know and admire what has been done. As for the value of new works, the conductor uses his best judgment in producing them. He must leave the rest to the judgment of time.

"I shall take particular care in my New York concerts not to perform a disproportionate number of compositions of the Russian schools. Art is cosmopolitan in the sense that it comes from all countries and, if it is important, has meaning for all peoples.

"I have a considerable number of novelties for America. I have Honneger's 'Pacific' symphony, for example, which has been extremely successful here, so that I had to repeat it. (This is the symphony, 'Pacific, 231,' of which the composer has said, 'I have always loved locomotives passionately, since, for me, they are living beings which I cherish as others cherish women or horses.' 'Pacific No. 231' is a locomotive of the heaviest and fastest type.) I have Ravel's instrumentation of Moussorgsky's 'Tableau d'une Exposition.' I have music by modern Austrian and Hungarian composers which is yet to be announced. I shall soon have completed my Boston programmes for five concerts. I shall wait until I get there and have a glimpse of the state of affairs musical before I arrange in detail the programmes for New York.

"As for interpreting the classics, I will tell you at once that often I cannot accept with sincerity traditional practices. I think tradition has often been destructive to masterpieces of earlier periods than ours. I have known, for example, more than one great German conductor to deliberately make changes of instrumentation in Beethoven which were not proportionate or characteristic of the score. I will give you an example. It has been for many years in Germany the custom with conductors to double the horns in the trio of the scherzo of the 'Eroica' symphony, and to double the brass in the finale of the Fifth Symphony.

"Now, in the last instance I agree, because the character of the music is massive and powerful, and there is need of more sonority than that which satisfied the ear in Beethoven's time. I also, by the way, take a slower tempo in this finale than some others, because I think that the tempo usually taken makes the music more trivial than the composer intended, whereas the opening motive of the movement, particularly, needs breadth and nobility of announcement. I mention these details to illustrate my statements.

"But in the case of the trio of the scherzo of the 'Eroica,' I do not agree at all. It is not in tonal proportion to the rest of that mysterious and joyous movement for six horns to lumber through the fanfares which Beethoven thought, and wrote, for three. These are details. I do other things which may be further from accepted conventions. After careful study of a score I can only express my convictions in my performances."

OLIN DOWNES

(Reprinted from the New York Times)

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

BOSTON, MASS.
GLOBE

JUN 29 1924

Koussevitzky has secured the exclusive rights for American first performances of several important musical novelties, including Honegger's "Pacific No. 231," Prokofiev's "Scythian Suite," and Ravel's orchestral arrangement of Musorgsky's piano pieces, "Pictures from an Exposition."

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE

JUN 29 1924

A BOU season, h accepted borough.
turned h music at happenin
Before s
the placi

BLOOMINGTON,
ILL.

JUN 28 1924

ORCHESTRAS OF NOTE HAVE OUTLINED THEIR SCHEDULES FOR SEASON

Several of the leading orchestras of the country have already arranged their schedules for the coming season, and are announcing that the artists engaged are unusually fine, and their offerings an advance over other seasons. Such announcements, while savoring of the sterotyped are saved when such names as Igor Stravinsky, and Ignace Paderwski are mentioned in connection.

The New York Philharmonic Orchestra announces that Stravinsky, the noted Russian composer, will conduct several of their concerts next season. Regularly the Philharmonic will be conducted by Willem Mengelberg and Willem van Hoogstraten, with Henry Hadley as associate director. The Philharomnic orchestral society will present eleven pianists and six violinists as soloists next season. The entire number reaches twenty-four and beginning with the pianists are: Alfred Cortot, William Bachaus, Carl Friedberg, Heinrich Gedhard, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Myra Hess, Nicholas Medtner, Wanda Landowska, Yolanda Mero, Elly Ney and Guiomar Novaes. The violinists so far as Efrem Zimbalist, Carl Flesch, Samuel Gardner, Scigione Guidi, Cecilia Hansen, Erna Rubinstein; cellists, Pablo Casals, Leo Schultz and Cornelius van Vliet; flute, John Amans; singers, Sophie Braslau, Mme. Charles Cahier and Marie Sundelius.

Walter Damrosch will again conduct the New York Symphony orchestra which will give thirty-five concerts in Carnegie Hall and sixteen Sunday afternoon concerts in Aeolian Hall. The list of soloists engaged so far to appear with the orchestra include Dusolina Giannini, Wanda Landowska, Frieda Gange, Mischa Mischakoff, Frederick Schorr, Sigrid Onegin, Adela Verne, Renee Chemet, Florence Easton, Sergei Rachmaninoff, Alfred Cortot, Ossip Gabrilowitsch and Albert Spalding.

Paul Kochanski and Felix Salmond will play the Bach double concerto for violin and 'cello and Samuel Dushkin and Lionel Tertis will be heard in the Mozart double concerto for violin and viola.

Walter Damrosch will present a Wagner program and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. Bruno Walter and Vladimir Golschmann have been engaged as guest conductors.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be enjoying its forty-fourth season, will give ten concerts at Carnegie Hall in New York during the winter. These appearances will be under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

Many single concerts of especial interest have been announced, and the offerings for the season will find particular appeal among the lovers of good music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM FALL RIVER
MASS.
GLOBE
JUL 1 1924

Paris Lauds Spalding.

By the way, a cable to the New York Herald Tribune from Paris refers to the remarkable reception given Spalding's performance of Respighi's "Concerto Gregoriano," played in Paris for the first time, with Koussevitsky, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, conductor of the orchestra, and Spalding the artist.

The cable reads: "Rarely does one witness in Paris the highly edifying spectacle of a French audience moved to tears by an American. Rarely does one see a huge throng of patriotic and intelligent Parisians neglecting to throw their usual rapturous fit over indigenous products and then throwing a proper one over an Anglo-Saxon. And to use the word 'rarely' is stretching the thing a bit.

"All this happened, however, to Albert Spalding. When he finished the third movement of a very beautiful, very successful effort to adapt Gregorian chants and mediaeval harmonies to the requirements of a complicated and modern form of musical expression, Paris accepted him immediately as a great artist. There was no doubt about it; people who five minutes before had hissed Honegger's ingenious attempt to put his impression of a huge locomotive running at full speed into music, yelled excitedly for Spalding. People who had yelled excitedly for Honnegger were none the less exuberant for Spalding.

"Koussevitzky shook the violinist's hand twice on his own account, and then was compelled to repeat a couple of times more on account of his insistent audience. Naturally, both were pleased, the audiences at Koussevitzky concerts, of which eight are given yearly at the opera, and nowhere else, being presumably the most censorious audiences on earth.

"It isn't going so very far to say (inasmuch as it is often said in Paris) that if somebody succeeds in satisfying Koussevitzky's followers he can please the most critical and devastatingly musical person anywhere else. Of course that is the French viewpoint, since M. Koussevitzky has been more or less adopted by the French capital."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SAN FRANCISCO,
CAL.
CHRONICLE

JUL 6 - 1924

Must Put New Music On Programs

By RAY C. B. BROWN

duty to the art of music.

"It is to be hoped that some of them may have read what Kussevtiski said the other day in Paris to a delegation of American writers on music. Music, he observed, is not a static art. It exhibits a continual and necessary movement. He declared his affection and admiration for the classics and the romantics, and his realization of their indispensability. But one cannot live only, as he remarked simply and truly, with Beethoven, Brahms, Schumann and the rest of the gods and half-gods. 'It is as necessary for us to know what is being done as it is to know and admire what has been done,' he said.

"We wish that Kussevtiski's words might be pasted in the hat of every concert-giver in the international world of music—every conductor, pianist, singer, fiddler, cellist and soloist upon the double bass. Especially would we like to force them upon the attention of eminent pianists, eminent singers. The young and unknown concert-givers will, if they are wise, take Newman's advice. The elderly and distinguished ones would probably pay no attention to it if he had offered it to them, for the excellent reason that they do not have to. They can go on exploiting the hackneyed repertoire until they drop in their tracks, and the public will continue to flock to hear them, and make the desired contributions to their bank accounts.

Tel. Chelsea 8800

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON,
MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

JUL 5 - 1924

Kussevitsky as He Appears At a Concert

A Graphic Account of the Last Concert Given in Paris by the New Leader of the Boston Symphony, Made Famous by Karl Muck and Enhanced by Monteux

IT is probable that Sergei Kussevitsky, when he comes to America next season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will not give programmes of the extremely brilliant and ultra-modern quality that he has been giving this spring in Paris. Mr. Kussevitsky has been told that Americans do not like too much pepper where orchestral music is concerned, and he is inclined to be cautious in this direction. Moreover, he himself is a man of very catholic tastes, who is not by nature an exponent of any one school, past or present, or clique, wherever it may be. Here he arranges lists calculated to appeal to a highly sophisticated public, alert for the latest musical sensation, and composers who, whatever their eventual importance in history, are representatives of the most "advanced" tendencies in this art. In America Mr. Kussevitsky plans carefully balanced programmes of classic and modern music, with a good admixture of new compositions, only a few of which he is willing to announce before he reaches Boston; it is not only in Paris that conductors strive to anticipate each other in the production of new works. He hopes, however, that when he does perform unknown compositions in America he will find a following for them. This was said in a conversation with a certain wistfulness and naivete. Mr. Kussevitsky has yet to discover that in Boston it is customary to keep abreast of everything of importance that is produced in the field of orchestral music, and that the public in New York often accepts what it gets when it finds no means of becoming articulate as to what it wants. But these are things that concern the future. Let us consider a typical Kussevitsky concert in Paris, such as the final concert of his spring series, which took place at the Opéra on the evening of May 29.

In this city Kussevitsky is the conductor of the hour. He is, of course, a storm centre of friends and enemies, of the intrigues and rivalries of the various sections of the musical community of Paris. A man of considerable financial resource as well as of commanding personality, his concerts are now packed to the doors. Each one of them, apparently, provides an irresistible sensation or two for an ordinarily surfeited public. Successful men being envied and hated in this sparkling metropolis as much as or more than anywhere else in the world, it follows that each Kussevitsky concert is attended by a considerable number of polished malcontents who do their utmost to secure tickets without paying for them and are very indignant when they cannot do so; and who, having secured seats either by astonishing ingenuity and effrontery or by most reluctantly parting with money for them, greatly relish the privilege of "roasting" the conductor while the music is being played with that peculiar Gallic wit and venom which distinguish the choicer spirits of the capital. The others are supporters of Stravinsky, of various stripes. Some are self-interested in the matter. Others will do anything to see and be seen on important public occasions. Then there is the host of foreign visitors—who cannot, however, rob the Parisian audience of that peculiar theatrical flare and glitter which still distinguishes it at the height of the season—and there are the genuine musical enthusiasts, thickest in the uppermost reaches of the house, where they still honor tradition by making voluble comments upon the performance or any other matter which happens to interest them. Thus the individual who leaned over the rail of the highest gallery while Kussevitsky was bowing and bowing again to the applause, "Hurry up," he yelled, "with the music, so that we poor people can hear it all before the last subway"—sensible advice, duly heeded. In a word, it is a Paris audience. Even the applause and "bravos" have certain distinctive timbre, that mixture of sudden enthusiasm and theatrical pretense that no other circumstances provide; and Mr. Kussevitsky, with a triumvirate of composers who are likewise prominent in the public gaze, is monarch of what he surveys.

The three composers, all present in loges, are Florent Schmitt, Sergi Prokofieff and Igor Stravinsky. Stravinsky is to appear as composer and pianist. He will play for the second time, by general request, his piano concerto which he introduced at the Kussevitsky concert of May 22, and which he will personally interpret, providing arrangements for his proposed tour are satisfactorily completed, next season in America. Prokofieff is represented by an extraordinary work for full chorus command that pertains to few conductors, Kussevitsky plays, obviously but not the less effectively, on his orchestra. He has no mannerism or particular gestures that a single concert fixes in the mind, but does appear to embody in every movement what he finds in the music. With a chorus of some good qualities and others by no means so good, and an orchestra which Mr. Kussevitsky will not prefer to the Boston Symphony, he secured the most expressive and, at times, volcanic response to his wishes.

And at such times the conductor was a figure to remember—erect, mperious, his face working with his own emotions; a hand of which the fingers themselves are eloquent suddenly bringing out an outburst of tone from the chorus; a glance which, sweeping over the orchestra, brings equally sudden and dramatic results. Kussevitsky has the stamp of a leader. As a musician he is evidently endowed with a temperament that can on occasion sweep everything before it. There is an authority, a quenchless enthusiasm and a big sweep in all that he does, which, if he were less sincere and individual as a musician than he is, would be a compelling force for public success. It is even predictable now that Mr. Kussevitsky will be a formidable rival in America in more ways than one for a conductor whose name also contains the letters "s" and "k" in its final syllable. no more than that conductor is he in the habit of allowing an audience or an orchestra to stagnate under him.

To return to the concert and the programme: Florent Schmitt's evocation of Pan, as it is hardly necssary to say, is a musical reincarnation of a certain Faun, who wakens from his slumber, not in a Debussyan heydey of his existence, but some quarter of a century later. His amorousness has a sensuous beauty which appropriately and no doubt intentionally leans more to Debussy rather than to the more mordant character of the talent of Schmitt. But it is a good piece of music, and the original composition stands orchestral transformation so well that one suspects Mr. Schmitt of thinking for orchestra when he wrote for the piano and finding relief in at last casting his conception in the orchestral mold which his creative nature intended. But the ride of Manfred, in spite of some very handsome dissonances and extremely well contrived instrumentation, sounds old-style and artificially stimulated.

"Sept Ils Sont Sept."

"Sept, ils sont sept," the violent and undeniably effective composition of Prokofieff, followed. It would have sent an audience accustomed to New York orchestral programmes scurrying for the doors. For this Prokofieff is a bold and bad young man. How his music will sound ten years hence is an open question. How it would have sounded under a conductor less temperamental and less sympathetc to its nature than Kussevitsky it is hard to say. But on the evening in question and under the circumstances the work made a powerful impression. It is huge and rather horrible and primitive.

In an Akkadian temple discovered in Mesopotamia is a cuneiform inscription describing the attributes of seven fearful demons, originators of all earthly evils. This famous inscription, which has excited the attention of many Assyriologists, among them Winkler, has been made the basis of a poetic incantation by the Russian, Constantin Balmont. It is the inspiration of Prokofieff's music, scored for tenor solo, chorus and orchestra. The meaning of the poem, translated into French in the programme, may be roughly indicated as follows:

Tela! Tela! Tela! Tela!
Seven, they are seven!
In the depths of the abyss
Their number is seven.
In the heavens of azure,
Seven, they are seven.
When they gather in the west
They are seven.
When they loom in the east
They are seven * * *
They know neither kindness or mercy,
They feel neither regret nor remorse.
They are deaf to prayers or supplications * * *
Men are mowed down by them as men mow down grain.

And more to the same purpose. This is the most effective composition of Prokofieff that we have heard. Composed as early as 1917, the score remained in Russia until recently recovered, forwarded to Paris and performed by Kussevitsky for the first time anywhere. It is music which would have delighted Hector Berlioz, and perhaps it is more than that. There is the sensation of the atavistic. Man trembles before the terrible and the unknown. The chorus is one seething tumult of outcries and supplications, reinforced by exceptional orchestral combinations and harmonies as jagged and unbeautiful as the gargoyles on Notre Dame. The task of the solo tenor, admirably executed by H. Fabert of the Opera, is really frightful. He must intone his lines in a manner sometimes verging on speech, or yells, instead of song, and this with a dramatic intensity that will tax him physically as as well as emotionally, to say nothing of maintaining rhythm and pitch complicated opposing forces. The voict glides through intervals that cannot be reduced to notation, and with a barbaric wildness difficult to describe. Few could have equalled M. Fabert in his task. The orchestra thuds and seethes and erupts. A strange piece with a physiognomy all its own, and a remarkable conclusion.

One listened to that crude, savage, half-articulate music and glanced upward at the loge where Prokofieff was sitting—Prokofieff, the front of whose head is bald, whose face, nevertheless, seems incredibly young and very cerebral, like a being who has come from another of the astounding qualities of his musical nature. The concerto is one of many new departures of Stravinsky. The "Symphonies pour instruments de vent," which Stokowski played last year in New York, was another. The concerto bears out the supposition that Stravinsky has become more and more capricious in his musical output since "Sacre du printemps," and less and less aware of his own artistic destiny. From "Oiseau de feu" to "Sacre du printemps," via the incomparable "Petrouchka," his way seems perfectly clear, after which this humble commentator cannot follow the singular and unpredictable divagations of Stravinsky's muse. He said as much—the commentator—to M. Kussevitsky, who made this reply: "There is a clear line of development, but if you try to trace it by traditional formulae you will not lose your way. The case, as I see it, is that Stravinsky in 'Sacre du printemps' reached the limit of rhythmical force and energy. He has to turn in another direction. He is seeking here and there for a further outlet, and wherever he seeks he finds something new. Meanwhile, however, there is a threat of consistency through all of Stravinsky's music. It does not lie in exterior appearances, but in the element which is at the basis of everything that he composes. Rhythm, always the evolution is rhythmical, and not linear in the sense of the classic masters. That is a fact to be understood before there can be any fair estimate of Stravinsky's compositions, particularly of his present period."

Words of M. Kussevitsky, outlining his attitude on the subject of orchestral programmes, modern and classical music, will be of interest to those who attend his concerts next winter. "I would like to make it clear," said the conductor, "that I am neither modernist nor classicist in my musical preferences. The works of the great classic masters are absolutely indispensable to me, as musician and in my life. No one would less willingly be without them than I. But music is not a static art. Music is continually being made which is an expression of the period in which it appears. It is as necessary for us to know what is being done as it is to know and admire what has been done. As for sonority than t in Beethoven's take a slower

some others, tempo usually more trivial th
whereas the op
ment, particula bility of annou
details to illust
"But in the
scherzo of the
all. It is not rest of that my ment for six ho
fanfares which wrote, for three other things wi accepted conven of a score I ca
tions in my per

(Reprinted fr

TON, MASS.
LOBE

2 9 1924

s secured the exclu-nerican first perform-
portant musical nov-
Honegger's "Pacific
y's "Scythian Suite," stral arrangement of o pieces, "Pictures on."

LYN, N. Y.
. Y.
GLE

2 9 1924

OMINGTON,
LL.
UN 28 1924

S OF NOTE
UTLINED THEIR ULES FOR SEASON

ire leading orchestras have already arranged for the coming sea-announcing that the
are unusually fine
ings an advance over
Such announcements of the sterotyped are ch names as Igor
Ignace Paderwski are onnection.
rk Philharmonic Or-ices that Stravinsky
ian composer, will of their concerts
Regularly the Philhar-conducted by Willem
Willem van Hoogenry Hadley as asso-
The Philharomnic
ty will present eleven violinists as soloists
The entire number four and beginning s are: Alfred Cortot,
haus, Carl Friedberg,
dhard, Ossip Gabriloess, Nicholas Medt-ndowska, Yolanda
nd Guiomar Novaes. far as Efrem Zim-
ch, Samuel Gardner,
Cecilia Hansen, Erna
olists, Pablo Casals,
Cornelius van Vliet;
ns; singers, Sophie harles Cahier and

sch will again conork Symphony or-ill give thirty-five gie Hall and sixteen concerts in Aeolian soloists engaged so the orchestra in-
Giannini, Wanda
r Gange, Mischa
ick Schorr, Sigrid
rne, Renee Chemet,
Sergei Rachmani-
ot, Ossip Gabrilolbert Spalding.
and Felix Salmond
ch double concerto cello and Samuel onel Tertis will be zart double concerto iola.
sch will present a n and Beethoven's
r. Bruno Walter and lmann have been en-
conductors.
Symphony Orchestra,
enjoying its forty-will give ten concerts fall in New York dur-
r. These appearances

the direction of Serge concerts of especial been announced, and or the season will find eal among the lovers of

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

FALL RIVER
MASS.
GLOBE
JUL 1 1924

Paris Lauds Spalding.

By the way, a cable to the New York Herald Tribune from Paris refers to the remarkable reception given Spalding's performance of Respighi's "Concerto Gregoriano," played in Paris for the first time, with Koussevitsky, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, conductor of the orchestra, and Spalding the artist.

The cable reads: "Rarely does one witness in Paris the highly edifying spectacle of a French audience moved to tears by an American. Rarely does one see a huge throng of patriotic and intelligent Parisians neglecting to throw their usual rapturous fit over indigenous products and then throwing a proper one over an Anglo-Saxon. And to use the word 'rarely' is stretching the thing a bit.

"All this happened, however, to Albert Spalding. When he finished the third movement of a very beautiful, very successful effort to adapt Gregorian chants and mediaeval harmonies to the requirements of a complicated and modern form of musical expression, Paris accepted him immediately as a great artist. There was no doubt about it; people who five minutes before had hissed Honegger's ingenious attempt to put his impression of a huge locomotive running at full speed into music, yelled excitedly for Spalding. People who had yelled excitedly for Honnegger were none the less exuberant for Spalding.

"Koussevitzky shook the violinist's hand twice on his own account, and then was compelled to repeat a couple of times more on account of his insistent audience. Naturally, both were pleased, the audiences at Koussevitzky concerts, of which eight are given yearly at the opera, and nowhere else, being presumably the most censorious audiences on earth.

"It isn't going so very far to say (inasmuch as it is often said in Paris) that if somebody succeeds in satisfying Koussevitzky's followers he can please the most critical and devastatingly musical person anywhere else. Of course that is the French viewpoint, since M. Koussevitzky has been more or less adopted by the French capital."

THIS CLIPPING FROM

SAN FRANCISCO,
CAL.
CHRONICLE
JUL 6 -1924

Must Put New Music On Programs

By RAY C. B. BROWN

duty to the art of music.

"It is to be hoped that some of them may have read what Koussevitski said the other day in Paris to a delegation of American writers on music. Music, he observed, is not a static art. It exhibits a continual and necessary movement. He declared his affection and admiration for the classics and the romantics, and his realization of their indispensability. But one cannot live only, as he remarked simply and truly, with Beethoven, Brahms, Schumann and the rest of the gods and half-gods. 'It is as necessary for us to know what is being done as it is to know and admire what has been done,' he said.

"We wish that Kussevtiski's words might be pasted in the hat of every concert-giver in the international world of music—every conductor, pianist, singer, fiddler, cellist and soloist upon the double bass. Especially would we like to force them upon the attention of eminent pianists, eminent singers. The young and unknown concert-givers will, if they are wise, take Newman's advice. The elderly and distinguished ones would probably pay no attention to it if he had offered it to them, for the excellent reason that they do not have to. They can go on exploiting the hackneyed repertoire until they drop in their tracks, and the public will continue to flock to hear them, and make the desired contributions to their bank accounts.

Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BOSTON,
MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
JUL 5 - 1924

Kussevitsky as He Appears At a Concert

A Graphic Account of the Last Concert Given in Paris by the New Leader of the Boston Symphony, Made Famous by Karl Muck and Enhanced by Monteux

IT is probable that Sergei Kussevitsky, when he comes to America next season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will not give programmes of the extremely brilliant and ultra-modern quality that he has been giving this spring in Paris. Mr. Kussevitsky has been told that Americans do not like too much pepper where orchestral music is concerned, and he is inclined to be cautious in this direction. Moreover, he himself is a man of very catholic tastes, who is not by nature an exponent of any one school, past or present, or clique, wherever it may be. Here he arranges lists calculated to appeal to a highly sophisticated public, alert for the latest musical sensation, and composers who, whatever their eventual importance in history, are representatives of the most "advanced" tendencies in this art. In America Mr. Kussevitsky plans carefully balanced programmes of classic and modern music, with a good admixture of new compositions, only a few of which he is willing to announce before he reaches Boston; it is not only in Paris that conductors strive to anticipate each other in the production of new works. He hopes, however, that when he does perform unknown compositions in America he will find a following for them. This was said in a conversation with a certain wistfulness and naivete. Mr. Kussevitsky has yet to discover that in Boston it is customary to keep abreast of everything of importance that is produced in the field of orchestral music, and that the public in New York often accepts what it gets when it finds no means of becoming articulate as to what it wants. But these are things that concern the future. Let us consider a typical Kussevitsky concert in Paris, such as the final concert of his spring series, which took place at the Opéra on the evening of May 29.

In this city Kussevitsky is the conductor of the hour. He is, of course, a storm centre of friends and enemies, of the intrigues and rivalries of the various sections of the musical community of Paris. A man of considerable financial resource as well as of commanding personality, his concerts are now packed to the doors. Each one of them, apparently, provides an irresistible sensation or two for an ordinarily surfeited public. Successful men being envied and hated in this sparkling metropolis as much as or more than anywhere else in the world, it follows that each Kussevitsky concert is attended by a considerable number of polished malcontents who do their utmost to secure tickets without paying for them and are very indignant when they cannot do so; and who, having secured seats either by astonishing ingenuity and effrontery or by most reluctantly parting with money for them, greatly relish the privilege of "roasting" the conductor while the music is being played with that peculiar Gallic wit and venom which distinguish the choicer spirits of the capital. The others are supporters of Stravinsky, of various stripes. Some are self-interested in the matter. Others will do anything to see and be seen on important public occasions. Then there is the host of foreign visitors—who cannot, however, rob the Parisian audience of that peculiar theatrical flare and glitter, which still distinguishes it at the height of the season—and there are the genuine musical enthusiasts, thickest in the uppermost reaches of the house, where they still honor tradition by making voluble comments upon the performance or any other matter which happens to interest them. Thus the individual who leaned over the rail of the highest gallery while Kussevitsky was bowing and bowing again to the applause, "Hurry up," he yelled, "with the music, so that we poor people can hear it all before the last subway"—sensible advice, duly heeded. In a word, it is a Paris audience. Even the applause and "bravos" have certain distinctive timbre, that mixture of sudden enthusiasm and theatrical pretense that no other circumstances provide; and Mr. Kussevitsky, with a triumvirate of composers who are likewise prominent in the public gaze, is monarch of what he surveys.

The three composers, all present in loges, are Florent Schmitt, Sergi Prokofieff and Igor Stravinsky. Stravinsky is to appear as composer and pianist. He will play for the second time, by general request, his piano concerto which he introduced at the Kussevitsky concert of May 22, and which he will personally interpret, providing arrangements for his proposed tour are satisfactorily completed, next season in America. Prokofieff is represented by an extraordinary [illegible]

command that pertains to few conductors, Kussevitsky plays, obviously but not the less effectively, on his orchestra. He has no mannerism or particular gestures that a single concert fixes in the mind, but does appear to embody in every movement what he finds in the music. With a chorus of some good qualities and others by no means so good, and an orchestra which Mr. Kussevitsky will not prefer to the Boston Symphony, he secured the most expressive and, at times, volcanic response to his wishes.

And at such times the conductor was a figure to remember—erect, mperious, his face working with his own emotions; a hand of which the fingers themselves are eloquent suddenly bringing out an outburst of tone from the chorus; a glance which, sweeping over the orchestra, brings equally sudden and dramatic results. Kussevitsky has the stamp of a leader. As a musician he is evidently endowed with a temperament that can on occasion sweep everything before it. There is an authority, a quenchless enthusiasm and a big sweep in all that he does, which, if he were less sincere and individual as a musician than he is, would be a compelling force for public success. It is even predictable now that Mr. Kussevitsky will be a formidable rival in America in more ways than one for a conductor whose name also contains the letters "s" and "k" in its final syllable. no more than that conductor is he in the habit of allowing an audience or an orchestra to stagnate under him.

To return to the concert and the programme: Florent Schmitt's evocation of Pan, as it is hardly necssary to say, is a musical reincarnation of a certain Faun, who wakens from his slumber, not in a Debussyan heydey of his existence, but some quarter of a century later. His amorousness has a sensuous beauty which appropriately and no doubt intentionally leans more to Debussy rather than to the more mordant character of the talent of Schmitt. But it is a good piece of music, and the original composition stands orchestral transformation so well that one suspects Mr. Schmitt of thinking for orchestra when he wrote for the piano and finding relief in at last casting his conception in the orchestral mold which his creative nature intended. But the ride of Manfred, in spite of some very handsome dissonances and extremely well contrived instrumentation, sounds old-style and artificially stimulated.

"Sept Ils Sont Sept."

"Sept, ils sont sept," the violent and undeniably effective composition of Prokofieff, followed. It would have sent an audience accustomed to New York orchestral programmes scurrying for the doors. For this Prokofieff is a bold and bad young man. How his music will sound ten years hence is an open question. How it would have sounded under a conductor less temperamental and less sympathetc to its nature than Kussevitsky it is hard to say. But on the evening in question and under the circumstances the work made a powerful impression. It is huge and rather horrible and primitive.

In an Akkadian temple discovered in Mesopotamia is a cuneiform inscription describing the attributes of seven fearful demons, originators of all earthly evils. This famous inscription, which has excited the attention of many Assyriologists, among them Winkler, has been made the basis of a poetic incantation by the Russian, Constantin Balmont. It is the inspiration of Prokofieff's music, scored for tenor solo, chorus and orchestra. The meaning of the poem, translated into French in the programme, may be roughly indicated as follows:

Tela!! Tela!! Tela!! Tela!!
Seven, they are seven!
In the depths of the abyss
Their number is seven.
In the heavens of azure,
Seven, they are seven.
When they gather in the west
They are seven.
When they loom in the east
They are seven • • •
They know neither kindness or mercy,
They feel neither regret nor remorse.
They are deaf to prayers or supplications • • •
Men are mowed down by them as men mow down grain.

And more to the same purpose. This is the most effective composition of Prokofieff that we have heard. Composed as early as 1917, the score remained in Russia until recently recovered, forwarded to Paris and performed by Kussevitsky for the first time anywhere. It is music which would have delighted Hector Berlioz, and perhaps it is more than that. There is the sensation of the atavistic. Man trembles before the terrible and the unknown. The chorus is one seething tumult of outcries and supplications, reinforced by exceptional orchestral combinations and harmonies as jagged and unbeautiful as the gargoyles on Notre Dame. The task of the solo tenor, admirably executed by H. Fabert of the Opera, is really frightful. He must intone his lines in a manner sometimes verging on speech, or yells, instead of song, and this with a dramatic intensity that will tax him physically as as well as emotionally, to say nothing of maintaining rhythm and pitch complicated opposing forces. The voict glides through intervals that cannot be reduced to notation, and with a barbaric wildness difficult to describe. Few could have equalled M. Fabert in his task. The orchestra thuds and seethes and erupts. A strange piece with a physiognomy all its own, and a remarkable conclusion.

One listened to that crude, savage, half-articulate music and glanced upward at the loge where Prokofieff was sitting—Prokofieff, the front of whose head is bald, whose face, nevertheless, seems incredibly young and very cerebral, like a being who

of the astounding qualities of his musical nature. The concerto is one of many new departures of Stravinsky. The "Symphonies pour instruments de vent," which Stokowski played last year in New York, was another. The concerto bears out the supposition that Stravinsky has become more and more capricious in his musical output since "Sacre du printemps," and less and less aware of his own artistic destiny. From "Oiseau de feu" to "Sacre du printemps," via the incomparable "Petrouchka," his way seems perfectly clear, after which this humble commentator cannot follow the singular and unpredictable divagations of Stravinsky's muse. He said as much—the commentator—to M. Kussevitsky, who made this reply: "There is a clear line of development, but if you try to trace it by traditional formulae you will not lose your way. The case, as I see it, is that Stravinsky in 'Sacre du printemps' reached the limit of rhythmical force and energy. He has to turn in another direction. He is seeking here and there for a further outlet, and wherever he seeks he finds something new. Meanwhile, however, there is a threat of consistency through all of Stravinsky's music. It does not lie in exterior appearances, but in the element which is at the basis of everything that he composes. Rhythm, always the evolution is rhythmical, and not linear in the sense of the classic masters. That is a fact to be understood before there can be any fair estimate of Stravinsky's compositions, particularly of his present period."

Words of M. Kussevitsky, outlining his attitude on the subject of orchestral programmes, modern and classical music, will be of interest to those who attend his concerts next winter. "I would like to make it clear," said the conductor, "that I am neither modernist nor classicist in my musical preferences. The works of the great classic masters are absolutely indispensable to me, as musician and in my life. No one would less willingly be without them than I. But music is not a static art. Music is continually being made which is an expression of the period in which it appears. It is as necessary for us to know what is being done as it is to know and admire what has been done. As for sonority than that which satisfied the ear in Beethoven's time. I also, by the way, take a slower tempo in this finale than some others, because I think that the tempo usually taken makes the music more trivial than the composer intended, whereas the opening motive of the movement, particularly, needs breadth and nobility of announcement. I mention these details to illustrate my statements.

"But in the case of the trio of the scherzo of the 'Eroica,' I do not agree at all. It is not in tonal proportion to the rest of that mysterious and joyous movement for six horns to lumber through the fanfares which Beethoven thought, and wrote, for three. These are details. I do other things which may be further from accepted conventions. After careful study of a score I can only express my convictions in my performances."

OLIN DOWNES

(Reprinted from the New York Times)

BLOOMINGTON,
ILL.

JUN 28 1924

ORCHESTRAS OF NOTE HAVE OUTLINED THEIR SCHEDULES FOR SEASON

Several of the leading orchestras of the country have already arranged their schedules for the coming season, and are announcing that the artists engaged are unusually fine and their offerings an advance over other seasons. Such announcements while savoring of the sterotyped are saved when such names as Igor Stravinsky, and Ignace Paderwski are mentioned in connection.

The New York Philharmonic Orchestra announces that Stravinsky the noted Russian composer, will conduct several of their concerts next season. Regularly the Philharmonic will be conducted by Willem Mengelberg and Willem van Hoogstraten, with Henry Hadley as associate director. The Philharomnic orchestral society will present eleven pianists and six violinists as soloists next season. The entire number reaches twenty-four and beginning with the pianists are: Alfred Cortot, William Bachaus, Carl Friedberg, Heinrich Gedhard, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Myra Hess, Nicholas Medtner, Wanda Landowska, Yolanda Mero, Elly Ney and Guiomar Novaes. The violinists so far as Efrem Zimbalist, Carl Flesch, Samuel Gardner, Scigione Guidi, Cecilia Hansen, Erna Rubinstein; 'cellists, Pablo Casals, Leo Schultz and Cornelius van Vliet; flute, John Amans; singers, Sophie Braslau, Mme. Charles Cahier and Marie Sundelius.

Walter Damrosch will again conduct the New York Symphony orchestra which will give thirty-five concerts in Carnegie Hall and sixteen Sunday afternoon concerts in Aeolian Hall. The list of soloists engaged so far to appear with the orchestra include Dusolina Giannini, Wanda Landowska, Florence Gange, Mischa Mischakoff, Frederick Schorr, Sigrid Onegin, Adela Verne, Renee Chemet, Florence Easton, Sergei Rachmaninoff, Alfred Cortot, Ossip Gabrilowitsch and Albert Spalding.

Paul Kochanski and Felix Salmond will play the Bach double concerto for violin and 'cello and Samuel Dushkin and Lionel Tertis will be heard in the Mozart double concerto for violin and viola.

Walter Damrosch will present a Wagner program and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. Bruno Walter and Vladimir Golschmann have been engaged as guest conductors.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be enjoying its forty-fourth season, will give ten concerts at Carnegie Hall in New York during the winter. These appearances will be under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

Many single concerts of especial interest have been announced, and the offerings for the season will find particular appeal among the lovers of good music.

---

of times more on account of his insistent audience. Naturally, both were pleased, the audiences at Koussevitzky concerts, of which eight are given yearly at the opera, and nowhere else, being presumably the most censorious audiences on earth.

"It isn't going so very far to say (inasmuch as it is often said in Paris) that if somebody succeeds in satisfying Koussevitzky's followers he can please the most critical and devastatingly musical person anywhere else. Of course that is the French viewpoint, since M. Koussevitzky has been more or less adopted by the French capital."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
CHRONICLE

JUL 6 - 1924

Must Put New Music On Programs

By RAY C. B. BROWN

duty to the art of music.

"It is to be hoped that some of them may have read what Kussevtiski said the other day in Paris to a delegation of American writers on music. Music, he observed, is not a static art. It exhibits a continual and necessary movement. He declared his affection and admiration for the classics and the romantics, and his realization of their indispensability. But one cannot live only, as he remarked simply and truly, with Beethoven, Brahms, Schumann and the rest of the gods and half-gods. 'It is as necessary for us to know what is being done as it is to know and admire what has been done,' he said.

"We wish that Kussevtiski's words might be pasted in the hat of every concert-giver in the international world of music—every conductor, pianist, singer, fiddler, cellist and soloist upon the double bass. Especially would we like to force them upon the attention of eminent pianists, eminent singers. The young and unknown concert-givers will, if they are wise, take Newman's advice. The elderly and distinguished ones would probably pay no attention to it if he had offered it to them, for the excellent reason that they do not have to. They can go on exploiting the hackneyed repertoire until they drop in their tracks, and the public will continue to flock to hear them, and make the desired contributions to their bank accounts.

[illegible] upon Peder-

that Americans do not like too much pepper where orchestral music is concerned, and he is inclined to be cautious in this direction. Moreover, he himself is a man of very catholic tastes, who is not by nature an exponent of any one school, past or present, or clique, wherever it may be. Here he arranges lists calculated to appeal to a highly sophisticated public, alert for the latest musical sensation, and composers who, whatever their eventual importance in history, are representatives of the most "advanced" tendencies in this art. In America Mr. Kussevitsky plans carefully balanced programmes of classic and modern music, with a good admixture of new compositions, only a few of which he is willing to announce before he reaches Boston; it is not only in Paris that conductors strive to anticipate each other in the production of new works. He hopes, however, that when he does perform unknown compositions in America he will find a following for them. This was said in a conversation with a certain wistfulness and naivete. Mr. Kussevitsky has yet to discover that in Boston it is customary to keep abreast of everything of importance that is produced in the field of orchestral music, and that the public in New York often accepts what it gets when it finds no means of becoming articulate as to what it wants. But these are things that concern the future. Let us consider a typical Kussevitsky concert in Paris, such as the final concert of his spring series, which took place at the Opéra on the evening of May 29.

In this city Kussevitsky is the conductor of the hour. He is, of course, a storm centre of friends and enemies, of the intrigues and rivalries of the various sections of the musical community of Paris. A man of considerable financial resource as well as of commanding personality, his concerts are now packed to the doors. Each one of them, apparently, provides an irresistible sensation or two for an ordinarily surfeited public. Successful men being envied and hated in this sparkling metropolis as much as or more than anywhere else in the world, it follows that each Kussevitsky concert is attended by a considerable number of polished malcontents who do their utmost to secure tickets without paying for them and are very indignant when they cannot do so; and who, having secured seats either by astonishing ingenuity and effrontery or by most reluctantly parting with money for them, greatly relish the privilege of "roasting" the conductor while the music is being played with that peculiar Gallic wit and venom which distinguish the choicer spirits of the capital. The others are supporters of Stravinsky, of various stripes. Some are self-interested in the matter. Others will do anything to see and be seen on important public occasions. Then there is the host of foreign visitors—who cannot, however, rob the Parisian audience of that peculiar theatrical flare and glitter which still distinguishes it at the height of the season—and there are the genuine musical enthusiasts, thickest in the uppermost reaches of the house, where they still honor tradition by making voluble comments upon the performance or any other matter which happens to interest them. Thus the individual who leaned over the rail of the highest gallery while Kussevitsky was bowing and bowing again to the applause, "Hurry up," he yelled, "with the music, so that we poor people can hear it all before the last subway"—sensible advice, duly heeded. In a word, it is a Paris audience. Even the applause and "bravos" have certain distinctive timbre, that mixture of sudden enthusiasm and theatrical pretense that no other circumstances provide; and Mr. Kussevitsky, with a triumvirate of composers who are likewise prominent in the public gaze, is monarch of what he surveys.

The three composers, all present in loges, are Florent Schmitt, Sergi Prokofieff and Igor Stravinsky. Stravinsky is to appear as composer and pianist. He will play for the second time, by general request, his piano concerto which he introduced at the Kussevitsky concert of May 22, and which he will personally interpret, providing arrangements for his proposed tour are satisfactorily completed, next season in America. Prokofieff is represented by an extraordinary work for full chorus and orchestra. "Sept, ils sont sept," after an invocation of the seven gods of evil found in a cuneiform inscription of the pre-Babylonian era. Schmitt has two new compositions, short orchestral pieces, the first of which is "La Tristesse de Pan," an orchestral version of the piano piece which he, in common with Stravinsky, Dukas, Malapiero, Bartols and others, composed when Debussy died under the collective title of "Tombeau de Debussy," and a second piece, "La Tragique Chevauchée," a modern French musical fantasy inspired by the ride of Byron's "Manfred." Of other times and tastes, and also for music of a simplicity and beauty very grateful by contrast to the ear, are Corelli's first "concerto grosso" for strings; the three nocturnes of Debussy, including the last, the "Sirènes," for voices and orchestra, and the superb dances from Borodine's "Prince Igor," in which, again, the chorus is employed.

A half hour or thereabouts after the time announced for the beginning of the concert Kussevitsky enters, steps quickly through the orchestra to his stand, raps for attention and commences without more ado the Corelli concerto. There are strong divisions of opinion here, as there will be in America, concerning his conducting; but there can be no question of his arousing keen public interest as man and musician; and, whether or not one agrees with his conceptions, it is hardly possible, after listening and talking to him, to doubt his sincerity. On the conductor's stand he is a figure to watch as well as to hear. Tall, with dark hair which is graying, with nervous hands and face which sensitively reflects his mood, and with a degree of bodily

---

America in more ways than one for a conductor whose name also contains the letters "s" and "k" in its final syllable, no more than that conductor is he in the habit of allowing an audience or an orchestra to stagnate under him.

To return to the concert and the programme: Florent Schmitt's evocation of Pan, as it is hardly necssary to say, is a musical reincarnation of a certain Faun, who wakens from his slumber, not in a Debussyan heydey of his existence, but some quarter of a century later. His amorousness has a sensuous beauty which appropriately and no doubt intentionally leans more to Debussy rather than to the more mordant character of the talent of Schmitt. But it is a good piece of music, and the original composition stands orchestral transformation so well that one suspects Mr. Schmitt of thinking for orchestra when he wrote for the piano and finding relief in at last casting his conception in the orchestral mold which his creative nature intended. But the ride of Manfred, in spite of some very handsome dissonances and extremely well contrived instrumentation, sounds old-style and artificially stimulated.

"Sept Ils Sont Sept."

"Sept, ils sont sept," the violent and undeniably effective composition of Prokofieff, followed. It would have sent an audience accustomed to New York orchestral programmes scurrying for the doors. For this Prokofieff is a bold and bad young man. How his music will sound ten years hence is an open question. How it would have sounded under a conductor less temperamental and less sympathetc to its nature than Kussevitsky it is hard to say. But on the evening in question and under the circumstances the work made a powerful impression. It is huge and rather horrible and primitive.

In an Akkadian temple discovered in Mesopotamia is a cuneiform inscription describing the attributes of seven fearful demons, originators of all earthly evils. This famous inscription, which has excited the attention of many Assyriologists, among them Winkler, has been made the basis of a poetic incantation by the Russian, Constantin Balmont. It is the inspiration of Prokofieff's music, scored for tenor solo, chorus and orchestra. The meaning of the poem, translated into French in the programme, may be roughly indicated as follows:

Telal! Telal! Telal! Telal!
Seven, they are seven!
In the depths of the abyss
Their number is seven.
In the heavens of azure,
Seven, they are seven.
When they gather in the west
They are seven.
When they loom in the east
They are seven * * *
They know neither kindness or mercy,
They feel neither regret nor remorse,
They are deaf to prayers or supplications * * *
Men are mowed down by them as men mow down grain.

And more to the same purpose. This is the most effective composition of Prokofieff that we have heard. Composed as early as 1917, the score remained in Russia until recently recovered, forwarded to Paris and performed by Kussevitsky for the first time anywhere. It is music which would have delighted Hector Berlioz, and perhaps it is more than that. There is the sensation of the atavistic. Man trembles before the terrible and the unknown. The chorus is one seething tumult of outcries and supplications, reinforced by exceptional orchestral combinations and harmonies as jagged and unbeautiful as the gargoyles on Notre Dame. The task of the solo tenor, admirably executed by H. Fabert of the Opera, is really frightful. He must intone his lines in a manner sometimes verging on speech, or yells, instead of song, and this with a dramatic intensity that will tax him physically as as well as emotionally, to say nothing of maintaining rhythm and pitch complicated opposing forces. The voict glides through intervals that cannot be reduced to notation, and with a barbaric wildness difficult to describe. Few could have equalled M. Fabert in his task. The orchestra thuds and seethes and erupts. A strange piece with a physiognomy all its own, and a remarkable conclusion.

One listened to that crude, savage, half-articulate music and glanced upward at the loge where Prokofieff was sitting—Prokofieff, the front of whose head is bald, whose face, nevertheless, seems incredibly young and very cerebral, like a being who has come from another age or planet, groomed and dressed in the style of today—come to examine a world upon which he may have sinister designs! A queer fellow, who seems to be delving, musically, in a certain hinterland of the human consciousness, listening to what he has discovered there, with as much calmness and detachment as if he had been a scientist discussing the theory of evolution.

He rose from his seat and bowed as amiably as you please to enormous applause, as the composition came to an end—a sudden hush that falls over chorus and orchestra, an effect of utter prostration and helpfulness in the presence of unfathomable mystery. The murmurs of the chorus are heard distantly, from far off, through the exordium of the orchestra. A curious business!

Now came Stravinsky, a small man, extremely self-possessed, who played his concerto exactly as we knew he would before he even entered the hall, with a clean-cut, electrical vigor that had no softness or sentiment in it, with a precision and rhythmical force inseparable from the composer of "The Rites of Spring." His finger technic was as clean as a steel blade, and his musical thinking, as composer and performer, was as clean as that, too. Again, in his concerto, he has done a new thing, and this by means of a style that is essentially classic. There is an opening theme in the manner of a chorale. It is developed frugally, with great vigor and life, and with many a fine grinding dissonance, broadly speaking, after the manner of Bach. The treatment is lengthy and elaborate, incisive and full of contrapuntal resource. The slow movement has more lyrical qualities, though not very much of sensuous beauty. The finale resumes contrapuntal procedure. Toward the last the composer makes bold employment of syncopation somewhat in the manner of American ragtime, in which, as we know, Stravinsky, with other leading European composers, has been much interested. With more and more rhythmical force and accumulation of healthy power the concerto comes to an end. It had an electrifying performance, particularly on the part of Stravinsky himself, who played with unending technic and endurance, attacking great chords in a manner veritably suggestive of the paws of a Russian bear, though always with a poise which is one cal, and not linear in the sense of the classic masters. That is a fact to be understood before there can be any fair estimate of Stravinsky's compositions, particularly of his present period."

---

Words of M. Kussevitsky, outlining his attitude on the subject of orchestral programmes, modern and classical music, will be of interest to those who attend his concerts next winter. "I would like to make it clear," said the conductor, "that I am neither modernist nor classicist in my musical preferences. The works of the great classic masters are absolutely indispensable to me, as musician and in my life. No one would less willingly be without them than I. But music is not a static art. Music is continually being made which is an expression of the period in which it appears. It is as necessary for us to know what is being done as it is to know and admire what has been done. As for the value of new works, the conductor uses his best judgment in producing them. He must leave the rest to the judgment of time.

"I shall take particular care in my New York concerts not to perform a disproportionate number of compositions of the Russian schools. Art is cosmopolitan in the sense that it comes from all countries and, if it is important, has meaning for all peoples.

"I have a considerable number of novelties for America. I have Honneger's 'Pacific' symphony, for example, which has been extremely successful here, so that I had to repeat it. (This is the symphony, 'Pacific, 231,' of which the composer has said, 'I have always loved locomotives passionately, since, for me, they are living beings which I cherish as others cherish women or horses.' 'Pacific No. 231' is a locomotive of the heaviest and fastest type.) I have Ravel's instrumentation of Moussorgsky's 'Tableau d'une Exposition.' I have music by modern Austrian and Hungarian composers which is yet to be announced. I shall soon have completed my Boston programmes for five concerts. I shall wait until I get there and have a glimpse of the state of affairs musical before I arrange in detail the programmes for New York.

"As for interpreting the classics, I will tell you at once that often I cannot accept with sincerity traditional practices. I think tradition has often been destructive to masterpieces of earlier periods than ours. I have known, for example, more than one great German conductor to deliberately make changes of instrumentation in Beethoven which were not proportionate or characteristic of the score. I will give you an example. It has been for many years in Germany the custom with conductors to double the horns in the trio of the scherzo of the 'Eroica' symphony, and to double the brass in the finale of the 'Fifth Symphony.'

"Now, in the last instance I agree, because the character of the music is massive and powerful, and there is need of more

TIMES

JUN 29 1924

The Vienna Opera Season in Paris Scores in Its Mozart Traditions

By OLIN J. DOWNES.

MOZART came like a Spring crocus to the boulevards. There could hardly have been a stronger contrast, or one more charming and unworldly in its effect, than the performances of three of his operas by the Vienna Opera Company at the Champs Elysées Théâtre in the last week of May and the first week of June, with Franz Schalk as conductor, and the performances through which Kussewitsky triumphed at the Opéra. The Vienna performances preceded those of the "Mozart season," which Ganna Walska, as artist and impresariatrix, had previously announced to take place, beginning the 5th of June, in the same theatre. The Walska performances cannot be described here, since we shall be far from Paris when they take place. The Vienna company's interpretation of Mozart occurred as a consequence of many conditions of the moment. The company had encountered the obstructions of musical unionism in England and postwar conditions which prevented its presentations of operas by Wagner and Strauss in France. It therefore confined itself to three operas of Mozart — "Don Juan," "Figaro's Wedding" and "The Elopement from the Seraglio"—for the Paris season, and these were performances to be remembered.

The night before the first "Don Juan" Kussewitsky had led his final concert of the season at the Opéra, scraping depths and storming heights with the music of Schmidt, Prokofieff, Strawinsky and all the other uneasy souls of this querulous and excitable period. Kussewitsky is the conquering virtuoso at the head of the greatest instrument man has yet devised—the modern orchestra. Schalk is as far as antipodes can be from anything like that. Schalk is dreamer and student personified as he sits at his harpsichord, oblivious to everything but the music.

They say that Schalk is a failure when he conducts an orchestral concert. Perhaps he has the same dread of an audience observing his legs that a certain music critic we know feels every time he ambles down the central aisle of a concert hall. But when he conducts opera—at least when he conducts Mozart—Schalk is inimitable. One can see him now seated in the eighteenth century manner at his little old instrument, striking a faint tinkling harmony for a recitative or taking up the baton for a moment, with a lightness that seems to emanate from the music, to remind the orchestra of some nuance or rhythmical punctuation. Or he uses only his hand, in the manner of a caress, to mold a phrase—his head thrown back, his thin, kindly old face shining with happiness in his task.

As no other conductor we have ever seen, he rules by love and not by fear. No doubt much has been done in many rehearsals. No doubt the singers were on the qui vive to give the best of which they were capable to the Paris audiences. But these things could not wholly account for the flavor of the performances. Old Schalk must have projected his conceptions as Arturo Toscanini permeated with himself the performances of "Tristan and Isolde" in past glorious days in the Metropolitan Opera House.

One thinks of these delightful performances first and last, too, from the standpoint of ensemble. Not that the company fell short in the abilities of individual singers. Far from it. But each singer was an actor, interpreting his part not merely with finished routine, but with inspiration and communicative fire. There was a small orchestra of about thirty, fully large enough for the score and for the excellent acoustics of the Champs Elysées Théâtre. The ensemble was one continual lesson in all that pertains to the harmonious realization of a composer's conception on the stage.

In America we often see good ensemble in an operatic production. The days of stars who have no conception of themselves as parts of a drama or their persons as details of a picture on the stage are gradually leaving us. But we seldom see an operatic ensemble of the character that distinguished the productions of "Don Juan" and "Figaro's Wedding" by the Viennese. This was an achievement of spirit as well as letter based upon a realization of the meaning of the entire drama by every one on the stage. There was a co-ordination of thinking as well as of acting and singing distinguishable from the machine-made ensemble of the average opera production, as the productions of the Mdscow Art players in New York were distinguishable from even brilliant theatrical performances elsewhere. The Vienna productions have also the final element of style of Mozart's period. There was elegance and vivacity, a certain formality of movement and gesture which nevertheless betrayed the most genuine emotion. The celebrated Don was a nobleman in all that he said or thought or did. If one must be a rascal, be a gentleman about it! The Countess in "Figaro's Wedding" was a Countess; her maid was a maid of that day and not this one. Nor were the peasants of "Don Juan" Italian ditch diggers of this year nineteen twenty-four. They were rustics of a period that has gone, louting low to their masters. The reason Don gave Masetto a sound beating, instead of the powerful Masetto thrashing the life out of the lordly Don was simply that in his heart Masetto knew the nobleman to be his superior whoever held the sword or the musket, and could never get around or psychologically override the fact.

These performances are the fruit of long tradition—not tradition that molders in books or in the skulls of self-appointed high priests of an art, lost to all but its outworn formulae, but tradition that lives and flames. It is a pity that such a spirit is so difficult to reproduce, even in the best-regulated opera companies of our land, because, if it could be summoned, it would give a rising generation a very different opinion of "the classics" than many now entertain. One wonders, in fact, if many a masterpiece does not gradually and silently disappear when transplanted to new periods and environments, because of the community's losing the path to its revelation, until the years close over it and it is lost to the sight of men. Music is nothing when it loses its essence, and that essence is often a very fragile thing.

Of course it requires more than expert stage management and interpretation, and the services of a conductor of the first rank; more, even, than these things, to attain such performances. Mozart cannot be sung by inferior artists. Elements indispensable to fine interpretation would have been lacking had there not been a number of highly accomplished artists in the cast. But for one there was a real Don Juan who sang with elegance and polish as well as fire, who wooed and wielded his sword with equal instinctiveness and effect. His recitative—a characteristic which he happily shared with many of those on the stage—was a delight to the ear and the understanding. In fact, the recitatives throughout the performance were so eloquent and led so naturally into the set airs of ensembles that the impression of stiff musical forms of a bygone era was almost completely removed. One listened to a continuous drama which reached its incomparable climax when the statue appeared at the feast. This Don Juan was Duhan. The Leporello was Mayr; the Donna Anna, Mme. Huni-Mihachek; Elvira, Mme. Borni Ottavio, Tauber—paucity of names in this place is to be explained by the fact that the second half of this letter (begun in Paris) was in process of composition in the limousine of an airplane when suddenly and unwarrantably this machine descended. It descended, after roaring loudly enough to banish all memories of Mozart that ever were, with a sudden, horrid, silent swoop. It landed in a valley far below, not only with violence to the person of ye scribe but also to the complete manglement of his programs, his admirable typewriter and the second section of his article. The names here given are, therefore, only those which he can accurately remember. Details of those Mozart performances, anyhow, are of secondary concern. The reviewer is not high in his watch tower in New York City, endeavoring to gage and describe just how much bettter G. sang than J. or vice versa. The opera's the thing. There will remain long in the memory Donna Anna's dramatic recital of her wrongs (as also the outcry of the orchestra which, thanks to Schalk, preceded it,) and the noble dignity and dramatic force of her narrative. It replaced that manner practiced by many sopranos which causes one to see in Donna Anna not a wildly suffering woman but a fussy species of mother-in-law. There is also to remember the aristocratic Elvira of Mme. Born. The men in the cast were fully equal to these singers. We have seen a more sensual and craven Leporello than that of Mayr, but he has a splendidly resonant voice and was fully in the picture, and Tauber did an astonishing thing: he made the air of Ottavio much more than a concert aria, he gave the figure a semblance of reality by his musical interpretation, and sang with such a fresh and manly tone-quality, and so well, that his solo was the signal for an ovation that swept the house. The ensembles were a joy, from the trio of the masques to the wonderful musical and dramatic combinations of the ballroom scene and what followed.

***

In the "Figaro" performance Duhan appeared as the Count with almost as much success as he had had as the Don, excelling in comedy. Mayr was the Figaro, and better suited to that rôle, it seemed, than to Leporello. Again Mme. Born showed her fine art as a singer when she characterized the Countess, a woman far in life and knowledge from that gay Rosina of another immortal operatic comedy, disillusioned, but a gallant creature for all that. Mme. Schone was a comely Cherubino, and some one else was an excellent Suzanne. There was opportunity to compare the two operas in performances of equal interest and merit. The principal conclusion reached under these circumstances, which should be acceptable to every one, is that the works are entirely and impressively different in style and cannot be compared!

***

Schalk's archestra, while of course it played scores which did not require the virtuosity or the instrumental mechanisms demanded by modern works, on the other hand performed music which would have immediately exposed technical bungling or tonal imperfections, as more modern music might not have done. Judged by these one-sided tests, it was the best orchestra to be heard at the time in Paris. No doubt the best musicians of the Vienna orchestra of over a hundred had been selected. The results must have gratified the conductor with the small and admirably efficient band of instrumentalists at his command, Schalk achieved exquisite balances and shadings. The playing was precision itself, but it had never the faintest suspicion of stiffnness. It is difficult to describe its light and shade, its singular elasticity, always present, or tempo or dynamic. It involved a delicate tapering of each lyrical phrase, a respiration of the instruments equally sympathetic to the character of the music and to the natural respiration of the singers, which must have made it inspiring for them to appear under such a conductor. The music was all transparency, sighs and tenderness of another world—songs of Ariel!

***

A curious thing in connection with orchestras in Paris, and indeed in Europe, is the way some conductors who visit us in America talk of their European players and the way in which the same conductors talk to Europeans about their musicians in America. Here I shall not mention names, save one. That is the name of Pierre Monteux, who, having completed his fifth and last season as conductor of the Boston Symphony, said to us with unaffected frankness: "I am spoiled for European orchestras. There are few, if any, today which equal the one I led in America; and you will not find any here which equal those you heard week in and week out last season in New York." Mr. Monteux will have conducted, by the time this letter arrives in New York, performances of Strawinsky's "Petrouchka," "Sacre due printemps," "Noces," by the Russian Ballet, which now has Monte Carlo as its headquarters and is sustained financially by the Prince of Monaco. Monteux is conducting at the urgent request of Strawinsky and not, one imagines, with particular personal pleasure in the work. At different rehearsals he has been confronted with a different orchestra. It is a musical condition here for which the war is partly responsible. We heard him teaching what was virtually his second orchestra "Petrouchka," and the hearing was interesting from more points than one. We heard—and did not particularly relish the experience—the last half of one of Walter Damrosch's Beethoven concerts with the orchestra available for his purpose. We heard the Kussewitsky orchestra at the opera, as previously related. There is no comparison in tone quality and virtuosity between these orchestras and a round half dozen of the leading orchestras of America. Yet we could give the name of the European conductor who said, after being praised for a New York performance, "I'm glad you liked it, but you should hear my orchestra in Europe." In Paris, of course, the same conductor says: "Ah! But you should hear the superb orchestra they give me in America." Perhaps musicians here are bettter aware of the real state of affairs than they readily admit. Certainly, Kussewitsky's audiences have increased since his engagements for the Boston Orchestra was announced in the European press. The time is rapidly coming, if it is not already here when musical conditions in Europe and America will represent a new "balance of power."

Dusolina Giannini Hailed as Second Patti at London Concert.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

WASHINGTON
D. C.

HERALD

L 6 1924

ALBERT SPALDING gave the first performance in Paris of Respighi's Gregorian concerto for violin and orchestra at the Paris Opera with the Paris Orchestra under Sergei Koussevitsky.

It is probable that Mr. Spalding will play this new work for the first time in this country with Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Washington will hope to be included in the list of cities where it will be per-

REDUCTION

RATIO

15x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

A5

A4

A3

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

78

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
POST

JUL 6 1924

Why Chaliapin Embraced Koussevitsky

New Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra

Previous Temperamental Difficulties of the Famous Russian Singer With the Great Orchestra Leader Reached Climax in Paris the Other Day -- "Rows" of the Orchestra

Mary Garden as she looked when making her first appearance in America with Paris' stamp of approval as the foremost exponent of soprano roles in modern French opera. Defending this position from the encroachment of Lina Cavalieri led to two terrific opera house wars. (C) Mishkin Studio.

A French cartoonist's impression of Koussevitsky during his recent concerts in Paris. The Russian's movements while conducting are reported to be altogether different from anything Boston has seen.

Mary Garden as Salome in Richard Strauss' like-named opera, which Kaiser Wilhelm criticised the composer for writing, thus drawing a fearless and blistering reply from Strauss. Mayor Curley forbade Miss Garden to present the role in Boston. (C) Mishkin Studio.

At last the feud was over. Koussevitsky and Chaliapin had publicly embraced in Paris. Now Chaliapin stepped out on the opera stage to rehearse in his great role of the murderous Czar Boris, under the baton of the reconciled Koussevitsky. The music began and then—

(Upper left) Feodor Chaliapin in street attire. Is he stopping his ears to keep from hearing mention of Koussevitsky? (Upper right) Serge Koussevitsky as Boston will see him. His most recent photo. Observe how he seems to be looking at Chaliapin from the corner of one eye, just as the basso seems to be doing on his side.

Slam!

That's the illustrious Koussevitsky—new conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Bang!

There goes Chaliapin—Russian singing-actor lionized recently at Symphony Hall and the Boston Opera House.

What's going to happen when Chaliapin next sings in Boston—

While Koussevitsky reigns as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra?

By R. L. Humphrey

Out from tempestuous Russia, Feodor Chaliapin burst on a Boston Symphony Hall audience three seasons ago, was hailed with thunderous approval, and pronounced a supreme master of interpretative singing.

Why hadn't Boston made his acquaintance sooner, many wondered?

For the world's greatest concert artists always come to Symphony Hall before their fame is very old, and here was this amazing basso, Chaliapin, making his first appearance there, when it was said that for 20 years the Russians had idolized him as their greatest singer.

And if he had stayed away so long, why the sudden decision to come?

For three years the question has gone begging.

Only now comes the answer, and it is—

Koussevitsky.

Basso Honored Above Conductor

It is said now that Europe—let alone Russia—was not big enough to hold the basso and Koussevitsky at the same time.

So to remedy the situation, Chaliapin decided on a drastic operation. tore himself away from Russia, Europe and Koussevitsky, and attached himself to the American concert and operatic stage.

According to the latest report, the excitements of the Soviet regime were made gay with extra sparks and racket by a head-on collision of violent dislike between Chaliapin and Koussevitsky.

It came when the genius of the basso was recognized with a signal honor by the Red powers. He was made Singer Extraordinary to the Soviet Republic. This meant that he was to journey up and down the land and educate the great common people of Russia by causing them, under official proclamation, to assemble and listen to the art of song as exemplified by him.

It so happened that Koussevitsky, without waiting for the revolution and the promptings of the Soviet government, already had ministered heavily to the musical education of the Russian populace.

With perfect idealism, back in the days of the Czar, he had, on his own initiative, hired a steamer and an orchestra, and had travelled along the Volga, giving free concerts to the people of the cities and towns along the river. The common people made him more famous.

went wild over this fine music, usually held sacred to the higher classes. That four months' cruise of Koussevitsky and his orchestra in 1909 left them pleading for more. And they got it. From the following season until the World war Koussevitsky gave yearly concerts to the people along Russia's "father of waters."

Trotsky to the Rescue

Some years before, he and the basso had had a falling-out with much action and thrills. Time had thrown a merciful haze over the incident.

Now this new war. Trotsky himself rushed to the rescue. He seemed an excellent person to take up the matter, because of his vast experience as Soviet minister of war. He had another qualification that seemed still more fitting—he was an "opera hound." But it was that very thing that wrought new havoc in the situation.

Trotsky secured Koussevitsky's appointment as "commissar of opera to the Soviet Republic."

Confusion worse confounded!

Of course Koussevitsky was a magnificent contribution to Russian opera. His fame as an orchestral conductor is largely due to dramatic fervor which imparts the noblest virtues of dramatic quality to even the driest music.

Yes—but Chaliapin over a course of some years had drawn around himself the mantle of the great god of opera in Russia. With that commanding way of his he had kicked over operatic traditions left and right, in his individual work as a singing-actor. He substituted real acting for the customary inanities and appeared in perfect marvels of makeup—both efforts winning him frenzied adulation from the Russian opera public. With fame added to his natural independence and assertiveness, Chaliapin became intrenched in a position so strong that he could dictate policies and even talk back to operatic conductors or actually make them alter their ideas to suit him.

So, how was it possible for Chaliapin to be Chaliapin, if his old rival Koussevitsky was to be Soviet dictator of opera?

And that, it is now reported, is why Chaliapin tore himself from his adoring Russian public, and suddenly turned up in Boston Symphony Hall, after remaining haughtily aloof for 20 years.

Enemies Embrace

For three seasons the great basso won tremendous acclaim in Boston, New York and Chicago, both as concert singer and as singing-actor with the forces of the Metropolitan Opera and the Chicago Opera.

Meantime Koussevitsky had been hailed in Paris, London, Edinburgh and Madrid as one of the greatest of all geniuses among orchestral conductors. It was announced that this spring he would lead a performance of the great Russian opera, "Boris Godounof," at the Paris opera. That is an opera which Chaliapin made famous, and which

Would Paris have to forego hearing Chaliapin's extraordinary interpretation of the role of Boris, because of the basso's ruction with the man who was to wield the baton?

Chaliapin went to Paris after the close of the American operatic season. There were expectations of a cyclonic tempest of violent Chaliapin decrial of Koussevitsky's abilities as an operatic conductor.

But people should never count on Chaliapin to do the expected.

What he actually did do was to announce that he and his fellow-countryman, Koussevitsky, were on terms of friendship—and he embraced Koussevitsky publicly in Paris to prove it!

War Again . . .

The date for the first rehearsal of "Boris" came. Koussevitsky took his place as conductor. Chaliapin took his place as leading bass. The music Moussorgsky conceived and Rimsky-Korsakof perfected sounded its setting for the wickedness of Czar Boris. Expectation was at top pitch to hear the spectacular results of the fusion of the art of Chaliapin with that of Koussevitsky.

Snap!

The bonds of friendship flew asunder, and the old feud was on again, worse than before.

Details as to just what happened are missing, but the long and short of that memorable rehearsal was this:

Koussevitsky proclaimed over Paris that never again would he conduct in the same opera house with Chaliapin. In fact, he wouldn't even conduct in the same city with him!

What's going to happen when Chaliapin makes his now expected annual concert visit to Symphony Hall, and his possible operatic appearance at the Opera House after Koussevitsky begins leading the Boston Symphony orchestra in the fall?

Or will the basso choose to ignore Symphony Hall, and make both concert and operatic appearances at the Opera House?

It is to be hoped that Boston will be spared actual physical conflict in this case, for such conflict has actually taken place already in New York and Chicago, because of the temperaments of opera stars.

Again Boris Spells Trouble

In fact, Chaliapin himself figured in the Chicago melee—and despite his giant bulk and strength, he wasn't the one who did the bruising.

The occasion, interestingly enough, was similar to the one at which the last clash with Koussevitsky took place in Paris. It was a rehearsal of "Boris."

At the appointed time everyone was present except Boris. Twenty minutes later he arrived. He was most generous and courtly in his apologies, as Chaliapin well knows how to be. Everyone was happy now, and Boris' music was begun.

Suddenly Chaliapin's mighty voice went silent in the midst of an aria. He turned a far from amiable face on the musicians.

"Imbeciles!" he snapped.

Right on the Nose

Conductor Spadoni's black eyebrows lowered themselves portentously. But Director Polacco is a steely-nerved diplomat, and signalled the conductor to keep the peace. Again the music started. Chaliapin's voice rolled forth again—and stopped abruptly.

"Imbeciles, pigs! 'Artists'—bah! rumbled the mighty bass.

Flop!

Conductor Spadoni hurled the opera score to the floor. He forgot about the diplomatic Polacco. He strode up to the brawny six-foot-two form of Chaliapin.

Swash!

Spadoni, unterrified before the giant, planted his fist on Chaliapin's nose.

"There—no more you say to us 'imbeciles!'" cried Spadoni.

He wheeled and stamped away to one exit, and towering Chaliapin, entirely unused to finding anyone with courage enough to jolt a fist against his nose, stalked in helpless fury for the opposite exit.

Gerry's Right Lands

This was not a precedent, for even the ladies have engaged in physical conflict on the operatic stage.

"Gerry" Farrar, looking charming beyond words, was singing the part of Carmen to Caruso's Don Jose.

Crack!

A sound like the snap of a whip was heard by opera-goers as far back as the first half of the orchestra seats.

Geraldine had slapped Caruso—and such a slap.

Of all people, for this to happen between Farrar and Caruso was inconceivable. For frequenters of the Metropolitan had believed, and had been led to believe by the singers themselves, that never were there happier friends than the favorite stars of the Metropolitan—Caruso, Farrar and their co-star, Scotti.

Geraldine explained the slap by saying that Caruso had overstepped the bounds of stage business by giving her an overfervent hug.

Handel Cause of War

A regular knock-down drag-off fight between two prima donnas took place in the good old days of the 17 hundreds with an opera audience thrown in for good measure.

The great composer, Handel, who had settled in London after a trip from Germany to Italy, was filled with such enthusiasm for Italian opera that he decided to popularize it in London, where acquaintance with it was scanty at that time. His plan was to compose operas in the Italian style, and then assure their best possible presentation by being his own producing director-manager and hiring the finest available talent.

He hired two of the foremost prima donnas of Italy, Cuzzoni and Faustina. Knowing they were very jealous of each other, he arranged his performances so that each in turn could be the supreme star of a whole opera to herself. Then he unwisely grew more ambitious. He decided to put them in one and the same opera. But he thought it was a safe thing to do because both roles were of equal importance.

Tooth and Nail

"London's best"—including the Princess Ann—assembled for the first night of this great work combining the talents of Handel and the two famous prima donnas.

Of course the thrilling moment would be when the action of the opera should bring both singers on the stage at the same time.

Thrilling it certainly was.

No sooner did Cuzzoni and Faustina see each other than they rushed together, scratched, pulled hair and even bit.

The audience started a sympathetic melee, and took sides fiercely. The men drew swords, the women howled and clawed. Princess Ann screamed royal orders unavailingly for many terrible moments.

Of the two doughty prima donnas, Cuzzoni seems to have been the hotter-tempered of the two. Although much applauded in London, she flounced off to Vienna in a huff because Faustina was paid one guinea more a year than she was. Poetic justice overtook her, for she later had to serve time in a debtor's prison in Holland, and in her old age, without friends, she was reduced to making buttons for a bare living.

Handel Nearly Killed

Handel himself engaged in an exciting bodily conflict. Some remarks he made about an opera composed by his old chum, Mattheson, led to an actual sword duel.

Whish—flash!

Mattheson's weapon sped past Handel's guard, straight toward a vital mark.

The life of Handel, the great composer, appeared to be done for.

But a brass button turned the point of the sword.

Handel was spared to write greater music for years afterward. Somehow, the artist with the dramatic spirit is an especially rich source of sparks of war—and in this, dramatic sopranos, dramatic male singers, composers of dramatic music and conductors with dramatic leanings and actors of the speaking stage, all seem to belong to the same guild. Hence it will not be amiss to quote here America's terrible battle kindled by two actors in New York.

Trouble Long a-Brewing

The thing started in London. The greatest actor there at that time, 184-, was the English tragedian, Macready. America's leading actor, Forrest, boldly invaded Macready's territory, and appeared as Macbeth. The audience disliked his impersonation and hissed Forrest blamed this on Macready, whom he accused of plotting it.

A little later the American was in Edinburgh at the same time the Englishman was appearing there as Hamlet. Forrest vengefully stood conspicuously in a theatre box and hissed Macready. The newspapers published exciting accounts of the insult, then letters with charges and counter-charges from both actors were printed, and public bitterness arose on both sides of the Atlantic.

Later Macready visited America and was hissed at a performance in Philadelphia. He blamed Forrest. More newspaper skirmishes and more open letters from both actors appeared.

At last Macready was announced to play "Macbeth" in New York at the Astor Place Opera House. Indications of trouble caused the stationing of police throughout the theatre. A huge crowd packed the house—mostly friendly to the Englishman. But on his appearance, certain spectators gave catcalls, groans and hisses.

Over 50 Killed or Wounded

At the same time, a mob outside the theatre howled continually and tried to break down the doors. At last, cavalry units of the State militia and the National Guard came to disperse the mob. The rioters attacked them with stones, heaped up close at hand because of street repairs. At last the cavalrymen fired, the mob replied with stones, and a small battle was waged with various retreats and rallies of the mob.

In the end, 22 persons were killed and 36 wounded.

Even people inside the theatre were hurt, by stones thrown through the windows. Macready barely escaped with his life, disguising himself and leaving the house with the crowd, instead of the stage door, where the mob was looking for him.

Mary Garden Flares Up

But artistic folk do not always give vent to their temperament by downright physical conflict. They battle frequently—only with words—but such words! Even whole opera companies have engaged in broils of this sort.

Mary Garden has started such battles more than once. One of the most important on her record was the Cavalieri affair, for that was a war that lead to another war.

Oscar Hammerstein gained a great deal of glory for his Manhattan Opera House because of Mary's spectacular performance of certain operas. An inspiration came to him that he could add still more lustre to his productions if he could advertise for one of his stars the soprano who had been called the most beautiful woman in the world—Lina Cavalieri. He began negotiations with the idea of dazzling his public with Cavalieri in the role of Thais.

Promptly came a cablegram from Mary Garden, summering in Europe.

It was Mary's resignation.

"'Thais' is my opera," she stated. "Whatever 'Thais' is in America, I made it, and I cannot remain in your company if any other person is allowed to sing it. Cavalieri excels in Italian roles; I, myself, excel in French parts. Of course, there's no such thing as jealousy in the matter."

Mary's War a Boomerang

Cavalieri's name immediately disappeared from the advance announcements about the new season. Hammerstein's company was thrown into tumult—the French faction against the Italian. Hammerstein's great conductor, Cleofonte Campanini, was drawn into the strife, and as a result tendered his resignation at the end of the season. It was really a wonder that the whole company didn't go on the rocks. The French faction—championing Mary Garden—carried her cause to victory by superior numbers.

But that was not the end.

Some years later, Mary became director of the Chicago Opera. One of the greatest stars of the company was the tenor, Muratore.

And Lina Cavalieri happened to have married him.

When Mary spoke in her capacity as director, Muratore took bitterly conflicting views. Either from that spark, or deliberate propaganda, war broke out in the Chicago Opera. Again it was the French against the Italians—and the Italians were in the majority. Galli-Curci added a quarrel of her own, and plunged in to reinforce the Italians.

At first Mary tried diplomacy.

"Fighting?" she echoed to reporters' queries. "I don't know of any in my company, and I don't think there's going to be any. Still, if they intend to fight, by gosh, I'm no small punkins at it myself, and I'll show 'em some real fighting!"

And yet——.

The war rocked Director Mary Garden on her throne—and rocked her off.

Lina Cavalieri—wife of the rambunctious Muratore, was given credit for a beautifully successful vengeance.

Twice Mary started battles without a single word of spritely Gardenesque comment.

One occasion was Geraldine Farrar's debut as Thais. Just as Mary told Hammerstein, she has long considered Thais a role sacred to her interpreting. Mary bought a ticket for Jerry's debut in the part.

The audience was expecting Jerry to present a thrillingly beautiful picture. She did.

But at the instant she swept upon the stage, Mary Garden, in an orchestra seat far down front, opened a spectacular feather fan of enormous size.

The spell of Farrar's entrance was ruined with the immediate shifting of the audience's attention to Mary Garden.

Again, Mary went to take in Farrar's debut as Zaza, another role very, very dear to the heart of Garden.

Mary seated herself in a box close to the stage. Farrar began.

And Mary Garden just laughed. She laughed and laughed.

The management sent envoys to request her to stop.

No, Jerry and Mary did not love one another after that.

Strauss Not Afraid of Kaiser

Even the ex-Kaiser Wilhelm, in the days of his might and majesty, was "sassed" by a figure of the operatic world—Richard Strauss.

Strauss had just completed his great modernistic opera, "Salome." The Kaiser caused the herr composer to know of his displeasure. His Highness, it was stated, considered the writing of an opera on such a theme as Salome unworthy of Strauss and not conducive to the advancement of pure art.

"I am not going to take lessons from any one," Strauss declared, "no matter how highly placed, unless his inherent knowledge of the subject is superior to my own."

The Kaiser decreed that "Salome" should not be sung in Berlin.

Schumann-Heink Gets Angry

But sharp-tongued though Strauss can be, even to an autocrat, the usually supremely good-natured Schumann-Heink was his Waterloo on one occasion.

Strauss' extraordinary "Elektra" was being rehearsed for its first German production, under the composer's own baton. This was the opera in which W. J. Henderson, as music critic for the New York Sun, said he found "melodies which spit and scratch and claw at one another like enraged panthers." One effect called for beating bass drums with birch rods. It was reported that Conductor Schuch strained his right arm while leading his orchestra through the score. Once he was said to have stopped the singers with the statement to the orchestra: "You will have to do that all over again. I thought I heard a voice."

Mme. Krull started rehearsing as Elektra. Strauss found much fault with her and was very blunt in showing his feelings.

At last he made a face and snapped furiously:

"You must be still more hateful in your acting of that speech."

The star failed to hear. The genial Schumann-Heink heard perfectly and didn't like the way Strauss was behaving himself. She turned to Madame Krull as if to relay Strauss' statement verbatim, and said sweetly:

"The royal general musical director says you must be still more like a colleague in your manner of expression."

May Boston be spared any great calamity over the feud between Chaliapin and Koussevitsky!

Toscanini's Acid Comments

Famous among word-battlers is Conductor Arturo Toscanini. He stabs and slays without mercy, sparing neither youth nor age.

When Sophie Brasiau, of the organ voice, was being treated most kindly and being made a great pet of, because she was the Metropolitan's youngest star, Toscanini refused to pet, and, in fact, bludgeoned her.

At a rehearsal she was trying her level best, in spite of feeling nervous and "green." The conductor made her repeat a phrase, criticised it unmercifully, and made her repeat it many times more. At last he stopped, gave her a fierce look, and cried:

"Signorina, you have no right to be here. The Metropolitan is no place for operatic beginners!"

But Sophie had temperament, too. She rushed off the stage and kept on going until she reached the lobby, where she hid until a search party was organized, and Caruso found her.

A soprano failed to appear at the start of the same rehearsal.

"You are late!" she was finally greeted by Toscanini with a growl.

"I am a star," she replied haughtily. "I come when I please."

"The only stars I recognize," Toscanini snorted, "are those in the heaven, and they are always on time!"

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&D
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

78

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
POST

JUL 6 1924

Why Chaliapin Embraced Koussevi

Previous Temperamental Difficulties of the Famous Russian Singer With the Great Orchestra Leader Reached Climax in Paris the Other Day--"Rows" of the Orchestra

Mary Garden as she looked when making her first appearance in America with Paris' stamp of approval as the foremost exponent of soprano roles in modern French opera. Defending this position from the encroachment of Lina Cavalieri led to two terrific opera house wars. (C) Mishkin Studio.

A French cartoonist's impression of Koussevitsky during his recent concerts in Paris. The Russian's movements while conducting are reported to be altogether different from anything Boston has seen.

At last the feud was over. Koussevitsky and Chaliapin had publicly embraced in Now Chaliapin stepped out on the opera stage to rehearse in his great role of the m ous Czar Boris, under the baton of the reconciled Koussevitsky. The music began and (Upper left) Feodor Chaliapin in street attire. Is he stopping his ears to keep from h mention of Koussevitsky? (Upper right) Serge Koussevitsky as Boston will se His most recent photo. Observe how he seems to be looking at Chaliapin from the of one eye, just as the basso seems to be doing on his side.

Slam!

That's the illustrious Koussevitsky—new conductor of Bos- Symphony Orchestra.

Bang!

There goes Chaliapin—Russian singing-actor lionized re- tedly at Symphony Hall and the Boston Opera House.

What's going to happen when Chaliapin next sings in Bos-

While Koussevitsky reigns as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra?

By R. L. Humphrey

Out from tempestuous Russia, Feodor Chaliapin burst on a Boston Symphony Hall audience three seasons ago, was hailed with thunderous approval, and pronounced a supreme master of interpretative singing.

Why hadn't Boston made his acquaintance sooner, many wondered?

For the world's greatest concert artists always come to Symphony Hall before their fame is very old, and here was this amazing basso, Chaliapin, making his first appearance there, when it was said that for 20 years the Russians had idolized him as their greatest singer.

And if he had stayed away so long, why the sudden decision to come?

went wild over this fine music, usually held sacred to the higher classes. That four months' cruise of Koussevitsky and his orchestra in 1909 left them pleading for more. And they got it. From the following season until the World war Koussevitsky gave yearly concerts to the people along Russia's "father of waters."

Trotsky to the Rescue

Some years before, he and the basso had had a falling-out with much action and thrills. Time had thrown a merciful haze over the incident.

Now this new war. Trotsky himself rushed to the rescue. He seemed an excellent person to take up the matter, because of his vast experience as Soviet minister of war. He had another qualification that seemed still more fitting—he was an "opera hound." But it was that very thing that wrought new havoc in the situation. Trotsky secured Koussevitsky

Would Paris have to forego hearing Chaliapin's extraordinary interpretation of the role of Boris, because of the basso's ruction with the man who was to wield the baton?

Chaliapin went to Paris after the close of the American operatic season. There were expectations of a cyclonic tempest of violent Chaliapin decrial of Koussevitsky's abilities as an operatic conductor.

But people should never count on Chaliapin to do the expected.

What he actually did do was to announce that he and his fellow-countryman, Koussevitsky, were on terms of friendship—and he embraced Koussevitsky publicly in Paris to prove it!

War Again . . .

The date for the first rehearsal of "Boris" came. Koussevitsky took his place as conductor. Chaliapin took his place as leading bass. The music Moussorgsky conceived and Rimsky-Korsakof perfected sounded its setting for the wickedness of Czar Boris. Ex-

Right on the Nose

Conductor Spadoni's black eyebrows lowered themselves portentously. But Director Polacco is a steely-nerved diplomat, and signalled the conductor to keep the peace. Again the music started. Chaliapin's voice rolled forth again—and stopped abruptly.

"Imbeciles, pigs! 'Artists'—bah! rumbled the mighty bass.

Flop!

Conductor Spadoni hurled the opera score to the floor. He forgot about the diplomatic Polacco. He strode up to the brawny six-foot-two form of Chaliapin.

Swash!

Spadoni, unterrified before the giant, planted his fist on Chaliapin's nose.

"There—no more you say to us 'imbeciles!'" cried Spadoni.

He wheeled and stamped away to one exit, and towering Chaliapin, entirely unused to finding anyone with courage enough to jolt a fist against his nose, stalked in helpless fury for the opposite exit.

Tooth and Nail

"London's best"—including the Princess Ann—assembled for the first night of this great work combining the talents of Handel and the two famous prima donnas.

Of course the thrilling moment would be when the action of the opera should bring both singers on the stage at the same time.

Thrilling it certainly was.

No sooner did Cuzzoni and Faustina see each other than they rushed together, scratched, pulled hair and even bit.

The audience started a sympathetic melee, and took sides fiercely. The men drew swords, the women howled and clawed. Princess Ann screamed royal orders unavailingly for many terrible moments.

Of the two doughty prima donnas, Cuzzoni seems to have been the hotter-tempered of the two. Although much applauded in London, she from both actors were printed, an lic bitterness arose on both si the Atlantic.

Later Macready visited Americ was hissed at a performance in delphia. He blamed Forrest. newspaper skirmishes and more letters from both actors appeared

At last Macready was announc play "Macbeth" in New York a Astor Place Opera House. Indic of trouble caused the stationing o lice throughout the theatre. A crowd packed the house—mostly fr ly to the Englishman. But on hi pearance, certain spectators gave calls, groans and hisses.

Over 50 Killed or Wounded

At the same time, a mob outside theatre howled continually and to break down the doors. At last, alry units of the State militia and National Guard came to disperse mob. The rioters attacked them stones, heaped up

liapin Embraced Koussevitsky

ental Difficulties an Singer With Leader Reached Other Day-- estra

New Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra

A French cartoonist's impression of Koussevitsky during his recent concerts in Paris. The Russian's movements while conducting are reported to be altogether different from anything Boston has seen.

Mary Garden as Salome in Richard Strauss' like-named opera, which Kaiser Wilhelm criticised the composer for writing, thus drawing a fearless and blistering reply from Strauss. Mayor Curley forbade Miss Garden to present the role in Boston. (C) Mishkin Studio.

At last the feud was over. Koussevitsky and Chaliapin had publicly embraced in Paris. Now Chaljapin stepped out on the opera stage to rehearse in his great role of the murderous Czar Boris, under the baton of the reconciled Koussevitsky. The music began and then—

(Upper left) Feodor Chaliapin in street attire. Is he stopping his ears to keep from hearing mention of Koussevitsky? (Upper right) Serge Koussevitsky as Boston will see him. His most recent photo. Observe how he seems to be looking at Chaliapin from the corner of one eye, just as the basso seems to be doing on his side.

Would Paris have to forego hearing Chaliapin's extraordinary interpretation of the role of Boris, because of the basso's ruction with the man who was to wield the baton?

Chaliapin went to Paris after the close of the American operatic season. There were expectations of a cyclonic tempest of violent Chaliapin decrial of Koussevitsky's abilities as an operatic conductor.

But people should never count on Chaliapin to do the expected.

What he actually did do was to announce that he and his fellow-countryman, Koussevitsky, were on terms of friendship—and he embraced Koussevitsky publicly in Paris to prove it!

War Again . . .

The date for the first rehearsal of "Boris" came. Koussevitsky took his place as conductor. Chaliapin took his place as leading bass. The music Moussorgsky conceived and

Right on the Nose

Conductor Spadoni's black eyebrows lowered themselves portentously. But Director Polacco is a steely-nerved diplomat, and signalled the conductor to keep the peace. Again the music started. Chaliapin's voice rolled forth again—and stopped abruptly.

"Imbeciles, pigs! 'Artists'—bah!" rumbled the mighty bass.

Flop!

Conductor Spadoni hurled the opera score to the floor. He forgot about the diplomatic Polacco. He strode up to the brawny six-foot-two form of Chaliapin.

Swash!

Spadoni, unterrified before the giant, planted his fist on Chaliapin's nose.

"There—no more you say to us 'imbeciles!'" cried Spadoni.

He wheeled and stamped away to one exit, and towering Chaliapin, entirely unused to finding anyone with courage enough to

Tooth and Nail

"London's best"—including the Princess Ann—assembled for the first night of this great work combining the talents of Handel and the two famous prima donnas.

Of course the thrilling moment would be when the action of the opera should bring both singers on the stage at the same time.

Thrilling it certainly was.

No sooner did Cuzzoni and Faustina see each other than they rushed together, scratched, pulled hair and even bit.

The audience started a sympathetic melee, and took sides fiercely. The men drew swords, the women howled and clawed. Princess Ann screamed royal orders unavailingly for many terrible moments.

from both actors were printed, and public bitterness arose on both sides of the Atlantic.

Later Macready visited America and was hissed at a performance in Philadelphia. He blamed Forrest. More newspaper skirmishes and more open letters from both actors appeared.

At last Macready was announced to play "Macbeth" in New York at the Astor Place Opera House. Indications of trouble caused the stationing of police throughout the theatre. A huge crowd packed the house—mostly friendly to the Englishman. But on his appearance, certain spectators gave catcalls, groans and hisses.

Over 50 Killed or Wounded

At the same time, a mob outside the theatre howled continually and tried to break down the doors. At last

Italian. Hammerstein's great conductor, Cleofonte Campanini, was drawn into the strife, and as a result tendered his resignation at the end of the season. It was really a wonder that the whole company didn't go on the rocks. The French faction—championing Mary Garden—carried her cause to victory by superior numbers.

But that was not the end.

Some years later, Mary became director of the Chicago Opera. One of the greatest stars of the company was the tenor, Muratore.

And Lina Cavalieri happened to have married him.

When Mary spoke in her capacity as director, Muratore took bitterly conflicting views. Either from that spark, or deliberate propaganda, war broke out in the Chicago Opera. Again it was the French against the Italians—and the Italians were in the majority. Galli-Curci added a quarrel of her own, and plunged in to reinforce the Italians.

At first Mary tried diplomacy.

"Fighting?" she echoed to reporters' queries. "I don't know of any in my company, and I don't think there's going to be any. Still, if they intend to fight, by gosh, I'm no small punkins at it myself, and I'll show 'em some real fighting!"

And yet——.

The war rocked Director Mary Garden on her throne—and rocked her off.

Lina Cavalieri—wife of the rambunctious Muratore, was given credit for a beautifully successful vengeance.

Twice Mary started battles without a single word of spritely Gardenesque comment.

One occasion was Geraldine Farrar's debut as Thais. Just as

Strauss Not Afraid of Kaiser

Even the ex-Kaiser Wilhelm, in the days of his might and majesty, was "sassed" by a figure of the operatic world—Richard Strauss.

Strauss had just completed his great modernistic opera, "Salome." The Kaiser caused the herr composer to know of his displeasure. His Highness, it was stated, considered the writing of an opera on such a theme as Salome unworthy of Strauss and not conducive to the advancement of pure art.

"I am not going to take lessons from any one," Strauss declared, "no matter how highly placed, unless his inherent knowledge of the subject is superior to my own."

The Kaiser decreed that "Salome" should not be sung in Berlin.

Schumann-Heink Gets Angry

But sharp-tongued though Strauss can be, even to an autocrat, the usually supremely good-natured Schumann-Heink was his Waterloo on one occasion.

Strauss' extraordinary "Elektra" was being rehearsed for its first German production, under the composer's own baton. This was the opera in which W. J. Henderson, as music critic for the New York Sun, said he found "melodies which spit and scratch and claw at one another like enraged panthers." One effect called for beating bass drums with birch rods. It was reported that Conductor

Mary Garden as she looked when making her first appearance in America with Paris' stamp of approval as the foremost exponent of soprano roles in modern French opera. Defending this position from the encroachment of Lina Cavalieri led to two terrific opera house wars. (C) Mishkin Studio.

A French cartoonist's impression of Koussevitsky during his recent concerts in Paris. The Russian's movements while conducting are reported to be altogether different from anything Boston has seen.

At last the feud was over. Koussevitsky and Chaliapin had publicly embrace Now Chaliapin stepped out on the opera stage to rehearse in his great role of t ous Czar Boris, under the baton of the reconciled Koussevitsky. The music began (Upper left) Feodor Chaliapin in street attire. Is he stopping his ears to keep fr mention of Koussevitsky? (Upper right) Serge Koussevitsky as Boston will His most recent photo. Observe how he seems to be looking at Chaliapin from of one eye, just as the basso seems to be doing on his side.

Slam!

That's the illustrious Koussevitsky—new conductor of Bos- Symphony Orchestra.

Bang!

There goes Chaliapin—Russian singing-actor lionized re- tedly at Symphony Hall and the Boston Opera House.

What's going to happen when Chaliapin next sings in Bos-

While Koussevitsky reigns as conductor of the Symphony Orchestra?

By R. L. Humphrey

Out from tempestuous Russia, Feodor Chaliapin burst on a Boston Symphony Hall audience three seasons ago, was hailed with thunderous approval, and pronounced a supreme master of interpretative singing.

Why hadn't Boston made his acquaintance sooner, many wondered?

For the world's greatest concert artists always come to Symphony Hall before their fame is very old, and here was this amazing basso, Chaliapin, making his first appearance there, when it was said that for 20 years the Russians had idolized him as their greatest singer.

And if he had stayed away so long, why the sudden decision to come?

For three years the question has gone begging.

Only now comes the answer, and it is—

Koussevitsky.

Basso Honored Above Conductor

It is said now that Europe—let alone Russia—was not big enough to hold the basso and Koussevitsky at the same time.

So to remedy the situation, Chaliapin decided on a drastic operation. tore himself away from Russia, Europe and Koussevitsky, and attached himself to the American concert and operatic stage.

According to the latest report, the excitements of the Soviet regime were made gay with extra sparks and racket by a head-on collision of violent dislike between Chaliapin and Koussevitsky.

It came when the genius of the basso was recognized with a signal honor by the Red powers. He was made Singer Extraordinary to the Soviet Republic. This meant that he was to journey up and down the land and educate the great common people of Russia by causing them, under official proclamation, to assemble and listen to the art of song as exemplified by him.

It so happened that Koussevitsky, without waiting for the revolution and the promptings of the Soviet government, already had ministered heavily to the musical education of the Russian populace.

With perfect idealism, back in the days of the Czar, he had, on his own initiative, hired a steamer and an orchestra, and had travelled along the Volga, giving free concerts to the people of the cities and towns along the river. The common people went wild over this fine music, usually held sacred to the higher classes. That four months' cruise of Koussevitsky and his orchestra in 1909 left them pleading for more. And they got it. From the following season until the World war Koussevitsky gave yearly concerts to the people along Russia's "father of waters."

Trotsky to the Rescue

Some years before, he and the basso had had a falling-out with much action and thrills. Time had thrown a merciful haze over the incident.

Now this new war. Trotsky himself rushed to the rescue. He seemed an excellent person to take up the matter, because of his vast experience as Soviet minister of war. He had another qualification that seemed still more fitting—he was an "opera hound." But it was that very thing that wrought new havoc in the situation.

Trotsky secured Koussevitsky's appointment as "commisar of opera to the Soviet Republic."

Confusion worse confounded!

Of course Koussevitsky was a magnificent contribution to Russian opera. His fame as an orchestral conductor is largely due to dramatic fervor which imparts the noblest virtues of dramatic quality to even the driest music.

Yes—but Chaliapin over a course of some years had drawn around himself the mantle of the great god of opera in Russia. With that commanding way of his he had kicked over operatic traditions left and right, in his individual work as a singing-actor. He substituted real acting for the customary inanities and appeared in perfect marvels of makeup—both efforts winning him frenzied adulation from the Russian opera public. With fame added to his natural independence and assertiveness, Chaliapin became intrenched in a position so strong that he could dictate policies and even talk back to operatic conductors or actually make them alter their ideas to suit him.

So, how was it possible for Chaliapin to be Chaliapin, if his old rival Koussevitsky was to be Soviet dictator of opera?

And that, it is now reported, is why Chaliapin tore himself from his adoring Russian public, and suddenly turned up in Boston Symphony Hall, after remaining haughtily aloof for 20 years.

Enemies Embrace

For three seasons the great basso won tremendous acclaim in Boston, New York and Chicago, both as concert singer and as singing-actor with the forces of the Metropolitan Opera and the Chicago Opera.

Meantime Koussevitsky had been hailed in Paris, London, Edinburgh and Madrid as one of the greatest of all geniuses among orchestral conductors. It was announced that this spring he would lead a performance of the great Russian opera, "Boris Godounof," at the Paris opera. That is an opera which Chaliapin made famous, and which

Would Paris have to forego hearing Chaliapin's extraordinary interpretation of the role of Boris, because of the basso's ruction with the man who was to wield the baton?

Chaliapin went to Paris after the close of the American operatic season. There were expectations of a cyclonic tempest of violent Chaliapin decrial of Koussevitsky's abilities as an operatic conductor.

But people should never count on Chaliapin to do the expected.

What he actually did do was to announce that he and his fellow-countryman, Koussevitsky, were on terms of friendship—and he embraced Koussevitsky publicly in Paris to prove it!

War Again . . .

The date for the first rehearsal of "Boris" came. Koussevitsky took his place as conductor. Chaliapin took his place as leading bass. The music Moussorgsky conceived and Rimsky-Korsakof perfected sounded its setting for the wickedness of Czar Boris. Expectation was at top pitch to hear the spectacular results of the fusion of the art of Chaliapin with that of Koussevitsky.

Snap!

The bonds of friendship flew asunder, and the old feud was on again, worse than before.

Details as to just what happened are missing, but the long and short of that memorable rehearsal was this:

Koussevitsky proclaimed over Paris that never again would he conduct in the same opera house with Chaliapin. In fact, he wouldn't even conduct in the same city with him!

What's going to happen when Chaliapin makes his now expected annual concert visit to Symphony Hall, and his possible operatic appearance at the Opera House after Koussevitsky begins leading the Boston Symphony orchestra in the fall?

Or will the basso choose to ignore Symphony Hall, and make both concert and operatic appearances at the Opera House?

It is to be hoped that Boston will be spared actual physical conflict in this case, for such conflict has actually taken place already in New York and Chicago, because of the temperaments of opera stars.

Again Boris Spells Trouble

In fact, Chaliapin himself figured in the Chicago melee—and despite his giant bulk and strength, he wasn't the one who did the bruising.

The occasion, interestingly enough, was similar to the one at which the last clash with Koussevitsky took place in Paris. It was a rehearsal of "Boris."

At the appointed time everyone was present except Boris. Twenty minutes later he arrived. He was most generous and courtly in his apologies, as Chaliapin well knows how to be. Everyone was happy now, and Boris' music was begun.

Suddenly Chaliapin's mighty voice went silent in the midst of an aria. He turned a far from amiable face on the musicians.

"Imbeciles!" he snapped.

Right on the Nose

Conductor Spadoni's black eyebrows lowered themselves portentously. But Director Polacco is a steely-nerved diplomat, and signalled the conductor to keep the peace. Again the music started. Chaliapin's voice rolled forth again—and stopped abruptly.

"Imbeciles, pigs! 'Artists'—bah! rumbled the mighty bass.

Flop!

Conductor Spadoni hurled the opera score to the floor. He forgot about the diplomatic Polacco. He strode up to the brawny six-foot-two form of Chaliapin.

Swash!

Spadoni, unterrified before the giant, planted his fist on Chaliapin's nose.

"There—no more you say to us 'imbeciles!' " cried Spadoni.

He wheeled and stamped away to one exit, and towering Chaliapin, entirely unused to finding anyone with courage enough to jolt a fist against his nose, stalked in helpless fury for the opposite exit.

Gerry's Right Lands

This was not a precedent, for even the ladies have engaged in physical conflict on the operatic stage.

"Gerry" Farrar, looking charming beyond words, was singing the part of Carmen to Caruso's Don Jose.

Crack!

A sound like the snap of a whip was heard by opera-goers as far back as the first half of the orchestra seats.

Geraldine had slapped Caruso—and such a slap.

Of all people, for this to happen between Farrar and Caruso was inconceivable. For frequenters of the Metropolitan had believed, and had been led to believe by the singers themselves, that never were there happier friends than the favorite stars of the Metropolitan—Caruso, Farrar and their co-star, Scotti.

Geraldine explained the slap by saying that Caruso had overstepped the bounds of stage business by giving her an overfervent hug.

Handel Cause of War

A regular knock-down drag off fight between two prima donnas took place in the good old days of the 17 hundreds with an opera audience thrown in for good measure.

The great composer, Handel, who had settled in London after a trip from Germany to Italy, was filled with such enthusiasm for Italian opera that he decided to popularize it in London, where acquaintance with it was scanty at that time. His plan was to compose operas in the Italian style, and then assure their best possible presentation by being his own producing director-manager and hiring the finest available talent.

He hired two of the foremost prima donnas of Italy, Cuzzoni and Faustina. Knowing they were very jealous of each other, he arranged his performances so that each in turn could be the supreme star of a whole opera to herself. Then he unwisely grew more ambitious. He decided to put them in one and the same opera. But he thought it was a safe thing to do because both roles were of equal importance.

Tooth and Nail

"London's best"—including the Princess Ann—assembled for the first night of this great work combining the talents of Handel and the two famous prima donnas.

Of course the thrilling moment would be when the action of the opera should bring both singers on the stage at the same time.

Thrilling it certainly was.

No sooner did Cuzzoni and Faustina see each other than they rushed together, scratched, pulled hair and even bit.

The audience started a sympathetic melee, and took sides fiercely. The men drew swords, the women howled and clawed. Princess Ann screamed royal orders unavailingly for many terrible moments.

Of the two doughty prima donnas, Cuzzoni seems to have been the hottempered of the two. Although much applauded in London, she flounced off to Vienna in a huff because Faustina was paid one guinea more a year than she was. Poetic justice overtook her, for she later had to serve time in a debtor's prison in Holland, and in her old age, without friends, she was reduced to making buttons for a bare living.

Handel Nearly Killed

Handel himself engaged in an exciting bodily conflict. Some remarks he made about an opera composed by his old chum, Mattheson, led to an actual sword duel.

Whish—flash!

Mattheson's weapon sped past Handel's guard, straight toward a vital mark.

The life of Handel, the great composer, appeared to be done for.

But a brass button turned the point of the sword.

Handel was spared to write greater music for years afterward. Somehow, the artist with the dramatic spirit is an especially rich source of sparks of war—and in this, dramatic sopranos, dramatic male singers, composers of dramatic music and conductors with dramatic leanings and actors of the speaking stage, all seem to belong to the same guild. Hence it will not be amiss to quote here America's terrible battle kindled by two actors in New York.

Trouble Long a-Brewing

The thing started in London. The greatest actor there at that time, 1846, was the English tragedian, Macready. America's leading actor, Forrest, boldly invaded Macready's territory, and appeared as Macbeth. The audience disliked his impersonation and hissed. Forrest blamed this on Macready, whom he accused of plotting it.

A little later the American was in Edinburgh at the same time the Englishman was appearing there as Hamlet. Forrest vengefully stood conspicuously in a theatre box and hissed Macready. The newspapers published exciting accounts of the insult, then letters with charges and counter-charges from both actors were printed lic bitterness arose on both the Atlantic.

Later Macready visited Am was hissed at a performance delphia. He blamed Forre newspaper skirmishes and m letters from both actors appea

At last Macready was anno play "Macbeth" in New Yor Astor Place. Opera House. In of trouble caused the stationin lice throughout the theatre. crowd packed the house—mostly ly to the Englishman. But on pearance, certain spectators ga calls, groans and hisses.

Over 50 Killed or Wound

At the same time, a mob outs theatre howled continually and to break down the doors. At las alry units of the State militia a National Guard came to dispers mob. The rioters attacked them stones, heaped up close at hand cause of street repairs. At last cavalrymen fired, the mob replied stones, and a small battle was w with various retreats and rallies o mob.

In the end, 22 persons were killed 36 wounded.

Even people inside the theatre hurt, by stones thrown through the dows. Macready barely escaped his life, disguising himself and leav the house with the crowd, instead the stage door, where the mob looking for him.

Mary Garden Flares Up

But artistic folk do not always g vent to their temperament by dow right physical conflict. They battle f quently only with words—but su words! Even whole opera compani have engaged in broils of this sort.

Mary Garden has started such ba ties more than once. One of the mo important on her record was the Cav lieri affair, for that was a war tha lead to another war.

Oscar Hammerstein gained a grea deal of glory for his Manhattan Oper House because of Mary's spectacula performance of certain operas. An in spiration came to him that he could ad still more lustre to his productions f he could advertise for one of his stars the soprano who had been called the most beautiful woman in the world—Lina Cavalieri. He began negotiations with the idea of dazzling his public with Cavalieri in the role of Thais.

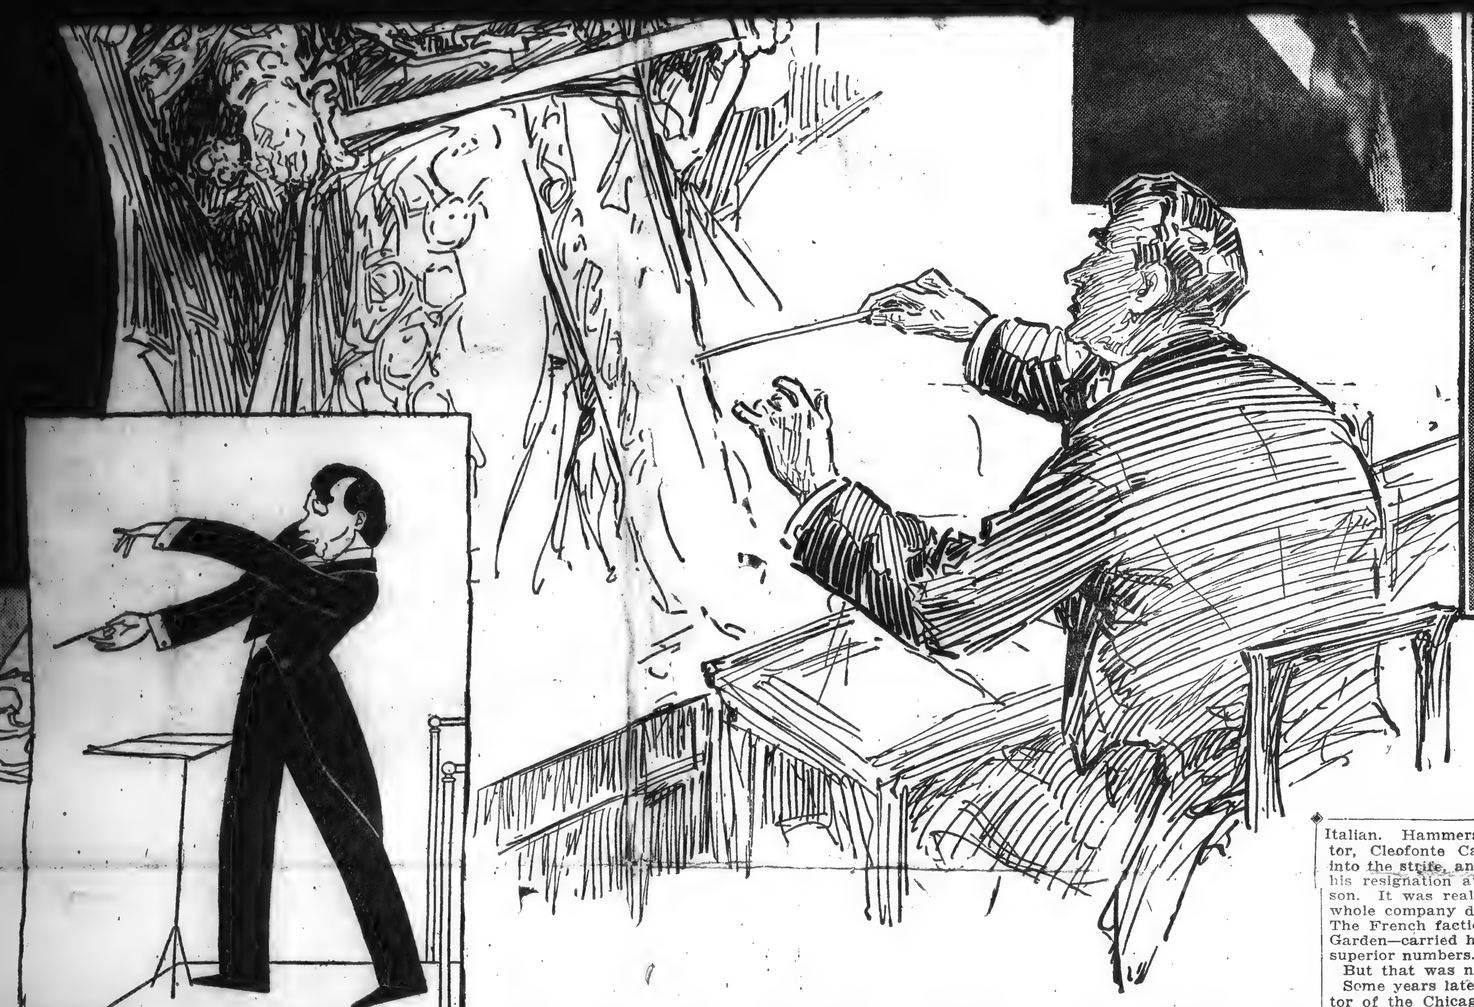
Promptly came a cablegram from Mary Garden, summering in Europe.

It was Mary's resignation.

" 'Thais' is my opera," she stated. "Whatever 'Thais' is in America, I made it, and I cannot remain in your company if any other person is allowed to sing it. Cavalieri excels in Italian roles; I, myself, excel in French parts. Of course, there's no such thing as jealousy in the matter."

Mary's War a Boomerang

Cavalieri's name immediately disappeared from the advance announcements about the new season. Hammerstein's company was thrown into tumult—the French faction against the



A French cartoonist's impression of Koussevitsky during his recent concerts in Paris. The Russian's movements while conducting are reported to be altogether different from anything Boston has seen.

Mary Garden as Salome in Richard Strauss' likenamed opera, which Kaiser Wilhelm criticised the composer for writing, thus drawing a fearless and blistering reply from Strauss. Mayor Curley forbade Miss Garden to present the role in Boston. (C) Mishkin Studio.

At last the feud was over. Koussevitsky and Chaliapin had publicly embraced in Paris. Now Chaliapin stepped out on the opera stage to rehearse in his great role of the murderous Czar Boris, under the baton of the reconciled Koussevitsky. The music began and then—

(Upper left) Feodor Chaliapin in street attire. Is he stopping his ears to keep from hearing mention of Koussevitsky? (Upper right) Serge Koussevitsky as Boston will see him. His most recent photo. Observe how he seems to be looking at Chaliapin from the corner of one eye, just as the basso seems to be doing on his side.

Would Paris have to forego hearing Chaliapin's extraordinary interpretation of the role of Boris, because of the basso's ruction with the man who was to wield the baton?

Chaliapin went to Paris after the close of the American operatic season. There were expectations of a cyclonic tempest of violent Chaliapin decrial of Koussevitsky's abilities as an operatic conductor.

But people should never count on Chaliapin to do the expected.

What he actually did do was to announce that he and his fellow-countryman, Koussevitsky, were on terms of friendship—and he embraced Koussevitsky publicly in Paris to prove it!

War Again . . .

The date for the first rehearsal of "Boris" came. Koussevitsky took his place as conductor. Chaliapin took his place as leading bass. The music Moussorgsky conceived and Rimsky-Korsakof perfected sounded its setting for the wickedness of Czar Boris. Expectation was at top pitch to hear the spectacular results of the fusion of the art of Chaliapin with that of Koussevitsky.

Snap!

The bonds of friendship flew asunder, and the old feud was on again, worse than before.

Details as to just what happened are missing, but the long and short of that memorable rehearsal was this:

Koussevitsky proclaimed over Paris that never again would he conduct in the same opera house with Chaliapin. In fact, he wouldn't even conduct in the same city with him!

What's going to happen when Chaliapin makes his now expected annual concert visit to Symphony Hall, and his possible operatic appearance at the Opera House after Koussevitsky begins leading the Boston Symphony orchestra in the fall?

Or will the basso choose to ignore Symphony Hall, and make both concert and operatic appearances at the Opera House?

It is to be hoped that Boston will be spared actual physical conflict in this case, for such conflict has actually taken place already in New York and Chicago, because of the temperaments of opera stars.

Again Boris Spells Trouble

In fact, Chaliapin himself figured in the Chicago melee—and despite his giant bulk and strength, he wasn't the one who did the bruising.

The occasion, interestingly enough, was similar to the one at which the last clash with Koussevitsky took place in Paris. It was a rehearsal of "Boris."

At the appointed time everyone was present except Boris. Twenty minutes later he arrived. He was most generous and courtly in his apologies, as Chaliapin well knows how to be. Everyone was happy now, and Boris' music was begun.

Suddenly Chaliapin's mighty voice went silent in the midst of an aria. He turned a far from amiable face on the musicians.

"Imbeciles!" he snapped.

Right on the Nose

Conductor Spadoni's black eyebrows lowered themselves portentously. But Director Polacco is a steely-nerved diplomat, and signalled the conductor to keep the peace. Again the music started. Chaliapin's voice rolled forth again—and stopped abruptly.

"Imbeciles, pigs! 'Artists'—bah! rumbled the mighty bass.

Flop!

Conductor Spadoni hurled the opera score to the floor. He forgot about the diplomatic Polacco. He strode up to the brawny six-foot-two form of Chaliapin.

Swash!

Spadoni, unterrified before the giant, planted his fist on Chaliapin's nose.

"There—no more you say to us 'imbeciles!' " cried Spadoni.

He wheeled and stamped away to one exit, and towering Chaliapin, entirely unused to finding anyone with courage enough to jolt a fist against his nose, stalked in helpless fury for the opposite exit.

Gerry's Right Lands

This was not a precedent, for even the ladies have engaged in physical conflict on the operatic stage.

"Gerry" Farrar, looking charming beyond words, was singing the part of Carmen to Caruso's Don Jose.

Crack!

A sound like the snap of a whip was heard by opera-goers as far back as the first half of the orchestra seats.

Geraldine had slapped Caruso—and such a slap.

Of all people, for this to happen between Farrar and Caruso was inconceivable. For frequenters of the Metropolitan had believed, and had been led to believe by the singers themselves, that never were there happier friends than the favorite stars of the Metropolitan—Caruso, Farrar and their co-star, Scotti.

Geraldine explained the slap by saying that Caruso had overstepped the bounds of stage business by giving her an overfervent hug.

Handel Cause of War

A regular knock-down drag off fight between two prima donnas took place in the good old days of the 17 hundreds with an opera audience thrown in for good measure.

The great composer, Handel, who had settled in London after a trip from Germany to Italy, was filled with such enthusiasm for Italian opera that he decided to popularize it in London, where acquaintance with it was scanty at that time. His plan was to compose operas in the Italian style, and then assure their best possible presentation by being his own producing director-manager and hiring the finest available talent.

He hired two of the foremost prima donnas of Italy, Cuzzoni and Faustina. Knowing they were very jealous of each other, he arranged his performances so that each in turn could be the supreme star of a whole opera to herself. Then he unwisely grew more ambitious. He decided to put them in one and the same opera. But he thought it was a safe thing to do because both roles were of equal importance.

Tooth and Nail

"London's best"—including the Princess Ann—assembled for the first night of this great work combining the talents of Handel and the two famous prima donnas.

Of course the thrilling moment would be when the action of the opera should bring both singers on the stage at the same time.

Thrilling it certainly was.

No sooner did Cuzzoni and Faustina see each other than they rushed together, scratched, pulled hair and even bit.

The audience started a sympathetic melee, and took sides fiercely. The men drew swords, the women howled and clawed. Princess Ann screamed royal orders unavailingly for many terrible moments.

Of the two doughty prima donnas, Cuzzoni seems to have been the hottertempered of the two. Although much applauded in London, she flounced off to Vienna in a huff because Faustina was paid one guinea more a year than she was. Poetic justice overtook her, for she later had to serve time in a debtor's prison in Holland, and in her old age, without friends, she was reduced to making buttons for a bare living.

Handel Nearly Killed

Handel himself engaged in an exciting bodily conflict. Some remarks he made about an opera composed by his old chum, Mattheson, led to an actual sword duel.

Whish—flash!

Mattheson's weapon sped past Handel's guard, straight toward a vital mark.

The life of Handel, the great composer, appeared to be done for.

But a brass button turned the point of the sword.

Handel was spared to write greater music for years afterward. Somehow, the artist with the dramatic spirit is an especially rich source of sparks of war—and in this, dramatic sopranos, dramatic male singers, composers of dramatic music and conductors with dramatic leanings and actors of the speaking stage, all seem to belong to the same guild. Hence it will not be amiss to quote here America's terrible battle kindled by two actors in New York.

Trouble Long a-Brewing

The thing started in London. The greatest actor there at that time, 1849, was the English tragedian, Macready. America's leading actor, Forrest, boldly invaded Macready's territory, and appeared as Macbeth. The audience disliked his impersonation and hissed. Forrest blamed this on Macready, whom he accused of plotting it.

A little later the American was in Edinburgh at the same time the Englishman was appearing there as Hamlet. Forrest vengefully stood conspicuously in a theatre box and hissed Macready. The newspapers published exciting accounts of the insult, then letters with charges and counter-charges from both actors were printed, and public bitterness arose on both sides of the Atlantic.

Later Macready visited America and was hissed at a performance in Philadelphia. He blamed Forrest. More newspaper skirmishes and more open letters from both actors appeared.

At last Macready was announced to play "Macbeth" in New York at the Astor Place Opera House. Indications of trouble caused the stationing of police throughout the theatre. A huge crowd packed the house—mostly friendly to the Englishman. But on his appearance, certain spectators gave catcalls, groans and hisses.

Over 50 Killed or Wounded

At the same time, a mob outside the theatre howled continually and tried to break down the doors. At last, cavalry units of the State militia and the National Guard came to disperse the mob. The rioters attacked them with stones, heaped up close at hand because of street repairs. At last the cavalrymen fired, the mob replied with stones, and a small battle was waged with various retreats and rallies of the mob.

In the end, 22 persons were killed and 36 wounded.

Even people inside the theatre were hurt, by stones thrown through the windows. Macready barely escaped with his life, disguising himself and leaving the house with the crowd, instead of the stage door, where the mob was looking for him.

Mary Garden Flares Up

But artistic folk do not always give vent to their temperament by downright physical conflict. They battle frequently only with words—but such words! Even whole opera companies have engaged in broils of this sort.

Mary Garden has started such battles more than once. One of the most important on her record was the Cavalieri affair, for that was a war that lead to another war.

Oscar Hammerstein gained a great deal of glory for his Manhattan Opera House because of Mary's spectacular performance of certain operas. An inspiration came to him that he could add still more lustre to his productions if he could advertise for one of his stars the soprano who had been called the most beautiful woman in the world—Lina Cavalieri. He began negotiations with the idea of dazzling his public with Cavalieri in the role of Thais.

Promptly came a cablegram from Mary Garden, summering in Europe.

It was Mary's resignation.

"'Thais' is my opera," she stated. "Whatever 'Thais' is in America, I made it, and I cannot remain in your company if any other person is allowed to sing it. Cavalieri excels in Italian roles; I, myself, excel in French parts. Of course, there's no such thing as jealousy in the matter."

Mary's War a Boomerang

Cavalieri's name immediately disappeared from the advance announcements about the new season. Hammerstein's company was thrown into tumult—the French faction against the Italian. Hammerstein's great conductor, Cleofonte Campanini, was drawn into the strife, and as a result tendered his resignation at the end of the season. It was really a wonder that the whole company didn't go on the rocks. The French faction—championing Mary Garden—carried her cause to victory by superior numbers.

But that was not the end.

Some years later, Mary became director of the Chicago Opera. One of the greatest stars of the company was the tenor, Muratore.

And Lina Cavalieri happened to have married him.

When Mary spoke in her capacity as director, Muratore took bitterly conflicting views. Either from that spark, or deliberate propaganda, war broke out in the Chicago Opera. Again it was the French against the Italians—and the Italians were in the majority. Galli-Curci added a quarrel of her own, and plunged in to reinforce the Italians.

At first Mary tried diplomacy.

"Fighting?" she echoed to reporters' queries. "I don't know of any in my company, and I don't think there's going to be any. Still, if they intend to fight, by gosh, I'm no small punkins at it myself, and I'll show 'em some real fighting!"

And yet——.

The war rocked Director Mary Garden on her throne—and rocked her off.

Lina Cavalieri—wife of the rambunctious Muratore, was given credit for a beautifully successful vengeance.

Twice Mary started battles without a single word of spritely Gardenesque comment.

One occasion was Geraldine Farrar's debut as Thais. Just as Mary told Hammerstein, she has long considered Thais a role sacred to her interpretation. Mary bought a ticket for Jerry's debut in the part.

The audience was expecting Jerry to present a thrillingly beautiful picture. She did.

But at the instant she swept upon the stage, Mary Garden, in an orchestra seat far down front, opened a spectacular feather fan of enormous size.

The spell of Farrar's entrance was ruined with the immediate shifting of the audience's attention to Mary Garden.

Again, Mary went to take in Farrar's debut as Zaza, another role very, very dear to the heart of Garden.

Mary seated herself in a box close to the stage. Farrar began.

And Mary Garden just laughed. She laughed and laughed.

The management sent envoys to request her to stop.

No, Jerry and Mary did not love one another after that.

Toscanini's Acid Comments

Famous among word-battlers is Conductor Arturo Toscanini. He stabs and slays without mercy, sparing neither youth nor age.

When Sophie Braslau, of the organ voice, was being treated most kindly, and being made a great pet of, because she was the Metropolitan's youngest star, Toscanini refused to pet, and, in fact, bludgeoned her.

At a rehearsal she was trying her level best, in spite of feeling nervous and "green." The conductor made her repeat a phrase, criticised it unmercifully, and made her repeat it many times more. At last he stopped, gave her a fierce look, and cried:

"Signorina, you have no right to be here. The Metropolitan is no place for operatic beginners!"

But Sophie had temperament, too. She rushed off the stage and kept on going until she reached the lobby, where she hid until a search party was organized, and Caruso found her.

A soprano failed to appear at the start of the same rehearsal.

"You are late!" she was finally greeted by Toscanini with a growl.

"I am a star," she replied haughtily. "I come when I please."

"The only stars I recognize," Toscanini snorted, "are those in the heavens, and they are always on time!"

Strauss Not Afraid of Kaiser

Even the ex-Kaiser Wilhelm, in the days of his might and majesty, was "sassed" by a figure of the operatic world—Richard Strauss.

Strauss had just completed his great modernistic opera, "Salome." The Kaiser caused the herr composer to know of his displeasure. His Highness, it was stated, considered the writing of an opera on such a theme as Salome unworthy of Strauss and not conducive to the advancement of pure art.

"I am not going to take lessons from any one," Strauss declared, "no matter how highly placed, unless his inherent knowledge of the subject is superior to my own."

The Kaiser decreed that "Salome" should not be sung in Berlin.

Schumann-Heink Gets Angry

But sharp-tongued though Strauss can be, even to an autocrat, the usually supremely good-natured Schumann-Heink was his Waterloo on one occasion.

Strauss' extraordinary "Elektra" was being rehearsed for its first German production, under the composer's own baton. This was the opera in which W. J. Henderson, as music critic for the New York Sun, said he found "melodies which spit and scratch and claw at one another like enraged panthers." One effect called for beating bass drums with birch rods. It was reported that Conductor Schuch strained his right arm while leading his orchestra through the score. Once he was said to have stopped the singers with the statement to the orchestra: "You will have to do that all over again. I thought I heard a voice."

Mme. Krull started rehearsing as Elektra. Strauss found much fault with her and was very blunt in showing his feelings.

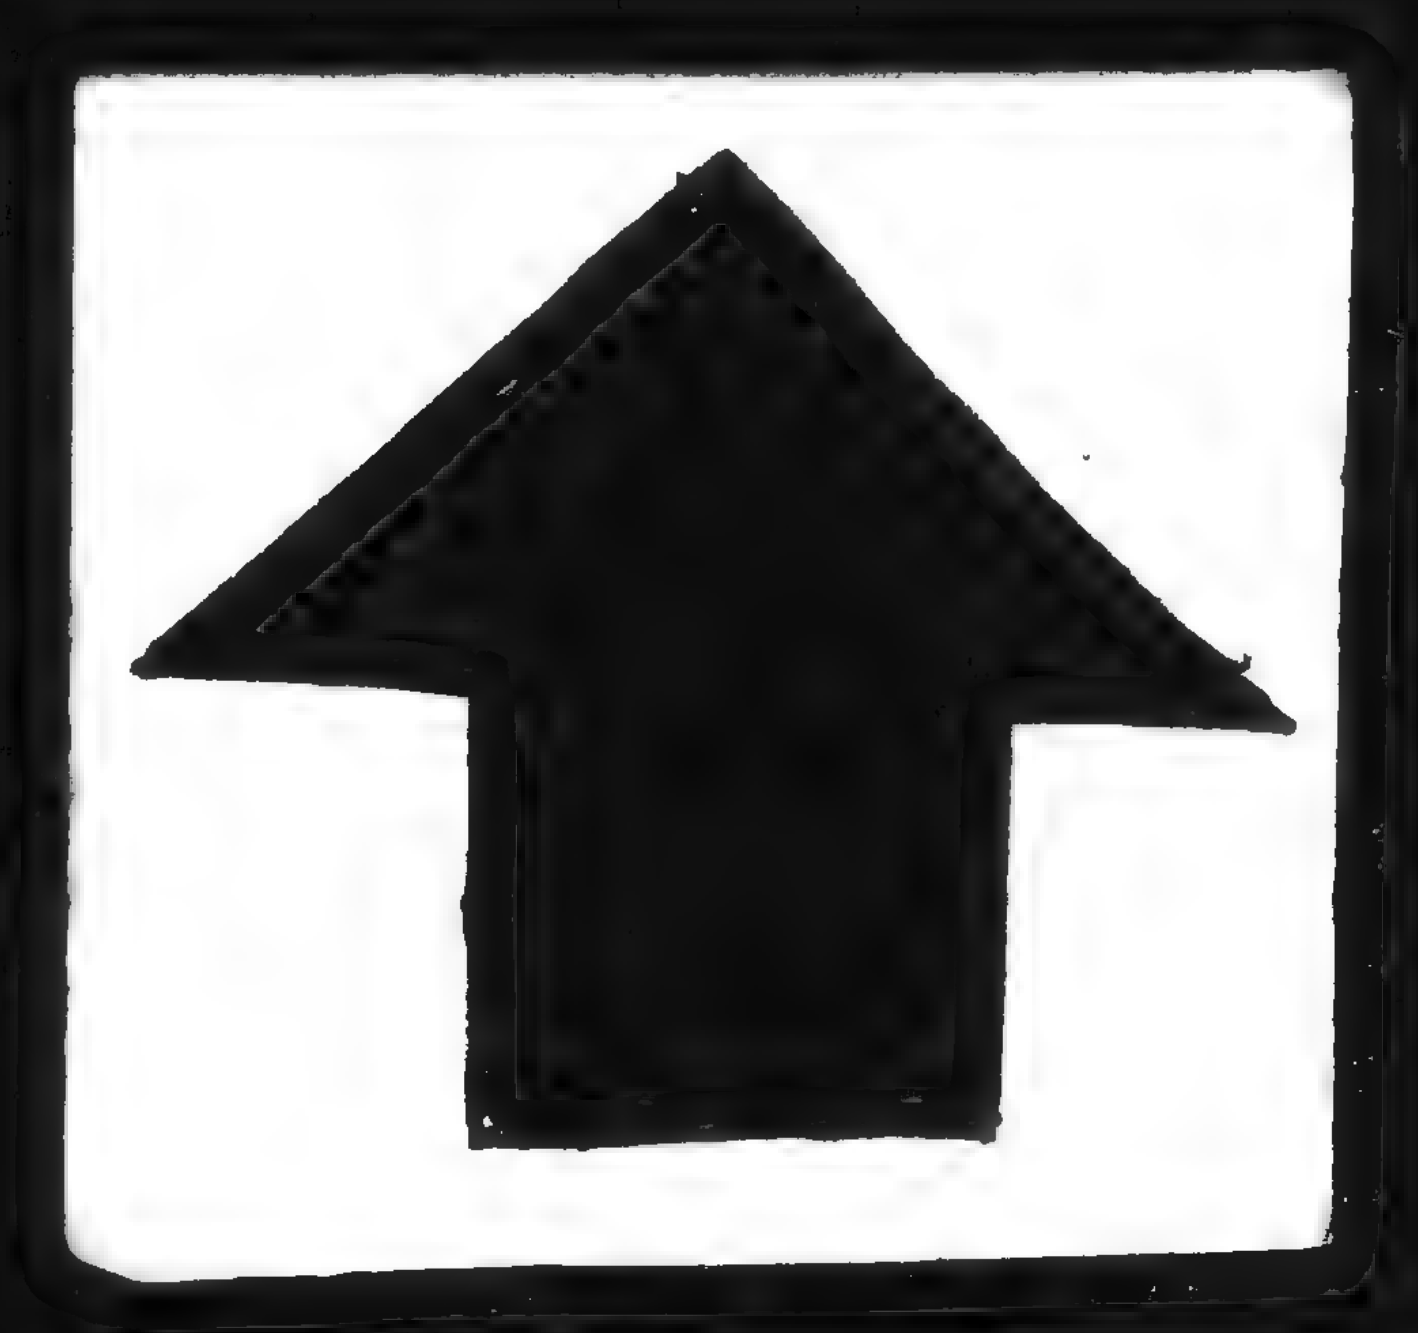
At last he made a face and snapped furiously:

"You must be still more hateful in your acting of that speech."

The star failed to hear. The genial Schumann-Heink heard perfectly and didn't like the way Strauss was behaving himself. She turned to Madame Krull as if to relay Strauss' statement verbatim, and said sweetly:

"The royal general musical director says you must be still more like a colleague in your manner of expression."

May Boston be spared any great calamity over the feud between Chaliapin and Koussevitsky!



78

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
POST

JUL 6 1924

ters with charges and counter-charges of tumult like a French factory parliament

Famous Artist Reveals His

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION

JUN 2 1924

Not only because he is to be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season, but also because he is undoubtedly the most spectacular and most talked of figure in the European conductorial world at the present time, the following explanation by M. Kussevitsky himself regarding his attitude on the subject of orchestral programs —as quoted in the New York Times —is of special interest. He said: "I would like to make it clear," said the conductor, "that I am neither modernist nor classicist in my musical preferences. The works of the great classic masters are absolutely indispensable to me, as musician and in my life. No one would less willingly be without them than I. But music is not a static art. Music is continually being made which is an expression of the period in which it appears. It is as necessary for us to know what is being done as it is to know and admire what has been done. As for the value of new works, the conductor uses his best judgment in producing them. He must leave the rest to the judgment of time.

"I shall take particular care in my New York concerts not to perform a disproportionate number of compositions of the Russian schools. Art is cosmopolitan in the sense that it comes from all countries and, if it is important, has meaning for all peoples.

"I have a considerable number of novelties for America. I have Honneger's 'Pacific' symphony, for example, which has been extremely successful here, so that I had to repeat it. (This is the symphony, 'Pacific, 231,' of which the composer has said, 'I have always loved locomotives passionately, since, for me, they are living beings which I cherish as others cherish women or horses.' 'Pacific No. 231' is a locomotive of the heaviest and fastest type.) I have Ravel's instrumentation of Moussorgshky's 'Tableau d'une Exposition.' I have music by modern Austrian and Hungarian composers which is yet to be announced. I shall soon have completed my Boston program for five concerts. I shall wait until I get there and have a glimpse of the state of affairs musical, before I arrange in detail the programs for New York."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS

MAY - 1924

Serge Koussevitzky who comes to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the fall, recently electrified Paris by a performance at the "Opera" of M. Arthur Honegger's symphonic movement called "Pacific," a musical glorification of the modern locomotive. Comparable to Joyce Kilmer's poem, the music does not resort to imitation of locomotive sounds to reach its goal. It rather shows the restrained force and the struggles of the engine when beginning then the first spurt of speed and finally the even melodies of its sustained running. It idealizes modernism and especially mechanism, much as Kilmer idalized the every day in his familiar poem and in such poems as

(Other Romeikes May Disappoint)

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
TIMES

JUN 2 2 1924

The Boston "Pop" concerts are now the centre of that city's musical activities. They date back to 1885 and are nearly as old as the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Agide Jacchia is conducting his eighth season. The concerts are given to the accompaniment of light refreshment.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
TIMES

JUN 2 2 1924

During its forty-fourth (1924-25) season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play at Carnegie Hall, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, on five Thursday evenings, Nov. 27, Jan. 1, Jan. 29, March 12, April 9; and on five Saturday afternoon matinees, Nov. 29, Jan. 3, Jan. 31, March 14 and April 11.

PORTLAND,
ME.
TELEGRAM

JUN 2 2 1924

The program for May 15 is comprised Schubert's Symphony No. 5; Florent Schmitt's Mirages, a suite for orchestra (first performance); Malpiero's Impressioni dal Vero, suite No. 3 (first performance); Respighi's Concerto gregoriano for violin (Albert Spalding), and orchestra (first time in France); and Scriabin's Poem of Ecstasy.

For May 22 the music was all by Stravinsky. He played the piano part of his concerto (first time). The other pieces were L'Oiseau de feu; Petrouchka, and Le Sacre du Printemps.

For May 29: Corelli, Concerto Grosso; Schmitt, Mirages; Debussy, Nocturnes; Stravinsky, Le Roi des Etoiles (first time); Prokofiev, Sept, ils sont Sept; Incantation for tenor, chorus and orchestra (first time); Borodin, dances from Prince Igor (with chorus).

It will be seen that this is all ne

78

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
POST

JUL 6 1924

ters with charges and counter-charges. Tumult—the French Jockey Club ...

Famous Artist Reveals His

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION

JUN 2 1924

Not only because he is to be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season, but also because he is undoubtedly the most spectacular and most talked of figure in the European conductorial world at the present time, the following explanation by M. Koussevitsky himself regarding his attitude on the subject of orchestral programs —as quoted in the New York Times —is of special interest. He said: "I would like to make it clear," said the conductor, "that I am neither modernist nor classicist in my musical preferences. The works of the great classic masters are absolutely indispensable to me, as musician and in my life. No one would less willingly be without them than I. But music is not a static art. Music is continually being made which is an expression of the period in which it appears. It is as necessary for us to know what is being done as it is to know and admire what has been done. As for the value of new works, the conductor uses his best judgment in producing them. He must leave the rest to the judgment of time.

"I shall take particular care in my New York concerts not to perform a disproportionate number of compositions of the Russian schools. Art is cosmopolitan in the sense that it comes from all countries and, if it is important, has meaning for all peoples.

"I have a considerable number of novelties for America. I have Honneger's 'Pacific' symphony, for example, which has been extremely successful here, so that I had to repeat it. (This is the symphony, 'Pacific, 231,' of which the composer has said, 'I have always loved locomotives passionately, since, for me, they are living beings which I cherish as others cherish women or horses.' 'Pacific No. 231' is a locomotive of the heaviest and fastest type.) I have Ravel's instrumentation of Moussorgshky's 'Tableau d'une Exposition.' I have music by modern Austrian and Hungarian composers which is yet to be announced. I shall soon have completed my Boston program for five concerts. I shall wait until I get there and have a glimpse of the state of affairs musical, before I arrange in detail the programs for New York."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS

1924

Serge Koussevitzky who comes to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the fall, recently electrified Paris by a performance at the "Opera" of M. Arthur Honegger's symphonic movement called "Pacific" a musical glorification of the modern locomotive. Comparable to Joyce Kilmer's poem, the music does not resort to imitation of locomotive sounds to reach its goal. It rather shows the restrained force and the struggles of the engine when beginning then the first spurt of speed and finally the even melodies of its sustained running. It idealizes modernism and especially mechanism, much as Kilmer idalized the every day in his similar poem and in such poems as

(Other Romeikes May Disappoint)

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
TIMES

JUN 2 2 1924

The Boston "Pop" concerts are now the centre of that city's musical activities. They date back to 1885 and are nearly as old as the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Agide Jacchia is conducting his eighth season. The concerts are given to the accompaniment of light refreshment.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
TIMES

JUN 2 2 1924

During its forty-fourth (1924-25) season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play at Carnegie Hall, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, on five Thursday evenings, Nov. 27, Jan. 1, Jan. 29, March 12, April 9; and on five Saturday afternoon matinees, Nov. 29, Jan. 3, Jan. 31, March 14 and April 11.

PORTLAND,
ME.
TELEGRAM

JUN 2 2 1924

The program for May 15 is comprised Schubert's Symphony No. 5; Florent Schmitt's Mirages, a suite for orchestra (first performance); Malpiero's Impressioni dal Vero, suite No. 3 (first performance); Respighi's Concerto gregoriano for violin (Albert Spalding), and orchestra (first time in France); and Scriabin's Poem of Ecstasy.

For May 22 the music was all by Stravinsky. He played the piano part of his concerto (first time). The other pieces were L'Oiseau de feu; Petrouchka, and Le Sacre du Printemps.

For May 29: Corelli, Concerto Grosso; Schmitt, Mirages; Debussy, Nocturnes; Stravinsky, Le Roi des Etoiles (first time); Prokofiev, Sept, ils sont Sept; Incantation for tenor, chorus and orchestra (first time); Borodin, dances from Prince Igor (with chorus).

It will be seen that this is all ne

Tel. Chelsea 6600

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
GAZETTE TIMES

JUL 6 1924

KUSSEWITSKY TO CONDUCT BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE.

When the Boston Symphony orchestra comes to Pittsburgh this fall it will have at its helm, Sergei Kussewitsky who succeeds the admirable Pierre Monteux as conductor of that organization. Mr. Monteux completed his considerable period of service as head of that organization with a reputation greatly enhanced by the results he has achieved in the face of the most serious obstacles. In the five years that he led the Boston Symphony, Mr. Monteux has seen it grow under his hand from the disorganized and incomplete body which a succession of untoward circumstances gave him, to the orchestra that has shown this season and last the technical capacities and the tonal beauty and brilliancy that bring back the days of its glory and rank it among the greatest organizations of its kind in the world.

Mr. Kussewitsky, one of the most striking figures among European conductors of the day, can count himself most fortunate in the instrument he finds ready to his hand.

To an interviewer in Paris, Mr. Kussewitsky recently gave hints of his projects for next season in this country. They concur with his reputation as an enthusiastic exponent of certain types, at least, of modern music. "I understand America is very fond of modern music, and I am going to introduce to America some modern Russian compositions which I consider most interesting. German music is in decadence now. I don't believe we will get much worth while from Germany in the next few years. The new music will come from Spain, from Russia and from France."

Sergei Kussewitsky was born at Tver, on Northern Russia in 1874, he conducted a tthe age of 12 a little orchestra in the town theater. He was graduated from the Moscow Conservatory at 22, and soon appeared at the Imperial Opera at Moscow as a soloist on the double bass and as the greatest player of this instrument in Europe. Sergei Rachmaninoff was the soloist at Kussewitsky's first concert, introducing on that occasion his Second Piano Concerto in Berlin. This was in 1907. Kussewitsky in the years that followed became famous throughout all Europe. His treatment of the classic masterpieces has often been disputed, his brilliancy as a virtuoso leader everywhere conceded.

Pittsburgh will be given the opportunity of hearing Kussewitsky this year, with the coming of the Boston Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BALTIMORE
MD.
NEWS

JUL 8 1924

New Conductor.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra appears in Baltimore next season—it is, we believe, booked for a single concert, one of Mrs. Wilson-Greene's course—it will be directed by Sergei Koussevitsky. He will come to the United States as conductor of the Boston Symphony, succeeding Pierre Monteux.

Koussevitsky, who has a great reputation in Europe, has recently been "a storm center" of Paris owing to his extremely radical programs.

At one concert, for instance, he presented Florent Schmitt's "La Tristesse de Pan,", "La Tragique Chevauchee," Prokofieff's "Sept, Ils Sont Sept" and a new Concerto for piano and orchestra by Stravinsky.

It looks as if we have a great deal to look for once Koussevitsky transfers his habitat to Boston—though Heaven knows what effect Puritanism and Baked Beans will have on his powers of selection. Perhaps it will reduce his modernism to the Straussian plane.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND,
ME.
TELEGRAM

JUL 13 1924

The various reports which have reached America concerning Serge Koussevitzky, who will make his American debut at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Fall, have, on the whole, pictured him as distinctly a modernist. But Mr. Koussevitzky has hastened to remove any fears that his audiences in Carnegie and Symphony halls are to have a season exclusively devoted to Stravinsky, Schonberg, Milhaud, Honegger, Bartok and their contemporaries, with a little Strauss or Debussy thrown in from time to time as a sop to the ultra-conservatives.

"The fear that I shall play nothing but modern music is unfounded," said the Russian conductor. "I love classical music and romantic music. But movement is the principal thing in art; one cannot live forever with Beethoven, Brahms, Schumann, Mendelssohn, etc. Such music is basic, and we must play it from time to time, but there is something beautiful in modern music which cannot be passed by."

Boston Symphony subscribers will not have all-Stravinsky programs, nor yet those of the time-honored Beethoven - Tschaikovsky - Wagner type, though there undoubtedly will be a plentiful need of music by each of these composers. There would be, said Mr. Koussevitzky, one or two modern works in each of his programs, many of which he already had arranged.

Rev. Dr. Henry Stiles Bradley of Deering street and Mr. and Mrs. George Fletcher West, Western Promenade, have left to spend the remainder of the month at Rangeley.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

JUL 13 1924

Music in Washington

Olin Downes of the New York Times sounds a similar note as the keynote of the attitude of American audiences in particular toward "ultra-modern music." He says in an article describing one of the fascinating concerts conducted under Sergei Koussevitsky in the French capital recently:

"It is probable that when he comes to America next season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Mr. Koussevitsky will not give programs of the extremely brilliant and ultra-modern quality that he has been giving this spring in Paris. Mr. Koussevitsky has been told that Americans do not like too much pepper where orchestral music is concerned." In describing a typical program of the Parisian series, Mr. Downes chose one including "Sept, ils Sont Sept," a violent composition by Prokofieff. He says:

"It would have sent an audience accustomed to New York orchestral programs scurrying for the doors, for this Prokofieff is a bold and bad young man. How his music will sound ten years hence is an open question."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE
RHODE ISLAND
TRIBUNE

JUL 13 1924

Musical Mention

It is probable that Sergei Koussevitzky, when he comes to America next season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will not give programs of the extremely brilliant and ultra-modern quality that he has been giving the spring in Paris.

Mr. Koussevitzky has been told that Americans do not like too much pepper when orchestral music is concerned, and he is inclined to be cautious in this direction. Moreover, he himself is a man of very catholic tastes, who is not by nature an exponent of any one school, past or present, or chique, wherever it may be. Here he arranges lists calculated to appeal to a highly sophisticated public, alert for the latest musical sensation and composers who, whatever their eventual importance in history, are representatives of the most "advanced" tendencies in this art. In America Mr. Koussevitzky plans carefully balanced programs of classic and modern music, with a good admixture of new compositions, only a few of which he is willing to announce before he reaches Boston; it is not only in Paris that conductors strive to anticipate each other in the production of new works. He hopes, however, that when he does perform unknown compositions in America he will find a following for them.

This was said in a conversation with a certain wistfulness and naivete. Mr. Koussevitzky has yet to discover that in Boston it is customary to keep abreast of everything of importance that is produced in the field of orchestral music and that the public in New York often accepts what it gets when it finds no means of becoming articulate as to what it wants. But these are things concern the future.

SPRINGFIELD,
MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JUL 13 1924

"PACIFIC 231," NEW HONNEGER SYMPHONY

Serge Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony Orchestra's Conductor, Will Give First Performance of Work in America

Translated by Julia Rogers from the French by Andre George in La Revue Musicale

Announcement of a new conductor for the Boston Symphony orchestra the coming season, creates a new interest in the question of program-making. Serge Koussevitzky, famous as a conductor in Europe, has already arrangeo the first five programs for his Boston concerts. He has also said that during the winter he will give the first performance in America of a symphony by Arthur Honneger, Pacific (231). Mr Honneger, in speaking of this work, says: "I have always had a great affection for locomotives. For me they are living beings, and I love them as some people love horses." He has translated this great affection into wonderful language. As heroine, Mr Honneger has chosen a locomotive, Pacific (231) for a heavy train of great speed. On the outside of the score is engraved in large type, 'Mouvement Symphonique." It is a powerful work, musically alive, and as extraordinary as it is invincible.

The work is very clear, of classic structure, and consists essentially of a formidable progression encompassing two slow movements. Without ever deviating from the picturesque, this strictly musical song keeps an exact parallel with the visual sensations. First, there is a sound of harmonics in the violin while the monster is at rest; then the effort to move necessitates heavy bowing in the double bases; then comes the acceleration of the entire orchestra to reach the song of a train of 300 tons, driven out on a moonlight night at 120 kilometers an hour. This lyric joy is sung by the horns and trombones, above a prodigious letting loose of chords, after which this outburst of dynamics is subdued by powerful forces of re-

NEW YORK
WORLD

JUL 13 1924

20 SAIL BACK TO ITALY TO VISIT OLD MOTHERS

Jacchia, Among Passengers, Says Boston Symphony Will Not Play Jazz.

More than a score of the first class passengers who sailed yesterday on the Lloyd Sabaudo liner Conte Verde for Naples and Genoa announced the prime reason for their trip was to visit aged mothers living in Italy.

Among the group were Agide Jacchia of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Boston Conservatory of Music, who will make his first visit to his eighty-year-old mother in twelve years. Others who said the one object was a "visit to mother" were Bruno Zirato, who was secretary to Enrico Caruso; Dr. Thomas Marco, Italian Vice Consul in Springfield, Mass., and F. Panciatichi, managing editor of the Corriere D'America.

Jaconia denied a rumor the Boston Symphony would adopt jazz as part of its rpertoire this season. "Neither the musicians nor the instruments used in a symphony orchestra are adapted to modern jazz," said the musician, who directs the Boston orchestra during spring and summer.

"A jazz score to the Boston Symphony would be like fitting a round plug in a square hole," he added.

SPRINGFIELD,
MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JUL 13 1924

CRITICAL FRENCH AUDIENCE RELENTS

Vehement Hissing Turned Into Lusty Cheering When American Violinist and Russian Orchestra Leader Play Italian Concerto

An American has at last broken the apathy of the French audiences to foreign talent in the recent Koussevitsky concert at the Paris Opera, with Albert Spalding, solo violinist. Interest is hightened in this unusual procedure in the fact that Mr Koussevitsky is to direct the musical destinies of the Boston Symphony next year. The occasion for the outburst which was real to the point of tears and shoutings by the audience, was the playing of the "Concerto Gregoriano," written by Otterino Respighi, and heard for the first time on this occasion. Koussevitsky conducted the orchestra and Spalding succeeded so admirably in interpreting the Gregorian chants and mediaeval harmonies to the complicated modern form, that the tribute became Spalding's even more than the conductor's.

Paris audiences are not reluctant to express their feelings but it is a wellknown fact that their enthusiasm is quickened more readily for their own than for any foreigner. On this occasion it amounted to complete acceptance of an Italian concerto, a Russian leader and an American soloist. Previous to the acclaim of Spalding, the audience had dissented violently to a Honegger composition with hissing as vehement as the cheering was lusty for their favorites. Koussevitsky made graceful acknowledgement of Spalding's accomplishment in spontaneous handshaking for the young artist.

FORT WORTH,
TEXAS
TELEGRAM

JUN 2 1924

MY Paris representative communicates the recent success gained in the French capital by Albert Spalding. And in a cabled account received elsewhere, the American violinist appears to have played the new Respighi Concerto Gregoriano altogether to the liking of the audience which attended the concert—given by an orchestra under the conductorship of Koussevitsky, who is to be the new head of the Boston Symphony.

This particular audience grew enthusiastic over Spalding's playing and "yelled excitedly" for him when he had finished his task.

When the violinist resumes his activities in the United States he will offer, among other works, the Respighi concerto. The composer granted Spalding the right to play it for the first time in this country.

"How to Educate a Wife," Acco

straint, and the end comes in broad and full harmony. This symphony of six minutes is one of the most extraordinary works in contemporaneous music. The physical action is equal to that of the most celebrated orchestral poems, as Tristan and Salome, only here there is no sorrow, and nothing metaphysical. It is classical music where the author knows how to explore unknown regions and experience new joys.

Under the marvelous directing of Koussevitzky the magnitude of the work is apparent from the start. It is the second time that the one who triumphed in "Kiug David" has received popular acclaim.

Recently at the International Music festival at Prague the Pacific Symphony of Honneger proved one of the great successes of the festival.

JUN 2 1924

sevitsky, the new Russian tor of the Boston Symphony tra has been giving a series r concerts in Paris. His pro- are naturally a matter of in- in Boston. That of May 3 in- Symphonie Funebre by Loca- ansman's "Legende", imitative avinsky; Honegger's "Pacific", delighted the audience; con- Prokofiev; a ballet piece by "Pictures of an Exhibition" ussorgsky; short Russian and h piano pieces.

Tel. Chelsea 8600

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
GAZETTE TIMES

JUL 6 1924

KUSSEWITSKY TO CONDUCT BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE.

When the Boston Symphony orchestra comes to Pittsburgh this fall it will have at its helm, Sergei Kussewitsky who succeeds the admirable Pierre Monteux as conductor of that organization. Mr. Monteux completed his considerable period of service as head of that organization with a reputation greatly enhanced by the results he has achieved in the face of the most serious obstacles. In the five years that he led the Boston Symphony, Mr. Monteux has seen it grow under his hand from the disorganized and incomplete body which a succession of untoward circumstances gave him, to the orchestra that has shown this season and last the technical capacities and the tonal beauty and brilliancy that bring back the days of its glory and rank it among the greatest organizations of its kind in the world.

Mr. Kussewitsky, one of the most striking figures among European conductors of the day, can count himself most fortunate in the instrument he finds ready to his hand.

To an interviewer in Paris, Mr. Kussewitsky recently gave hints of his projects for next season in this country. They concur with his reputation as an enthusiastic exponent of certain types, at least, of modern music. "I understand America is very fond of modern music, and I am going to introduce to America some modern Russian compositions which I consider most interesting. German music is in decadence now. I don't believe we will get much worth while from Germany in the next few years. The new music will come from Spain, from Russia and from France."

Sergei Kussewitsky was born at Tver, on Northern Russia in 1874, he conducted a tthe age of 12 a little orchestra in the town theater. He was graduated from the Moscow Conservatory at 22, and soon appeared at the Imperial Opera at Moscow as a soloist on the double bass and as the greatest player of this instrument in Europe. Sergei Rachmaninoff was the soloist at Kussewitsky's first concert, introducing on that occasion his Second Piano Concerto in Berlin. This was in 1907. Kussewitsky in the years that followed became famous throughout all Europe. His treatment of the classic masterpieces has often been disputed, his brilliancy as a virtuoso leader everywhere conceded.

Pittsburgh will be given the opportunity of hearing Kussewitsky this year, with the coming of the Boston Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BALTIMORE
MD.
NEWS

JUL 8 1924

New Conductor.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra appears in Baltimore next season—it is, we believe, booked for a single concert, one of Mrs. Wilson-Greene's course—it will be directed by Sergei Koussevitsky. He will come to the United States as conductor of the Boston Symphony, succeeding Pierre Monteux.

Koussevitsky, who has a great reputation in Europe, has recently been "a storm center" of Paris owing to his extremely radical programs.

At one concert, for instance, he presented Florent Schmitt's "La Tristesse de Pan,", "La Tragique Chevauchee," Prokofieff's "Sept, Ils Sont Sept" and a new Concerto for piano and orchestra by Stravinsky.

It looks as if we have a great deal to look for once Koussevitsky transfers his habitat to Boston—though Heaven knows what effect Puritanism and Baked Beans will have on his powers of selection. Perhaps it will reduce his modernism to the Straussian plane.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE
RHODE ISLAND
TRIBUNE

JUL 13 1924

Musical Mention

It is probable that Sergei Koussevitzky, when he comes to America next season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will not give programs of the extremely brilliant and ultra-modern quality that he has been giving the spring in Paris.

Mr. Koussevitzky has been told that Americans do not like too much pepper when orchestral music is concerned, and he is inclined to be cautious in this direction. Moreover, he himself is a man of very catholic tastes, who is not by nature an exponent of any one school, past or present, or chique, wherever it may be. Here he arranges lists calculated to appeal to a highly sophisticated public, alert for the latest musical sensation and composers who, whatever their eventual importance in history, are representatives of the most "advanced" tendencies in this art. In America Mr. Koussevitzky plans carefully balanced programs of classic and modern music, with a good admixture of new compositions, only a few of which he is willing to announce before he reaches Boston; it is not only in Paris that conductors strive to anticipate each other in the production of new works. He hopes, however, that when he does perform unknown compositions in America he will find a following for them.

This was said in a conversation with a certain wistfulness and naivete. Mr. Koussevitzky has yet to discover that in Boston it is customary to keep abreast of everything of importance that is produced in the field of orchestral music and that the public in New York often accepts what it gets when it finds no means of becoming articulate as to what it wants. But these are things concern the future.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND,
ME.
TELEGRAM

JUL 13 1924

The various reports which have reached America concerning Serge Koussevitzky, who will make his American debut at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Fall, have, on the whole, pictured him as distinctly a modernist. But Mr. Koussevitzky has hastened to remove any fears that his audiences in Carnegie and Symphony halls are to have a season exclusively devoted to Stravinsky, Schonberg, Milhaud, Honegger, Bartok and their contemporaries, with a little Strauss or Debussy thrown in from time to time as a sop to the ultra-conservatives.

"The fear that I shall play nothing but modern music is unfounded," said the Russian conductor. "I love classical music and romantic music. But movement is the principal thing in art; one cannot live forever with Beethoven, Brahms, Schumann, Mendelssohn, etc. Such music is basic, and we must play it from time to time, but there is something beautiful in modern music which cannot be passed by."

Boston Symphony subscribers will not have all-Stravinsky programs, nor yet those of the time-honored Beethoven - Tschaikovsky - Wagner type, though there undoubtedly will be a plentiful need of music by each of these composers. There would be, said Mr. Koussevitzky, one or two modern works in each of his programs, many of which he already had arranged.

Rev. Dr. Henry Stiles Bradley of Deering street and Mr. and Mrs. George Fletcher West, Western Promenade, have left to spend the remainder of the month at Rangeley.

SPRINGFIELD,
MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JUL 13 1924

"PACIFIC 231," NEW HONNEGER SYMPHONY

Serge Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony Orchestra's Conductor, Will Give First Performance of Work in America

Translated by Julia Rogers from the French by Andre George in La Revue Musicale

Announcement of a new conductor for the Boston Symphony orchestra the coming season, creates a new interest in the question of program-making. Serge Koussevitzky, famous as a conductor in Europe, has already arrangeo the first five programs for his Boston concerts. He has also said that during the winter he will give the first performance in America of a symphony by Arthur Honneger, Pacific (231). Mr Honneger, in speaking of this work, says: "I have always had a great affection for locomotives. For me they are living beings, and I love them as some people love horses." He has translated this great affection into wonderful language. As heroine, Mr Honneger has chosen a locomotive, Pacific (231) for a heavy train of great speed. On the outside of the score is engraved in large type, 'Mouvement Symphonique." It is a powerful work, musically alive, and as extraordinary as it is invincible.

The work is very clear. of classic structure, and consists essentially of a formidable progression encompassing two slow movements. Without ever deviating from the picturesque, this strictly musical song keeps an exact parallel with the visual sensations. First, there is a sound of harmonics in the violin while the monster is at rest; then the effort to move necessitates heavy bowing in the double bases; then comes the acceleration of the entire orchestra to reach the song of a train of 300 tons, driven out on a moonlight night at 120 kilometers an hour. This lyric joy is sung by the horns and trombones, above a prodigious letting loose of chords, after which this outburst of dynamics is subdued by powerful forces of re-

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR

JUL 13 1924

Music in Washington

Olin Downes of the New York Times sounds a similar note as the keynote of the attitude of American audiences in particular toward "ultra-modern music." He says in an article describing one of the fascinating concerts conducted under Sergei Koussevitsky in the French capital recently:

"It is probable that when he comes to America next season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Mr. Koussevitsky will not give programs of the extremely brilliant and ultra-modern quality that he has been giving this spring in Paris. Mr. Koussevitsky has been told that Americans do not like too much pepper where orchestral music is concerned." In describing a typical program of the Parisian series, Mr. Downes chose one including "Sept, ils Sont Sept," a violent composition by Prokofieff. He says:

"It would have sent an audience accustomed to New York orchestral programs scurrying for the doors, for this Prokofieff is a bold and bad young man. How his music will sound ten years hence is an open question."

NEW YORK
WORLD

JUL 13 1924

20 SAIL BACK TO ITALY TO VISIT OLD MOTHERS

Jacchia, Among Passengers, Says Boston Symphony Will Not Play Jazz.

More than a score of the first class passengers who sailed yesterday on the Lloyd Sabaudo liner Conte Verde for Naples and Genoa announced the prime reason for their trip was to visit aged mothers living in Italy.

Among the group were Agide Jacchia of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Boston Conservatory of Music, who will make his first visit to his eighty-year-old mother in twelve years. Others who said the one object was a "visit to mother" were Bruno Zirato, who was secretary to Enrico Caruso; Dr. Thomas Marco, Italian Vice Consul in Springfield, Mass., and F. Panciatichi, managing editor of the Corriere D'America.

Jaconia denied a rumor the Boston Symphony would adopt jazz as part of its rpertoire this season. "Neither the musicians nor the instruments used in a symphony orchestra are adapted to modern jazz," said the musician, who directs the Boston orchestra during spring and summer.

"A jazz score to the Boston Symphony would be like fitting a round plug in a square hole," he added.

SPRINGFIELD,
MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JUL 13 1924

CRITICAL FRENCH AUDIENCE RELENTS

Vehement Hissing Turned Into Lusty Cheering When American Violinist and Russian Orchestra Leader Play Italian Concerto

An American has at last broken the apathy of the French audiences to foreign talent in the recent Koussevitsky concert at the Paris Opera, with Albert Spalding, solo violinist. Interest is hightened in this unusual procedure in the fact that Mr Koussevitsky is to direct the musical destinies of the Boston Symphony next year. The occasion for the outburst which was real to the point of tears and shoutings by the audience, was the playing of the "Concerto Gregoriano," written by Otterino Respighi and heard for the first time on this occasion. Koussevitsky conducted the orchestra and Spalding succeeded so admirably in interpreting the Gregorian chants and mediaeval harmonies to the complicated modern form, that the tribute became Spalding's even more than the conductor's.

Paris audiences are not reluctant to express their feelings but it is a wellknown fact that their enthusiasm is quickened more readily for their own than for any foreigner. On this occasion it amounted to complete acceptance of an Italian concerto, a Russian leader and an American soloist. Previous to the acclaim of Spalding, the audience had dissented violently to a Honegger composition with hissing as vehement as the cheering was lusty for their favorites. Koussevitsky made graceful acknowledgement of Spalding's accomplishment in spontaneous handshaking for the young artist.

FORT WORTH,
TEXAS
TELEGRAM

JUN 2 1924

MY Paris representative communicates the recent success gained in the French capital by Albert Spalding. And in a cabled account received elsewhere, the American violinist appears to have played the new Respighi Concerto Gregoriano altogether to the liking of the audience which attended the concert—given by an orchestra under the conductorship of Koussevitsky, who is to be the new head of the Boston Symphony.

This particular audience grew enthusiastic over Spalding's playing and "yelled excitedly" for him when he had finished his task.

When the violinist resumes his activities in the United States he will offer, among other works, the Respighi concerto. The composer granted Spalding the right to play it for the first time in this country.

"How to Educate a Wife," Acco

straint, and the end comes in broad and full harmony. This symphony of six minutes is one of the most extraordinary works in contemporaneous music. The physical action is equal to that of the most celebrated orchestral poems, as Tristan and Salome, only here there is no sorrow, and nothing metaphysical. It is classical music where the author knows how to explore unknown regions and experience new joys.

Under the marvelous directing of Koussevitzky the magnitude of the work is apparent from the start. It is the second time that the one who triumphed in "Klug David" has received popular acclaim.

Recently at the International Music festival at Prague the Pacific Symphony of Honneger proved one of the great successes of the festival.

JUN 2 1924

ssevitsky, the new Russian tor of the Boston Symphony tra has been giving a series r concerts in Paris. His pro- are naturally a matter of in- in Boston. That of May 8 in- Symphonie Funebre by Loca- ansman's "Legende", imitative avinsky; Honegger's "Pacific", delighted the audience; con- y Prokofiev; a ballet piece by "Pictures of an Exhibition" ussorgsky; short Russian and h piano pieces.

Tel. Chelsea 8600

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PA.
GAZETTE TIMES
JUL 6 1924

KUSSEWITSKY TO CONDUCT BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE.

When the Boston Symphony orchestra comes to Pittsburgh this fall it will have at its helm, Sergei Kussewitsky who succeeds the admirable Pierre Monteux as conductor of that organization. Mr. Monteux completed his considerable period of service as head of that organization with a reputation greatly enhanced by the results he has achieved in the face of the most serious obstacles. In the five years that he led the Boston Symphony, Mr. Monteux has seen it grow under his hand from the disorganized and incomplete body which a succession of untoward circumstances gave him, to the orchestra that has shown this season and last the technical capacities and the tonal beauty and brilliancy that bring back the days of its glory and rank it among the greatest organizations of its kind in the world.

Mr. Kussewitsky, one of the most striking figures among European conductors of the day, can count himself most fortunate in the instrument he finds ready to his hand.

To an interviewer in Paris, Mr. Kussewitsky recently gave hints of his projects for next season in this country. They concur with his reputation as an enthusiastic exponent of certain types, at least, of modern music. "I understand America is very fond of modern music, and I am going to introduce to America some modern Russian compositions which I consider most interesting. German music is in decadence now. I don't believe we will get much worth while from Germany in the next few years. The new music will come from Spain, from Russia and from France."

Sergei Kussewitsky was born at Tver, on Northern Russia in 1874, he conducted a tthe age of 12 a little orchestra in the town theater. He was graduated from the Moscow Conservatory at 22, and soon appeared at the Imperial Opera at Moscow as a soloist on the double bass and as the greatest player of this instrument in Europe. Sergei Rachmaninoff was the soloist at Kussewitsky's first concert, introducing on that occasion his Second Piano Concerto in Berlin. This was in 1907. Kussewitsky in the years that followed became famous throughout all Europe. His treatment of the classic masterpieces has often been disputed, his brilliancy as a virtuoso leader everywhere conceded.

Pittsburgh will be given the opportunity of hearing Kussewitsky this year, with the coming of the Boston Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BALTIMORE
MD.
NEWS
JUL 8 1924

New Conductor.

When the Boston Symphony Orchestra appears in Baltimore next season—it is, we believe, booked for a single concert, one of Mrs. Wilson-Greene's course—it will be directed by Sergei Koussevitsky. He will come to the United States as conductor of the Boston Symphony, succeeding Pierre Monteux.

Koussevitsky, who has a great reputation in Europe, has recently been "a storm center" of Paris owing to his extremely radical programs.

At one concert, for instance, he presented Florent Schmitt's "La Tristesse de Pan,", "La Tragique Chevauchee," Prokofieff's "Sept, Ils Sont Sept" and a new Concerto for piano and orchestra by Stravinsky.

It looks as if we have a great deal to look for once Koussevitsky transfers his habitat to Boston—though Heaven knows what effect Puritanism and Baked Beans will have on his powers of selection. Perhaps it will reduce his modernism to the Straussian plane.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND,
ME.
TELEGRAM
JUL 13 1924

The various reports which have reached America concerning Serge Koussevitzky, who will make his American debut at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Fall, have, on the whole, pictured him as distinctly a modernist. But Mr. Koussevitzky has hastened to remove any fears that his audiences in Carnegie and Symphony halls are to have a season exclusively devoted to Stravinsky, Schonberg, Milhaud, Honegger, Bartok and their contemporaries, with a little Strauss or Debussy thrown in from time to time as a sop to the ultra-conservatives.

"The fear that I shall play nothing but modern music is unfounded," said the Russian conductor. "I love classical music and romantic music. But movement is the principal thing in art; one cannot live forever with Beethoven, Brahms, Schumann, Mendelssohn, etc. Such music is basic, and we must play it from time to time, but there is something beautiful in modern music which cannot be passed by."

Boston Symphony subscribers will not have all-Stravinsky programs, nor yet those of the time-honored Beethoven - Tschaikovsky - Wagner type, though there undoubtedly will be a plentiful need of music by each of these composers. There would be, said Mr. Koussevitzky, one or two modern works in each of his programs, many of which he already had arranged.

Rev. Dr. Henry Stiles Bradley of Deering street and Mr. and Mrs. George Fletcher West, Western Promenade, have left to spend the remainder of the month at Rangeley.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE
RHODE ISLAND
TRIBUNE
JUL 13 1924

Musical Mention

It is probable that Sergei Koussevitzky, when he comes to America next season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will not give programs of the extremely brilliant and ultra-modern quality that he has been giving the spring in Paris.

Mr. Koussevitzky has been told that Americans do not like too much pepper when orchestral music is concerned, and he is inclined to be cautious in this direction. Moreover, he himself is a man of very catholic tastes, who is not by nature an exponent of any one school, past or present, or chique, wherever it may be. Here he arranges lists calculated to appeal to a highly sophisticated public, alert for the latest musical sensation and composers who, whatever their eventual importance in history, are representatives of the most "advanced" tendencies in this art. In America Mr. Koussevitzky plans carefully balanced programs of classic and modern music, with a good admixture of new compositions, only a few of which he is willing to announce before he reaches Boston; it is not only in Paris that conductors strive to anticipate each other in the production of new works. He hopes, however, that when he does perform unknown compositions in America he will find a following for them.

This was said in a conversation with a certain wistfulness and naivete. Mr. Koussevitzky has yet to discover that in Boston it is customary to keep abreast of everything of importance that is produced in the field of orchestral music and that the public in New York often accepts what it gets when it finds no means of becoming articulate as to what it wants. But these are things concern the future.

SPRINGFIELD,
MASS.
REPUBLICAN
JUL 13 1924

"PACIFIC 231," NEW HONNEGER SYMPHONY

Serge Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony Orchestra's Conductor, Will Give First Performance of Work in America

Translated by Julia Rogers from the French by Andre George in La Revue Musicale

Announcement of a new conductor for the Boston Symphony orchestra the coming season, creates a new interest in the question of program-making. Serge Koussevitzky, famous as a conductor in Europe, has already arrangeo the first five programs for his Boston concerts. He has also said that during the winter he will give the first performance in America of a symphony by Arthur Honneger, Pacific (231). Mr Honneger, in speaking of this work, says: "I have always had a great affection for locomotives. For me they are living beings, and I love them as some people love horses." He has translated this great affection in [illegible] language. As heroine, famous resorts are transferred [illegible] Hall," "Suicide Hall," and [illegible] City; Brodie's resort, [illegible] was reproduced in detail at [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
JUL 13 1924

Music in Washington

Olin Downes of the New York Times sounds a similar note as the keynote of the attitude of American audiences in particular toward "ultra-modern music." He says in an article describing one of the fascinating concerts conducted under Sergei Koussevitsky in the French capital recently:

"It is probable that when he comes to America next season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Mr. Koussevitsky will not give programs of the extremely brilliant and ultra-modern quality that he has been giving this spring in Paris. Mr. Koussevitsky has been told that Americans do not like too much pepper where orchestral music is concerned." In describing a typical program of the Parisian series, Mr. Downes chose one including "Sept, ils Sont Sept," a violent composition by Prokofieff. He says:

"It would have sent an audience accustomed to New York orchestral programs scurrying for the doors, for this Prokofieff is a bold and bad young man. How his music will sound ten years hence is an open question."

NEW YORK
WORLD
JUL 13 1924

SPRINGFIELD,
MASS.
REPUBLICAN
JUL 13 1924

20 SAIL BACK TO ITALY TO VISIT OLD MOTHERS

Jacchia, Among Passengers, Says Boston Symphony Will Not Play Jazz.

More than a score of the first class passengers who sailed yesterday on the Lloyd Sabaudo liner Conte Verde for Naples and Genoa announced the prime reason for their trip was to visit aged mothers living in Italy.

Among the group were Agide Jacchia of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and director of the Boston Conservatory of Music, who will make his first visit to his eighty-year-old mother in twelve years. Others who said the one object was a "visit to mother" were Bruno Zirato, who was secretary to Enrico Caruso; Dr. Thomas Marco, Italian Vice Consul in Springfield, Mass., and F. Panciatichi, managing editor of the Corriere D'America.

Jacchia denied a rumor the Boston Symphony would adopt jazz as part of its repertoire this season. "Neither the musicians nor the instruments used in a symphony orchestra are adapted to modern jazz," said the musician, who directs the Boston orchestra during spring and summer.

"A jazz score to the Boston Symphony would be like fitting a round plug in a square hole," he added.

CRITICAL FRENCH AUDIENCE RELENTS

Vehement Hissing Turned Into Lusty Cheering When American Violinist and Russian Orchestra Leader Play Italian Concerto

An American has at last broken the apathy of the French audiences to foreign talent in the recent Koussevitsky concert at the Paris Opera, with Albert Spalding, solo violinist. Interest is hightened in this unusual procedure in the fact that Mr Koussevitsky is to direct the musical destinies of the Boston Symphony next year. The occasion for the outburst which was real to the point of tears and shoutings by the audience, was the playing of the "Concerto Gregoriano," written by Otterino Respighi and heard for the first time on this occasion. Koussevitsky conducted the orchestra and Spalding succeeded so admirably in interpreting the Gregorian chants and medieaval harmonies to the complicated modern form, that the tribute became Spalding's even more than the conductor's.

Paris audiences are not reluctant to express their feelings but it is a wellknown fact that their enthusiasm is quickened more readily for their own than for any foreigner. On this occasion it amounted to complete acceptance of an Italian concerto, a Russian leader and an American soloist. Previous to the acclaim of Spalding, the audience had dissented violently to a Honegger composition with hissing as vehement as the cheering was lusty for their favorites. Koussevitsky made graceful acknowledgement of Spalding's accomplishment in spontaneous handshaking for the young artist.

FORT WORTH,
TEXAS
TELEGRAM
JUN 2 1924

MY Paris representative communicates the recent success gained in the French capital by Albert Spalding. And in a cabled account received elsewhere, the American violinist appears to have played the new Respighi Concerto Gregoriano altogether to the liking of the audience which attended the concert—given by an orchestra under the conductorship of Koussevitsky, who is to be the new head of the Boston Symphony.

This particular audience grew enthusiastic over Spalding's playing and "yelled excitedly" for him when he had finished his task.

When the violinist resumes his activities in the United States he will offer, among other works, the Respighi concerto. The composer granted Spalding the right to play it for the first time in this country.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND,
ME.
TELEGRAM
JUN 2 1924

Koussevitsky, the new Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been giving a series of four concerts in Paris. His programs are naturally a matter of interest in Boston. That of May 8 included Symphonie Funebre by Locatelli Tansman's "Legende", imitative of Stravinsky; Honegger's "Pacific", which delighted the audience; concert by Prokofiev; a ballet piece by Dalla; "Pictures of an Exhibition" by Moussorgsky; short Russian and English piano pieces.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW YORK
N. Y.
TELEGRAM

JUL 14 1924

A Dissenter from Stravinsky.

Igor Stravinsky so successfully stampeded musical America last season and the Stravinsky worship blossomed over night into a cult so well-night universal that a single dissenting voice finds its way across the tumult of praise and glorification with a curious and arresting appeal. The voice is that of Jean Marnold, writing in Paris, the European capital of Stravinskyism, in the Mercure de France.

First M. Mangold takes Sergei Koussevitsky, who comes to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season, to task for feeding up his audiences with certain works of Stravinsky, played over and over again:—"The superannuated 'Fire Bird,' 'Petrouchka,' which is becoming a bore, and 'Le Sacre du Printemps,' which grows more and more indifferent." But Strainvsky is fashionable: "Snobbism swoons at his knees, and an entire evening was devoted to him. The feature of it, among the above-mentioned 'chestnuts, was a concerto for piano accompanied by an orchestra of wood-wind and brass, which seemed to be of the style recently inaugurated by the author in his octet for wind instruments.

"Since those two works are unpublished, one can only carry away an impression of them. Mine was approximately that of something by a Max Reger who had heard a little Schoenberg. I should be very glad to have to contradict myself after reading the works, but I admit that I am very doubtful whether I shall. At no moment of his career, except in certain parts of the 'Nightingale,' was the polyphony of M. Stravinsky interesting. At first he imitated Rimsky and Moussorgsky, breathed in a little of Dubussy and perhaps of M. Ravel, then the shock of M. Schoenberg let loose the 'wallop' of the 'Sacre.'

"His turning backwards now to a verbose and hard pseudo-classicism testifies to the artificial nature of his evolution or, better, to its non-existence. A natural evolution is spontaneous, continuous and logical; the development of M. Stravinsky is always beginning over again in a new way. His originality is deliberate and laborious. His melodic poverty is destructive.

"One can admire in his art an extreme dexterity; one finds in it little of feeling, never intelligence. It is certainly not a primitive art—far from it!—but primary, which, furthermore, is very well suited to the epoch we are traversing, but which will pass away without leaving any more trace than a brilliant meteor, brutal and ephemeral. I write this for eight or ten years hence, and I sign it in complete security."

So M. Marnold in his disbelief throws down the gauntlet to the ultimate judge of all things, time. And still they go on playing Stravinsky!

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
June

AUG 3 1924

AMERICAN ORCHESTRA PRAISED BY MONTEUX

PARIS, Aug. 2. — Pierre Monteux, who has just returned from America, after five years as conductor of the Boston Symphony, is enthusiastic in his praise of American orchestras, although he deplores the lack of appreciation of American composers. In an interview in Comoedia he says, "Charles Martin Loeffler is a great artist who, in France, would occupy a first place. Ernest Schelling, John Alden Carpenter, Edward Burlingame Hill, Gregory Mason and Henry T. Gilbert also have extraordinary talent." Of his successor, he says: "The Boston Symphony has a great success, which M. Koussevitsky will undoubtedly add to."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
GLOBE

AUG 3 1924

Wilhelm Furtwangler, conductor of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, is to appear in New York as guest conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra next season. Mengelberg and Stravinsky are also announced as guest conductors of this orchestra, and the New York Symphony Society is importing Bruno Walter and Golschmann. Boston should hear some of these conductors, though the coming of Koussevitsky to our own orchestra seems to be regarded in New York as a bigger event than the advent of any of these guests.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WASHINGTON,
D. C.
STAR

AUG 3 1924

Music in Washington

THERE is compensation for every trial, according to the Good Book, and anticipation of the good things in music that are to come a bit later on should be compensation for these warm summer days, even if De Wolf Hopper operas were not already excellently upholding the cause of music.

First, there are the New York Symphony Orchestra concerts, five in number, as usual, with Bruno Walter announced as guest conductor of one program. High-lights for this series should be the Brahms "Double Concerto" for violin and cello, to be played by Kochanski and Salmond, both heard here last season in admirable programs; Mozart's "Double Concerto" for violin and viola, which is to be presented by Samuel Dushkin and Lionel Tertis, and Walter Damrosch's conducting of Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony," with soloists and chorus.

Among the novelties promised for next season, Geraldine Farrar's revision of Bizet's "Carmen," produced with her own company, sounds interesting. The performance of the "Puppet Opera," brought from Italy, rather piques the curiosity. The concert by Elvira de Hidalgo, who has sung in leading opera houses of Europe for several years and will sing roles in her much-praised Spanish coloratura voice for both Metropolitan and Chicago opera performances, as well as in concert work this year, should prove exceptional.

A piece of news to set Washingtonians rejoicing, even if all else fails, tells of the coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of the much-heralded Serge Koussevitzsky, for one concert. Considering the persistent effervescence of Parisian audiences this summer over M. Koussevitzsky's programs, particularly those featuring ultra-modern music, this concert should arouse unusual interest.

Many favorite soloists, both vocal and instrumental, are listed for the season, together with combination programs of other artists. Fuller details are given elsewhere on this page.

Then, too, Washington has the added promise of three operatic performances by the Chicago Opera Company in February, with Mary Garden, Rosa Raisa and Chaliapin, to look forward to.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND,
ME.
TELEGRAM

AUG 10 1924

It is said that Chaliapin, the great basso singer, and Konssevitsky, the new Russian leader of the Boston Symphony, never could agree and will not appear on the same program. It is stated that Europe is not big enough to hold the two. And now Koussevitsky is coming to America and Boston Symphony audiences are crazy over Chaliapin, the marvelous song interpreter, so it is affirmed that some effort will be made to amalgamate the opposing elements.

BE SURE
(Other Romeikes May Disappoint)

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE Rock
AUG 11 1924

* * * *

The obituary which appeared in Musical America contained special mention of Mrs. Gardner's devotion to music and her encouragement for its promotion. She made the recognition of many great artists possible and her proteges were many. She gave funds toward the education of many young musicians and artists, and all musicians were eager to appear at her musicales, as this meant general recognition of their ability. She was a personal supporter of the Boston Symphony, and though she retired from society some eight years ago after a serious illness, she was still occasionally seen in recent years at Symphony concerts and at performances of the opera. Among some of the notable artists she entertained were Paderewski (it is said that she paid him $3,000 for this appearance); Carmencita, the famous dancer; the famous De Reszkes; John Singer Sargent, the well-known portrait painter; and the Boston Symphony Orchestra was frequently hired to play at her private entertainments.

* * * *

Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

AUG 9 1924

The full Boston Symphony orchestra with its new conductor, Sergei Koussevitsky, will give the first concert on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 2. The orchestra did not visit Lowell last season but in 1922-23 it gave two fine concerts. Mr. Donovan has not fixed upon the soloist for the Lowell concert but he hopes to announce that Raymond Havens, pianist, will be the assisting artist. Mr. Havens has been soloist with the orchestra a dozen or more times, three times under Mr. Donovan's direction, and his work has been warmly approved. It is the policy of the Star series to use instrumentalists as soloists with the orchestra rather than singers and of the instrumentalists preferably a pianist. In 1920, when the Star series first presented concert in Lowell the Boston Symphony orchestra gave a fine concert at the Strand Theatre under its direction. Miss Irma Seydel, violinist, was the soloist on that occasion.

LAZARO
Famous Spanish Tenor, former Member Metropolitan Opera Co.
TICKETS NOW AT BOX OFFICE.
Carnegie Hall, Wed. Eve., June 25 at 8:15— Song Recital—HIPOLITO

Apropos of the old masters, students of early Italian art should not fail to read in the current number of "Art in America," the essay in which Mr. Benson describes a new Botticelli. It is a tiny "Annunciation" in an American collection, that of Mr. Louis Hyde, at Glens Falls, N. Y. The theme is treated, says the critic, with "creative joy of brain and hand," and he lingers with intense appreciation over various passages in the design, one in which

Miss Enid Stoddard will hold an exhibition of her miniatures, previously shown at the Royal Academy in London and at the Salon in Paris, during the month of July at Newport. The event will be under the patronage of a committee of distinguished Newport summer residents. Miss Stoddard's work was recently complimented by Queen Mary of England.

The art chapter of the Adirondacks Mountain Club is giving an exhibition of photographs in the galleries of the National Arts Club, East Twentieth Street and Gramercy Park, the event to close on Wednesday. The majority of subjects, represented both in color and flat tints, portray the beauty spots in the Adirondacks. This is the first exhibition by the club, which plans to make it an annual affair with prize awards.

Beginning on the 23d there will be on view at the Art Center an exhibition of artistically furnished interiors provided by various decorators. It will have an educational purpose in its endeavor to show that beauty can be attained with economy. The following co-operate in providing the exhibition: Miss Nancy McClelland, Miss Gheen, Mrs. Marjorie Sill Wickware, Mrs. Agnes Foster Wright and J. R. Bremner.

In 1875, at Fontainebleau, when Robert Louis Stevenson and Will H. Low were young men together, the artist made an open-air sketch of his friend which is commemorated in the romancer's "Forest Notes." Mr. Low gives a reproduction of it in a little pamphlet he has made, embodying a fragment from the old essay in "Cornhill," a delightful note upon the painting by Christopher Morley, and some brief technical observations of his own. The portrait, at present in Mr. Low's studio at Bronxville, ought some day to be seen in this city. The pamphlet makes a welcome addition to the great mass of Stevensoniana.

A summer show just opened at the City Club, 55 West Forty-fourth Street, consists of paintings by eleven American artists, lent by courtesy of the Babcock Gallery. Those represented are John E. Costigan, Abbott Graves, H. R. Poore, W. R. Leigh, H. A. Vincent, Paul King, George P. Ennis, Edward Dufner, A. P. Lucas, Sigurd Skou and Richard Kimbel.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW YORK
N. Y.
TELEGRAM

JUL 14 1924

A Dissenter from Stravinsky.

Igor Stravinsky so successfully stampeded musical America last season and the Stravinsky worship blossomed over night into a cult so well-night universal that a single dissenting voice finds its way across the tumult of praise and glorification with a curious and arresting appeal. The voice is that of Jean Marnold, writing in Paris, the European capital of Stravinskyism, in the Mercure de France.

First M. Mangold takes Sergei Koussevitzky, who comes to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season, to task for feeding up his audiences with certain works of Stravinsky, played over and over again:—"The superannuated 'Fire Bird,' 'Petrouchka,' which is becoming a bore, and 'Le Sacre du Printemps,' which grows more and more indifferent." But Strainvsky is fashionable: "Snobbism swoons at his knees, and an entire evening was devoted to him. The feature of it, among the above-mentioned 'chestnuts, was a concerto for piano accompanied by an orchestra of wood-wind and brass, which seemed to be of the style recently inaugurated by the author in his octet for wind instruments.

"Since those two works are unpublished, one can only carry away an impression of them. Mine was approximately that of something by a Max Reger who had heard a little Schoenberg. I should be very glad to have to contradict myself after reading the works, but I admit that I am very doubtful whether I shall. At no moment of his career, except in certain parts of the 'Nightingale,' was the polyphony of M. Stravinsky interesting. At first he imitated Rimsky and Moussorgsky, breathed in a little of Dubussy and perhaps of M. Ravel, then the shock of M. Schoenberg let loose the 'wallop' of the 'Sacre.'

"His turning backwards now to a verbose and hard pseudo-classicism testifies to the artificial nature of his evolution or, better, to its non-existence. A natural evolution is spontaneous, continuous and logical; the development of M. Stravinsky is always beginning over again in a new way. His originality is deliberate and laborious. His melodic poverty is destructive.

"One can admire in his art an extreme dexterity; one finds in it little of feeling, never intelligence. It is certainly not a primitive art—far from it! —but primary, which, furthermore, is very well suited to the epoch we are traversing, but which will pass away without leaving any more trace than a brilliant meteor, brutal and ephemeral. I write this for eight or ten years hence, and I sign it in complete security."

So M. Marnold in his disbelief throws down the gauntlet to the ultimate judge of all things, time. And still they go on playing Stravinsky!

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.

AUG 1924

AMERICAN ORCHESTRA PRAISED BY MONTEUX

PARIS, Aug. 2. — Pierre Monteux, who has just returned from America, after five years as conductor of the Boston Symphony, is enthusiastic in his praise of American orchestras, although he deplores the lack of appreciation of American composers. In an interview in Comoedia he says, "Charles Martin Loeffler is a great artist who, in France, would occupy a first place. Ernest Schelling, John Alden Carpenter, Edward Burlingame Hill, Gregory Mason and Henry T. Gilbert also have extraordinary talent." Of his successor, he says: "The Boston Symphony has a great success, which M. Koussevitsky will undoubtedly add to."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
GLOBE

AUG 3 1924

Wilhelm Furtwangler, conductor of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, is to appear in New York as guest conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra next season. Mengelberg and Stravinsky are also announced as guest conductors of this orchestra, and the New York Symphony Society is importing Bruno Walter and Golschmann. Boston should hear some of these conductors, though the coming of Koussevitsky to our own orchestra seems to be regarded in New York as a bigger event than the advent of any of these guests.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WASHINGTON,
D. C.
STAR

AUG 3 1924

Music in Washington

THERE is compensation for every trial, according to the Good Book, and anticipation of the good things in music that are to come a bit later on should be compensation for these warm summer days, even if De Wolf Hopper operas were not already excellently upholding the cause of music.

First, there are the New York Symphony Orchestra concerts, five in number, as usual, with Bruno Walter announced as guest conductor of one program. High-lights for this series should be the Brahms "Double Concerto" for violin and cello, to be played by Kochanski and Salmond, both heard here last season in admirable programs; Mozart's "Double Concerto" for violin and viola, which is to be presented by Samuel Dushkin and Lionel Tertis, and Walter Damrosch's conducting of Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony," with soloists and chorus.

Among the novelties promised for next season, Geraldine Farrar's revision of Bizet's "Carmen," produced with her own company, sounds interesting. The performance of the "Puppet Opera," brought from Italy, rather piques the curiosity. The concert by Elvira de Hidalgo, who has sung in leading opera houses of Europe for several years and will sing roles in her much-praised Spanish coloratura voice for both Metropolitan and Chicago opera performances, as well as in concert work this year, should prove exceptional.

A piece of news to set Washingtonians rejoicing, even if all else fails, tells of the coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of the much-heralded Serge Koussevitzsky, for one concert. Considering the persistent effervescence of Parisian audiences this summer over M. Koussevitzsky's programs, particularly those featuring ultra-modern music, this concert should arouse unusual interest.

Many favorite soloists, both vocal and instrumental, are listed for the season, together with combination programs of other artists. Fuller details are given elsewhere on this page.

Then, too, Washington has the added promise of three operatic performances by the Chicago Opera Company in February, with Mary Garden, Rosa Raisa and Chaliapin, to look forward to.

THIS CLIPPING FROM PORTLAND,
ME.
TELEGRAM

AUG 10 1924

It is said that Chaliapin, the great basso singer, and Konssevitsky, the new Russian leader of the Boston Symphony, never could agree and will not appear on the same program. It is stated that Europe is not big enough to hold the two. And now Koussevitsky is coming to America and Boston Symphony audiences are crazy over Chaliapin, the marvelous song interpreter, so it is affirmed that some effort will be made to amalgamate the opposing elements.

BE SURE
(Other Romeikes May Disappoint)

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

AUG 11 1924

* * * *

The obituary which appeared in Musical America contained special mention of Mrs. Gardner's devotion to music and her encouragement for its promotion. She made the recognition of many great artists possible and her proteges were many. She gave funds toward the education of many young musicians and artists, and all musicians were eager to appear at her musicales, as this meant general recognition of their ability. She was a personal supporter of the Boston Symphony, and though she retired from society some eight years ago after a serious illness, she was still occasionally seen in recent years at Symphony concerts and at performances of the opera. Among some of the notable artists she entertained were Paderewski (it is said that she paid him $3,000 for this appearance); Carmencita, the famous dancer; the famous De Reszkes; John Singer Sargent, the well-known portrait painter; and the Boston Symphony Orchestra was frequently hired to play at her private entertainments.

* * * *

Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

AUG 1924

The full Boston Symphony orchestra with its new conductor, Sergei Koussevitsky, will give the first concert on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 2. The orchestra did not visit Lowell last season but in 1922-23 it gave two fine concerts. Mr. Donovan has not fixed upon the soloist for the Lowell concert but he hopes to announce that Raymond Havens, pianist, will be the assisting artist. Mr. Havens has been soloist with the orchestra a dozen or more times, three times under Mr. Donovan's direction, and his work has been warmly approved. It is the policy of the Star series to use instrumentalists as soloists with the orchestra rather than singers and of the instrumentalists preferably a pianist. In 1920, when the Star series first presented concert in Lowell the Boston Symphony orchestra gave a fine concert at the Strand Theatre under its direction. Miss Irma Seydel, violinist, was the soloist on that occasion.

LAZARO
Famous Spanish Tenor, former Member Metropolitan Opera Co.
TICKETS NOW AT BOX OFFICE.
Carnegie Hall, Wed. Eve., June 25 at 8:15— Song Recital—HIPOLITO

Apropos of the old masters, students of early Italian art should not fail to read in the current number of "Art in America," the essay in which Mr. Benson describes a new Botticelli. It is a tiny "Annunciation" in an American collection, that of Mr. Louis Hyde, at Glens Falls, N. Y. The theme is treated, says the critic, with "creative joy of brain and hand," and he lingers with intense appreciation over various passages in the design, one in which

The art chapter of the Adirondacks Mountain Club is giving an exhibition of photographs in the galleries of the National Arts Club, East Twentieth Street and Gramercy Park, the event to close on Wednesday. The majority of subjects, represented both in color and flat tints, portray the beauty spots in the Adirondacks. This is the first exhibition by the club, which plans to make it an annual affair with prize awards.

Miss Enid Stoddard will hold an exhibition of her miniatures, previously shown at the Royal Academy in London and at the Salon in Paris, during the month of July at Newport. The event will be under the patronage of a committee of distinguished Newport summer residents. Miss Stoddard's work was recently complimented by Queen Mary of England.

In 1875, at Fontainebleau, when Robert Louis Stevenson and Will H. Low were young men together, the artist made an open-air sketch of his friend which is commemorated in the romancer's "Forest Notes." Mr. Low gives a reproduction of it in a little pamphlet he has made, embodying a fragment from the old essay in "Corinth," a delightful note upon the painting by Christopher Morley, and some brief technical observations of his own. The portrait, at present in Mr. Low's studio at Bronxville, ought some day to be seen in this city. The pamphlet makes a welcome addition to the great mass of Stevensoniana.

Beginning on the 23d there will be on view at the Art Center an exhibition of artistically furnished interiors provided by various decorators. It will have an educational purpose in its endeavor to show that beauty can be attained with economy. The following are to co-operate in providing the exhibition: Miss Nancy McClelland, Miss Gheen, Mrs. Marjorie Sill Wickware, Mrs. Agnes Foster Wright and J. R. Bremner.

A summer show just opened at the City Club, 55 West Forty-fourth Street, consists of paintings by eleven American artists, lent by courtesy of the Babcock Gallery. Those represented are John E. Costigan, Abbott Graves, H. R. Poore, W. R. Leigh, H. A. Vincent, Paul King, George P. Ennis, Edward Dufner, A. P. Lucas, Sigurd Skou and Richard Kimbel.

REDUCTION

RATIO

14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TRIBUNE
JUN 5

Koussevitzky Plays the Moderns And Mengelberg Storms Paris

New Compositions by Prokofieff and Schmitt Given for First Time by Russian Conductor, While Dutchman Features Bach

By F. D. Perkins

Special Correspondence to The New York Herald Tribune

PARIS, May 31.

With Walter Damrosch, Willem Mengelberg and Serge Koussevitzky among those present, a roster of the conductors who have been providing Paris with its orchestral music during the last fortnight of May might almost be an extract from a prospectus of what New York is going to receive in the season of 1924-'25. Others who have directed or are about to direct concerts here are Pablo Casals and Vladimir Golschmann.

Mr. Koussevitzky, who had given an all Stravinsky program at the Opéra on the 22d (discussed in my last letter to The Herald Tribune), concluded his series of four concerts last Thursday night with another program which might cause some startled glances if posted on a Carnegie Hall billboard. Not, indeed, the opening Concerto Grosso of Archangelo Corelli, of the vintage of 1712; but this was followed by two "Mirages," by Florent Schmitt; Prokofieff's "Sept, ils sont sept!" (an "incantation" for tenors, chorus and orchestra); and a repetition of the Stravinsky piano concerto, which had its public launching a week before.

The Corelli work, in C minor, the third of a series of concerti grossi published in 1712 in Rome, was styled "first hearing," although it would seem strange that, even if "completely forgotten, in spite of its great interest and importance," the work should not have been given somewhere during the last 212 years. Agreeable music, of orthodox eighteenth century type, it was played with much vigor and sonority by the musicians under Mr. Koussevitzky, who picks the players for his annual spring series from the various orchestras of Paris.

For the first hearing of Florent Schmitt's "Mirages" the audience was reminded that with the dedication of the first part, "Tristesse de Pan," to the memory of Claude Debussy, "this funeral homage must not be forgotten if one wishes to grasp the character of this piece," which, even in its original piano version, was already suggestive of orchestral possibilities. Pan, indeed, seemed a not too distant relative of the Faun who dreamed through Debussy's indolent Afternoon, but more melancholy, with his original plaintive mood becoming agitated, and then relapsing to its former mild, melodious wistfulness. The second one, "La Tragique Chevauchée," had for its program an excerpt from Byron's "Mazeppa," and followed this almost too faithfully, with an incessant galloping figure running practically from beginning to end—with comparatively little else. But applause was fervid, and Mr. Koussevitzky waved to Mr. Schmitt, who duly rose to bow his thanks.

Prokofieff's "Sept, ils sont sept!" was a far from beautiful but an unusual and striking work, with music that effectively reproduced and enhanced the sentiment of its weird, uncanny text. This was a poem by the Russian Constantin Balmont, inspired by an inscription found on the wall of a temple in Akkad, in the region of Babylon, which is a prayer or incantation against seven sexless demons, the authors of all evil. In chorus and orchestra it was sharp, high-pitched, penetrating music, of which the opening outburst seemed the very apotheosis of discord. Then the tenor, H. Fabert, began his lines in a hushed undertone which later became a shout, none of the voices being granted anything that could be considered song. The incantation continued upon the same theme, [illegible] numerous articles and essays have been published concerning this typically American form of musical composition. Recently, in an interview which Serge Koussevitsky gave in Paris, he declared that it represented American musical invention more truly than any other form of musical composition that we have produced.

The Dutch, headed by Willem Mengelberg, conquered Paris, for the time being, last week, when six concerts at the Champs Elysées by the Concertgebouw Orchestra and the Toonkunst Choral Society, both of Amsterdam. Mr. Mengelberg gave three performances of the Bach St. Matthew Passion, two of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony and a Franco-Dutch program which brought two familiar Philharmonic numbers: Mr. Mengelberg's own Prelude and Ravel's "La Valse." The final number, Fauré's Requiem, had an interesting and effective arrangement of the singers in the center, surrounded by the orchestra.

The performance of the Ninth Symphony, on May 23, offered an interesting opportunity to compare the two orchestras which serve under the Dutch conductor. The Concertgebouw is a remarkable orchestra, and played with a fullness and richness of tone, a precision, zest and spirit in their response to Mr. Mengelberg, which would bring high praise on either side of the Atlantic. Whether or not it excelled the Philharmonic would need further hearings to decide—it seemed, on the whole, a dead heat.

The huge chorus, numbering about 350, did remarkable work, with a tone which held its strength and volume in the highest notes. The solo soprano, Mlle. Mia Peltenberg, also was able to preserve an unbroken tone. The solo tenor was an old friend, Jacques [illegible]

PART FIVE

A Leader of True Ability

trans. Lat. Aug. 23

Serge Koussevitsky, the Man and the Conductor, Who Comes to Fill the Position of Muck and Monteux When the Symphonic Season Opens in Boston

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY, who is to take charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this winter, was born in Tver (North Russia) in 1874. He received his first musical education at home. What the nature or the extent of it may have been I do not know, but at the mature age of twelve he became chef d'orchestre in the theatre of his natal town, a post which he held for two years. His duties were to compose whatever music might be required for the plays put on at the theatre, and to conduct the entr'acts. At fourteen he went to Moscow to continue his studies. According to the regulations of the Conservatoire, the stipendiares of the orchestral class had to choose, for special study, one of the brass instruments or the double bass. Koussevitsky chose the latter, becoming the pupil of the celebrated Rambaussec. On the double b[illegible] he soon developed an extraordinary facility: he not only became the double bass soloist in the orchestra of the Imperial Opera at Moscow, but succeeded his teacher as professor of the instrument at the Conservatoire. For ten years he toured Russia and Western Europe as a contrabass virtuoso, and composed a number of works for the instrument—including a concerto—that are now part of the repertoire of every contrabassist.

His main ambition, however, was all along to be a conductor. In 1907 he formed, out of the pupils of the Berlin Hochschule für Musik, an orchestra with which he worked for two years, studying chiefly the classics and Wagner. He returned to Russia in 1909, and organized the Koussevitsky orchestra that soon became so famous: it was made up of the best players from the other Russian orchestras. The men were engaged by the year and were barred from giving their services to any other organization, or at any other concerts than those of the Koussevitsky. For the performance of the choral works given at his Moscow concerts he formed a mixed choir of 250 voices; in Petrograd he used for this purpose the celebrated Archangelesky Choir. The formal Moscow and Petrograd season ending at Easter, Koussevitsky in the spring gave Beethoven festivals, Bach festivals, Tchaikowsky festivals, Rimsky-Korsakov festivals, etc., in the two capitol towns. In the summer for many years he toured the provinces with his orchestra, taking it and various distinguished soloists into villages that not only never heard an orchestra before but not even had seen certain of the instruments; his annual voyages down the Volga with this company of musicians were among the most romantic events of the musical life of our time. In this way he introduced a number of classical and modern works to thousands who otherwise would never have h[illegible] a bar of them.

One of his objects throughout his career has been to break away from routine. In those great years between 1907 and the outbreak of the war he introduced a number of novelties, native and foreign, to the Russian public, including works by Debussy, Ravel, Fanelli, Florent Schmitt, Paul Dukas, Roger Ducasse, Bruckner, Mahler, Bantock, Taneiev, Prokoviev and others. He gave Russian audiences their first introduction to Strawinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" and Scriabine's Third and Fifth Symphonies ("The Divine Poem" and "Prometheus"). He was first to make a popular success of Scriabine's "Poem of Ecstasy," which till then had not been understood. He gave the still unpublished "Après la lecture d'un Psaume" of Taneiev (for soli, orchestra and chorus), which is as yet unknown in Europe; Rachmaninov's "The Bells"; several early works of Prokoviev; works of the Polish Karlovicz, Szymanovsky, etc.

During the early part of the war he still managed to carry on. Most of the members of his own orchestra had been called up for service; but he continued to give concerts at Moscow and Petrograd with other orchestras, performing such works as the Ninth Symphony and the D-Major Mass of Beethoven, the B-Minor Mass of Bach, and so on. After the revolution in 1917 he was appointed director of the Russian State orchestras. He remained in Russia until 1920, when he left his native country to settle in Western Europe.

In 1921 he founded those Paris concerts of his that are now so famous. During the four years from 1921 to 1924 he has given annually in Paris two seasons of four concerts each, at which he has introduced a large number of Russian and other novelties. The long list of his Parisian first performances includes Debussy's "Sarabande et Danse" (orchestrated by Ravel), Florent Schmitt's "Reves," Milhaud's "Deuxième Suite de Prothée," Honegger's 'Horace Victorieux," "Chant de Joie" and "Pacific," Magnard's Fourth symphony, Bax's "Garden of Fand," Malipiero's "Pause del Silenzio" and "Impressioni da Vero," Respighi's "Antiche Danse ed Aeri," Roussel's symphony (op. 23), Gretchaninov's 'Liturgie de St. Jean Chrysostôme," "Liadov's "Kikimora," Rimsky-Korsakov's "La Bataille de Kerjeneitz," "Le Vol du Bourdon" and suite from "Tzar Saltan," Prokoviev's "Symphonie Classique," Second and Third piano concertos, violin concerto, "Scythian Suite," and "Sept, ils sont sept" (for tenor, orchestra and chorus), Scriabine's "Prometheus" and "Poem of Ecstasy," Strawinsky's octet, "Le Sacre du Printemps" and "Le Roi des Etoiles," Tansmann's "Legende," and many other new works and rediscovered or rearranged classics, such as the curious little symphony by Riegel, a Boccherini symphony in D major, Locatelli's great "Symphonie Funèbre," etc., etc. He soon became extremely popular in London, and has conducted in several other English and Scotch towns, in Barcelona, Madrid, Rome, Berlin, Warsaw, etc. At Barcelona he both conducted and staged a number of Russian operas—Rimsky-Korsakov's "Snow Malden," Tchaikowsky's "Pique-Dame," Moussorgski's 'Boris Godounov," and Borodin's "Prince Igor." In Paris he has given "Boris Godounov" and "Khovantchina."

To this record of the external life of Koussevitsky it may be added that in 1909 he and his wife founded the publishing business of "L'Edition Russe de Musique," the object of which was partly to give the younger Russian composers of talent an opportunity that otherwise might not have come their way, partly to prevent the exploitation that people of this kind have sometimes to submit to at the hands of purely commercial publishing houses. More recently the old Russian business of Gutheil & Co. was also taken over. The works published by N. & S. Koussevitzky include some of the chief works of Scriabine (including "Prometheus"); Strawinsky's "Petrouchka," "Le Sacre du Printemps," "Le Rossignol," the octet; the "Chant du Rossignol," "Pulcinella," the chamber music works, and (now in the press) "Mavra," the "Symphonies for Wind Instruments," and the piano concerto; Prokoviev's Second and Third piano concertos, the violin concerto, the "Rhapsodie Juive," the "Scythian Suite," the opera "L'Amour des Trois Oranges," the ballet "Chout," etc.; a number of Rachmaninov's works, including the three piano concertos, "The Bells," "The Island of the Dead," etc.; many works by Gretchaninov, Medtner, Rimsky-Korsakov, Siloti, etc.; and some theoretical treatises, including Rimsky-Korsakov's book on orchestration.

America will find Koussevitzky's musicianship and his orchestral technique equal to any demands that are likely to be made on them. The question is not as to his competence, but what will be thought of his readings. Opinions will differ about him, as they do about every conductor. I can speak only of the impression he has made on myself after experience of him in music of all schools and all orders. He has a volcanic temperament, but I have never yet known it to run away with him. I have often found myself disagreeing with him; but I have never disagreed with him on the score that he had lost control over his own fire. On the contrary, it is precisely when his temperament is at boiling point that his hand on the regulator is steadiest and surest. When I have disagreed with him most acutely has been in moments when, I was pretty certain, the fire had, for purely physical reasons, gone out. I particularly remember a performance of Brahms's Third Symphony in which he took the third movement at so slow a pace that its real character seemed to me to be completely perverted; the gentle, unassuming, half-sad, half-playful poco allegretto became a brooding andante—almost an adagio. I am not in Koussevitsky's secrets. It is just possible that this is really how the third movement strikes him. But until I hear him play it again in the same way I shall prefer to believe the explanation to be simply that he was tired, and had no idea how slow the tempo really was. He takes an enormous amount out of himself when he conducts, and the wonder to me always is how he manages to get through the quantity of work he does, and to keep his nerves so steady and his head so cool through it all.

Richard Strauss once astonished the world by saying à propos of "Tristan," 'Believe me, the brain that could pour out that passionate music must have been as cold as ice." What seems like paradox in this, however, is no more than sober truth. The more an artist is on fire, the cooler have to be the head and hand that direct the fire. Koussevitsky has this central ice in an exaraordinary degree. I believe it would hardly be possible to raise some works to a higher pitch of nervous incandescence than he does; but the nervousness never gets out of hand. It is Koussevitsky's servant, not his master. The excitement is always perfectly under control; one great plastic line runs round and through the work.

American audiences will no doubt soon have an opportunity of testing the truth of this statement for themselves in such a work as Scriabine's "Poem of Ecstasy." Nervous excitement could hardly go further; yet there is never the least suggestion of nervous derangement. The music is hysterical, but not the performance. The distinction needs insisting on because it is too often forgotten when judging a conductor. We do not blame a Salvini because he shows us Lear mad. Lear is mad. But to assume that, because the actor shows us a mad Lear, he himself is mad, would be, as John Stuart Mill would say, to argue that because there is pepper in the soup there must be pepper in the cook. There are certain musical works that were born in a nervous excitement bordering on hysteria, and it is the conductor's business to reproduce for us the state of the composer's mind when he wrote the work. But it is possible to handle a hysterical patient, or to make him the subject of a lecture on hysteria, without being hysterical yourself; indeed, the cooler you are the better will your lecture be, and the more your audience will understand of the true nature of hysteria. Koussevitzky keeps the "Poem of Ecstasy" in a perpetual seethe, but there is no chaos in it, rather a cosmic shapeliness and orderliness.

Some of Koussevitzky's tempi may appear on the slow side as measured by the metronome, but one gets no feeling of dragging, because of the intellectual control that sees the end in the beginning, and plans everything perfectly to scale. His "Tristan" Prelude and Liebstode may serve as an example of this. I do not wish, however, to convey the impression that it is only in music of the romantic or nervous order that he shines. His tastes are exceedingly catholic, and I have found his Haydn and his Boccherini as masterly as his Scraibine or Strawinsky. In genuinely classic music, indeed, his plastic line is even surer and firmer than in Romantic. In the latter he seems inclined now and then to "dramatize" more than the music will quite stand. In Strauss's "Don Juan," for instance, many people think that he takes the Donna Anna section rather too slowly. The explanation seems to be that he mentally dramatizes the character. Instead of speaking from the outside he lets it speak for itself. Donna Anna, thus, as it were, states her own case, tells her own story—and takes her own time about it, as she would do on the stage.

Had I the requisite space, I would like to argue again here a thesis I put forward a little while ago when discussing Weingartner's and Koussevitsky's London performances of the ninth symphony—that Koussevitsky's Beethoven is the genuine classic and Weingartner's the Romantic.

The popular belief, of course, is to the contrary—that the sober elderly German shown us in the ordinary German reading is the true Beethoven, while the volcanic spirit that Koussevitsky makes of him is only Koussevitsky himself. I believe this to be a fallacy. The classic is never a classic to himself; he only becomes a classic to later generations. To himself he is a very lively, ardent Romantic. To make for yourself a fancy picture of this classic, a hundred years after his death, and to insist on his behaving himself in the decorous way you think that classics ought to behave, is really to romanticize him. Koussevitsky, by playing the ninth symphony as if it had been written yesterday by a powerful genius whose muscles were twice the size of an ordinary man, gives us, I contend, a Beethoven in which Beethoven would recognize himself. Koussevitsky's reading, therefore is the genuinely classic one; it reproduces for us the vigor and [illegible]

WEDDING INVITATIONS AND ANNOUNCEMENTS
LATEST STYLES
CORRECT FORMS
RIGHT PRICES
Wards
STATIONERS
57-61 FRANKLIN ST - BOSTON

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE Providence
R. I.
News
ISSUE OF
AUG 23 1924

MODERN MUSICAL DIRECTOR FAMOUS AS FILM CONDUCTOR

William A. Krauch, who arrived in Providence last week to assume his duties as musical and production director and conductor of the de luxe presentations and of the symphony orchestra at the Modern Theatre, beginning Saturday afternoon, Aug. 30, when that house reopens with "The Sea Hawk," is the foremost musical director in this country. He comes to the Modern Theatre, whose management has placed him under a long-term contract, direct from the Strand Theatre in New York, where he was associate to Conductor Carl Eduard and Managing Director Joe Plunkett.

Professor Krausch has been associate conductor of the Strand Theatre for more than two years. He is a native of Boston, where his family lives. However, he is moving his home to this city next week. He is a master of every musical instrument and has composed many successful symphonies, operettas and popular melodies, although his chief claim to fame is as conductor of symphony orchestras. For some time he was one of the foremost members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and before that he was conductor and director of the famous Boston Opera Company.

Professor Krauch was born in Boston and received his musical education at the New England Conservatory there and abroad. Following his Boston Symphony engagements he assumed charge of the musical direction of the Orpheum Theater there and later introduced the de luxe presentation idea for the first time at the Park Theatre, also in the Hub city. In 1914 he toured the country as musical director of road shows of the D. W. Griffith picture, "The Birth of a Nation," and from there went to the Winter Garden in New York, where he directed the Winter Garden "Passing Shows" orchestra. From there he went to the Amsterdam Theatre, to become musical director of Flo Ziegfeld's "Follies." From there he went to the Strand Theatre as associate to Conductor Carl Eduard.

had for its creator and for the men of his day, not this [illegible] and slickened down through a century of false idealization. However, my Australian friends will soon have plentiful opportunities of deciding this and other questions concerning Koussevitsky for themselves.

ERNEST NEWMAN

[Reprinted from the American Mercury for]

81

INFORMATION OBSCURED

81

THIS CLIPPING FROM WILMINGTON, DEL.
EVERY EVE
AUG 1924

MODERN MUSIC MASTER TO WIELD BOSTON BATON

New Russian School Will Have Sympathetic Rendering, While Classics May Shine in New Light Reflected From Koussevitsky's Modernism; Wonderful Vitality Credited to His Readings Due to Union of Idealism With Sound Musicianship.

BY CHARLES W. CANFIELD.

Serge Koussevitsky, who is to direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra this winter is the subject of an article in the American Mercury, written by Ernest Newman.

At the age of twelve Koussevitsky became leader of the orchestra at the theatre in his native town, Tver, North Russia. He later specialized on the double-bass and acquired the reputation of a noted virtuoso of this instrument, touring his native country and Western Europe.

He later organized his own orchestra, made up from the best players from other Russian orchestras, and a mixed choir of 250 voices, and in 1921 founded a series of concerts in Paris which at once made a sensation, at which he introduced a number of novelties, including works of Scriabine. Strowinsky Tanciev, Gretchaninov and other moderns.

With his wife he established a music publishing business in the efforts to encourage the younger composers of his nationality.

He is credited by Newman with a "volcanic temperament," but a cool head and hand. The temperament enables him to "raise some works to a high pitch of nervous incandescence," notably Scriabines "Poem of Ectasy, which he keeps in a perpetual seethe," though without chaos, rather a cosmic shapeliness and orderliness."

As with every leader of original talent, his interpretations are not always agreed with by critics, but that is no new condition. At all events his appearance here will add a new interest to the coming season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CLEVELAND, OHIO
PRESS
AUG 22 1924

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
TRAVELER
Boston, Mass.
AUG 23 1924

Modern

George Koussevitsky will direct the Boston Orchestra this coming season of 1924-1925.

For a year or two this page has been printing news of modern music of the sort which the more conservative supporters of symphony concerts deprecate as ultra-modern. This is the music which seems to have reached its most interesting development in the compositions by Stravinsky.

This composer's striking music was the concert success of last season in New York, where it was played by several New York orchestras as well as the Philadelphia Orchestra. But only timid approaches to the new interest in music were ventured in Cleveland.

Boston is to hear much of the moderns this coming season, one may assume. For Koussevitzky was the prophet of the moderns while he directed symphony concerts in Russia and during the last three seasons in Paris. Will music continue to look backward in Cleveland?

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS
AUG 23 1924

It is strange, indeed, that "jazz" music is taking such a strong hold upon the American musician that numerous articles and essays have been published concerning this typically American form of musical composition. Recently, in an interview which Serge Koussevitsky gave in Paris, he declared that it represented American musical invention more truly than any other form of musical composition that we have produced.

PART FIVE

A Leader of True Ability

trans. Sat. Aug. 23

Serge Koussevitsky, the Man and the Co

Edison at Montpelier

Montpelier, Vt., Aug. 23—Thomas A. Edison, accompanied by Mrs. Edison, has arrived from Portsmouth, N. H. Henry Ford and Harvey S. Firestone, who were with the inventor for the past week during a trip through northern New England, were not with Mr. Edison on this detour. Mr. Edison said he had been watching the country in this vicinity for possibilities of water-power development.

BIG ENOUGH TO BE SAFE

[From the Buffalo Express]

Think of a counterfeit one-dollar bill six feet long by four feet wide. If you think about it twice, the second thought will doubtless be that it is certainly big enough to be safe. That is, no one would be apt to accept it as a genuine issue. But not so the careful and exact Federal authorities.

The dollar, a rug made in Greece and reproducing a silver certificate, with finely woven portraits of Lincoln and Grant, was brought into this country on the liner King Alexander by a Greek merchant, living in Chicago. Seizure was made by Secret Service agents, who refused the name of the rug's owner. The agents explained it was illegal to reproduce currency in any manner.

It is nice to know that our interests are so carefully guarded. But we would get along just as well if our guardian angels were not so foolish sometimes.

Will Soon Go to the Mountains

Mr. and Mrs. Henry V. Cunningham, Miss Winifred A. Cunningham and Henry V. Cunningham, Jr., will leave their cottage on University lane, Manchester, next week, for a trip through the mountains and Maine, returning to the shore for the autumn.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE Providence
R. I.
News
ISSUE OF
AUG 23 1924

MODERN MUSICAL DIRECTOR FAMOUS

The bronze statue of the Pilgrim maiden which will be erected at Plymouth, as a gift from the National Society of New England Women will be unveiled Sept. 4, at 2 P. M., with appropriate ceremonies. Mrs. Eugene J. Grant of Brooklyn, N. Y., president general of the National Society, will present the statue which is to stand in Brewster Park, a small plot of ground back of the postoffice. The statue will be unveiled by Mrs. Richard Henry Green of New York, a past president of the society. Music will be furnished by the Plymouth Band.

A banquet will be served at seven o'clock that evening at Hotel Pilgrim with leaders of various patriotic societies of America as guests of honor. The governors of the New England States and their wives, also past presidents of the National Society have been invited. Boston and Hartford Colonies have charge of the local arrangements. Mrs. Frederick C. Parchert of Brookline is chairman of the banquet and hospitality committee. Tickets for the banquet may be obtained from Mrs. Gilbert Hatheway, 94 Squantum street, Atlantic. Headquarters will be at Hotel Pilgrim. Those desiring rooms in private homes can obtain them by addressing Mrs. J. R. Fitzgerald, 9 Town square, Plymouth.

The figure will be a noteworthy addition to the collection of memorials erected at Plymouth. It is eight feet six inches in height and rests on a twelve-ton boulder with a concrete foundation. It is designed to commemorate those women and young girls whose courage and fortitude helped to found this republic and whose virtues the National Society wishes to perpetuate. Henry H. Kitson is the sculptor.

NOBODY'LL EVER LIVE TO SEE THAT

[From the Toledo Blade]

What we would like to live long enough to see is a so-called people's friend who doesn't want office.

Kitson's "Pilgrim Maiden" to Be Unveiled by National Society at Plymouth on Sept. 4

GIFT OF NEW ENGLAND WOMEN

Mr. Charles J. Connick held Thursday and Friday of this week an informal exhibition of stained glass at his studio in Harcourt street. The complete Chancel window for Harmony Grove Cemetery Chapel, Salem, was displayed. The central panel of this group was exhibited at the Boston Museum of Fine Arts a short time ago, together with several of the aisle windows of the same chapel.

Stained Glass

Good Taste Will Win

By GEORGE W. STEWART

Manager of Music Festivals; Former Member Boston Symphony Orchestra

LIKE the Yankee that I am, might answer the question by asking another: Is American automobiling hopelessly jagged? The one is as likely as the other. In either case the condition is serious. The country is infested with purveyors and perpetrators of jazz, ignorant, impudent creatures, respecting neither rule of composition nor tradition of performance; just as the highways are infested with reckless, irresponsible, drunken persons, too often ignorant of the fundamental principles of driving, disregarding wholly the unwritten laws of common courtesy.

Neither the one nor the other destroys confidence in the ultimate outcome.

The sobering influence of a legion of sincere American composers, together with the ever increasing desire for really good music played by real orchestras for pictures, is doing much to counteract the malign influence of those publishers and producers who, by shrewd tactics frequently aided and abetted by the radio and the megaphone through which their indecent offerings are shouted at bar concerts and other entertainments, are constantly unloang upon the public their unsavory wares.

Society is menaced by jazand by jag in practically equal proportion. Neither shall prail, though the struggle may be long and bitter.

The inherent good taste of the American people will eventually taboo jazz, just as respect for the written laws for safety and the unwritten rules of decency shall eliminate from our highways the driver with jag.

THE LOSS OF GOOD HEALTH IS A WRETCHED EXPERIENCE

Stop eating meat, eat wholesome fresh fish. Physicians everywhere agree upon this one point. Too much meat is injurious. Fish is a simple wholesome diet, one that will agree with you, make you feel alert and energetic. Roth Fulton Market, 36 East Fourth Street.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

81

THIS CLIPPING FROM WILMINGTON, DEL.
EVERY EVE
AUG 1924

MODERN MUSIC MASTER TO WIELD BOSTON BATON

New Russian School Will Have Sympathetic Rendering, While Classics May Shine in New Light Reflected From Koussevitsky's Modernism; Wonderful Vitality Credited to His Readings Due to Union of Idealism With Sound Musicianship.

BY CHARLES W. CANFIELD.

Serge Koussevitsky, who is to direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra this winter is the subject of an article in the American Mercury, written by Ernest Newman.

At the age of twelve Koussevitsky became leader of the orchestra at the theatre in his native town, Tver, North Russia. He later specialized on the double-bass and acquired the reputation of a noted virtuoso of this instrument, touring his native country and Western Europe.

He later organized his own orchestra, made up from the best players from other Russian orchestras, and a mixed choir of 250 voices, and in 1921 founded a series of concerts in Paris which at once made a sensation, at which he introduced a number of novelties, including works of Scriabine. Strowinsky Tanciev, Gretchaninov and other moderns.

With his wife he established a music publishing business in the efforts to encourage the younger composers of his nationality.

He is credited by Newman with a "volcanic temperament," but a cool head and hand. The temperament enables him to "raise some works to a high pitch of nervous incandescence," notably Scriabines "Poem of Ectasy, which he keeps in a perpetual seethe," though without chaos, rather a cosmic shapeliness and orderliness."

As with every leader of original talent, his interpretations are not always agreed with by critics, but that is no new condition. At all events his appearance here will add a new interest to the coming season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CLEVELAND, OHIO
PRESS
AUG 22 1924

Modern

George Koussevitsky will direct the Boston Orchestra this coming season of 1924-1925.

For a year or two this page has been printing news of modern music of the sort which the more conservative supporters of symphony concerts deprecate as ultra-modern. This is the music which seems to have reached its most interesting development in the compositions of Stravinsky.

This composer's striking music was the concert success of last season in New York, where it was played by several New York orchestras as well as the Philadelphia Orchestra. But only timid approaches to the new interest in music were ventured in Cleveland.

Boston is to hear much of the moderns this coming season, one may assume. For Koussevitzky, the prophet of the moderns who he directed symphony concerts in Russia and during the last three seasons in Paris. Will music continue to look backward in Cleveland?

ESTABLISHED 1801
From
TRAVELER
Boston, Mass.
AUG 23 1924

FASHIONS

ribbon cocardes, and feather ornamentation are so far the outstanding characteristics of new importations. In one collection almost every hat showed matching trims. In another black hatters' plush was combined with salmon-tinted velvet or a twist of flame-colored

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS
AUG 23 1924

It is strange, indeed, that "jazz" music is taking such a strong hold upon the American musician that numerous articles and essays have been published concerning this typically American form of musical composition. Recently, in an interview which Serge Koussevitsky gave in Paris, he declared that it represented American musical invention more truly than any other form of musical composition that we have produced.

PART FIVE

A Leader trans. of True Ability

Sat. Aug. 23

Serge Koussevitsky, the Man and the Conduct... Positi... W...

S... receiv... home it m... the ... d'orc... town... His ... migh... the ... At ... his ... th... orc... st... do... te... R... d... n... t... M... f... t... V... a... in... tr...

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE Providence
R. I.
News
ISSUE OF
AUG 23 1924

MODERN MUSICAL DIRECTOR FAMOUS

Kitson's "Pilgrim Maiden" to Be Unveiled by National Society at Plymouth on Sept. 4

The bronze statue of the Pilgrim maiden which will be erected at Plymouth, as a gift from the National Society of New England Women will be unveiled Sept. 4, at 2 P. M., with appropriate ceremonies. Mrs. Eugene J. Grant of Brooklyn, N. Y., president general of the National Society, will present the statue which is to stand in Brewster Park, a small plot of ground back of the postoffice. The statue will be unveiled by Mrs. Richard Henry Green of New York, a past president of the society. Music will be furnished by the Plymouth Band.

A banquet will be served at seven o'clock that evening at Hotel Pilgrim with leaders of various patriotic societies of America as guests of honor. The governors of the New England States and their wives, also past presidents of the National Society have been invited. Boston and Hartford Colonies have charge of the local arrangements. Mrs. Frederick C. Parchett of Brookline is chairman of the banquet and hospitality committee. Tickets for the banquet may be obtained from Mrs. Gilbert Waterhouse, 94 Squantum street, Atlantic. Headquarters will be at Hotel Pilgrim. Those desiring rooms in private homes can obtain them by addressing Mrs. J. R. Fitzgerald, 9 Town square, Plymouth.

The figure will be a noteworthy addition to the collection of memorials erected at Plymouth. It is eight feet six inches in height and rests on a twelve-ton boulder with a concrete foundation. It is designed to commemorate those women and young girls whose courage and fortitude helped to found this republic and whose virtues the National Society wishes to perpetuate. Henry H. Kitson is the sculptor.

[From the Toledo Blade]

NOBODY'LL EVER LIVE TO SEE THAT

What we would like to live long enough to see is a so-called people's friend who doesn't want office.

Brookline Guests en Route West

Mrs. A. C. Lemeris of Clark Road, Brookline, has had as guests her brother and sister-in-law, Mr. and Mrs. William G. Hutchison of Los Angeles, Calif., who have just returned from a seven months' trip abroad, taking the Mediterranean cruise as far as Egypt and the Holy Land and covering Continental Europe and the British Isles. They returned to Los Angeles a few days ago.

Will Soon Go to the Mountains

Mr. and Mrs. Henry V. Cunningham, Miss Winifred A. Cunningham and Henry V. Cunningham, Jr., will leave their cottage on University lane, Manchester, next week, for a trip through the mountains and Maine, returning to the shore for the autumn.

BIG ENOUGH TO BE SAFE

[From the Buffalo Express]

Think of a counterfeit one-dollar bill six feet long by four feet wide. If you think about it twice, the second thought will doubtless be that it is certainly big enough to be safe. That is, no one would be apt to accept it as a genuine issue. But not so the careful and exact Federal authorities.

The dollar, a rug made in Greece and reproducing a silver certificate, with finely woven portraits of Lincoln and Grant, was brought into this country on the liner King Alexander by a Greek merchant, living in Chicago. Seizure was made by Secret Service agents, who refused the name of the rug's owner. The agents explained it was illegal to reproduce currency in any manner.

It is nice to know that our interests are so carefully guarded. But we would get along just as well if our Guardian angels were not so foolish sometimes.

Tea Given at "Felsenmeer"

Yesterday afternoon at "Felsenmeer," the Harrison Koons Caner home at Dana's Beach, Manchester, a tea was being given in honor of Dr. and Mrs. G. Colket Caner (Mary Russell Paul), son and daughter-in-law of Mr. and Mrs. Caner.

Dinner Party at "Villa Crest"

"Villa Crest," the home of Mr. and Mrs. Walter D. Denegre in West Manchester, was the scene of a dinner party last night given in honor of house guests from Washington, Mr. and Mrs. Nelson Perin, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Spencer and Mr. and Mrs. Randall Hadner.

Stained Glass

Mr. Charles J. Connick held Thursday and Friday of this week an informal exhibition of stained glass at his studio in Harcourt street. The complete Chancel window for Harmony Grove Cemetery Chapel, Salem, was displayed. The central lancet of this group was exhibited at the Boston Museum of Fine Arts a short time ago, together with several of the aisle windows of the same chapel.

GIFT OF NEW ENGLAND WOMEN

The Pennsylvania Academy of the Fine Arts and the Philadelphia Water Color Club are already announcing that the twenty-second annual exhibition of water colors by living artists will be held at the Academy beginning Nov. 9. Work entered from the city of Boston may be sent directly to the Academy, or be delivered unpacked to Messrs. Doll and Richards, 71 Newbury street, on or before Thursday, Oct. 16. Work delivered to Doll and Richards will, at the discretion of the Academy, be judged in Boston by the Academy water color jury, or will be forwarded at the expense of the Academy to Philadelphia for judgment. Work which does not qualify for the exhibition must be promptly sent for to Messrs. Doll and Richards, upon receipt of notification of the jury's action.

two performances as well as for others.

The Pennsylvania Academy of the Fine Arts and the Philadelphia Water Color Club are already announcing that the twenty-second annual exhibition of water colors by living artists will be held at the Academy beginning Nov. 9. Work entered from the city of Boston may be sent directly to the Academy, or be delivered unpacked to Messrs. Doll and Richards, 71 Newbury street, on or before Thursday, Oct. 16. Work delivered to Doll and Richards will, at the discretion of the Academy, be judged in Boston by the Academy water color jury, or will be forwarded at the expense of the Academy to Philadelphia for judgment. Work which does not qualify for the exhibition must be promptly sent for to Messrs. Doll and Richards, upon receipt of notification of the jury's action.

Stained Glass

Mr. Charles J. Connick held Thursday and Friday of this week an informal exhibition of stained glass at his studio in Harcourt street. The complete Chancel window for Harmony Grove Cemetery Chapel, Salem, was displayed. The central lancet of this group was exhibited at the Boston Museum of Fine Arts a short time ago, together with several of the aisle windows of the same chapel.

GIFT OF NEW ENGLAND WOMEN

The Pennsylvania Academy of the Fine Arts and the Philadelphia Water Color Club are already announcing that the twenty-second annual exhibition of water colors by living artists will be held at the Academy beginning Nov. 9. Work entered from the city of Boston may be sent directly to the Academy, or be delivered unpacked to Messrs. Doll and Richards, 71 Newbury street, on or before Thursday, Oct. 16. Work delivered to Doll and Richards will, at the discretion of the Academy, be judged in Boston by the Academy water color jury, or will be forwarded at the expense of the Academy to Philadelphia for judgment. Work which does not qualify for the exhibition must be promptly sent for to Messrs. Doll and Richards, upon receipt of notification of the jury's action.

DAYTON
OHIO
JOURNAL

Igor Stravinsky May Direct America's Great Orchestras As Honored Guest Conductor

World's Outstanding Figure in Modern Composition as Composer of Futuristic Music Shows Interest in Proposal to Bring Him to United States.

By PIERRE V. R. KEY.

NEW YORK, June 21.—Quite the most important news musically in a long time is the decision of Igor Stravinsky to visit the United States, as guest coductor with one, or several, of the foremost symphony orchestras. At the moment the negotiations are at a point of suspended animation; but a contract is likely to be signed even as these words are being written. The chief obstacle appears to be the fee which Stravinsky demands. It is fantastic. Like other celebrated foreign musicians, the Russian composer of futuristic music has no slight opinion of his professional worth. No doubt, too, he is well acquainted with the money some of his distinguished confreres have been paid for waving a baton over an American symphony orchestra. So he is proceeding accordingly.

W. A. Brennan, manager of the Boston Symphony, talked with Stravinsky a few weeks ago. Brennan had gone to Europe to complete final arrangements for the coming of the Boston's new conductor, Koussevitsky, and meeting the Slav composer he sounded him out concerning a possible visit to the Hub.

Soon the news of this chat became known in those circles where orchestral activities exist; and almost immediately Stravinsky had offers from other sources.

One of these was that the New York Philharmonic, which is forging ahead steadily under the chairmanship of Clarence H. Mackay, would get Stravinsky. It would not surprise those in close touch with what is going on in the inside of big music affairs to learn that the Philharmonic would be the orchestra to first present to the American public the man who is the outstanding figure in modern composition.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1887
AUG 231924
From
TRAVELER
Boston, Mass.

A Leader of True Ability

Serge Koussevitsky, the Man and the Conductor, Who Comes to Fill the Position of Muck and Monteux When the Symphonic Season Opens in Boston

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY, who is to take charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this winter, was born in Tver (North Russia) in 1874. He received his first musical education at home. What the nature or the extent of it may have been I do not know, but at the mature age of twelve he became chef d'orchestre in the theatre of his natal town, a post which he held for two years. His duties were to compose whatever music might be required for the plays put on at the theatre, and to conduct the entr'actes. At fourteen he went to Moscow to continue his studies. According to the regulations of the Conservatoire, the stipendiares of the orchestral class had to choose, for special study, one of the brass instruments or the double bass. Koussevitsky chose the latter, becoming the pupil of the celebrated Rambaussec. On the double b he soon developed an extraordinary facility: he not only became the double bass soloist in the orchestra of the Imperial Opera at Moscow, but succeeded his teacher as professor of the instrument at the Conservatoire. For ten years he toured Russia and Western Europe as a contrabass virtuoso, and composed a number of works for the instrument—including a concerto—that are now part of the repertoire of every contrabassist.

His main ambition, however, was all along to be a conductor. In 1907 he formed, out of the pupils of the Berlin Hochschule für Musik, an orchestra with which he worked for two years, studying chiefly the classics and Wagner. He returned to Russia in 1909, and organized the Koussevitsky orchestra that soon became so famous: it was made up of the best players from the other Russian orchestras. The men were engaged by the year and were barred from giving their services to any other organization, or at any other concerts than those of the Koussevitsky. For the performance of the choral works given at his Moscow concerts he formed a mixed choir of 250 voices; in Petrograd he used for this purpose the celebrated Archangelesky Choir. The formal Moscow and Petrograd season ending at Easter, Koussevitsky in the spring gave Beethoven festivals, Bach festivals, Tchaikowsky festivals, Rimsky-Korsakov festivals, etc., in the two capitol towns. In the summer for many years he toured the provinces with his orchestra, taking it and various distinguished soloists into villages that not only never heard an orchestra before but not even had seen certain of the instruments; his annual voyages down the Volga with this company of musicians were among the most romantic events of the musical life of our time. In this way he introduced a number of classical and modern works to thousands who otherwise would never have heard a bar of them.

One of his objects throughout his career has been to break away from routine. In those great years between 1907 and the outbreak of the war he introduced a number of novelties, native and foreign, to the Russian public, including works by Debussy, Ravel, Fanelli, Florent Schmitt, Paul Dukas, Roger Ducasse, Bruckner, Mahler, Bantock, Taneiev, Prokoviev and others. He gave Russian audiences their first introduction to Strawinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" and Scriabine's Third and Fifth Symphonies ("The Divine Poem" and "Prometheus"). He was first to make a popular success of Scriabine's "Poem of Ecstasy," which till then had not been understood. He gave the still unpublished "Après la lecture d'un Psaume" of Taneiev (for soli, orchestra and chorus), which is as yet unknown in Europe; Rachmaninov's "The Bells"; several early works of Prokoviev; works of the Polish Karlovicz, Szymanovsky, etc.

During the early part of the war he still managed to carry on. Most of the members of his own orchestra had been called up for service; but he continued to give concerts at Moscow and Petrograd with other orchestras, performing such works as the Ninth Symphony and the D-Major Mass of Beethoven, the B-Minor Mass of Bach, and so on. After the revolution in 1917 he was appointed director of the Russian State orchestras. He remained in Russia until 1920, when he left his native country to settle in Western Europe.

In 1921 he founded those Paris concerts of his that are now so famous. During the four years from 1921 to 1924 he has given annually in Paris two seasons of four concerts each, at which he has introduced a large number of Russian and other novelties. The long list of his Parisian first performances includes Debussy's "Sarabande et Danse" (orchestrated by Ravel), Florent Schmitt's "Reves," Milhaud's "Deuxième Suite de Prothée," Honegger's "Horace Victorieux," "Chant de Joie" and "Pacific," Magnard's Fourth symphony, Bax's "Garden of Fand," Malipiero's "Pause del Silenzio" and "Impressioni dal Vero," Respighi's "Antiche Danse ed Arii," Rousse's symphony (op. 23), Gretchaninov's "Liturgie de St. Jean Chrysostôme," "Liadov's "Kikimora," Rimsky-Korsakov's "La Bataille de Kerjenelitz," "Le Vol du Bourdon" and suite from "Tsar Saltan," Prokoviev's "Symphonie Classique," Second and Third piano concertos, violin concerto, "Scythian Suite," and "Sept, ils sont sept" (for tenor, orchestra and chorus), Scriabine's "Prometheus" and "Poem of Ecstasy," Strawinsky's octet, "Le Sacre du Printemps" and "Le Roi des Etoiles," Tansmann's "Legende," and many other new works and rediscovered or rearranged classics, such as the curious little symphony by Riegel, a Boccherini symphony in D major, Lozatelli's great "Symphonie Funèbre," etc., etc. He soon became extremely popular in London, and has conducted in several other English and Scotch towns, in Barcelona, Madrid, Rome, Berlin, Warsaw, etc. At Barcelona he both conducted and staged a number of Russian operas—Rimsky-Korsakov's "Snow Maiden," Tchaikowsky's "Pique-Dame," Moussorgski's "Boris Godounov," and Borodin's "Prince Igor." In Paris he has given "Boris Godounov" and "Khovantchina."

To this record of the external life of Koussevitzky it may be added that in 1909 he and his wife founded the publishing business of "L'Edition Russe de Musique," the object of which was partly to give the younger Russian composers of talent an opportunity that otherwise might not have come their way, partly to prevent the exploitation that people of this kind have sometimes to submit to at the hands of purely commercial publishing houses. More recently the old Russian business of Guthell & Co. was also taken over. The works published by N. & S. Koussevitzky include some of the chief works of Scriabine (including "Prometheus"); Strawinsky's "Petrouchka," "Le Sacre du Printemps," "Le Rossignol," the octet; the "Chant du Rossignol," "Pulcinella," the chamber music works, and (now in the press) "MaMaRa," the "Symphonies for Wind Instruments," and the piano concerto; Prokoviev's Second and Third piano concertos, the violin concerto, the "Rhapsodie Juive," the "Scythian Suite," the opera "L'Amour des Trois Oranges," the ballet "Chout," etc.; a number of Rachmaninov's works, including the three piano concertos, "The Bells," "The Island of the Dead," etc.; many works by Gretchaninov, Medtner, Rimsky-Korsakov, Slioti, etc.; and some theoretical treatises, including Rimsky-Korsakov's book on orchestration.

America will find Koussevitzky's musicianship and his orchestral technique equal to any demands that are likely to be made on them. The question is not as to his competence, but what will be thought of his readings. Opinions will differ about him, as they do about every conductor. I can speak only of the impression he has made on myself after experience of him in music of all schools and all orders. He has a volcanic temperament, but I have never yet known it to run away with him. I have often found myself disagreeing with him; but I have never disagreed with him on the score that he had lost control over his own fire. On the contrary, it is precisely when his temperament is at boiling point that his hand on the regulator is steadiest and surest. When I have disagreed with him most acutely has been in moments when, I was pretty certain, the fire had, for purely physical reasons, gone out. I particularly remember a performance of Brahms's Third Symphony in which he took the third movement at so slow a pace that its real character seemed to me to be completely perverted; the gentle, reassuring, half-sad, half-playful poco allegretto became a brooding andante—almost an adagio. I am not in Koussevitzky's secrets. It is just possible that this is really how the third movement strikes him. But until I hear him play it again in the same way I shall prefer to believe the explanation to be simply that he was tired, and had no idea how slow the tempo really was. He takes an enormous amount out of himself when he conducts, and the wonder to me always is how he manages to get through the quantity of work he does, and to keep his nerves so steady and his head so cool through it all.

Richard Strauss once astonished the world by saying a propos of "Tristan," 'Believe me, the brain that could pour out that passionate music must have been as cold as ice." What seems like paradox in this, however, is no more than sober truth. The more an artist is on fire, the cooler have to be the head and hand that direct the fire. Koussevitsky has this central ice in an exaraordinary degree. I believe it would hardly be possible to raise some works to a higher pitch of nervous incandescence than he does; but the nervousness never gets out of hand. It is Koussevitsky's servant, not his master. The excitement is always perfectly under control; one great plastic line runs round and through the work.

American audiences will no doubt soon have an opportunity of testing the truth of this statement for themselves in such a work as Scriabine's "Poem of Ecstasy." Nervous excitement could hardly go further; yet there is never the least suggestion of nervous derangement. The music is hysterical, but not the performance. The distinction needs insisting on because it is too often forgotten when judging a conductor. We do not blame a Salvini because he shows us Lear mad. But to assume that, because the actor shows us a mad Lear, he himself is mad, would be, as John Stuart Mill would say, to argue that because there is pepper in the soup there must be pepper in the cook. There are certain musical works that were born in a nervous excitement bordering on hysteria, and it is the conductor's business to reproduce for us the state of the composer's mind when he wrote the work. But it is possible to handle a hysterical patient, or to make him the subject of a lecture on hysteria, without being hysterical yourself; indeed, the cooler you are the better will your lecture be, and the more your audience will understand of the true nature of hysteria. Koussevitzky keeps the "Poem of Ecstasy" in a perpetual seethe, but there is no chaos in it, rather a cosmic shapeliness and orderliness.

Some of Koussevitzky's tempi may appear on the slow side as measured by the metronome, but one gets no feeling of dragging, because of the intellectual control that sees the end in the beginning, and plans everything perfectly to scale. His "Tristan" Prelude and Liebstode may serve as an example of this. I do not wish, however, to convey the impression that it is only in music of the romantic or nervous order that he shines. His tastes are exceedingly catholic, and I have found his Haydn and his Boccherini as masterly as his Scriabine or Strawinsky. In genuinely classic music, indeed, his plastic line is even surer and firmer than in Romantic. In the latter he seems inclined now and then to "dramatize" more than the music will quite stand. In Strauss's "Don Juan," for instance, many people think that he takes the Donna Anna section rather too slowly. The explanation seems to be that he mentally dramatizes the character. Instead of speaking from the outside he lets it speak for itself. Donna Anna, thus, as it were, states her own case, tells her own story—and takes her own time about it, as she would do on the stage.

Had I the requisite space, I would like to argue again here a thesis I put forward a little while ago when discussing Weingartner's and Koussevitsky's London performances of the ninth symphony—that Koussevitsky's Beethoven is the genuine classic and Weingartner's the Romantic.

The popular belief, of course, is the contrary—that the sober elderly German shown us in the ordinary German reading is the true Beethoven, while the volcanic spirit that Koussevitsky makes of him is only Koussevitsky himself. I believe this to be a fallacy. The classic is never a classic to himself; he only becomes a classic to later generations. To himself he is a very lively, ardent Romantic. To make for yourself a fancy picture of this classic, a hundred years after his death, and to insist on his behaving himself in the decorous way you think that classics ought to behave, is really to romanticize him. Koussevitsky, by playing the ninth symphony as if it had been written yesterday by a powerful genius whose muscles were twice the size of an ordinary man's, as I contend a Beethoven had for its creator and for the men of his day, not this vigor and tension watered and slackened down through a century of false idealization. However, my American friends will soon have plentiful opportunities of deciding this and other questions concerning Koussevitsky for themselves.

ERNEST NEWMAN

[Reprinted from the American Mercury for September]

WEDDING INVITATIONS AND ANNOUNCEMENTS
LATEST STYLES
CORRECT FORMS
RIGHT PRICES
Wards
STATIONERS
67-69 FRANKLIN ST - BOSTON

NEW YORK
EVENING SUN
AUG 23 1924
AUG 23 1924

Prima Donnas of the Baton.

New York's admiration for the orchestra conductor, which has been growing during recent seasons, ought to be gratified during the coming year. If the efforts of the symphonic orchestras to prevent their listeners from growing weary of one man direction do not succeed, it will not be from the lack of conductors engaged for the purpose. The Philharmonic Society has engaged to preside over its concerts WILLEM MENGELBERG, WILLEM VAN HOOGSTRATEN, HENRY HADLEY, IGOR STRAVINSKY and WILHELM FURTWÄNGLER. There are thus two Dutchmen, a Russian and a German among the five conductors who will be in charge of the concerts of the orchestra, with one American in the person of Mr. HADLEY. New York audiences are not likely to lay much stress on nationality in artistic performances, but there are few who will not be glad to know that one native conductor appears in this list.

WALTER DAMROSCH heads the conductors of the Symphony Orchestra, of course, with BRUNO WALTER and VLADIMIR GOLSCHMANN to assist him in the course of the season, while JOSEF STRANSKY will remain at the conductor's desk at the concerts of

[illegible]
[illegible]
[illegible]

[illegible] SEVENTH AVE. NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1887
AUG 231924
From
TRAVELER
Boston, Mass.

A Leader of True Ability

Serge Koussevitsky, the Man and the Conductor, Who Comes to Fill the Position of Muck and Monteux When the Symphonic Season Opens in Boston

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY, who is to take charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this winter, was born in Tver (North Russia) in 1874. He received his first musical education at home. What the nature or the extent of it may have been I do not know, but at the mature age of twelve he became chef d'orchestre in the theatre of his natal town, a post which he held for two years. His duties were to compose whatever music might be required for the plays put on at the theatre, and to conduct the entr'acts. At fourteen he went to Moscow to continue his studies. According to the regulations of the Conservatoire, the stipendiares of the orchestral class had to choose, for special study, one of the brass instruments or the double bass. Koussevitsky chose the latter, becoming the pupil of the celebrated Rambausse. On the double bass he soon developed an extraordinary facility: he not only became the double bass soloist in the orchestra of the Imperial Opera at Moscow, but succeeded his teacher as professor of the instrument at the Conservatoire. For ten years he toured Russia and Western Europe as a contrabass virtuoso, and composed a number of works for the instrument—including a concerto—that are now part of the repertoire of every contrabassist.

His main ambition, however, was all along to be a conductor. In 1907 he formed, out of the pupils of the Berlin Hochschule für Musik, an orchestra with which he worked for two years, studying chiefly the classics and Wagner. He returned to Russia in 1909, and organized the Koussevitsky orchestra that soon became so famous: it was made up of the best players from the other Russian orchestras. The men were engaged by the year and were barred from giving their services to any other organization, or at any other concerts than those of the Koussevitsky. For the performance of the choral works given at his Moscow concerts he formed a mixed choir of 250 voices; in Petrograd he used for this purpose the celebrated Archangelesky Choir. The formal Moscow and Petrograd season ending at Easter, Koussevitsky in the spring gave Beethoven festivals, Bach festivals, Tchaikowsky festivals, Rimsky-Korsakov festivals, etc., in the two capitol towns. In the summer for many years he toured the provinces with his orchestra, taking it and various distinguished soloists into villages that not only never heard an orchestra before but not even had seen certain of the instruments; his annual voyages down the Volga with this company of musicians were among the most romantic events of the musical life of our time. In this way he introduced a number of classical and modern works to thousands who otherwise would never have heard a bar of them.

One of his objects throughout his career has been to break away from routine. In those great years between 1907 and the outbreak of the war he introduced a number of novelties, native and foreign, to the Russian public, including works by Debussy, Ravel, Fanelli, Florent Schmitt, Paul Dukas, Roger Ducasse, Bruckner, Mahler, Bantock, Taneiev, Prokoviev and others. He gave Russian audiences their first introduction to Strawinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" and Scriabine's Third and Fifth Symphonies ("The Divine Poem" and "Prometheus"). He was first to make a popular success of Scriabine's "Poem of Ecstasy," which till then had not been understood. He gave the still unpublished "Après la lecture d'un Psaume" of Taneiev (for soli, orchestra and chorus), which is as yet unknown in Europe; Rachmaninov's "The Bells"; several early works of Prokoviev; works of the Polish Karlovicz, Szymanovsky, etc.

During the early part of the war he still managed to carry on. Most of the members of his own orchestra had been called up for service; but he continued to give concerts at Moscow and Petrograd with other orchestras, performing such works as the Ninth Symphony and the D-Major Mass of Beethoven, the B-Minor Mass of Bach, and so on. After the revolution in 1917 he was appointed director of the Russian State orchestras. He remained in Russia until 1920, when he left his native country to settle in Western Europe.

In 1921 he founded those Paris concerts of his that are now so famous. During the four years from 1921 to 1924 he has given annually in Paris two seasons of four concerts each, at which he has introduced a large number of Russian and other novelties. The long list of his Parisian first performances includes Debussy's "Sarabande et Danse" (orchestrated by Ravel), Florent Schmitt's "Reves," Milhaud's "Deuxième Suite de Prothée," Honegger's "Horace Victorieux," "Chant de Joie" and "Pacific," Magnard's Fourth symphony, Bax's "Garden of Fand," Malipiero's "Pause del Silenzio" and "Impressioni dal Vero," Respighi's "Antiche Danse ed Arie," Roussel's symphony (op. 23), Gretchaninov's "Liturgie de St. Jean Chrysostôme," "Liadov's "Kikimora," Rimsky-Korsakov's "La Bataille de Kerjenitz," "Le Vol du Bourdon" and suite from "Tsar Saltan," Prokoviev's "Symphonie Classique," Second and Third piano concertos, violin concerto, "Scythian Suite," and "Sept, ils sont sept" (for tenor, orchestra and chorus), Scriabine's "Prometheus" and "Poem of Ecstasy," Strawinsky's octet, "Le Sacre du Printemps" and "Le Roi des Etoiles," Tansmann's "Legende," and many other new works and rediscovered or rearranged classics, such as the curious little symphony by Riegel, a Boccherini symphony in D major, Locatelli's great "Symphonie Funebre," etc., etc. He soon became extremely popular in London, and has conducted in several other English and Scotch towns, in Barcelona, Madrid, Rome, Berlin, Warsaw, etc. At Barcelona he both conducted and staged a number of Russian operas—Rimsky-Korsakov's "Snow Maiden," Tchaikowsky's "Pique-Dame," Moussorgski's "Boris Godounov," and Borodin's "Prince Igor." In Paris he has given "Boris Godounov" and "Khovantchina."

To this record of the external life of Koussevitsky it may be added that in 1909 he and his wife founded the publishing business of "L'Edition Russe de Musique," the object of which was partly to give the younger Russian composers of talent an

WEDDING INVITATIONS AND ANNOUNCEMENTS
LATEST STYLES
CORRECT FORMS
RIGHT PRICES
Ward's
STATIONERS
[illegible] FRANKLIN ST. BOSTON

NEW YORK
EVENING SUN
AUG 23 1924
AUG 23 1924

Prima Donnas of the Baton.

New York's admiration for the orchestra conductor, which has been growing during recent seasons, ought to be gratified during the coming year. If the efforts of the symphonic orchestras to prevent their listeners from growing weary of one man direction do not succeed, it will not be from the lack of conductors engaged for the purpose. The Philharmonic Society has engaged to preside over its concerts WILLEM MENGELBERG, WILLEM VAN HOOGSTRATEN, HENRY HADLEY, IGOR STRAVINSKY and WILHELM FURTWÄNGLER. There are thus two Dutchmen, a Russian and a German among the five conductors who will be in charge of the concerts of the orchestra, with one American in the person of Mr. HADLEY. New York audiences are not likely to lay much stress on nationality in artistic performances, but there are few who will not be glad to know that one native conductor appears in this list.

WALTER DAMROSCH heads the conductors of the Symphony Orchestra, of course, with BRUNO WALTER and VLADIMIR GOLSCHMANN to assist him in the course of the season, while JOSEF STRANSKY will remain at the conductor's desk at the concerts of the State Orchestra. ERNEST SCHELLING will conduct the concerts for children which the Philharmonic Society sponsored last year. These conductors will succeed one another at the concerts of the various orchestras which have engaged them, since the idea of one master of the baton remaining in charge of an orchestra's activities all through a season does not appear consistent with the musical taste of the day.

These ten conductors are to be permanently attached to the city's orchestras. Yet they will not be the only musicians to stand in front of their forces and reveal their readings of classic composers or their interpretations of the tempestuous moderns. Much as conductors may be desired by New York's musical audiences, there are also conductors who seek the approval of the metropolis. So from the distant regions of Lake Erie there will come the Cleveland Orchestra with NIKOLAI SOKOLOFF to give the metropolis a new taste of his mettle, while from Lake Michigan OSSIP GABILOWITSCH will journey to the more academic regions of West Fifty-seventh street that the Detroit Orchestra may show what it can do even so far from home. SERGEI KOUSSEVITZKY will interpret some of the modern composers when he comes here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and LEOPOLD STOKOWSKI will probably perform the same office by these interesting musicians of the younger generation with the Philadelphia Orchestra as his medium.

Of the conductors there is still not one and end. ARTUR BODANZKY will devote part from the more garish delights of the Metropolitan to guide the Friends of Music through some strange and rarely heard scores, while GEORGES BARREERE will conduct his little orchestra in chamber music and some novelties requiring no more complicated forces. The American National Orchestra will have HOWARD BARLOW to show how much progress this training school for musicians has made. Then ALBERT COATES, already admired here, may be counted on to bring down the Rochester Philharmonic for this city to hear, and no doubt HENRI VERBRUGGHEN will journey from Minneapolis with the orchestra he has trained there.

So the forthcoming musical season will not be lacking in these prima donnas of the baton. They are indeed more familiar and numerous today than any other kind of first ladies of music, as HANS VON BÜLOW called them.

[illegible] he had lost control over his own [illegible]. On the contrary, it is precisely when his temperament is at boiling point that his hand on the regulator is steadiest and surest. When I have disagreed with him most acutely has been in moments when, I was pretty certain, the fire had, for purely physical reasons, gone out. I particularly remember a performance of Brahms's Third Symphony in which he took the third movement at so slow a pace that its real character seemed to me to be completely perverted; the gentle, unassuming, half-sad, half-playful poco allegretto became a brooding andante—almost an adagio. I am not in Koussevitzky's secrets. It is just possible that this is really how the third movement strikes him. But until I hear him play it again in the same way I shall prefer to believe the explanation to be simply that he was tired, and had no idea how slow the tempo really was. He takes an enormous amount out of himself when he conducts, and the wonder to me always is how he manages to get through the quantity of work he does, and to keep his nerves so steady and his head so cool through it all.

Richard Strauss once astonished the world by saying à propos of "Tristan," 'Believe me, the brain that could pour out that passionate music must have been as cold as ice." What seems like paradox in this, however, is no more than sober truth. The more an artist is on fire, the cooler have to be the head and hand that direct the fire. Koussevitsky has this central ice in an exaraordinary degree. I believe it would hardly be possible to raise some works to a higher pitch of nervous incandescence than he does; but the nervousness never gets out of hand. It is Koussevitsky's servant, not his master. The excitement is always perfectly under control; one great plastic line runs round and through the work.

American audiences will no doubt soon have an opportunity of testing the truth of this statement for themselves in such a work as Scriabine's "Poem of Ecstasy." Nervous excitement could hardly go further; yet there is never the least suggestion of nervous derangement. The music is hysterical, but not the performance. The distinction needs insisting on because it is too often forgotten when judging a conductor. We do not blame a Salvini because he shows us Lear mad. Lear is mad. But it is assumed that, because the actor shows us a mad Lear, he himself is mad, would be, as John Stuart Mill would say, to argue that because there is pepper in the soup there must be pepper in the cook. There are certain musical works that were born in a nervous excitement bordering on hysteria, and it is the conductor's business to reproduce for us the state of the composer's mind when he wrote the work. But it is possible to handle a hysterical patient, or to make him the subject of a lecture on hysteria, without being hysterical yourself; indeed, the cooler you are the better will your lecture be, and the more your audience will understand of the

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
AUG 24 1924

MUSIC IN Washington

57.1.52

* * * *

ANOTHER believer in music of a lighter type is Serge Koussevitzky, one of the most popular directors in Europe, who is coming to this country to be director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the coming season. He is reported, in an interview with the Paris correspondent of The Evening Star and the North American Newspaper Alliance, to have expressed himself convinced that much that is worthy can be found even in jazz. He stated that he heard an American jazz orchestra play several compositions, which, as he termed them, were truly good.

Koussevitzky is a believer in modern music as well as in the classics. He plans to have his orchestra play, during the approaching season, numbers of compositions that are still in the manuscript stage. He believes that cotemporary composers are as able as those who have gone before. He expects that he will find here composers who, a century from now will be ranked by music lovers as the equals of Mozart and Beethoven.

His attitude will no doubt win him a great following among those who believe in present-day writers. Surely such compositions as those given at the series in the Freer Art Gallery that were among the Berkshire Festival winners cannot be denied the highest approval. If Koussevitzky uncovers works on a par with these and should they prove to be of American origin, his popularity here will no doubt parallel that which has been his in Europe, where he is acclaimed for his democracy as well as for his musicianship.

ST. PAUL, MINN.
PIONEER PRESS
AUG 24 1924

KOUSSEVITZKY ACCEPTS SYMPHONY ENGAGEMENT

Serge Koussevitzky, who comes to America this season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

[illegible] true [illegible] keeps [illegible] seeth [illegible] con- [illegible] Sym- [illegible] near- [illegible] metro- [illegible] Tragi- [illegible] rol- [illegible] and- [illegible] His [illegible] serve- [illegible] vien- [illegible] hat- [illegible] e [illegible] ate- [illegible] coun- [illegible] pass- [illegible] in [illegible] music indeed, his plastic line is even surer and firmer than in Romantic. In the latter he seems inclined now and then to "dramatize" more than the music will quite stand. In Strauss's "Don Juan," for instance, many people think that he takes the Donna Anna section rather too slowly. The explanation seems to be that he mentally dramatizes the character. Instead of speaking from the outside he lets it speak for itself. Donna Anna, thus, as it were, states her own case, tells her own story—and takes her own time about it, as she would do on the stage.

Had I the requisite space, I would like to argue again here a thesis I put forward a little while ago when discussing Weingartner's and Koussevitsky's London performances of the ninth symphony—that Koussevitsky's Beethoven is the genuine classic and Weingartner's the Romantic.

The popular belief, of course, is to the contrary—that the sober elderly German shown us in the ordinary German reading is the true Beethoven, while the volcanic spirit that Koussevitsky makes of him is only Koussevitsky himself. I believe this to be a fallacy. The classic is never a classic to himself; he only becomes a classic to later generations. To himself he is a very lively, ardent Romantic. To make for yourself a fancy picture of this classic, a hundred years after his death, and to insist on his behaving himself in the decorous way you think that classics ought to behave, is really to romanticize him. Koussevitsky, by playing the ninth symphony as if it had been written yesterday by a powerful genius whose muscles were twice the size of an ordinary man's gives us, I contend, a Beethoven [illegible]

[illegible] for its creator and for the men of [illegible]ay, not this vigor and tension watered [illegible]nickened down through a century of [illegible]idealization. However, my American [illegible]s will soon have plentiful opportuni- [illegible]r deciding this and other questions [illegible]ning Koussevitsky for themselves.

ERNEST NEWMAN

[Reprinted from the American Mercury for September]

BOSTON, MASS.
POST
AUG 28 1924

THE SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR

After Monteux, Koussevitzky. The waning of summer is a reminder that it will not be long before the gifted Russian conductor will be weighed in the scales of popular approval or disapproval. His predecessor, coming to an orchestra disorganized and faltering, faced an easier test. Koussevitzky comes to replace a leader who had recalled memories of the great days of old, who had won great popularity by actual achievement.

The Russian, whose career is interestingly outlined by Ernest Newman, a well known English critic, in the September Mercury, has been almost spectacularly successful in Russia and England, in France and Spain. Mr. Newman says that he has a volcanic temperament but that he keeps it under control always. His readings are original, provocative. They seldom arouse indifference. They win a hearer or they repulse him. They should make the Symphony programmes of the approaching winter memorable.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PITTSBURGH, PA.

POST

AUG 25 1924

Great Attractions in Edith Taylor Thomson's Concer

DUSOLINA GIANNINI WITH DE GOGORZA DEC. 11. SOPRANO | OLGA SAMAROFF PIANIST NOV. 20 | RUTH ST. DENIS DANCER MOSQUE FEB. 28. | SIGRID ONEGIN CONTRALTO OCT. 23

Edith Taylor Thomson's Pittsburgh concerts, which succeeded the Heyn concerts two seasons ago in Pittsburgh, will begin at Carnegie Music Hall Thursday evening, October 23, and in a series of five attractions four will be presented at Carnegie Music Hall and the fifth and final attraction of the season will be presented at Syria Mosque. The opening attraction in this series will be a song recital by Mme. Sigrid Onegin, one of the most famous of living contraltos. Gifted with a glorious voice and fine stage presence Mme. Onegin, who made her Pittsburgh appearance last season as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be warmly welcomed in this, her first recital here. Mme. Onegin made her operatic debut with Caruso in "Carmen" in 1913, and though it was her third appearance on any stage she won critical Stuttgart at once by her rich and flexible voice, her dramatic fire and her youth.

Olga Samaroff, an American pianist, trained entirely in her own country, and who now stands as one of the world's greatest pianists, will be the second attraction in the series, appearing at Carnegie Music Hall on Thursday evening, November 20. Despite her Russian name, which is that of her maternal great-grandmother, Mme. Samaroff is the daughter of an officer in the United States army and was born at the army post of San Antonio.

At the third concert, which takes place at Carnegie Music Hall on Thursday evening, December 11, two artists of note will be presented, one, Dusolina Giannini, soprano, as yet unknown to Pittsburgh, the other Emile de Gogorza, baritone, a well-known favorite. Giannini is one of the few artists of the world who achieved fame at her first public appearance. Owing to the illness of Miss Anna Case, soloist for the concert of the Schola Cantorum in New York, in March, 1922, Miss Giannini was permitted by her illustrious teacher, Marcella Sembrich, to fill the vacancy. Her success on that occasion is world history and she awoke next morning to find herself famous.

Mischa Elman, distinguished Russian violinist, will be the attraction at the fourth concert in the series. Since he first came to America Elman has held a place all his own, and his name stands high among the violinists of the world. Great beauty of tone and splendid technique distinguish his playing, and his pitch is impeccable. His concert will be at Carnegie Music Hall, Thursday evening, February 12.

The fifth and closing attraction of the series will be given at Syria Mosque. Ruth St. Denis, Ted Shawn and the famous Denishawn Dancers will present the program. Pittsburgh knows this fine organization, but has yet to learn its artistic merit, for never before has it been presented in an auditorium where proper scenic effects are possible. The dance program will be given on Saturday evening, February 28.

ST. PAUL, MINN.

PIONEER PRESS

AUG 24 1924

NOTED RUSSIAN MUSICIAN IS TO DIRECT BOSTON SYMPHONY

Serge Koussevitzky Reveals Interesting Personality in Discussing His Musical Aspiration, Trials and Successes.

Paris, France, Aug. 23.—"What I hope to do in America is to show the public that masterpieces of music are being written today as powerful, stirring, and beautiful as the greatest of the past," says Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor who will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra this coming season.

"I will present in Boston music never heard before," he said, "music which now exists only in manuscripts which I have in my keeping."

Music lovers in the French capital have gone mad over the Russian leader.

But it is not alone for his introduction of new composers that they storm the doors of the Theatre Nationale de l'Opera for all his concerts.

America may be sure that Koussevitzky will present its musical public with auditions of the older classics, without a trace of modernity in his reading of them, their historic beauties reproduced painstakingly and enthusiastically.

America also may be sure that this man will be engaged during his entire stay in America on a passionate hunt for musical genius resident or native in the new world.

"Jazz music?" (he was answering a query). "I like all good music. And several Americans have written jazz which is truly good.

"I was in London recently," he continued, "and dropped in late at night for something to eat at a supper club where dancing was going on. There was an orchestra of American boys there. The oldest could not have been more than 30. Some of those boys were improvising as they went along, and they were great players. I stayed until a shockingly late hour. Those boys were fine musicians, but I learned that they were not particularly notable among America's jazz musicians—just a group of college students from one of your Western states."

Mr. Koussevitzky is married. His wife is musical. Mrs. Koussevitzky is the sort of person to whom the young Russian composers dedicate their most ambitious works. A species of goddess, for Scriabin, Stravinsky and their fellows. She has great sympathy for them, is a tireless listener, an able and appreciative critic. She is more than well-to-do. She has published the music of more than one hungry genius, and has supplied food to many others.

In appearance, manner and dress, Mr. Koussevitzky might be a successful, middle-aged business man—a forceful figure of no eccentricities, of middle height, stocky, unathletic.

The fact is, Mr. Koussevitzky is an evangelist and a showman. He would appreciate both Billy Sunday and P. T. Barnum.

This is what he told an interviewer of a trip he used to take in pre-war Russia with an orchestra of 100 players, in a steamboat on the Volga.

"I carried music through a vast section of Russia," he said. "Once every two years before the war I used to charter a big steamer and make a journey of 2,500 miles. We stopped at every big city and many small towns. The peasants would flock to the river from villages for miles back into the country which few Europeans have ever seen. And I took them the best that exists in music, new and old. Debussy, Ravel, Florent Schmitt, P. Dukas, Roger Ducasse, Elgar, Richard Strauss. I made them known in villages where there isn't any modern life as Europe and America know it.

"They were marvelous, those journeys. They are not possible any more."

When he was fourteen, he entered the conservatoire of the Moscow Philharmonic Society as a student of composition and orchestral conducting. In order to qualify for a scholarship he studied the double bass and became such a master of that resounding instrument that upon the termination of his study he obtained a post at the Moscow Imperial Opera. For several years thereafter he appeared in the principal cities of Russia as a double bass virtuoso.

He never lost sight of his real aim, to conduct a great orchestra. In 1909, after an intensive study of the interpretation of classics and moderns in an orchestra formed by him in Berlin from students of the Berlin High School of Music, he returned to Russia and established his own symphony orchestra in Moscow. This body of musicians quickly became famous all over Russia so that its appearance in Petrograd was always one of the great events of the court season. It was with this group of players with which Koussevitzky toured the Volga.

Then came the war. The first revolution, that of 1917, did not disturb him. He was appointed general conductor of the Russian State Orchestra by the provisional government established by Kerensky. This orchestra formerly was the court orchestra.

Then came the Bolshevik uprising.

"Life in Russia is impossible," he concludes. "There is no chance for artistic endeavor. I tried. I gave concerts in rooms that were freezing. The brass players wore mittens. You can't do it. It's impossible. Everything has gone to pieces."

Mr. Koussevitzky gave me a list of the music which he was the first to perform in Paris and which he will bring to America. But Mr. Koussevitzky says he will not force any particular kind of music down the throats of his listeners. He will experiment to find what his audiences like.

The Koussevitzky first performances which include works by Debussy, Roland-Manuel, Florent Schmitt, Milhaud, Honegger, Ravel, Magnard, Bax, Arnold Reed, Holbrooke, Malpiero, Respighi, Tansman, Delage, Roussel, Cretchaninoff, Moussorgsky, Borodin, Kastalsky, Liadov, Rachmaninoff, Rimsky-Korsakov, Prokofieff, Scriabin, Starvinsky, Vivaldi, Riegel, Boccherini, Stammnitz, Polaci, Locatelli, Corelli, Brahms, Hugo Wolff, Manuel de Falla and Lily Boulanger.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK TRIBUNE

JUN 2 21924

The Russians Invade America; Some of Their Plans Disclosed

Intrepid Secret Agent, in Guise of Music Reporter, Learns From Stravinsky and Koussevitzky What They Intend to Do to Us Next Season

By F. D. Perkins

PARIS.

Igor Stravinsky, who has just launched his new piano concerto upon the loudly approving musical public of Paris, intends to visit America next winter—or, at least, he was proposing to do so on the morning of Memorial Day. The exact details have not yet been decided, but Mr. Stravinsky expects to arrive next January or February. He would appear, presumably, as pianist, and also as conductor in his own numbers; for, as he remarked to the writer, he considered himself to be, on the whole, the best interpreter of his own orchestral compositions.

* * *

The amazing Russian, a slim, spare, white-flanneled figure on this warm Paris morning, lost a slightly languid air when he spoke of his music, talking of his works and his views with a notable confidence, as one who knew just what he was doing, and why. Interested in hearing about the success of "Le Sacre du Printemps" in New York, he pointed out that, since the completion of that work, he had radically changed the character of his compositions. He now used far smaller bodies of instruments, he said, and produced music of a more classic form, not drawing on external sources (such as a "program") for his emotion, but letting the emotion which lay in the music itself suffice. Of works in this latest manner, which might be considered to have been developed by 1920, Mr. Stravinsky gave the following list:

Symphonies for wind instruments;

Concerto for four-stringed instruments (played in America by the Flonzaley Quartet);

Opera, "Mavra";

Octuor for wind instruments;

Concerto for piano, "followed by harmonic orchestra."

This "orchestre d'harmonie" called for in the concerto was, Mr. Stravinsky emphasized, a type of orchestra separate and distinct from the symphony orchestra, and not merely an incomplete one. He outlined three kinds of orchestras—the symphonic, the harmonic and the fanfare, this last consisting of brass and percussion instruments. The Paris critics, discussing the première of the concerto on May 22, talked of the "harmonic orchestra" of wind and percussion (reinforced by double basses) as "a symphony orchestra minus strings"—which was wrong, according to the composer. People were used to seeing strings playing alone, and could talk readily of a string orchestra. "But when they hear works for wind instruments alone they ask, 'Where are the bows?'—which is foolish."

* * *

Moreover, Mr. Stravinsky does not like the idea of strings in a piano concerto. "Strings and piano, a sound scraped and a sound struck, do not sound well together; piano and wind, sounds struck and blown, do." He cited his "Noces," recently introduced at the Théâtre des Champs Elysées by the Daghileff Ballet Russe, as an example of his latest style. With its four pianos and percussion, all instruments which are struck, it certainly agrees with this principle.

Commenting on the somewhat classical flavor which had appeared in some of his latest works—the frequent fuguos in the concerto, for instance, which contained a strong hint of Bach—Mr. Stravinsky remarked that he did not wax classical for the sake of classicism. "The word 'classic,'" he said, "signifies nothing. 'Petrushka' is now a classic. I do not copy a thing because it is classic; I copy Bach because I like him, because he interests me. Bach is the greatest composer I know."

He noted, however, a certain objection to his use of such forms. The critics would allow classic forms to be expressed through the medium of a composer like César Franck, but they expected Stravinsky to be "modern" in the manner of "Le Sacre du Printemps." "But," he said, "I know what is sound and have more respect for what is so than they. I have no great respect for habit."

* * *

Whatever the first impression of public or critics regarding a new Stravinsky work might be, the composer's remarks implied that there was actually nothing unfinished or experimental in a new composition after it had left his hand. The piano concerto, for instance, may, in his view, be called perfect in that it is complete. "It is perfection," he said, "in the sense that it cannot be improved upon."

The form and instrumentation of his works, he emphasized, were dictated by the requirements of the works themselves, not merely for the sake of originality, of trying out new combinations of instruments. "I do not try to be original," he urged. The various methods of instrumentation which appeared in his compositions were adopted, he pointed out, because they were just what the work in question called for. He was interested in "music in a sonorous medium," and composed his music in such a medium—hence the use of wind instruments in his later compositions.

A fondness of the public for labels was cited by the composer, who remarked, "I do not like big words" (gros mots), "cabotinage." The public does. He found the same public reluctant to adjust itself to new musical developments. Having accepted "Le Sacre du Printemps," they expected Stravinsky to go on composing works of massive size. They feared modern music; but, he said, "The modern will become old." There was much discussion, he remarked, about each of his new works, but so far he had made no mistakes; the ultimate verdict had been in his favor. But the reluctance remained.

* * *

For "Le Sacre" Stravinsky had delved, he said, into the bowels of the earth. "But now I build cottages, houses, factories. Instead of a miner I have become an architect"—this is, in short, the difference between the Stravinsky of 1912 and of 1924.

After a busy season as conductor and pianist in various parts of Europe, the composer plans to leave his rooms in the Paris house of the Pleyel Piano Company for a short vacation. He will then resume his composition and prepare for his American visit, which, whatever the outcome, should be interesting. In this connection it should be observed that Stravinsky speaks a little, though not very much, English.

The various reports which have reached America concerning Serge Koussevitzky, who will make his American début at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next fall, have, on the whole, pictured him as distinctly a modernist. But Mr. Koussevitzky, in his opening words to your correspondent, hastened to remove any fears that his audiences in Carnegie and Symphony halls are to have a season exclusively devoted to Stravinsky, Schönberg, Milhaud, Honegger, Bartok and their contemporaries, with a little Strauss or Debussy thrown in from time to time as a sop to the ultra-conservatives.

* * *

"The fear that I shall play nothing but modern music is unfounded," said the Russian conductor. "I love classical music and romantic music. But movement is the principal thing in art; one cannot live forever with Beethoven, Brahms, Schumann, Mendelssohn, etc. Such music is basic, and we must play it from time to time, but there is something beautiful in modern music which cannot be passed by."

Boston Symphony subscribers will not have all-Stravinsky programs, nor yet those of the time-honored Beethoven-Tchaikovsky-Wagner type, though there undoubtedly will be a plentiful meed of music by each of these composers. There would be, said Mr. Koussevitzky, one or two modern works in each of his programs, many of which he already had arranged.

For various novelties which he intends to give in 1924-'25, Mr. Koussevitzky has the exclusive rights of performance. These include Serge Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite," Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's series of piano pieces, "Pictures From an Exposition," and a symphonic poem by Arthur Honegger entitled "Pacific No. 231," the Pacific in question being an express locomotive. "What I have sought in the 'Pacific,'" says M. Honegger in a program note for the first performance of the composition under Mr. Koussevitzky this spring, "is not an imitation of the noises of a locomotive, but the translation of a visual impression and physical enjoyment by a musical construction. It begins with the objective contemplation, the tranquil contemplation of the machine at rest"; then the engine starts and attains speed until M. Honegger is experiencing "the lyric state, the feeling of the 300-ton train launched in the middle of the night at 120 kilometers an hour."

* * *

Between Mr. Koussevitzky and his secretary, it was revealed that the conductor began his professional career in 1906 at the Hochschule, in Berlin, then directed by Joachim, where pupils of the baton could practice with an orchestra—for a consideration. After two years there he made his debut with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra in 1908 at a concert in which Sergi Rachmaninoff was the soloist in a concerto of his own. The next year Koussevitzky appeared in London, making various appearances with the London Symphony Orchestra from 1909 to 1912.

On the stand Mr. Koussevitzky is comparatively conservative in his motions, with characteristic but not extravagant gestures. Generally he stands straight, making somewhat short, decisive motions with his arms—one hand occasionally upraised as if to halt traffic, while, in more emotional passages, he will bend and straighten in a straight up and down motion. He barely, if ever, sways from side to side, or rises to his toes. On the whole, while his conducting in the last two Paris concerts (May 22 and 29) did not seem to have the curvilinear grace of Leopold Stokowski's, for instance, it gave the impression that Mr. Koussevitzky knew exactly what he wanted, and was fully able to get it from the musicians before him.

While obviously possessing a thorough confidence in himself and his ideas, Mr. Koussevitzky gives the impression of a thoroughly agreeable simplicity, a readiness to be shown as well as to show, and an entire absence of anything suggesting conceit or pomposity, or that his recent successes had increased the circumference of his hatband. Told of the vogue of Russian art and music in America, he remarked that in both Russia and the United States life has a large breadth and rhythm, and that harmony between the two countries should do much to assure the peace of the world.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

ALBANY NEW YORK JOURNAL

JUL 2 21924

SERGEI KOUSSEVITZKY

Probably no newcomer to America next season is awaited with greater anxiety than Koussevitzky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Mr. Koussevitzky is counted in Europe as an ultra-modern, and his Paris concerts this spring have included many of the latest compositions, but that Boston will not have too heavy a diet of this type of music is the opinion of Olin Downes, who writes the following letter from Paris to the New York "Times."

Paris, May 30.—It is probable that Sergei Koussevitzky, when he comes to America next spring as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will not give programs of the extremely brilliant and ultra-modern quality that he has been giving this spring in Paris. Mr. Koussevitzky has been told that Americans do not like too much pepper where orchestral music is concerned, and he is inclined to be cautious in this direction. Moreover, he himself is a man of very catholic tastes, who is not by nature an exponent of any one school, past or present, or clique, wherever it may be. Here he arranges lists calculated to appeal to a highly sophisticated public, alert for the latest musical sensation, and composers who, whatever their eventual importance in history, are representatives of the most "advanced" tendencies in this art. In America Mr. Koussevitzky plans carefully balanced programs of classic and modern music, with a good admixture of new compositions, only a few of which he is willing to announce before he reaches Boston; it is not only in Paris that conductors strive to anticipate each other in the production of new works. He hopes, however, that when he does perform unknown compositions in America he will find a following for them. This was said in a conversation with a certain wistfulness and naivete. Mr. Koussevitzky has yet to discover that in Boston it is customary to keep abreast of everything of importance that is produced in the field of orchestral music and that the public in New York often accepts what it gets when it finds no means of becoming articulate as to what it wants. But these are things that concern the future.

All of which is interesting to Albanians for the great Boston orchestra with Koussevitzky conducting will be presented here during the coming season by Ben Franklin.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

TIMES

JUL 1924

Pierre Monteux, who has been the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the past five seasons, has returned to France. The eminent French conductor when interviewed in Paris spoke in the highest terms of American orchestras. On the other hand he deplored the lack of appreciation of American composers. Monsieur Monteux considers Charles Martin Loefler a great artist who, in France, would occupy a first place. Ernest Schelling, John Alden Carpenter, Edward Burlingame Hill, Gregory Mason and Henry T. Gilbert are also named by the conductor as composers of extraordinary talent.

ician, who directs the Boston or-tra during spring and summer.

jazz score to the Boston Sym-ny would be like fitting a round in a square hole," he added.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PITTSBURGH, PA.

POST

AUG 25 1924

Great Attractions in Edith Taylor Thomson's Concer

DUSOLINA GIANNINI WITH DE GOGORZA DEC. 11. SOPRANO

OLGA SAMAROFF PIANIST NOV. 20

RUTH ST. DENIS DANCER MOSQUE FEB. 28.

SIGRID ONEGIN CONTRALTO OCT. 23

Edith Taylor Thomson's Pittsburgh concerts, which succeeded the Heyn concerts two seasons ago in Pittsburgh, will begin at Carnegie Music Hall Thursday evening, October 23, and in a series of five attractions four will be presented at Carnegie Music Hall and the fifth and final attraction of the season will be presented at Syria Mosque. The opening attraction in this series will be a song recital by Mme. Sigrid Onegin, one of the most famous of living contraltos. Gifted with a glorious voice and fine stage presence Mme. Onegin, who made her Pittsburgh appearance last season as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be warmly welcomed in this, her first recital here. Mme. Onegin made her operatic debut with Caruso in "Carmen" in 1913, and though it was her third appearance on any stage she won critical Stuttgart at once by her rich and flexible voice, her dramatic fire and her youth.

Olga Samaroff, an American pianist, trained entirely in her own country, and who now stands as one of the world's greatest pianists, will be the second attraction in the series, appearing at Carnegie Music Hall on Thursday evening, November 20. Despite her Russian name, which is that of her maternal great-grandmother, Mme. Samaroff is the daughter of an officer in the United States army and was born at the army post of San Antonio.

At the third concert, which takes place at Carnegie Music Hall on Thursday evening, December 11, two artists of note will be presented, one, Dusolina Giannini, soprano, as yet unknown to Pittsburgh, the other Emile de Gogorza, well-known favorite. Giannini is one of the few artists of the world who achieved fame at her first public appearance. Owing to the illness of Miss Anna Case, soloist for the concert of the Schola Cantorum in New York, in March, 1922, Miss Giannini was permitted by her illustrious teacher, Marcella Sembrich, to fill the vacancy. Her success on that occasion is world history and she awoke next morning to find herself famous.

Mischa Elman, distinguished Russian violinist, will be the attraction at the fourth concert in the series. Since he first came to America Elman has held a place all his own, and his name stands high among the violinists of the world. Great beauty of tone and splendid technique distinguish his playing, and his pitch is impeccable. His concert will be at Carnegie Music Hall, Thursday evening, February 12.

The fifth and closing attraction of the series will be given at Syria Mosque. Ruth St. Denis, Ted Shawn and the famous Denishawn Dancers will present the program. Pittsburgh knows this fine organization, but has yet to learn its artistic merit, for never before has it been presented in an auditorium where proper scenic effects are possible. The dance program will be given on Saturday evening, February 28.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK TRIBUNE

JUN 2 21924

The Russians Invade America; Some of Their Plans Disclosed

Intrepid Secret Agent, in Guise of Music Reporter, Learns From Stravinsky and K...

"Portrait of My Mother," by Malcolm Parcell, received the popularity prize of $200 in the Carnegie Institute's twenty-third international exhibition, just closed at Pittsburgh. The portrait led "Study of a Russian Dramatic Artist," by Serely Sorin, Russian artist, by a large number of votes.

A movement to increase the endowment fund of the Art Association of Newport from $7,550 to $100,000 has been begun by a committee including Dr. Charles A. Brackett, Mrs. Paul Fitzsimons, Miss Fanny Foster, the Rev. Stanley C. Hughes, Arthur Curtiss James, Miss Ellen Mason, Admiral William S. Sims, Mrs. Caroline Lorillard Spencer, Miss Agnes Storer and Mrs. Harry Payne Whitney.

What the Newport Art Association means to the community of Newport, R. I., according to Harrison S. Morris, its president, is told in the organization's record of achievement:

"Thirteen years ago a small group of artists and art lovers founded the Art Association of Newport," says Mr. Morris. "The association now owns the land and the buildings of the plant, which is valued at approximately $100,000. We have 800 members, including teachers, clergymen, social workers, the families of the army, navy and marine corps stationed in and around Newport, and the summer residents.

"The scope of our work is large. We maintain classes in drawing, modeling, painting, decorative design and musical composition. We carry on a course of art lectures once a week during the winter months, and of informal addresses from distinguished persons during the summer season. Our annual exhibit held in July is the most important of the summer exhibitions of portrait of the summer galleries are also used for private exhibitions of the country. Our galleries are also the meeting of additions to complete having been closed the last month for Street will be opened Tuesday after the George Grey Barnard Cloisters at Fort Washington Avenue and 190th view five days.

Roman F. Melzer, former decorator to the Czar of Russia; hand-painted shawls, silhouettes by the Baroness Maydell, paintings, embroideries and wood carvings. The work will be on Adolph Lewisohn and Mrs. William A. Putnam.

Eighteen paintings and nine water colors were received by Gilt, and eight oils and thirty water colors by Purchase. Three of the sculpture accessions were gifts and eight were purchases. 186 are donations and 74 are purchased by the museum. Of the prints, 186 are donations and 74 are purchases.

The following gifts and donors are announced:

Paintings—"Haymarket," by John Sloan, Mrs. Harry Payne Whitney; "End of the Rain," by J. H. Twachtman, Allen Tucker; "The Sheepfold," by Gaston Guignard, Alexander M. Whitte; "Fete Champetre," by Adolphe Monticelli, William A. Putnam; "The Judgment of Paris," by Thomas Dewrick, Adolph Lewisohn; "Gloucester Harbor," by Louise Upton Brumbeck, Alfred Bossom; "Head of a Lady," by Jroper," by Charanel; "Demolition of Players," by Jaulmes; "Port of Saint Charles Elliott, Dr. Silas C. Blaisdell.

"Cabaret Scene," by Savia; "Tennis Players," by de Beaumont; "Peasants Thann," by Jungheim, Mrs. Elmira "Dachstein," by Velton, and "Capof Avila," by Thil; "Camouflage," by Fougeray, and "Morning: Pont Guydon," by Fougeray, from David Bemasco; "Koenigsee," by Jungheim, and "Capri," by Potter, anonymous donor, and "Sharman," Terreno, Majorca," by W. Harry Lee Post.

Water Colors—"L'Amazone," by Manet, Frank L. Babbott, and "Dancer Reading," by Giz; "Yew Tree," by Cezanne; "Montmarte," by Gazan; "Fisherman," by Jodelet; "Street Singers," by Jodelet; "The Marsh," by Le Petit; "Montmarte," by Gazan; Seevagen; "The Canter," by Brissaud, and "The Eagle," by Delermoz, from Edward C. Blum.

Sculpture—"J. Alden Weir," bronze, by Olin Warner, Frank L. Babbott; fifteenth century bas-relief of a bishop, G. J. Demotte; Japanese bronze elephant, Captain Ivan A. Kahlant.

The print gifts include a dry point and four etchings from Mme. Raymond Delaunois; a lithograph of "St. Paul's, London," from Joseph Pennell; three wood engravings by Mammeri and three etchings by Barriere, from committee for diffusion of French art; three etchings by Zorn and three lithographs by Whistler, from Edward C. Blum; twenty-six etched portraits of members of the armaments conference, by Walter Tittle, from William H. Childs.

Two etchings by George E. Burr, from Mr. Burr; fifty-nine mezzotints by S. Arlent Edwards, after well known paintings, from Mr. Edwards; two etchings by Ismael Smith, from Mr. Hubbard; collection of sixty-eight book plates by Ismael Smith, from Mr. Smith; four dry points by Paul Hellen, one colored etching by Tacquoy, one

THIS CLIPPING FROM

ALBANY NEW YORK JOURNAL

JUL 2 21924

SERGEI KOUSSEVITZKY

Probably no newcomer to America next season is awaited with greater anxiety than Koussevitzky, the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Mr. Koussevitzky is counted in Europe as an ultra-modern, and his Paris concerts this spring have included many of the latest compositions, but that Boston will not have too heavy a diet of this type of music is the opinion of Olin Downes, who writes the following letter from Paris to the New York "Times."

Paris, May 30.—It is probable that Sergei Koussevitzky, when he comes to America next spring as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will not give programs of the extremely brilliant and ultra-modern quality that he has been giving this spring in Paris. Mr. Koussevitzky has been told that Americans do not like too much pepper where orchestral music is concerned, and he is inclined to be cautious in this direction. Moreover, he himself is a man of very catholic tastes, who is not by nature an exponent of any one school, past or present, or clique, wherever it may be. Here he arranges lists calculated to appeal to a highly sophisticated public, alert for the latest musical sensation, and composers who, whatever their eventual importance in history, are representatives of the most "advanced" tendencies in this art. In America Mr. Koussevitzky plans carefully balanced programs of classic and modern music, with a good admixture of new compositions, only a few of which he is willing to announce before he reaches Boston; it is not only in Paris that conductors strive to anticipate each other in the production of new works. He hopes, however, that when he does perform unknown compositions in America he will find a following for them. This was said in a conversation with a certain wistfulness and naivete. Mr. Koussevitzky has yet to discover that in Boston it is customary to keep abreast of everything of importance that is produced in the field of orchestral music and that the public in New York often accepts what it gets when it finds no means of becoming articulate as to what it wants. But these are things that concern the future.

All of which is interesting to Albanians for the great Boston orchestra with Koussevitzky conducting will be presented here during the coming season by Ben Franklin.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

TIMES

JUL 1924

Pierre Monteux, who has been the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the past five seasons, has returned to France. The eminent French conductor when interviewed in Paris spoke in the highest terms of American orchestras. On the other hand he deplored the lack of appreciation of American composers. Monsieur Monteux considers Charles Martin Loefler a great artist who, in France, would occupy a first place. Ernest Schelling, John Alden Carpenter, Edward Burlingame Hill, Gregory Mason and Henry T. Gilbert are also named by the conductor as composers of extraordinary talent.

ST. PAUL, MINN. PIONEER PRESS

AUG 24 1924

Mother's Day Sunday should find us in the jails, and I have reached the conclusion that it is because we mothers and fathers do not take our job seriously enough.

"We bring our children into the world, clothe, feed and educate them and endeavor to give them the benefit of our advice and experience and then proceed deliberately to tear down the foundation we have laid, by neglecting to instill in them a respect for law and order. We are apt to be careless of these things ourselves and do not stop to think that words dropped carelessly in the hearing of a child are apt to find root and grow."

"Youngsters think it is smart to 'get away' with things and keep on and on until the day comes when they don't 'get away with it" and land behind the prison bars. Who is to blame? Isn't it just another case of 'The sins of the fathers'—and mothers? I wonder!"

"Anyway, I am going to make a picture on this subect. jit isn't going to be a preachment or an arraignment of present day "jazz." It is going to be a story of a big dramatic theme that is vital—for surely our babies and our babies' babies are the vital thing in the lives of us mothers and fathers."

"And a mother has written the story. My lifelong friend, Adela Rogers St. Johns, has written a story that has in it everything that I had hoped for—love, drama, life. I hope you will take it—I hope it will make you all think. It will, I know, if you could have seen what I have seen—those young boys and girls behind prison walls who haven't been able to "get away with it."

"Behind every man's life stands a mother. She, more than anyone or anything else, molds his destiny. Love is not enough. Mother may become a Smother love that weakens

THIS CLIPPING FROM

OMAHA NEBRASKA WORLD

JUL 2 0 1924

20 SAIL BACK TO ITALY TO VISIT OLD MOTHERS

From New York World.

More than a score of the first class passengers who sailed yesterday on the Lloyd Sabaudo liner Conte Verde ofr Naples and Genoa announced the prime reason for their trip was to visit aged mothers living in Italy.

Among the group were Agide Jacchia of the Boston Symphony orchestra and director of the Boston Conservatory of Music, who will make his fist visit to his 80-year-old mother in 12 years. Others who said the one object was a "visit to mother" were Bruno Zirato, who was secretary to Enrico Caruso; Dr. Thomas Marco, Italian vice consul in Springfield, Mass., and F. Panciatichi, managing editor of the Corriere D'America.

Jacchia denied a rumor the Boston Symphony would adopt jazz as part of its repertoire this season. "Neither the musicians nor the instruments used in a symphony orchestra are adapted to modern jazz," said the musician, who directs the Boston orchestra during spring and summer.

"A jazz score to the Boston Symphony would be like fitting a round plug in a square hole," he added.

DAMAGED PAGE

844
THIS CLIPPING FROM THE TORONTO
CANADA
ISSUE OF
JUL 13 1924.

MUSIC

NEW CONDUCTOR OF BOSTON BAND

Serge Koussevitzky is to be the next conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as the successor to Pierre Monteaux. He will cross the ocean this summer to assume his duties in the fall. Koussevitsky appears to be the musical craze of the moment in London. His conducting seems to appeal strongly to the Britishers, and one finds many references to him in the English musical press these days. The following items of Koussevitzkiana possess, accordingly, more than the usual amount of interest.

Music at Breakfast.

At the breakfast-table, Diana reads the morning paper con amore. Her sympathies flow in many channels and she is the partisan of many causes. But unfortunately sympathies beget antipathies. To enjoy some things one must dislike others. Thus Diana is apt to become waspish. So it was that she put down her coffee-cup with a snort—rather a gracious snort—and declared that the man was a fool. Presence of mind prompted me to declare that men are unwise and curiously planned.

"Just listen to this criticism of Koussevitsky," she said without paying any attention to my remark.

Now, one of the rules, more golden than the journey to Samarcand, on which the domestic felicity of our household reposes, is that no reading aloud from the newspapers is ever permitted at breakfast.

Of this I reminded Diana. "Don't be silly, Jack. You know perfectly well I made the rule because you would keep on bothering me with the quotations of your silly stocks. I must read you what they say about the poor man."

Feeling that, although we were in 1924, the moralities were not thus to be trifled with, I put the matter plainly before Diana:

"My Dear, why the rule was made is immaterial. The point is that it exists—that for this house it is a rule of conduct resting on general consent. As such it belongs to morality, and for you to read me what a critic says of Koussevitsky would be an immoral act. Besides, I can guess what it is. A magnetic personality with a disregard for tradition; a musical Trotsky who treats tempi like the bourgeois they are; and gingers up Beethoven and the Choral Symphony in defiance of every tradition that comes from Germany."

"Those beastly old Germans, how I hate them!" said Diana.

Conscience whispered that it was wrong thus to exploit human passions. So I reminded Diana that just now it was some nameless critic against whom her hate had been directed.

"I don't hate him really," she said, "and I suppose anyone who is a critic and has to listen to all sorts of terrible people becomes a dried-up old fossil. Only I should like musical criticism to tell me about my own feelings, instead of worrying about dynamics and tonalities and tempi. I don't mind a bit when Koussevitsky conducts Beethoven whether he follows the tradition of Bulow or Wagner, or whoever it is. All I know is that I've been in heaven and I expect lots of other people have too. And I'd like to read someone who would remind me of it and tell me what it's like, just to see if we agree."

"What you want, my dear, is a critic who will describe the adventures of his soul among the masterpieces."

My originality impressed her, and she clapped her hands. "How clever you are, Jack. That's it exactly. Why won't they tell us about them?"

"Perhaps they have no adventures."

"Or no souls."

"It may be so," I agreed, "or possibly their adventures are not of the sort one writes about."

"Oh, I am sure I could write about mine," said Diana. "Supposing it's the Choral Symphony with dear old Koussevitsky conducting. The first movement is solemn, a sort of Sunday in heaven, and nobody is quite certain whether they like it or not—that's why one doesn't know when it begins whether it's in the major or minor. On the whole, they are rather subdued. But it all changes in the Scherzo. Koussevitsky makes one sure that this is just the kind of music the angels to-day are dancing to. It's a sort of heavenly jazz, jazz in excelsis. There the drums inherit eternal life. Or rather they jump right into it, and perfectly naturally too. They don't even have to repent.

"You remember, Jack, how it begins?" I nodded—"by the strings leaping down an octave. After a bar of silence they make another spring. Again there is silence. Then, when you're expecting the strings a third time, the drums jump down their octave with a tremendous bang and the whole orchestra follows. There's some beautiful twittering then—for the more old-fashioned angels, I expect—till that octave-leap comes back again and again, just as if to say that they [illegible] in heaven. [illegible] makes you see [illegible] is a place where [illegible] go on springing about. [illegible] flutes, oboes and clarinets [illegible] heavenly new tune—it really [illegible] heavenly,' although it's also [illegible] rather jaunty. And in the middle the oboes and clarinets sing a little song—God's very near just then—and only the wicked old bassoon, who hops up and down in counterpoint, suggests that St. Peter is sometimes a little careless. He isn't wicked really, though, and shows it by leading off in the slow movement where everybody is very good. Next...."

But at that moment the telephone bell rang and brought Diana abruptly to earth. Meanwhile I am praying that musical criticism will continue to be written by the objective male. [John Layer in The London Morning Post.]

A Little Thought.

"I do not wish to belittle Koussevitsky, who is the greatest conductor of his particular school I have heard," writes Dyneley Hussey in the London Saturday Review. "I have never seen anyone with such a remarkable right arm, it is as sensitive and as quick in action as a seismograph. But in the classics he seems to me to commit the same kind of errors as Albert Coates, though he commits them infinitely better. There are, broadly, two ways in which an executant may approach the music he wishes to interpret. He may bend it to his will and remake it in his own image. That is the way of Koussevitsky and of Busoni. The value of such performances will vary generally in proportion to the musical sensibility of the executant and, for each of us individually according to the amount of sympathy we have for his particular point of view.

"The second way is to keep strictly to the score and to give the music as it is written. Here the value of the performances depends upon the ability of the executant to transform the letter into the expressive spirit of the music. It is the way of Weingartner. It involves the complete fusion of the strong personality of the performer into the music—and I would dispute any suggestion that Weingartner has any less individuality than Koussevitsky—and it seems to me the more difficult, as it is the less showy, task. Let me illustrate my meaning; One of the most difficult things in violin playing is the production of octaves absolutely in tune. When it is done it sounds so simple that a violinist of great and deserved reputation said that he never played them quite in tune, because the audience would fail to recognize the difficulties he was overcoming. Even so, it takes a keener attention and a finer perception to appreciate the sensitive balance and the true expression of the composer's ideas through the subservience of the executant than to be captured by sensational contrasts and new readings....Koussevitsky undoubtedly puts infinitely more passion into any performance he gives and he raises his audience at the time to a higher pitch of excitement. But for many of us Weingartner is the more profound, the more moving."

HE COMES TO BOSTON.

Serge Koussevitzky is the brilliant young conductor who will take charge of the destinies of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Autumn. In Europe, they regard him as a personality, and his debut on this side of the Atlantic will be awaited with great interest. Will he restore the Boston Orchestra to its premier position among the bands of this continent?

A WARLIKE WALTZ

A strange story is told by the Matin, Paris. In the War Museum at Roveroto is a sheet of music containing the words and notes of a waltz by Chiappona. The title is "Blanca." And why should this be in a museum devoted to the war? This sheet of music is in reality a cryptogram, for which the notes of the scale are used. To decipher, it was necessary to have a key, not musical, known only to a certain number. This waltz was widely circulated in the Italy under Austrian rule. The message read: To-morrow war will be definitely declared against Austria. May God aid Italy!"

Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM LOUISVILLE, KY.
HERALD
1924

Koussevitsky Arrives.

Serge Koussevitsky, who is to succeed Pierre Monteux as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived in New York a few days ago, en route to the Hub city which will be his music headquarters for the next five years.

Much has been written about this Russian, who achieved fame first as a virtuoso player of the double-bass. Altho he began to conduct at the age of 12 it was not until the Russian State Orchestra in 1917 that Koussevitsky found a real opportunity to develop.

Compelled, with the fall of Kerensky, to flee his country, Koussevitsky went to Paris, and there, as well as in London and other British Isle centers, he attracted attention—chiefly for his readings of modern orchestra scores.

There has been much speculation over what Koussevitsky will do in his new post, where his predecessors have been well-schooled classicists. He is of good height and physique, with a strong and expressive face and hair turning to gray. Koussevitsky is 50, and vital. He said he had brought with him a number of modern novelties, and that he is looking forward with keen interest to his stay in this country.

Bostonians will have their first opportunity to judge of their new musician at the first concert of the Boston Symphony on October 10. Koussevitsky's New York debut will take place on Thanksgiving night.

(Other Rometikes May Disappoint)

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE CAMDEN,
N. J.
JUL — 1924

AMERICAN ORCHESTRAS PRAISED BY MONTEUX

Paris, July 17.—Pierre Monteux, who recently returned from America, after five years as conductor of the Boston Symphony is enthusiastic in his praise of American orchestras, although he deplores the lack of appreciation of American composers.

In an interview in Comoedia he says, "Charles Martin Loeffler is a great artist who, in France, would occupy a first place. Ernest Schelling, John Alden Carpenter, Edward Burlingame Hill, Gregory Mason and Henry T. Gilbert also have extraordinary talent."

Of his successor, he says: "The Boston Symphony has a great success, which M. Koussevitsky will undoubtedly add to."

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
SEP 6 1924

The degree to which interest in symphonic music in America has grown, was evidenced on March 30, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra was obliged to give no less than two full performances of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, to accommodate all who wished to hear it.

Philadelphia has settled its orchestral difficulties, although it required two months to do it. The men get something like $20,000 a year more, although the management does not say which men get it or how it is distributed. Stokowski will return next year, and he will conduct before the same orchestra and not have to develop a new one.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

IN the autumn of 1924 Serge Koussevitzky, called the most striking figure and dominant personality in the orchestral concerts of London and Paris, will come to America for the first time, to be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is described as a leader of rare magnetism and forcefulness, and as an artist of impassioned convictions.

Mr. Koussevitzky's earlier career in Russia was perhaps most conspicuous in the famous orchestra which he organized in Moscow. He assembled his country's best musicians, subsidized them, that his hand might be entirely free, and drilled them into a remarkable organization. In Moscow and Petrograd, Beethoven and Bach festivals figured among his concerts. He likewise championed music of genius from living composers. It was also characteristic of him to travel all over Russia with his orchestra, bearing symphonic music to parts where it had never been heard. He even chartered a steamer and, sailing the length of the Volga, gave concerts in town after town.

It was in 1920 that circumstances took him westward. In Paris he organized what have come to be known broadly as the "Koussevitzky Concerts" which for the last four seasons have been the most prominent in that city. In London he has made a similarly vivid impression, particularly as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra. He has likewise appeared as guest over numerous other European orchestras. He has occasionally conducted opera, notably at the Grand Opera in Paris and in Barcelona.

THE DITSON NOVELTY LIST

Serge Koussevitzky will be the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is claimed that he is the only truly great conductor whom as yet America has not heard.

When interviewed in Paris last spring by Olin Downes, critic on the "New York Times," he said, "I am neither a modernist nor classicist in my musical preferences. The works of the great classic masters are absolutely indispensable to me, as musician and in my life. But music is not a static art, and it is as necessary for us to know what is being done as it is to know and admire what has been done." Obviously the Boston Orchestra's programs, both in Boston and elsewhere, will be stimulating and interesting in more ways than one under Mr. Koussevitzky's baton.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

SEP 6 1924

Boston Symphony's Concerts.

The forty-fourth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin Oct. 10 under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor. There will be twenty-four Friday afternoon concerts and twenty-four Saturday evening concerts. Rachmaninoff, Stravinsky and Prokofieff, each of them famous as pianist, will appear in their own works. The assisting soloists will be Margaret Matzenauer, Alfred Cortot, Serge Prokofieff, Albert Spalding, Igor Stravinsky, Serge Rachmaninoff, Guy Maier, Leo Pattison, and others to be announced.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TRIBUNE

SEP 6 1924

Serge Koussevitsky Sails

From The New York Herald Tribune's Paris Bureau

Copyright, 1924, New York Tribune Inc.

PARIS, Sept. 5.—Serge Koussevitsky sailed to-day to take up the direction of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which this noted leader has signed a six-months' contract. "I must return to Paris in the spring, as I have promised to give the usual series of concerts," he said.

"Americans have a real ear for music, and as this is developed along the right direction, jazz is going to find its prestige rapidly diminished," he added.

Rep. American Mercury Sept.

THE ARTS AND SCIENCES

Music

KOUSSEVITZKY

By Ernest Newman

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, who is to take charge of the Boston Orchestra this Winter, was born in Tver (North Russia) in 1874. He received his first musical education at home. What the nature or the extent of it may have been I do not know, but at the mature age of twelve he became chef d'orchestre in the theatre of his natal town, a post which he held for two years. His duties were to compose whatever music might be required for the plays put on at the theatre, and to conduct the entr'actes. At fourteen he went to Moscow to continue his studies. According to the regulations of the Conservatoire, the stipendiares of the orchestral class had to choose, for special study, one of the brass instruments or the double-bass. Koussevitzky chose the latter, becoming the pupil of the celebrated Rambaussec. On the double-bass he soon developed an extraordinary facility: he not only became the double-bass soloist in the orchestra of the Imperial Opera at Moscow, but succeeded his teacher as professor of the instrument at the Conservatoire. For ten years he toured Russia and Western Europe as a contrabass virtuoso, and composed a number of works for the instrument—including a concerto—that are now part of the répertoire of every contrabassist.

His main ambition, however, was all along to be a conductor. In 1907 he formed, out of the pupils of the Berlin Hochschule für Musik, an orchestra with which he worked for two years, studying chiefly the classics and Wagner. He returned to Russia in 1909, and organized the Koussevitzky Orchestra that soon became so famous: it was made up of the best players from the other Russian orchestras. The men were engaged by the year, and were barred from giving their services to any other organization, or at any other concerts than those of Koussevitzky. For the performance of the choral works given at his Moscow concerts he formed a mixed choir of 250 voices; in Petrograd he used for this purpose the celebrated Archangelsky Choir. The formal Moscow and Petrograd seasons ending at Easter, Koussevitzky, in the Spring, gave Beethoven festivals, Bach festivals, Tchaikovsky festivals, Rimsky-Korsakov festivals, etc., in the two capital towns. In the Summer, for many years, he toured the provinces with his orchestra, taking it and various distinguished soloists into villages that had not only never heard an orchestra before but had not even seen certain of the instruments; his annual voyages down the Volga with this company of musicians were among the most romantic events of the musical life of our time. In this way he introduced a number of classical and modern works to thousands who would otherwise never have heard a bar of them.

One of his objects throughout his career has been to break away from routine. In those great years between 1907 and the outbreak of the war he introduced a number of novelties, native and foreign, to the Russian public, including works by Debussy, Ravel, Fanelli, Florent Schmitt, Paul Dukas, Roger Ducasse, Bruckner, Mahler, Bantock, Taneiev, Prokoviev and others. He gave Russian audiences their first introduction to Strawinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" and Scriabine's Third and Fifth symphonies ("The Divine Poem" and "Prometheus"). He was the first to make

"Tristan" Prelude and Liebestod may serve as an example of this. I do not wish, however, to convey the impression that it is only in music of the Romantic or nervous order that he shines. His tastes are exceedingly catholic, and I have found his Haydn and his Boccherini as masterly as his Scriabine or Strawinsky. In genuinely classic music, indeed, his plastic line is even surer and firmer than in Romantic. In the latter he seems inclined now and then to "dramatize" more than the music will quite stand. In Strauss's "Don Juan," for instance, many people feel that he takes the Donna Anna section rather too slowly. The explanation seems to be that he mentally dramatizes the character. Instead of describing it from the outside, he lets it speak for itself. Donna Anna thus, as it were, states her own case, tells her own story—and takes her own time about it, as she would do on the stage.

Had I the requisite space, I would like to argue again here a thesis I put forward a little while ago when discussing Weingartner's and Koussevitzky's London performances of the Ninth symphony—that Koussevitzky's Beethoven is the genuine classic and Weingartner's the Romantic.

The popular belief, of course, is to the contrary—that the sober, elderly German gentleman shown us in the ordinary German reading is the true Beethoven, while the volcanic spirit that Koussevitzky makes of him is only Koussevitzky himself. I believe this to be a fallacy. The classic is never a classic to himself; he only becomes a classic to later generations. To himself he is a very lively, ardent Romantic. To make for yourself a fancy picture of this classic, a hundred years after his death, and to insist on his behaving himself in the decorous way you think that classics ought to behave, is really to romanticize him. Koussevitzky, by playing the Ninth symphony as if it had been written yesterday by a powerful genius whose muscles were twice the size of those of the ordinary man, gives us, I contend, a Beethoven in which Beethoven would recognize himself. Koussevitzky's reading, therefore, is the genuinely classic one; it reproduces for us the vigor and the tension the work must have had for its creator and for the men of his day, not this vigor and tension watered and slackened down through a century of false idealization. However, my American friends will soon have plentiful opportunities of deciding this and other questions concerning Koussevitzky for themselves.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
Journal
Jersey City NJ
SEP 6 1924

Q.—How long has the Boston Symphony Orchestra been in existence? J. M.

A.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra completed its forty-second year last spring.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
Press
Asbury Park NJ
SEP 16 1924

Q. How long has the Boston Symphony orchestra been in existence?—J. M.

A. The Boston Symphony orchestra completed its forty-second year last spring.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

IN the autumn of 1924 Serge Koussevitzky, called the most striking figure and dominant personality in the orchestral concerts of London and Paris, will come to America for the first time, to be the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He is described as a leader of rare magnetism and forcefulness, and as an artist of impassioned convictions.

Mr. Koussevitzky's earlier career in Russia was perhaps most conspicuous in the famous orchestra which he organized in Moscow. He assembled his country's best musicians, subsidized them, that his hand might be entirely free, and drilled them into a remarkable organization. In Moscow and Petrograd, Beethoven and Bach festivals figured among his concerts. He likewise championed music of genius from living composers. It was also characteristic of him to travel all over Russia with his orchestra, bearing symphonic music to parts where it had never been heard. He even chartered a steamer and, sailing the length of the Volga, gave concerts in town after town.

It was in 1920 that circumstances took him westward. In Paris he organized what have come to be known broadly as the "Koussevitzky Concerts" which for the last four seasons have been the most prominent in that city. In London he has made a similarly vivid impression, particularly as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra. He has likewise appeared as guest over numerous other European orchestras. He has occasionally conducted opera, notably at the Grand Opera in Paris and in Barcelona.

Serge Koussevitzky will be the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is claimed that he is the only truly great conductor whom as yet America has not heard.

When interviewed in Paris last spring by Olin Downes, critic on the "New York Times," he said, "I am neither a modernist nor classicist in my musical preferences. The works of the great classic masters are absolutely indispensable to me, as musician and in my life. But music is not a static art, and it is as necessary for us to know what is being done as it is to know and admire what has been done." Obviously the Boston Orchestra's programs, both in Boston and elsewhere, will be stimulating and interesting in more ways than one under Mr. Koussevitzky's baton.

THE DITSON NOVELTY LIST

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

SEP 6 1924

Boston Symphony's Concerts.

The forty-fourth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin Oct. 10 under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor. There will be twenty-four Friday afternoon concerts and twenty-four Saturday evening concerts. Rachmaninoff, Stravinsky and Prokofieff, each of them famous as pianist, will appear in their own works. The assisting soloists will be Margaret Matzenauer, Alfred Cortot, Serge Prokofieff, Albert Spalding, Igor Stravinsky, Serge Rachmaninoff, Guy Maier Lee Pattison, and others to be announced.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TRIBUNE

SEP 6 1924

Serge Koussevitsky Sails

From The New York Herald Tribune's Paris Bureau

Copyright, 1924, New York Tribune Inc.

PARIS, Sept. 5.—Serge Koussevitsky sailed to-day to take up the direction of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which this noted leader has signed a six-months' contract. "I must return to Paris in the spring, as I have promised to give the usual series of concerts," he said.

"Americans have a real ear for music, and as this is developed along the right direction, jazz is going to find its prestige rapidly diminished," he added.

American Mercury
Sept.

THE ARTS AND SCIENCES

Music

KOUSSEVITZKY

By Ernest Newman

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, who is to take charge of the Boston Orchestra this Winter, was born in Tver (North Russia) in 1874. He received his first musical education at home. What the nature or the extent of it may have been I do not know, but at the mature age of twelve he became chef d'orchestre in the theatre of his natal town, a post which he held for two years. His duties were to compose whatever music might be required for the plays put on at the theatre, and to conduct the entr'actes. At fourteen he went to Moscow to continue his studies. According to the regulations of the Conservatoire, the stipendiares of the orchestral class had to choose, for special study, one of the brass instruments or the double-bass. Koussevitzky chose the latter, becoming the pupil of the celebrated Rambaussec. On the double-bass he soon developed an extraordinary facility: he not only became the double-bass soloist in the orchestra of the Imperial Opera at Moscow, but succeeded his teacher as professor of the instrument at the Conservatoire. For ten years he toured Russia and Western Europe as a contrabass virtuoso, and composed a number of works for the instrument—including a concerto—that are now part of the répertoire of every contrabassist.

His main ambition, however, was all along to be a conductor. In 1907 he formed, out of the pupils of the Berlin Hochschule für Musik, an orchestra with which he worked for two years, studying chiefly the classics and Wagner. He returned to Russia in 1909, and organized the Koussevitzky Orchestra that soon became so famous: it was made up of the best players from the other Russian orchestras. The men were engaged by the year, and were barred from giving their services to any other organization, or at any other concerts than those of Koussevitzky. For the performance of the choral works given at his Moscow concerts he formed a mixed choir of 250 voices; in Petrograd he used for this purpose the celebrated Archangelsky Choir. The formal Moscow and Petrograd seasons ending at Easter, Koussevitzky, in the Spring, gave Beethoven festivals, Bach festivals, Tchaikovsky festivals, Rimsky-Korsakov festivals, etc., in the two capital towns. In the Summer, for many years, he toured the provinces with his orchestra, taking it and various distinguished soloists into villages that had not only never heard an orchestra before but had not even seen certain of the instruments; his annual voyages down the Volga with this company of musicians were among the most romantic events of the musical life of our time. In this way he introduced a number of classical and modern works to thousands who would otherwise never have heard a bar of them.

One of his objects throughout his career has been to break away from routine. In those great years between 1907 and the outbreak of the war he introduced a number of novelties, native and foreign, to the Russian public, including works by Debussy, Ravel, Fanelli, Florent Schmitt, Paul Dukas, Roger Ducasse, Bruckner, Mahler, Bantock, Taneiev, Prokoviev and others. He gave Russian audiences their first introduction to Strawinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" and Scriabine's Third and Fifth symphonies ("The Divine Poem" and "Prometheus"). He was the first to make

"Tristan" Prelude and Liebestod may serve as an example of this. I do not wish, however, to convey the impression that it is only in music of the Romantic or nervous order that he shines. His tastes are exceedingly catholic, and I have found his Haydn and his Boccherini as masterly as his Scriabine or Strawinsky. In genuinely classic music, indeed, his plastic line is even surer and firmer than in Romantic. In the latter he seems inclined now and then to "dramatize" more than the music will quite stand. In Strauss's "Don Juan," for instance, many people feel that he takes the Donna Anna section rather too slowly. The explanation seems to be that he mentally dramatizes the character. Instead of describing it from the outside, he lets it speak for itself. Donna Anna thus, as it were, states her own case, tells her own story—and takes her own time about it, as she would do on the stage.

Had I the requisite space, I would like to argue again here a thesis I put forward a little while ago when discussing Weingartner's and Koussevitzky's London performances of the Ninth symphony—that Koussevitzky's Beethoven is the genuine classic and Weingartner's the Romantic.

The popular belief, of course, is to the contrary—that the sober, elderly German gentleman shown us in the ordinary German reading is the true Beethoven, while the volcanic spirit that Koussevitzky makes of him is only Koussevitzky himself. I believe this to be a fallacy. The classic is never a classic to himself; he only becomes a classic to later generations. To himself he is a very lively, ardent Romantic. To make for yourself a fancy picture of this classic, a hundred years after his death, and to insist on his behaving himself in the decorous way you think that classics ought to behave, is really to romanticize him. Koussevitzky, by playing the Ninth symphony as if it had been written yesterday by a powerful genius whose muscles were twice the size of those of the ordinary man, gives us, I contend, a Beethoven in which Beethoven would recognize himself. Koussevitzky's reading, therefore, is the genuinely classic one; it reproduces for us the vigor and the tension the work must have had for its creator and for the men of his day, not this vigor and tension watered and slackened down through a century of false idealization. However, my American friends will soon have plentiful opportunities of deciding this and other questions concerning Koussevitzky for themselves.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE Boston Evening Transcript
SEP 1924

Q.—How long has the Boston Symphony Orchestra been in existence? J. M.

A.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra completed its forty-second year last spring.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE Boston Evening Transcript
SEP 6 1924

Q. How long has the Boston Symphony orchestra been in existence?—J. M.

A. The Boston Symphony orchestra completed its forty-second year last spring.

84

 Transcript Sept 14

As the Door Swings Open Upon Music

Koussevitzky, Newcomers and New Courses for the Forty-Fourth Year of Symphony Concerts

TODAY Mr. Koussevitzky is taking ship at Cherbourg on the way to his new post as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A week hence, he is expected at Symphony Hall. From the one date or the other, chroniclers may reckon the beginning of "the reign of the Russians," as a few wits are already naming it. To Mr. Koussevitzky—they have discovered—will be added three other Russians among the "assisting artists" for the new season: Rakhmaninov as pianist and composer; Stravinsky as composer and pianist; Prokofiev as both and, possibly, conductor in his own music. They have heard also that the programs will contain more than one new piece from Russian hands. Hence their nimble exercise in phrase-making for the smiles of all within earshot. The pastime is innocent and a pretty provocation to those who still complain that Mr. Koussevitzky is a Russian. He is—it is true—by the accident of birth (which is chance for us all), by residence in his younger years, by the earlier practise of his profession. No sooner, however, had he risen in it than he became the cosmopolitan, the individualist, that in these days, nearly all eminent conductors are. In his turn Mr. Koussevitzky has traversed the concert-halls of Europe from Moscow to Madrid. When Russia became a troubled and precarious dwelling-place for the arts, he transferred himself to Paris. Thence, and from London in equal measure, his renown has spread through the western world. As Russian conductor, it might barely have heeded him. As cosmopolitan conductor, it sets him in the first rank of these days.

Now, in plain fact, conducting is a highly individualized calling. Not from the passport and the records that assign him a nationality proceed a conductor's eminence and vogue. The sources of his merits, the springs of his power, are within himself as musician, poet, stimulant and authority upon the orchestra before him and the audience behind him. By the understanding and imagination that possess him, so does he give forth music in his own image as well as that of the composer. Mr. Koussevitzky is not a high-placed conductor because he happens to be Russian by antecedents, but by the mettle he has proved in a dozen corners, as an Irishman might say, of this round world. And on no other ground, or for no other occasion was he called to Symphony Hall. All this is to write the very primer of musical understanding. Yet there were those who believed—and may still believe—that only a German can truthfully and eloquently translate Beethoven into sound or that a Parisian is necessarily a notable conductor, because the French armies were among the victors in the late war. Near neighbors are those who await with an air of mistrust and foreboding the waving of a Russian baton over the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Some of these even call the engagement of Mr. Koussevitzky a "mystery"—as though the trustees were misled into the choosing of a conductor of the first rank, who should be also, since Americans exact it, vivid "personality."

As groundless are the repeated alarms over Mr. Koussevitzky as a fanatical, forth-putting modernist. In these times eminent conductors are seldom fanatics for anybody or anything. Rather, they are, musically, broad-minded, open-minded, discerning and balanced. They are even aware that an audience is—an audience, especially through a series of fifty concerts in the same city to the same public. Incredible as to some it seems, Mr. Koussevitzky passions himself for the classic masters of music. As Mr. Newman has said in these columns, he would set his Bach, Beethoven and Mozart newly aglow, in the ardors, bright or deep, large and full, with which they wrote. He conceives them as eager spirits outpouring themselves upon our time as well as upon their own day. With this intensified life they must warm orchestra and audience as they have already kindled his own responsive and transmitting powers. From this impassioning of the classics, more than from any other merit, has sprung Mr. Koussevitzky's great reputation in Europe. Therewith do his band and his hearers feel him most. Yet he discriminates while he burns. If he would have his Beethoven incandescent and his Brahms heating high, he is as eager in another vein for the modelling and the chiselling, the suavity and sensibility, the pellucid mood and course, the play of sentiment, the darts of fervor, in eighteenth-century music. More: he rediscovers and reanimates it, choosing from the shadowy neglected nooks as well as from the sunny high places. For within these forms and surfaces—he would persuade us—there is still the pulse of life.

By the same token, a conductor of Mr. Koussevitzky's intensities is little likely to overlook the romantics of music from Schubert, Berlioz and Schumann through Wagner, Chaikovsky and Strauss. They recur upon his programs in Europe. They invite his visioning and dramatizing powers. With them, he can be architect for line and poet for picture and passion. The discerning and good-willed Monteux erased Chaikovsky's tone-poem of Francesca and Paolo from his programs for last winter, because Mr. Koussevitzky excels in it. From London to Moscow his version of Strauss's "Don Juan" remains a tingling memory. In a nearly opera-less city like Boston, he may go open-armed to Wagner. A Russian outflinging himself upon Chaikovsky and Rimsky—there has been none such hereabouts in this symphonic day—should not fail of excitements where audiences thrill to relative calm. The romantics of Friday and Saturday at Symphony Hall bid fair next season to have their fill, with Mr. Koussevitzky as minister. Nay: even the exacting Francophiles may anticipate contentedly. No less a master of line and edge, the new conductor stirs to Ravel. Another turn and his sensibility joins hands with Debussy's.

Yet Mr. Koussevitzky remains the dreaded—and dreadful—modernist; wherein as on that score he is not one jot more menacing to the peace of Symphony Hall than was the now haloed Monteux. No conductor, unless he work in a provincialized Germany, may shut his ears to the music written in this, our immediate, day, or close his doors when a Stravinsky or a Honegger, out of an innovating generation, knocks at them. Symphony concerts have their classics—so far in perpetuity. They have as well their established moderns, who may or may not endure the sifting years. Neither the one nor the other is in the least peril at Symphony Hall or any other concert-room. Record has yet to name the conductor who, in human nature, would not prove his particular and pervading quality in both. They prove—and display—him; while with the modernists the composer usually comes uppermost for execration or applause. Not many of us have a warrantable notion how much or how little Mr. Koussevitzky admires his newcomers. Because they have sometimes preponderated through four grouped and specially schemed concerts in Paris is no sign that they will also overweigh twenty-four pairs of concerts under the different conditions of Boston.

Here, none the less, the modernists will surely be heard in full and also just, desert, not merely because Mr. Koussevitzky is responsive voice to them, but because he is in artist's and musician's honor bound to find place for the new ways and the new works. Irritated ears and angry tongues to the contrary notwithstanding, a renowned conductor may not now "turn down" Stravinsky or Honegger, the new Italians and Englishmen, the newer Russians and Czechs, and still look himself honestly in the face. Like or mislike it, the day of rejection and silence is overpast. The innovators and "come-outers" have won their right to hearing, and heard they will be, as part of the progress, the pleasure, the pains and the penalties of music coursing through our day. The listeners may welcome or resent; but still the tide will flow. No conductor—least of all an alert and eager Koussevitzky—and no audience, may escape it. Yet Boston, it is the silly custom to say, "is different." Not a whit. The public of Symphony Hall that cannot abide the modernists is no larger and no more vocal with woe and menace than it is in New York or Paris or London. Beside it, in all four cities, the curious, interested, exhilarated, believing minority is the same "obnoxious" fraction—or faction. Yet the conductors, and not least Mr. Koussevitzky, somehow minister to it and somehow prevail. As some say strangely, they believe they are serving both the present and the future of the music.

So stand the signs of the times at Symphony Hall for a public that is to be thrice blessed in the coming of a conductor of the first rank in both Western and Eastern Europe; a classicist, a romanticist and a modernist justly and discerningly fused; in passion for his music yet in wrought design unfolding it, courting power yet also courting sensibility. Four times blessed is Mr. Koussevitzky coming in his turn to an unchanged orchestra bestowed upon him in new flower and eager to be extended—at last—to the top of its bent. A fifth blessing is his in the full authority over the matter and the manner of the concerts that is the theory, practice, tradition and pride of Henry Higginson's orchestra. At the very beginning Mr. Koussevitzky elects to exercise it. He will have no decorative "soloists"; no intensive and expansive "assisting artists" fondly fancying that a Symphony Concert is service and setting to their powers and "personality." Instead his "soloists" will come to play music they have themselves composed or to fit into schemes and pieces of the conductor's own choice and devising. For the while, they are Rakhmaninov, Stravinsky and Prokofiev for their own piano-pieces; Mr. Spalding for Respighi's new Concerto for Violin; Mr. Cortot, Messrs. Maier and Pattison and Mme. Matzenauer for other purposes not yet disclosed. . . . Once more, expectancy is the word. H. T. P.

CONDUCTOR AND SOLOISTS OF SYMPHONY CONCERT SEASO

ALBERT SPALDING
VIOLINIST

SERVEI RACHMANINOFF,
PIANIST
© RUBEY-REMBRANT STUDIOS

MARGARET MATZENAUER
CONTRALTO

ALFRED CORTOT,
PIANIST
RUBEY-REMBRANT STUDIOS

SERGE PROKOFIEFF,
PIANIST

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKI
CONDUCTOR

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
~~CHRONICLE~~
Bulletin
SEP 6 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY LEADER

By ALLEN RAYMOND
Paris Correspondent of The Bulletin and the North American Newspaper Alliance.

"WHAT I hope to do in America is to show the public that masterpieces of music are being written today as powerful, stirring, and beautiful as the greatest of the past," says Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor who will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra this coming season.

"I will present in Boston music never heard before," he said, "music which now exists only in manuscripts which I have in my keeping, music written by men now living, who will rank as high a century from now as Mozart and Beethoven. Some of it shall be America's first."

I have seen how Koussevitzky's music has been received in Paris. Music lovers have gone mad over the Russian leader, literally frenzied in their idolatry

"I will do in the new world what I have done in the old," was his reply to a request for an outline of his plans.

In the old world he has become known as a hunter for musical talent, and a patron of young composers. He believes there is genius in America, and he hopes to ferret it out.

"Jazz music?" (He was answering a query.) "I like all good music. And several Americans have written jazz which is truly good. Besides writing it, your nation seems to have a talent for playing it.

Likes Jazz Band.

"I was in London recently. There was an orchestra of American boys there. The oldest could not have been more than 30. I had a table near them, where I could hear them and watch them individually. Some of those boys were improvising as they went along, and they were great players. I let my supper get cold listening to them.

"Life in Russia is impossible," he concludes. "There is no chance for artistic endeavor. I tried. I gave concerts in rooms that were freezing. The brass players had to wear mittens. You can't do it. It's impossible. Everything has gone to pieces."

There was a story floating about Paris that Koussevitzky and his compatriot, the basso Chaliapin, had quarreled over Bolshevism. Chaliapin managed to get along well with the Soviet chiefs. Koussevitzky left the country rather than try to carry on artistic endeavor under what he felt were impossible conditions. Koussevitzky denies the quarrel.

Serge Koussevitzky, who comes to America this season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.
—Photo by Lipnitzki, Paris.

(Copyright, 1924, in U. S. and Canada by North American Newspaper Alliance. All rights reserved.)

As the Door Swings Open Upon Music

Koussevitzky, Newcomers and New Courses for the Forty-Fourth Year of Symphony Concerts

TODAY Mr. Koussevitzky is taking ship at Cherbourg on the way to his new post as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A week hence, he is expected at Symphony Hall. From the one date or the other, chroniclers may reckon the beginning of "the reign of the Russians," as a few wits are already naming it. To Mr. Koussevitzky—they have discovered—will be added three other Russians among the "assisting artists" for the new season: Rakhmaninov as pianist and composer; Stravinsky as composer and pianist; Prokofiev as both and, possibly, conductor in his own music. They have heard also that the programs will contain more than one new piece from Russian hands. Hence their nimble exercise in phrase-making for the smiles of all within earshot. The pastime is innocent and a pretty provocation to those who still complain that Mr. Koussevitzky is a Russian. He is—it is true—by the accident of birth (which is chance for us all), by residence in his younger years, by the earlier practise of his profession. No sooner, however, had he risen in it than he became the cosmopolitan, the individualist, that in these days, nearly all eminent conductors are. In his turn Mr. Koussevitzky has traversed the concert-halls of Europe from Moscow to Madrid. When Russia became a troubled and precarious dwelling-place for the arts, he transferred himself to Paris. Thence, and from London in equal measure, his renown has spread through the western world. As Russian conductor, it might barely have heeded him. As cosmopolitan conductor, it sets him in the first rank of these days.

Now, in plain fact, conducting is a highly individualized calling. Not from the passport and the records that assign him a nationality proceed a conductor's eminence and vogue. The sources of his merits, the springs of his power, are within himself as musician, poet, stimulant and authority upon the orchestra before him and the audience behind him. By the understanding and imagination that possess him, so does he give forth music in his own image as well as that of the composer. Mr. Koussevitzky is not a high-placed conductor because he happens to be Russian by antecedents, but by the mettle he has proved in a dozen corners, as an Irishman might say, of this round world. And on no other ground, or for no other occasion was he called to Symphony Hall. All this is to write the very primer of musical understanding. Yet there were those who believed—and may still believe—that only a German can truthfully and eloquently translate Beethoven into sound or that a Parisian is necessarily a notable conductor, because the French armies were among the victors in the late war. Near neighbors are those who await with an air of mistrust and foreboding the waving of a Russian baton over the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Some of these even call the engagement of Mr. Koussevitzky a "mystery"—as though the trustees were misled into the choosing of a conductor of the first rank, who should be also, since Americans exact it, vivid "personality."

As groundless are the repeated alarms over Mr. Koussevitzky as a fanatical, forth-putting modernist. In these times eminent conductors are seldom fanatics for anybody or anything. Rather, they are, musically, broad-minded, open-minded, discerning and balanced. They are even aware that an audience is—an audience, especially through a series of fifty concerts in the same city to the same public. Incredible as to some it seems, Mr. Koussevitzky passions himself for the classic masters of music. As Mr. Newman has said in these columns, he would set his Bach, Beethoven and Mozart newly aglow, in the ardors, bright or deep, large and full, with which they wrote. He conceives them as eager spirits outpouring themselves upon our time as well as upon their own day. With this intensified life they must warm orchestra and audience as they have already kindled his own responsive and transmitting powers. From this impassioning of the classics, more than from any other merit, has sprung Mr. Koussevitzky's great reputation in Europe. Therewith do his band and his hearers feel him most. Yet he discriminates while he burns. If he would have his Beethoven incandescent and his Brahms beating high, he is as eager in another vein for the modelling and the chiselling, the suavity and sensibility, the pellucid mood and course, the play of sentiment, the darts of fervor, in eighteenth-century music. More: he rediscovers and reanimates it, choosing from the shadowy neglected nooks as well as from the sunny high places. For within these forms and surfaces—he would persuade us—there is still the pulse of life.

By the same token, a conductor of Mr. Koussevitzky's intensities is little likely to overlook the romantics of music from Schubert, Berlioz and Schumann through Wagner, Chaikovsky and Strauss. They recur upon his programs in Europe. They invite his visioning and dramatizing powers. With them, he can be architect for line and poet for picture and passion. The discerning and good-willed Monteux erased Chaikovsky's tone-poem of Francesca and Paolo from his programs for last winter, because Mr. Koussevitzky excels in it. From London to Moscow his version of Strauss's "Don Juan" remains a tingling memory. In a nearly opera-less city like Boston, he may go open-armed to Wagner. A Russian outflinging himself upon Chaikovsky and Rimsky—there has been none such hereabouts in this symphonic day—should not fail of excitements where audiences thrill to relative calm. The romantics of Friday and Saturday at Symphony Hall bid fair next season to have their fill, with Mr. Koussevitzky as minister. Nay: even the exacting Francophiles may anticipate contentedly. No less a master of line and edge, the new conductor stirs to Ravel. Another turn and his sensibility joins hands with Debussy's.

Yet Mr. Koussevitzky remains the dreaded—and dreadful—modernist; wherein as on that score he is not one jot more menacing to the peace of Symphony Hall than was the now haloed Monteux. No conductor, unless he work in a provincialized Germany, may shut his ears to the music written in this, our immediate, day, or close his doors when a Stravinsky or a Honegger, out of an innovating generation, knocks at them. Symphony concerts have their classics—so far in perpetuity. They have as well their established moderns, who may or may not endure the sifting years. Neither the one nor the other is in the least peril at Symphony Hall or any other concert-room. Record has yet to name the conductor who, in human nature, would not prove his particular and pervading quality in both. They prove—and display—him; while with the modernists the composer usually comes uppermost for execration, or applause. Not many of us have a warrantable notion how much or how little Mr. Koussevitzky admires his newcomers. Because they have sometimes preponderated through four grouped and specially schemed concerts in Paris is no sign that they will also overweigh twenty-four pairs of concerts under the different conditions of Boston.

Here, none the less, the modernists will surely be heard in full and also just, desert, not merely because Mr. Koussevitzky is responsive voice to them, but because he is in artist's and musician's honor bound to find place for the new ways and the new works. Irritated ears and angry tongues to the contrary notwithstanding, a renowned conductor may not now "turn down" Stravinsky or Honegger, the new Italians and Englishmen, the newer Russians and Czechs, and still look himself honestly in the face. Like or mislike it, the day of rejection and silence is overpast. The innovators and "come-outers" have won their right to hearing, and heard they will be, as part of the progress, the pleasure, the pains and the penalties of music coursing through our day. The listeners may welcome or resent; but still the tide will flow. No conductor—least of all an alert and eager Koussevitzky—and no audience, may escape it. Yet Boston, it is the silly custom to say, "is different." Not a whit. The public of Symphony Hall that cannot abide the modernists is no larger and no more vocal with woe and menace than it is in New York or Paris or London. Beside it, in all four cities, the curious, interested, exhilarated, believing minority is the same "obnoxious" fraction—or faction. Yet the conductors, and not least Mr. Koussevitzky, somehow minister to it and somehow prevail. As some say strangely, they believe they are serving both the present and the future of the music.

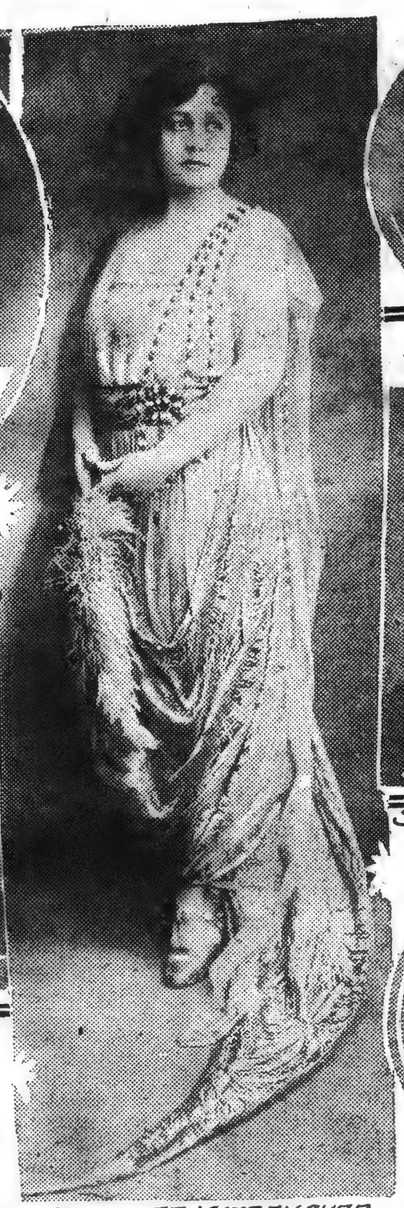
So stand the signs of the times at Symphony Hall for a public that is to be thrice blessed in the coming of a conductor of the first rank in both Western and Eastern Europe; a classicist, a romanticist and a modernist justly and discerningly fused; in passion for his music yet in wrought design unfolding it, courting power yet also courting sensibility. Four times blessed is Mr. Koussevitzky coming in his turn to an unchanged orchestra bestowed upon him in new flower and eager to be extended—at last—to the top of its bent. A fifth blessing is his in the full authority over the matter and the manner of the concerts that is the theory, practice, tradition and pride of Henry Higginson's orchestra. At the very beginning Mr. Koussevitzky elects to exercise it. He will have no decorative "soloists"; no intensive and expansive "assisting artists" fondly fancying that a Symphony Concert is service and setting to their powers and "personality." Instead his "soloists" will come to play music they have themselves composed or to fit into schemes and pieces of the conductor's own choice and devising. For the while, they are Rakhmaninov, Stravinsky and Prokofiev for their own piano-pieces; Mr. Spalding for Respighi's new Concerto for Violin; Mr. Cortot, Messrs. Maier and Pattison and Mme. Matzenauer for other purposes not yet disclosed. . . . Once more, expectancy is the word.

H. T. P.

CONDUCTOR AND SOLOISTS OF SYMPHONY CONCERT SEASO

ALBERT SPALDING
VIOLINIST

SERVEI RACHMANINOFF,
PIANIST
© KUBEY-REMBRANT STUDIOS



MARGARET MATZENAUER
CONTRALTO

ALFRED CORTOT,
PIANIST
KUBEY-REMBRANT STUDIOS

SERGE PROKOFIEFF,
PIANIST

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKI
CONDUCTOR

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
~~CHRONICLE~~

SEP 6 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY LEADER

By ALLEN RAYMOND
Paris Correspondent of The Bulletin and the North American Newspaper Alliance.

"WHAT I hope to do in America is to show the public that masterpieces of music are being written today as powerful, stirring, and beautiful as the greatest of the past," says Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor who will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra this coming season.

"I will present in Boston music never heard before," he said, "music which now exists only in manuscripts which I have in my keeping, music written by men now living, who will rank as high a century from now as Mozart and Beethoven. Some of it shall be America's first."

I have seen how Koussevitzky's music has been received in Paris. Music lovers have gone mad over the Russian leader, literally frenzied in their idolatry

"I will do in the new world what I have done in the old," was his reply to a request for an outline of his plans.

In the old world he has become known as a hunter for musical talent, and a patron of young composers. He believes there is genius in America, and he hopes to ferret it out.

"Jazz music?" (He was answering a query.) "I like all good music. And several Americans have written jazz which is truly good. Besides writing it, your nation seems to have a talent for playing it.

Likes Jazz Band.

"I was in London recently. There was an orchestra of American boys there. The oldest could not have been more than 20. I had a table near them, where I could hear them and watch them individually. Some of those boys were improvising as they went along, and they were great players. I let my supper get cold listening to them.

"Life in Russia is impossible," he concludes. "There is no chance for artistic endeavor. I tried. I gave concerts in rooms that were freezing. The brass players had to wear mittens. You can't do it. It's impossible. Everything has gone to pieces."

There was a story floating about Paris that Koussevitzky and his compatriot, the basso Chaliapin, had quarreled over Bolshevism. Chaliapin managed to get along well with the Soviet chiefs. Koussevitzky left the country rather than try to carry on artistic endeavor under what he felt were impossible conditions. Koussevitzky denies the quarrel.

Serge Koussevitzky, who comes to America this season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.
—Photo by Lipnitzki, Paris.

(Copyright, 1924, in U. S. and Canada by North American Newspaper Alliance. All rights reserved.)

As the Door Swings Open Upon Music

Koussevitzky, Newcomers and New Courses for the Forty-Fourth Year of Symphony Concerts

TODAY Mr. Koussevitzky is taking ship at Cherbourg on the way to his new post as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A week hence, he is expected at Symphony Hall. From the one date or the other, chroniclers may reckon the beginning of "the reign of the Russians," as a few wits are already naming it. To Mr. Koussevitzky—they have discovered—will be added three other Russians among the "assisting artists" for the new season: Rakhmaninov as pianist and composer; Stravinsky as composer and pianist; Prokofiev as both and, possibly, conductor in his own music. They have heard also that the programs will contain more than one new piece from Russian hands. Hence their nimble exercise in phrase-making for the smiles of all within earshot. The pastime is innocent and a pretty provocation to those who still complain that Mr. Koussevitzky is a Russian. He is—it is true—by the accident of birth (which is chance for us all), by residence in his younger years, by the earlier practise of his profession. No sooner, however, had he risen in it than he became the cosmopolitan, the individualist, that in these days, nearly all eminent conductors are. In his turn Mr. Koussevitzky has traversed the concert-halls of Europe from Moscow to Madrid. When Russia became a troubled and precarious dwelling-place for the arts, he transferred himself to Paris. Thence, and from London in equal measure, his renown has spread through the western world. As Russian conductor, it might barely have heeded him. As cosmopolitan conductor, it sets him in the first rank of these days.

Now, in plain fact, conducting is a highly individualized calling. Not from the passport and the records that assign him a nationality proceed a conductor's eminence and vogue. The sources of his merits, the springs of his power, are within himself as musician, poet, stimulant and authority upon the orchestra before him and the audience behind him. By the understanding and imagination that possess him, so does he give forth music in his own image as well as that of the composer. Mr. Koussevitzky is not a high-placed conductor because he happens to be Russian by antecedents, but by the mettle he has proved in a dozen corners, as an Irishman might say, of this round world. And on no other ground, or for no other occasion was he called to Symphony Hall. All this is to write the very primer of musical understanding. Yet there were those who believed—and may still believe—that only a German can truthfully and eloquently translate Beethoven into sound or that a Parisian is necessarily a notable conductor, because the French armies were among the victors in the late war. Near neighbors are those who await with an air of mistrust and foreboding the waving of a Russian baton over the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Some of these even call the engagement of Mr. Koussevitzky a "mystery"—as though the trustees were misled into the choosing of a conductor of the first rank, who should be also, since Americans exact it, vivid "personality."

As groundless are the repeated alarms over Mr. Koussevitzky as a fanatical, forth-putting modernist. In these times eminent conductors are seldom fanatics for anybody or anything. Rather, they are, musically, broad-minded, open-minded, discerning and balanced. They are even aware that an audience is—an audience, especially through a series of fifty concerts in the same city to the same public. Incredible as to some it seems, Mr. Koussevitzky passions himself for the classic masters of music. As Mr. Newman has said in these columns, he would set his Bach, Beethoven and Mozart newly aglow, in the ardors, bright or deep, large and full, with which they wrote. He conceives them as eager spirits outpouring themselves upon our time as well as upon their own day. With this intensified life they must warm orchestra and audience as they have already kindled his own responsive and transmitting powers. From this impassioning of the classics, more than from any other merit, has sprung Mr. Koussevitzky's great reputation in Europe. Therewith do his band and his hearers feel him most. Yet he discriminates while he burns. If he would have his Beethoven incandescent and his Brahms beating high, he is as eager in another vein for the modelling and the chiselling, the suavity and sensibility, the pellucid mood and course, the play of sentiment, the darts of fervor, in eighteenth-century music. More: he rediscovers and reanimates it, choosing from the shadowy neglected nooks as well as from the sunny high places. For within these forms and surfaces—he would persuade us—there is still the pulse of life.

By the same token, a conductor of Mr. Koussevitzky's intensities is little likely to overlook the romantics of music from Schubert, Berlioz and Schumann through Wagner, Chaikovsky and Strauss. They recur upon his programs in Europe. They invite his visioning and dramatizing powers. With them, he can be architect for line and poet for picture and passion. The discerning and good-willed Monteux erased Chaikovsky's tone-poem of Francesca and Paolo from his programs for last winter, because Mr. Koussevitzky excels in it. From London to Moscow his version of Strauss's "Don Juan" remains a tingling memory. In a nearly opera-less city like Boston, he may go open-armed to Wagner. A Russian outflinging himself upon Chaikovsky and Rimsky—there has been none such hereabouts in this symphonic day—should not fail of excitements where audiences thrill to relative calm. The romantics of Friday and Saturday at Symphony Hall bid fair next season to have their fill, with Mr. Koussevitzky as minister. Nay: even the exacting Francophiles may anticipate contentedly. No less a master of line and edge, the new conductor stirs to Ravel. Another turn and his sensibility joins hands with Debussy's.

Yet Mr. Koussevitzky remains the dreaded—and dreadful—modernist; wherein as on that score he is not one jot more menacing to the peace of Symphony Hall than was the now haloed Monteux. No conductor, unless he work in a provincialized Germany, may shut his ears to the music written in this, our immediate, day, or close his doors when a Stravinsky or a Honegger, out of an innovating generation, knocks at them. Symphony concerts have their classics—so far in perpetuity. They have as well their established moderns, who may or may not endure the sifting years. Neither the one nor the other is in the least peril at Symphony Hall or any other concert-room. Record has yet to name the conductor who, in human nature, would not prove his particular and pervading quality in both. They prove—and display—him; while with the modernists the composer usually comes uppermost for execration or applause. Not many of us have a warrantable notion how much or how little Mr. Koussevitzky admires his newcomers. Because they have sometimes preponderated through four grouped and specially schemed concerts in Paris is no sign that they will also overweigh twenty-four pairs of concerts under the different conditions of Boston.

Here, none the less, the modernists will surely be heard in full and also just, desert, not merely because Mr. Koussevitzky is responsive voice to them, but because he is in artist's and musician's honor bound to find place for the new ways and the new works. Irritated ears and angry tongues to the contrary notwithstanding, a renowned conductor may not now "turn down" Stravinsky or Honegger, the new Italians and Englishmen, the newer Russians and Czechs, and still look himself honestly in the face. Like or mislike it, the day of rejection and silence is overpast. The innovators and "come-outers" have won their right to hearing, and heard they will be, as part of the progress, the pleasure, the pains and the penalties of music coursing through our day. The listeners may welcome or resent; but still the tide will flow. No conductor—least of all an alert and eager Koussevitzky—and no audience, may escape it. Yet Boston, it is the silly custom to say, "is different." Not a whit. The public of Symphony Hall that cannot abide the modernists is no larger and no more vocal with woe and menace than it is in New York or Paris or London. Beside it, in all four cities, the curious, interested, exhilarated, believing minority is the same "obnoxious" fraction—or faction. Yet the conductors, and not least Mr. Koussevitzky, somehow minister to it and somehow prevail. As some say strangely, they believe they are serving both the present and the future of the music.

So stand the signs of the times at Symphony Hall for a public that is to be thrice blessed in the coming of a conductor of the first rank in both Western and Eastern Europe; a classicist, a romanticist and a modernist justly and discerningly fused; in passion for his music yet in wrought design unfolding it, courting power yet also courting sensibility. Four times blessed is Mr. Koussevitzky coming in his turn to an unchanged orchestra bestowed upon him in new flower and eager to be extended—at last—to the top of its bent. A fifth blessing is his in the full authority over the matter and the manner of the concerts that is the theory, practice, tradition and pride of Henry Higginson's orchestra. At the very beginning Mr. Koussevitzky elects to exercise it. He will have no decorative "soloists"; no intensive and expansive "assisting artists" fondly fancying that a Symphony Concert is service and setting to their powers and "personality." Instead his "soloists" will come to play music they have themselves composed or to fit into schemes and pieces of the conductor's own choice and devising. For the while, they are Rakhmaninov, Stravinsky and Prokofiev for their own piano-pieces; Mr. Spalding for Respighi's new Concerto for Violin; Mr. Cortot, Messrs. Maier and Pattison and Mme. Matzenauer for other purposes not yet disclosed. . . . Once more, expectancy is the word. H. T. P.

CONDUCTOR AND SOLOISTS OF SYMPHONY CONCERT SEASO

ALBERT SPALDING
VIOLINIST

SERVEI RACHMANINOFF,
PIANIST
© RUBEY-REMBRANT STUDIOS

MARGARET MATZENAUER
CONTRALTO

ALFRED CORTOT,
PIANIST
RUBEY-REMBRANT STUDIOS

SERGE PROKOFIEFF,
PIANIST

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKI
CONDUCTOR

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SAN FRANCISCO, CALI
CHRONICLE

SEP 6 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY LEADER

By ALLEN RAYMOND
Paris Correspondent of The Bulletin and the North American Newspaper Alliance.

"WHAT I hope to do in America is to show the public that masterpieces of music are being written today as powerful, stirring, and beautiful as the greatest of the past," says Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor who will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra this coming season.

"I will present in Boston music never heard before," he said, "music which now exists only in manuscripts which I have in my keeping, music written by men now living, who will rank as high a century from now as Mozart and Beethoven. Some of it shall be America's first."

I have seen how Koussevitzky's music has been received in Paris. Music lovers have gone mad over the Russian leader, literally frenzied in their idolatry

"I will do in the new world what I have done in the old," was his reply to a request for an outline of his plans.

In the old world he has become known as a hunter for musical talent, and a patron of young composers. He believes there is genius in America, and he hopes to ferret it out.

"Jazz music?" (He was answering a query.) "I like all good music. And several Americans have written jazz which is truly good. Besides writing it, your nation seems to have a talent for playing it.

Likes Jazz Band.

"I was in London recently. There was an orchestra of American boys there. The oldest could not have been more than 30. I had a table near them, where I could hear them and watch them individually. Some of those boys were improvising as they went along, and they were great players. I let my supper get cold listening to them.

"Life in Russia is impossible," he concludes. "There is no chance for artistic endeavor. I tried. I gave concerts in rooms that were freezing. The brass players had to wear mittens. You can't do it. It's impossible. Everything has gone to pieces."

There was a story floating about Paris that Koussevitzky and his compatriot, the basso Chaliapin, had quarreled over Bolshevism. Chaliapin managed to get along well with the Soviet chiefs. Koussevitzky left the country rather than try to carry on artistic endeavor under what he felt were impossible conditions. Koussevitzky denies the quarrel.

Serge Koussevitzky, who comes to America this season as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.
—Photo by Lipnitzki, Paris.

(Copyright, 1924, in U. S. and Canada by North American Newspaper Alliance. All rights reserved.)

REDUCTION

RATIO

14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
Sunday
SEP 6 1924

As the Door Swings Open Upon Music

Koussevitzky, Newcomers and New Courses for the Forty-Fourth Year of Symphony Concerts

TODAY Mr. Koussevitzky is taking ship at Cherbourg on the way to his new post as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A week hence, he is expected at Symphony Hall. From the one date or the other, chroniclers may reckon the beginning of "the reign of the Russians," as a few wits are already naming it. To Mr. Koussevitzky—they have discovered—will be added three other Russians among the "assisting artists" for the new season: Rakhmaninov as pianist and composer; Stravinsky as composer and pianist; Prokofiev as both and, possibly, conductor in his own music. They have heard also that the programs will contain more than one new piece from Russian hands. Hence their nimble exercise in phrase-making for the smiles of all within earshot. The pastime is innocent and a pretty provocation to those who still complain that Mr. Koussevitzky is a Russian. He is—it is true—by the accident of birth (which is chance for us all), by residence in his younger years, by the earlier practise of his profession. No sooner, however, had he risen in it than he became the cosmopolitan, the individualist, that in these days, nearly all eminent conductors are. In his turn Mr. Koussevitzky has traversed the concert-halls of Europe from Moscow to Madrid. When Russia became a troubled and precarious dwelling-place for the arts, he transferred himself to Paris. Thence, and from London in equal measure, his renown has spread through the western world. As Russian conductor, it might barely have heeded him. As cosmopolitan conductor, it sets him in the first rank of these days.

Now, in plain fact, conducting is a highly individualized calling. Not from the passport and the records that assign him a nationality proceed a conductor's eminence and vogue. The sources of his merits, the springs of his power, are within himself as musician, poet, stimulant and authority upon the orchestra before him and the audience behind him. By the understanding and imagination that possess him, so does he give forth music in his own image as well as that of the composer. Mr. Koussevitzky is not a high-placed conductor because he happens to be Russian by antecedents, but by the mettle he has proved in a dozen corners, as an Irishman might say, of this round world. And on no other ground, or for no other occasion was he called to Symphony Hall. All this is to write the very primer of musical understanding. Yet there were those who believed—and may still believe—that only a German can truthfully and eloquently translate Beethoven into sound or that a Parisian is necessarily a notable conductor, because the French armies were among the victors in the late war. Near neighbors are those who await with an air of mistrust and foreboding the waving of a Russian baton over the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Some of these even call the engagement of Mr. Koussevitzky a "mystery"—as though the trustees were misled into the choosing of a conductor of the first rank, who should be also, since Americans exact it, vivid "personality."

As groundless are the repeated alarms over Mr. Koussevitzky as a fanatical, forth-putting modernist. In these times eminent conductors are seldom fanatics for anybody or anything. Rather, they are, musically, broad-minded, open-minded, discerning and balanced. They are even aware that an audience is—an audience, especially through a series of fifty concerts in the same city to the same public. Incredible as to some it seems, Mr. Koussevitzky passions himself for the classic masters of music. As Mr. Newman has said in these columns, he would set his Bach, Beethoven and Mozart newly aglow, in the ardors, bright or deep, large and full, with which they wrote. He conceives them as eager spirits outpouring themselves upon our time as well as upon their own day. With this intensified life they must warm orchestra and audience as they have already kindled his own responsive and transmitting powers. From this impassioning of the classics, more than from any other merit, has sprung Mr. Koussevitzky's great reputation in Europe. Therewith do his band and his hearers feel him most. Yet he discriminates while he burns. If he would have his Beethoven incandescent and his Brahms beating high, he is as eager in another vein for the modelling and the chiselling, the suavity and sensibility, the pellucid mood and course, the play of sentiment, the darts of [illegible] in eighteenth-century music. Mo[illegible] he rediscovers and reanimates it, choosing from the shadowy neglected nooks as well as from the sunny high places. For within these forms and surfaces—he would persuade us—there is still the pulse of life.

By the same token, a conductor of Mr. Koussevitzky's intensities is little likely to overlook the romantics of music from Schubert, Berlioz and Schumann through Wagner, Chaikovsky and Strauss. They recur upon his programs in Europe. They invite his visioning and dramatizing powers. With them, he can be architect for line and poet for picture and passion. The discerning and good-willed Monteux erased Chaikovsky's tone-poem of Francesca and Paolo from his programs for last winter, because Mr. Koussevitzky excels in it. From London to Moscow his version of Strauss's "Don Juan" remains a tingling memory. In a nearly opera-less city like Boston, he may go open-armed to Wagner. A Russian outflinging himself upon Chaikovsky and Rimsky—there has been none such hereabouts in this symphonic day—should not fail of excitements where audiences thrill to relative calm. The romantics of Friday and Saturday at Symphony Hall bid fair next season to have their fill, with Mr. Koussevitzky as minister. Nay: even the exacting Francophiles may anticipate contentedly. No less a master of line and edge, the new conductor stirs to Ravel. Another turn and his sensibility joins hands with Debussy's.

Yet Mr. Koussevitzky remains the dreaded—and dreadful—modernist; whereas on that score he is not one jot more menacing to the peace of Symphony Hall than was the now haloed Monteux. No conductor, unless he work in a provincialized Germany, may shut his ears to the music written in this, our immediate, day, or close his doors when a Stravinsky or a Honegger, out of an innovating generation, knocks at them. Symphony concerts have their classics—so far in perpetuity. They have as well their established moderns, who may or may not endure the sifting years. Neither the one nor the other is in the least peril at Symphony Hall or any other concert-room. Record has yet to name the conductor who, in human nature, would not prove his particular and pervading quality in both. They prove—and display—him; while with the modernists the composer usually comes uppermost for execration or applause. Not many of us have a warrantable notion how much or how little Mr. Koussevitzky admires his newcomers. Because they have sometimes preponderated through four grouped and specially schemed concerts in Paris is no sign that they will also overweigh twenty-four pairs of concerts under the different conditions of Boston.

Here, none the less, the modernists will surely be heard in full and also just, desert, not merely because Mr. Koussevitzky is responsive voice to them, but because he is in artist's and musician's honor bound to find place for the new ways and the new works. Irritated ears and angry tongues to the contrary notwithstanding, a renowned conductor may not now "turn down" Stravinsky or Honegger, the new Italians and Englishmen, the newer Russians and Czechs, and still look himself honestly in the face. Like or mislike it, the day of rejection and silence is overpast. The innovators and "come-outers" have won their right to hearing, and heard they will be, as part of the progress, the pleasure, the pains and the penalties of music coursing through our day. The listeners may welcome or resent; but still the tide will flow. No conductor—least of all an alert and eager Koussevitzky—and no audience, may escape it. Yet Boston, it is the silly custom to say, "is different." Not a whit. The public of Symphony Hall that cannot abide the modernists is no larger and no more vocal with woe and menace than it is in New York or Paris or London. Beside it, in all four cities, the curious, interested, exhilarated, believing minority is the same "obnoxious" fraction—or faction. Yet the conductors, and not least Mr. Koussevitzky, somehow minister to it and somehow prevail. As some say strangely, they believe they are serving both the present and the future of the music.

So stand the signs of the times at Symphony Hall for a public that is to be thrice blessed in the coming of a conductor of the first rank in both Western and Eastern Europe; a classicist, a romanticist and a modernist justly and discerningly fused; in passion for his music yet in wrought design unfolding it, courting power yet also courting sensibility. Four times blessed is Mr. Koussevitzky coming in his turn to an unchanged orchestra bestowed upon him in new flower and eager to be extended—at last—to the top of its bent. A fifth blessing is his in the full authority over the matter and the manner of the concerts that is the theory, practice, tradition and pride of Henry Higginson's orchestra. At the very beginning Mr. Koussevitzky elects to exercise it. He will have no decorative "soloists"; no intensive and expansive "assisting artists" fondly fancying that a Symphony Concert is service and setting to their powers and "personality." Instead his "soloists" will come to play music they have themselves composed or to fit into schemes and pieces of the conductor's own choice and devising. For the while, they are Rakhmaninov, Stravinsky and Prokofiev for their own piano-pieces; Mr. Spalding for Respighi's new Concerto for Violin; Mr. Cortot, Messrs. Maier and Pattison and Mme. Matzenauer for other purposes not yet disclosed. . . . Once more, expectancy is the word.

H. T. P.

PLAYS IN PROSPECT

Monday, Sept. 15

SPRING CLEANING" at the Selwyn—Frederick Lonsdale's expertly written and highly flavored comedy of a frivolous, quick-witted, sharp-tongued, gracefully unmoral circle in London, time the present. A dissenting husband undertakes to enlighten it by the bringing of a

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR
SEP 6 1924

Few Soloists for Boston Symphony

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY will begin his tenure as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with a reform. That is, he will ameliorate the nuisance of "assisting artists."

Traditionally, a long list of soloists for the season should have been announced by this time. Instead, the management of Symphony Hall today makes known the names of five soloists, two of whom are paired, and three visiting composers who will appear in works of their own, with the orchestra this season. Whether the composers are to conduct their works or to perform solo parts in them is not revealed. It is also said that other soloists will be added to the list, but that the number of them will by no means reach the customary 17 or so.

Further, it is indicated that soloists hereafter will not be brought forward as high lights of a program filled out with orchestral works, but rather will be regarded as filling an important but not a predominant rôle in programs essentially orchestral.

Doubtless former leaders of the orchestra would have liked to institute this reform, but dared not quite make the plunge. Mr. Koussevitzky, who is sailing today for the United States, has made his decision known in advance.

Probably most of the regular attendants at symphony concerts in Boston will welcome the change. It is true that there is a considerable number of listeners who display far greater interest in the personality of a soloist than in the musical content of a symphony. But it is also possible that they are more clamorous than numerous. Certainly there are very many symphony concert-goers who care more for symphonic music, with just representation of the concerto form, than for a long succession of soloists who more or less overshadow more important musical matters. Unquestionably the new policy will be an artistic advance, and doubtless its achievement will convert many who offhand would not want to yield up the soloist habit.

Particularly, the announced soloists are Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Albert Spalding, violinist; Alfred Cortot, pianist, and Guy Maier and Lee Pattison, performers of music for two pianos.

The composers who will appear with the orchestra either as conductors or as pianists in works of their own are Igor Stravinsky, Serge Prokofieff and Serge Rachmaninoff; all, it will be noted, countrymen of the conductor, who is the first Russian to direct the Boston orchestra.

The personnel of the orchestra remains as Pierre Monteux left it for the season of 1924-1925, which opens Oct. 10.

L. A. S.

BOSTON, MASS.
POST

KOUSSEVITZKY SAILS FOR HUB

Symphony's Conductor Thinks Jazz Will Diminish

PARIS, Sept. 5.—Serge Koussevitzky sailed today to take up the direction of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which this noted leader has signed a six months' contract.

"I must return to Paris in the spring as I have promised to give the usual series of concerts," he said. "Americans have a real ear for music, and as this is developed along the right direction, jazz is going to find its prestige rapidly diminished," he added.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE Utica N.Y.
SEP 6 1924

MISS CURRAN BRINGS TWO ORCHESTRAS

Under the direction of Gertrude Curran, Paul Whi[illegible] and his far-famed orchestra will give a concert in Utica this season at the Avon Theater. The date for this attraction has not yet been decided.

Miss Curran will also bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra sometime this fall or winter. Uticans will look forward to these two banner engagements with exceptional interest.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

SEP 6 1924

Q. How long has the Boston Symphony Orchestra been in existence? J. M.

A. The Boston Symphony Orchestra completed its forty-second year last spring.

(Other Romeikes May Disappoint)

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

SEP 6 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY COMING TO UTICA THIS SEASON

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is scheduled to make a local appearance during the coming season, under the auspices of Miss Gertrude Curran. This aggregation of orchestral artists is making an extensive tour during the coming months. Mr. Brennan, manager, has been in town, interviewing the local manager concerning the engagement.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
SEP 6 1924

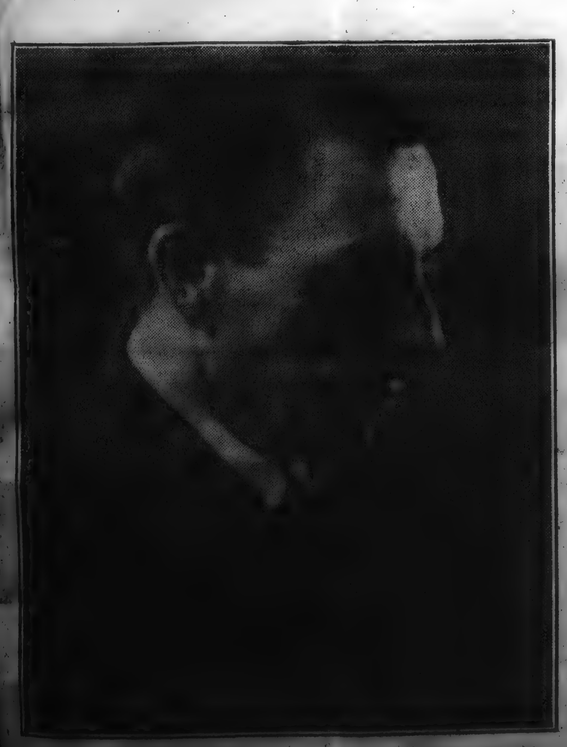
NEW LEADER OF BOSTON SYMPHONY OFF FOR U. S.

Special Cable (Copyright) Buffalo Evening News.

PARIS, Sept. 6.—Serge Koussevitiky sailed yesterday to take up the direction of the Boston Symphony orchestra with which this noted leader has signed a six months contract.

"I must return to Paris in the spring as I have promised to give the usual series of concerts," he said. "Americans have a real ear for music, and as this is developed along the right direction, jazz is going to find its prestige rapidly diminished," he added.

Year One of the Russian Reign Over the Symphony Concerts



Rakhmaninov (Kubey-Rembrandt)
Pianist in His Own Music

Stravinsky (Musical America)
Composer and Also Pianist

Prokofiev
Playing His Own Piano-Pieces

Koussevitzky (Lipnitzki)
Conductor and Chooser

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
POST

SEP 6 1924

As the Door Swings Open Upon Music

Koussevitzky, Newcomers and New Courses for the Forty-Fourth Year of Symphony Concerts

TODAY Mr. Koussevitzky is taking ship at Cherbourg on the way to his new post as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A week hence, he is expected at Symphony Hall. From the one date or the other, chroniclers may reckon the beginning of "the reign of the Russians," as a few wits are already naming it. To Mr. Koussevitzky—they have discovered—will be added three other Russians among the "assisting artists" for the new season: Rakhmaninov as pianist and composer; Stravinsky as composer and pianist; Prokofiev as both and, possibly, conductor in his own music. They have heard also that the programs will contain more than one new piece from Russian hands. Hence their nimble exercise in phrase-making for the smiles of all within earshot. The pastime is innocent and a pretty provocation to those who still complain that Mr. Koussevitzky is a Russian. He is—it is true—by the accident of birth (which is chance for us all), by residence in his younger years, by the earlier practise of his profession. No sooner, however, had he risen in it than he became the cosmopolitan, the individualist, that in these days, nearly all eminent conductors are. In his turn Mr. Koussevitzky has traversed the concert-halls of Europe from Moscow to Madrid. When Russia became a troubled and precarious dwelling-place for the arts, he transferred himself to Paris. Thence, and from London in equal measure, his renown has spread through the western world. As Russian conductor, it might barely have heeded him. As cosmopolitan conductor, it sets him in the first rank of these days.

Now, in plain fact, conducting is a highly individualized calling. Not from the passport and the records that assign him a nationality proceed a conductor's eminence and vogue. The sources of his merits, the springs of his power, are within himself as musician, poet, stimulant and authority upon the orchestra before him and the audience behind him. By the understanding and imagination that possess him, so does he give forth music in his own image as well as that of the composer. Mr. Koussevitzky is not a high-placed conductor because he happens to be Russian by antecedents, but by the mettle he has proved in a dozen corners, as an Irishman might say, of this round world. And on no other ground, or for no other occasion was he called to Symphony Hall. All this is to write the very primer of musical understanding. Yet there were those who believed—and may still believe—that only a German can truthfully and eloquently translate Beethoven into sound or that a Parisian is necessarily a notable conductor, because the French armies were among the victors in the late war. Near neighbors are those who await with an air of mistrust and foreboding the waving of a Russian baton over the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Some of these even call the engagement of Mr. Koussevitzky a "mystery"—as though the trustees were misled into the choosing of a conductor of the first rank, who should be also, since Americans exact it, vivid "personality."

As groundless are the repeated alarms over Mr. Koussevitzky as a fanatical, forth-putting modernist. In these times eminent conductors are seldom fanatics for anybody or anything. Rather, they are, musically, broad-minded, open-minded, discerning and balanced. They are even aware that an audience is—an audience, especially through a series of fifty concerts in the same city to the same public. Incredible as to some it seems, Mr. Koussevitzky passions himself for the classic masters of music. As Mr. Newman has said in these columns, he would set his Bach, Beethoven and Mozart newly aglow in the ardors, bright or deep, large and full, with which they wrote. He conceives them as eager spirits outpouring themselves upon our time as well as upon their own day. With this intensified life they must warm orchestra and audience as they have already kindled his own responsive and transmitting powers. From this impassioning of the classics, more than from any other merit, has sprung Mr. Koussevitzky's great reputation in Europe. Therewith do his band and his hearers feel him most. Yet he discriminates while he burns. If he would have his Beethoven incandescent and his Brahms beating high, he is as eager in another vein for the modelling and the chiselling, the suavity and sensibility, the pellucid mood and course, the play of sentiment, the darts of [illegible] favor in eighteenth-century music. More he rediscovers and reanimates it, choosing from the shadowy neglected nooks as well as from the sunny high places. For within these forms and surfaces—he would persuade us—there is still the pulse of life.

By the same token, a conductor of Mr. Koussevitzky's intensities is little likely to overlook the romantics of music from Schubert, Berlioz and Schumann through Wagner, Chaikovsky and Strauss. They recur upon his programs in Europe. They invite his visioning and dramatizing powers. With them, he can be architect for line and poet for picture and passion. The discerning and good-willed Monteux erased Chaikovsky's tone-poem of Francesca and Paolo from his programs for last winter, because Mr. Koussevitzky excels in it. From London to Moscow his version of Strauss's "Don Juan" remains a tingling memory. In a nearly opera-less city like Boston, he may go open-armed to Wagner. A Russian outflinging himself upon Chaikovsky and Rimsky—there has been none such hereabouts in this symphonic day—should not fall of excitements where audiences thrill to relative calm. The romantics of Friday and Saturday at Symphony Hall bid fair next season to have their fill, with Mr. Koussevitzky as minister. Nay: even the exacting Francophiles may anticipate contentedly. No less a master of line and edge, the new conductor stirs to Ravel. Another turn and his sensibility joins hands with Debussy's.

Yet Mr. Koussevitzky remains the dreaded—and dreadful—modernist; whereas on that score he is not one jot more menacing to the peace of Symphony Hall than was the now haloed Monteux. No conductor, unless he work in a provincialized Germany, may shut his ears to the music written in this, our immediate, day, or close his doors when a Stravinsky or a Honegger, out of an innovating generation, knocks at them. Symphony concerts have their classics—so far in perpetuity. They have as well their established moderns, who may or may not endure the sifting years. Neither the one nor the other is in the least peril at Symphony Hall or any other concert-room. Record has yet to name the conductor who, in human nature, would not prove his particular and pervading quality in both. They prove—and display—him; while with the modernists the composer usually comes uppermost for execration or applause. Not many of us have a warrantable notion how much or how little Mr. Koussevitzky admires his newcomers. Because they have sometimes preponderated through four grouped and specially schemed concerts in Paris is no sign that they will also overweigh twenty-four pairs of concerts under the different conditions of Boston.

Here, none the less, the modernists will surely be heard in full and also just, desert, not merely because Mr. Koussevitzky is responsive voice to them, but because he is in artist's and musician's honor bound to find place for the new ways and the new works. Irritated ears and angry tongues to the contrary notwithstanding, a renowned conductor may not now "turn down" Stravinsky or Honegger, the new Italians and Englishmen, the newer Russians and Czechs, and still look himself honestly in the face. Like or mislike it, the day of rejection and silence is overpast. The innovators and "come-outers" have won their right to hearing, and heard they will be, as part of the progress, the pleasure, the pains and the penalties of music coursing through our day. The listeners may welcome or resent; but still the tide will flow. No conductor—least of all an alert and eager Koussevitzky—and no audience, may escape it. Yet Boston, it is the silly custom to say, "is different." Not a whit. The public of Symphony Hall that cannot abide the modernists is no larger and no more vocal with woe and menace than it is in New York or Paris or London. Beside it, in all four cities, the curious, interested, exhilarated, believing minority is the same "obnoxious" fraction—or faction. Yet the conductors, and not least Mr. Koussevitzky, somehow minister to it and somehow prevail. As some say strangely, they believe they are serving both the present and the future of the music.

So stand the signs of the times at Symphony Hall for a public that is to be thrice blessed in the coming of a conductor of the first rank in both Western and Eastern Europe: a classicist, a romanticist and a modernist justly and discerningly fused; in passion for his music yet in wrought design unfolding it, courting power yet also courting sensibility. Four times blessed is Mr. Koussevitzky coming in his turn to an unchanged orchestra bestowed upon him in new flower and eager to be extended—at last—to the top of its bent. A fifth blessing is his in the full authority over the matter and the manner of the concerts that is the theory, practice, tradition and pride of Henry Higginson's orchestra. At the very beginning Mr. Koussevitzky elects to exercise it. He will have no decorative "soloists"; no intensive and expansive "assisting artists" fondly fancying that a Symphony Concert is service and setting to their powers and "personality." Instead his "soloists" will come to play music they have themselves composed or to fit into schemes and pieces of the conductor's own choice and devising. For the while, they are Rakhmaninov, Stravinsky and Prokofiev for their own piano-pieces; Mr. Spalding for Respighi's new Concerto for Violin; Mr. Cortot, Messrs. Maier and Pattison and Mme. Matzenauer for other purposes not yet disclosed. . . . Once more, expectancy is the word.

H. T. P.

PLAYS IN PROSPECT

Monday, Sept. 15

SPRING CLEANING" at the Selwyn—Frederick Lonsdale's expertly written and highly flavored comedy of a frivolous, quick-witted, sharp-tongued, gracefully unmoral circle in London, time the present. A dissenting husband undertakes to enlighten it by the bringing of a

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

SEP 6 1924

Few Soloists for Boston Symphony

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY will begin his tenure as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with a reform. That is, he will ameliorate the nuisance of "assisting artists."

Traditionally, a long list of soloists for the season should have been announced by this time. Instead, the management of Symphony Hall today makes known the names of five soloists, two of whom are paired, and three visiting composers who will appear in works of their own, with the orchestra this season. Whether the composers are to conduct their works or to perform solo parts in them is not revealed. It is also said that other soloists will be added to the list, but that the number of them will by no means reach the customary 17 or so.

Further, it is indicated that soloists hereafter will not be brought forward as high lights of a program filled out with orchestral works, but rather will be regarded as filling an important but not a predominant rôle in programs essentially orchestral.

Doubtless former leaders of the orchestra would have liked to institute this reform, but dared not quite make the plunge. Mr. Koussevitzky, who is sailing today for the United States, has made his decision known in advance.

Probably most of the regular attendants at symphony concerts in Boston will welcome the change. It is true that there is a considerable number of listeners who display far greater interest in the personality of a soloist than in the musical content of a symphony. But it is also possible that they are more clamorous than numerous. Certainly there are very many symphony concert-goers who care more for symphonic music, with just representation of the concerto form, than for a long succession of soloists who more or less overshadow more important musical matters. Unquestionably the new policy will be an artistic advance, and doubtless its achievement will convert many who offhand would not want to yield up the soloist habit.

Particularly, the announced soloists are Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Albert Spalding, violinist; Alfred Cortot, pianist, and Guy Maier and Lee Pattison, performers of music for two pianos.

The composers who will appear with the orchestra either as conductors or as pianists in works of their own are Igor Stravinsky, Serge Prokofieff and Serge Rachmaninoff; all, it will be noted, countrymen of the conductor, who is the first Russian to direct the Boston orchestra.

The personnel of the orchestra remains as Pierre Monteux left it for the season of 1924-1925, which opens Oct. 10.

L. A. S.

BOSTON, MASS.
POST

KOUSSEVITZKY SAILS FOR HUB

Symphony's Conductor Thinks Jazz Will Diminish

PARIS, Sept. 5.—Serge Koussevitzky sailed today to take up the direction of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which this noted leader has signed a six months' contract.

"I must return to Paris in the spring as I have promised to give the usual series of concerts," he said. "Americans have a real ear for music, and as this is developed along the right direction, jazz is going to find its prestige rapidly diminished," he added.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

SEP 1924

MISS CURRAN BRINGS TWO ORCHESTRAS

Under the direction of Miss Gertrude Curran, Paul Whiteman and his far-famed orchestra will give a concert in Utica this season at the Avon Theater. The date for this attraction has not yet been decided.

Miss Curran will also bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra sometime this fall or winter. Uticans will look forward to these two banner engagements with exceptional interest.

Tel. Chelsea [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM

SEP 1924

Q. How long has the Boston Symphony Orchestra been in existence? J. M.

A. The Boston Symphony Orchestra completed its forty-second year last spring.

(Other Romeikes May Disappoint)

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

SEP 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY COMING TO UTICA THIS SEASON

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is scheduled to make a local appearance during the coming season, under the auspices of Miss Gertrude Curran. This aggregation of orchestral artists is making an extensive tour during the coming months. Mr. Brennan, manager, has been in town, interviewing the local manager concerning the engagement.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

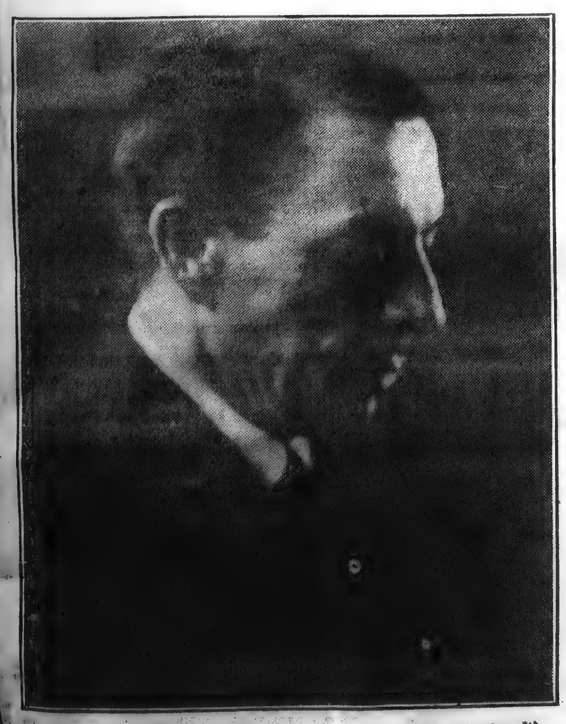
NEW LEADER OF BOSTON SYMPHONY OFF FOR U. S.

Special Cable (Copyright)
Buffalo Evening News.

PARIS, Sept. 6.—Serg Koussevitiky sailed yesterday to take up the direction of the Boston Symphony orchestra with which this noted leader has signed a six months contract.

"I must return to Paris in the spring as I have promised to give the usual series of concerts," he said. "Americans have a real ear for music, and as this is developed along the right direction, jazz is going to find its prestige rapidly diminished," he added.

Year One of the Russian Reign Over the Symphony Concerts



Rakhmaninov (Kubey-Rembrandt)
Pianist in His Own Music

Stravinsky (Musical America)
Composer and Also Pianist

Prokofiev
Playing His Own Piano-Piecs

Koussevitzky (Lipnitzki)
Conductor and Chooser

New Boston Symphony Conductor, Koussevitzky, Tells His Plans

Famous Musician Likes American "Jazz"---His Programmes Outlined

Everybody wants to know about Koussevitzky—
What will he do when he comes to Boston?
What does he think of jazz and Americans?
What does he look like, how does he conduct, what is he like in private life, and hundreds of other such questions.

For the great Serge Koussevitzky has just sailed from France to take charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and he will be here this week.

Today the Sunday Post, through its correspondent in Paris, reveals Koussevitzky in the first interview that he has given regarding his coming to Boston.

This is an intimately human sketch of the great musician whose coming is the greatest musical sensation in years.

BY ALLEN RAYMOND

(Paris correspondent of the Boston Post and the North American Newspaper Alliance.)

Paris, Sept. 6.

"What I hope to do in America is to show the public that masterpieces of music are being written today as powerful, stirring and beautiful as the greatest of the past," says Serge Koussevi zky, the Russian conductor, who will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra this coming season.

Koussevitzky

In the twilight shadow of his Paris home, looking down through the trees upon the peaceful Seine, he outlined for readers of the Sunday Post his plans and hopes for his approachig career across the Atlantic.

"I will present in Boston music never heard before," he said; "music which now exists only in manuscripts which I have in my keeping; music written by men now living who will rank as high a century from now as Mozart and Beethoven. I have given some of their music to Paris. You have seen how it has been received. Some of it shall be America's first."

I have seen how Koussevitzky's music has been received in Paris. Music lovers in the French capital have gone mad over the Russian leader, literally frenzied in their idolatry.

But it is not alone for his introduction of new composers that they storm the doors of the Theatre Nationale de l'Opera for all his concerts.

America may be sure that Koussevitzky will present its musical public with auditions of the older classics, without a trace of modernity in his reading of them, their historic beauties reproduced painstakingly and enthusiastically, exactly as the modern Russian believes the older masters wished them rendered.

America also may be sure that this man will be engaged during his entire stay in America on a passionate hunt for musical genius resident or native in the new world.

"I will do in the new world what I have done in the old," was his reply to a request for an outline of his plans.

In the old world he has become known as a hunter for musical talent, and a patron of young composers. He believes there is genius in America, and he hopes to ferret it out. The breadth of territory which his search will cover may be indicated by an incident he told the interviewer.

Jazz Music

"Jazz music?" (He was answering a query.) "I like all good music. And several Americans have written jazz which is truly good. Besides writing it, your nation seems to have a talent for playing it.

"I was in London recently, and dropped in late at night for something to eat at a supper club where dancing was going on. There was an orchestra of American boys there. The oldest could not have been more than thirty. I had a table near them where I could hear them and watch them individually. Some of those boys were improvising as they went along, and they were great players.

"I let my supper get cold listening to them. I stayed until a shockingly late hour. Those boys were fine musicians, but I learned that they were not particularly notable among America's jazz musicians—just a group of college students from one of your Western States."

Mr. Koussevitzky is a man of one passion, music. He is a man of no hobbies. Over and above his talents, his outstanding quality is enthusiasm. He is as enthusiastic over the subject he expounds from his conductor's platform as is Billy Sunday over his. (Their methods of exposition differ.)

Music has been practically his entire life since the age when most boys are playing marbles. At the age of 12 he conducted a provincial theatre orchestra in Russia, and was a composer. Today he is 52 years old.

His Wife Also Musical

Mr. Koussevitzky is married. His wife is musical. Mrs. Koussevitzky is the sort of person to whom the young Russian composers dedicate their most ambitious works. A species of goddess, for Scriabine, Strawinsky and their fellows. She has great sympathy for them, is a tireless listener, an able and appreciative critic. She is more than well-to-do. She has published the music of more than one hungry genius, and has supplied food to many others.

In appearance, manner and dress, Mr. Koussevitzky might be a successful middle-aged business man, a forceful figure of no eccentricities, of middle height, stocky, un-athletic. Only his eyes inform you he is not. Few business men have eyes glowing with such dark, strange fires as his, when enthusiasm is flaming in them. They are the eyes of a young reformer, an evangelist.

Would Appreciate Billy Sunday

The fact is, Mr. Koussevitzky IS an evangelist and a showman. He would appreciate both Billy Sunday and P. T. Barnum. This is what he told his interviewer of a trip he used to take in prewar Russia, with an orchestra of 100 players, in a steamboat on the Volga:

"I carried music through a vast section of Russia," he said. "Once every two years before the war I used to charter a big steamer, and make a journey of 2500 miles. We stopped at every big city and many small towns. We sent men ahead to advertise that we were coming. The peasants would flock to the river from villages for miles back into country which few Europeans have ever seen. And I took them the best that exists in music, new and old. Debussy, Ravel, Florent Schmitt, P. Ducas, Roger Ducasse, Panelly, Elgar, Richard Strauss! I made them known in villages where there isn't any modern life as Europe and America know it.

"I took them into the back country and gave them to hundreds of thousands of Russian people, scattered over an area of 500,000 square miles. You should have seen them come to see and to hear us. And on these trips I found musicians who are now playing in the great capitals.

"They were marvellous, those journeys. They are not possible any more."

There is a pardonable pride that glows through the musician's story of his pre-war missionary tours. There is no doubt that Koussevitzky, like other artists, is an egotist, but his is not a blatant egotism. It is the self-confidence and pride of a man who has demonstrated his abilities, and who is enthusiastic over the place of music in the general scheme of things.

Music is the most important thing in the world to him. Therefore, it must count for a great deal with society at large.

As a small boy, he says, the orchestras he heard in Tver, the north Russian community where he was born, exerted an impelling fascination over him. His family were mercantile, middle-class folk, who were fond of music. It was early the centre of his existence, and though he experimented with various instruments when a boy, he always intended to direct an orchestra as his life work.

When he was 14, he entered the Conservatoire of the Moscow Philharmonic Society as a student of composition and orchestral conducting. In order to qualify for a scholarship he studied the double-bass, and became such a master of that resounding instrument that upon the termination of his study he obtained the post of double-bass soloist at the Moscow Imperial Opera. For several years thereafter he appeared in the principal cities of Russia as a double-bass virtuoso.

He never lost sight of his real aim, the conduct of a great orchestra. In 1909, after an intensive study of the interpretation of classics and moderns in an orchestra formed by him in Berlin, from students of the Berlin High School of Music, he returned to Russia and established his own symphony orchestra in Moscow. This body of musicians quickly became famous all over Russia, so that its appearance in Petrograd was always one of the great events of the Court season.

It was with this group of players with which Koussevitzky toured the Volga. Then came the war. The first revolution, that of 1917, did not disturb him. He was appointed general conductor of the Russian State Orchestra by the Provisional government established by Kerensky. This orchestra formerly was the Court Orchestra.

Then came the Bolshevik uprising.

"I am not a politician," says the composer and conductor, speaking of it. "I am not an economist."

Then he pauses. He does not launch into the diatribes against the new regime, which explode from most of the Russian colony in Paris. He sits and broods.

Players Wore Mittens

"Life in Russia is impossible," he concludes. "There is no chance for artistic endeavor. I tried. I gave concerts in rooms that were freezing. The brass players wore mittens. You can't do it. It's impossible. Everything has gone to pieces."

There was a story floating about Paris that Koussevitzky and his compatriot, the basso, Chaliapine, had quarrelled over Bolshevism. Chaliapine managed to get along well with the Soviet chiefs. Koussevitzky left the country rather than try to carry on artistic endeavor under what he felt were impossible conditions. Koussevitzky denies the quarrel.

His Opinion on Chaliapine

"Chaliapine is a great artist and a great Russian," he says. When he and the basso met upon the Place de l'Opera, just in front of the Cafe de la Paix, for the first time since 1920, the two literally fell upon each other's necks. Shortly thereafter, Koussevitzky led the orchestra in the Opera when Chaliapine appeared, and led it in each of the basso's appearances thereafter.

The union of the two popular favorites in one performance almost caused a riot. The prices were quadrupled, and still the mob stormed the doors trying to get in.

I doubt if Koussevitzky ever quarrelled with anyone on Bolshevism or anything else aside from music. Therein lies all his interest, and all his capability of getting excited.

He is interested in choral music as well as orchestral, and in the union of the two. In Moscow he organized a choir of 250 voices to give choral works in conjunction with his symphony orchestra.

Always Seeking New Music

His chief interest undoubtedly is in the discovery of new music and making it known to the public. He introduced Debussy into Russia, and twice invited the great Frenchman to Moscow and Petrograd to conduct his own works. Many of the Debussy works in Koussevitzky's library are annotated by Debussy's own hand.

Koussevitzky was the warm friend, the discoverer and patron of Scriabine. The composer always considered Koussevitzky the best interpreter of his work. Koussevitzky was the first to perform Scriabine's "Prometheus" poem.

As part of his work in the field of new music, Koussevitzky and his wife are the publishers of "L'Edition Russe de Musique," which they began in Moscow in 1909 and now continue in Paris. The aim of this publishing business is to print the music of young Russians of talent who otherwise might have difficulty in getting their works printed. The recommendation of Koussevitzky is sufficient to make a sale for it once published in France.

This publishing business has printed the works of Strawinsky, Serge Rachmaninoff, Scriabine, Prokofieff, Gretchaninoff, and the famous "Treaty of Orchestration" of Rimsky-Korsakoff.

What Boston Will Hear

Mr. Koussevitzky gave me a list of the music which he was the first to perform in Paris, and which he will bring to America. Very little of it has been heard in the United States, but some of it has been heard in London, where Koussevitzky has acted as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestral in Manchester and Liverpool, where he has conducted the Philharmonic Society, and in Edinburgh and Glasgow, where he conducted the Scottish Symphony Orchestra. He is taking all these scores to Boston, and probably most of it, if not all, will be played there. But Mr. Koussevitzky says he will not force any particular kind of music down the throats of his listeners. He will experiment to find what his audiences like.

The Koussevitzky first performances have included these selections, and it may therefore be expected that these will be given in Boston.

Debussy: "Sarabande," "Danse."

Roland-Manuel: "Isabelle et Pantalon Overture," "Three Movements of Scarlatti."

Florent Schmitt: "Reves," "Mirages," Suite for Orchestra.

Darius Milhaud: "Second Suite of Protheus."

Arthur Honegger: "The Victorious Horace," "Chant de Joie," "Pacific 231."

Maurice Ravel: "Paintings From the Picture Show by Moussorgsky," "Alborada del Gracioso."

Alberic Magnard: "Fourth Symphony."

Arnold Bax: "The Garden of Fand."

W. Reed: "The Will o' Wisp."

Holbrooke: "Bronwen Overture."

Fr. Malipiero: "Pause del Silenzio," "Imprezioni dal Vero, Third Suite."

O. Respighi, "Antiche Danze ed Arie," "Concerto Gregoriano for violin and orchestra."

A. Tansman, "Scherzo Symphonique," "Legende."

M. Delage: "Overture for the Ballet de l'Avenir," "Three Poems for Voice and Orchestra."

A. Roussel: "Symphony, Op. 23."

A. Gretchaninoff: "A Liturgy for St. John Chrysostom."

Moussorgsky: Two scenes with soloists and chorus from the opera "Khovanchina."

Borodine: Two acts from the opera "Prince Igor," with chorus and soloists.

Moussorgsky: "The Defeat of Sennacherib," cantata for chorus and orchestra.

Kastalsky, "Fraternal Commemoration."

Liadoff: "Kikimora," "From the Apocolypsis."

Rachmaninoff: "The Island of Death," "Third Concerto for Piano and Orchestra."

Rimsky-Korsakoff: "The Battle of Kejelnietz," "The Flight From the Bumble Bee," "Suite" from the opera "Tsar Saltan."

Prokofieff: "Symphonie Classique," "Second Concerto for Piano and Orchestra," "Third Concerto for Piano and Orchestra," "First Concerto for Violin and Orchestra," "Suite Scythe," "Suite" from the opera "Love of Three Oranges," "Sept! Ils Sont Sept!"

Scriabine: "Poem de l'Extase," "Poem of Fire" (Prometheus).

Strawinsky: "Octur" for wind instruments, "Wind Instruments Symphony" (given in London), "Concerto for Piano and Wind Instruments," "Chant du Rossignol" ("Symphonic Poem").

Vivaldi: "Concerto," scored by A. Siloti.

Riegel: "Symphony in C Major."

Boccherin: "Symphony in C."

Stammitz: "Concerto for Strings."

Polaci: "Symphony in C Minor."

Locatelli: "A Funeral Symphony."

Corelly: "Concerto for Orchestra, No. 3."

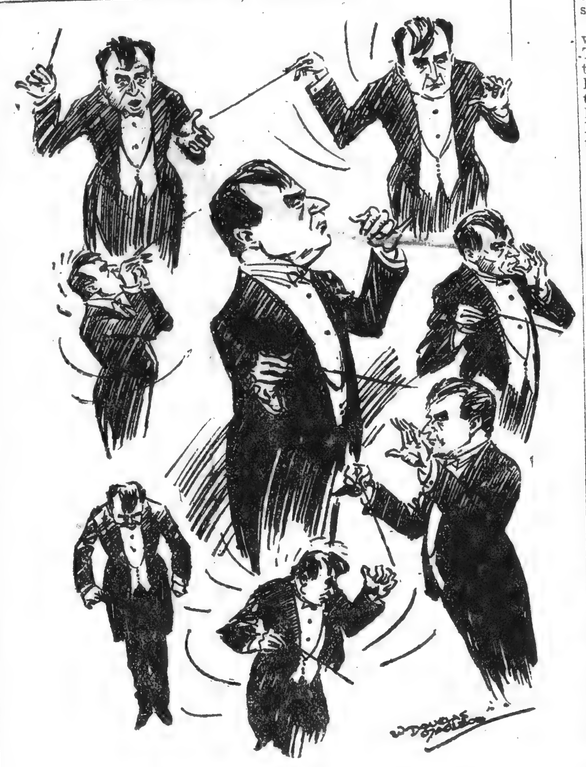
Schubert: "Fifth Symphony."

Brahms: "Schicksalslied," with chorus.

Hugo Wolf: "Der Feuerreiter," with chorus.

Manuel de Falla: "El Amor Brujo."

Lily Boulanger: "Poem Bouddhique."



An impression of the great composer-conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, who is coming to lead Symphony Orchestra this season. This cartoon is from the Glasgow Evening News, Scotland, and shows the great conductor's varying moods.

ATTENTION SUCCESSFUL
Automobile Salesme
ONLY
Your present in[illegible]e on each sale made is probably governed by the value of the used car [illegible] take in trade, irrespe[illegible]ve of the effort requir[illegible]
On our pla[illegible] commissions are not a[illegible]ted by any used car t[illegible]ed in, as our Salesmen [illegible]e compensated on a fixe[illegible]asis regardless of the n[illegible]re of the sale.
We n[illegible] have an opening for tw[illegible] successful men. Applica[illegible]ons treated confidential[illegible]
M[illegible] CAULDWELL
860 [illegible]ommonwealth Ave.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
ADVERTISER,
Boston, Mass.
24

Famous Soloists for Symphony Season

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY sailed to assume his duties as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The season will open with the concerts on October 10 and 11. There is only one change in the personnel of the famous orchestra. A new second harpist is coming.

For the regular series of 24 pairs of concerts all Friday afternoon seats have been resubscribed. Some Saturday evening seats are still available.

The soloists will be chosen according to the new conductor's plan to preserve the symphonic integrity of the programs. Each artist will appear in a certain orchestral score of importance with a solo part for which his genius is particularly suited.

Three composers, who are also pianists and conductors, will appear in works of their own. These are Rachmaninoff, Stravinsky and Prokofieff. Igor Stravinsky is coming to America for the first time this season. Serge Prokofieff is one of the most talented of the younger Russian artists.

Margaret Matzenaur, Albert Spalding, Alfred Cortot and Maier and Lee Pattison are also among the soloists already chosen.

PITTSBURG, PENN.
PRESS
SEP 7 1924

RECITAL COURSE HOLDS MANY FAMOUS ARTISTS

The May Beegle concert offices will open for business tomorrow, when subscriptions will be received for attractions in the various courses under this management. An unusually attractive list is announced for the 1924-25 season, including a recital course in Syria mosque with the following star attractions: Alma Gluck, De Pachmann, Hidalgo, Pavlowa and Ballet Russe, Zimbalist, Martinelli and Maria Jeritza.

A series of symphony orchestra concerts will also be given at the mosque, presenting six of the world's greatest organizations Friday nights and Saturday matinees. The orchestras to be heard include th Boston, Detroit, New York Philharmonic, Cleveland, Cincinnati and Minneapolis. Noted soloists will be featured during the season with the various orchestras, engagements already having been made of Elsa Alsen, Wagnerian opera soprano; Viola Mitchell, violinist, and Maier, Pattison and Shattuck, pianists.

Miss Beegle also announces for Carnegie music hall three stellar attractions opening, on Wednesday, Nov. 26, with Rachmaninoff, followed by Fritz Kreisler and Geraldine Farrar, who with her company will give an operatic fantasie of "Carmen," with costumes, scenery, ballet and orchestra.

The season will open on Monday night, Oct. 20, with a recital by Alma Gluck, who returns after an absence of three seasons. Detailed announcements of all attractions will be mailed on request.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SEASON AND SOLOISTS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its 44th season in Symphony Hall on Oct 10 and 11. The Friday seats have all been resubscribed for. Saturday seats not thus taken are now on sale. Their number is considerably fewer than at this time last year.

The orchestra retains without change in personnel. The new interest is in the conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, who will be the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr Koussevitzky sailed for America yesterday, and not long after arriving will assemble the orchestra for rehearsal.

Serge Koussevitzky has been active during the past Spring and Summer months appearing as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra at the "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris, and presiding over performances of Russian opera at the Grand Opera House there.

During the several years that this conductor has been heard in western Europe, he has been one of the most talked-about of European celebrities. His brilliant and forceful leadership is much remarked upon, and likewise, his evident sympathy, conviction and range as an interpretative artist. It was in his native Russia that Koussevitzky first became well known as a conductor.

His principal achievement there was the orchestra which he organized in Moscow and with which he traveled the length and breadth of his country, making symphonic music known in many parts where it had never been heard. At this time, as also later, he has been as eager to perform the established "classic" repertory as the music of living composers. It is since 1920 that he has become the dominant figure in the concert halls of London and Paris.

The list of soloists now announced is only partial and will be added to later. In choosing these assiating artists, the conductor is planning carefully to preserve the symphonic integrity of the programs. In this interest, each artist will appear in a certain orchestral score of importance with a solo part for which his genius is particularly suited.

Three composers who are also brilliant pianists and experienced as conductors will appear in works of their own. These are, Rachmaninoff, Stravinsky, Prokofieff. Serge Rachmaninoff has appeared several times as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His undisputed eminence as a piano virtuoso by no means over-shadows his importance as the composer of numerous scores, both orchestral and in smaller forms.

Igor Stravinsky is to come to America for the first time. To the daring score "Le Sacre du Printemps," which was performed at these concerts last season, and such famous ballets as "Petrouchka" and the "Fire Bird" he has recently added a concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in which he appeared at the "Concerts Koussevitzky" last Summer with great success.

Serge Prokofieff has been called the most talented of the younger generation of Russian composers, and is likewise a pianist of remarkable ability. He first came to America in 1918. Several of his works have been performed in this country, notably his satiric opera, "The Love for the Three Oranges," which was produced by the Chicago Opera Company. His Scythian Suite and his tone poem, "Sept 'lis sont Sept!" have attracted a great deal of attention in Europe under the baton of Mr Koussevitzky.

The remaining artists have appeared on former occasions as soloists with this orchestra. They are Margaret Matzenaur, the Wagnerian mezzo-soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Albert Spalding, the distinguished American violinist, and Alfred Cortot, who is considered the greatest pianist of France; likewise Guy Maier and Lee Pattison, who will appear in music for two pianos, with orchestra.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

2.8

2.5

3.2

2.2

3.6

2.0

1.8

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PENN.
PRESS
SEP 7 1924

ORCHESTRA SERIES CONDUCTORS AND ARTISTS

THE most auspicious program yet announced will be given this season by the Pittsburgh Orchestral association, bringing to the city the leading orchestras of the nation. Above are pictured the conductors and a part of the artists who will be heard as soloists with this year's program.

To the upper left is shown Serge Koussevisky, the brilliant new conductor of the Boston Symphony, who will be heard for the first time this season. The upper center is Viola Mitchell, Pittsburgh violinist, whose artistic playing has resulted in her engagement with the Cincinnati Symphony as soloist; to the upper right is Elsa Alsen, dramatic soprano, formerly of the Wagnerian Opera Co., who comes as soloist with the Cleveland Symphony.

The center left is Fritz Reiner, conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony the center view, Henri Vergrugghen, conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony, and to the center right, Arthur Shattuck, piano soloist with the Detroit Symphony. The lower left shows Nikolai, the admirable conductor of the Cleveland Symphony; the lower center, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, conductor of the Detroit Symphony, and to the lower right Willem Mengelberg, conductor of the New York Philharmonic. The concerts will be under the local management of May Beegle, with the following dates announced: The Boston Symphony, Nov. 14 and 15; the Cleveland Symphony, Dec. 12 and 13; the Cincinnati Symphony, Jan. 16 and 17; the Minneapolis Symphony, Feb. 6 and 7; the New York Philharmonic, March 13 and 14, and the Detroit Symphony, March 27 and 28.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CLEVELAND,
OHIO
~~TIMES~~
SEP 7 1924

Koussevitzky, Coming to Boston, Tells of His Aims

BY ALLEN RAYMOND,
Paris Correspondent of The Plain Dealer and the North American Newspaper Alliance.

PARIS.—"What I hope to do in America is to show the public that masterpieces of music are being written today as powerful, stirring, and beautiful as the greatest of the past," says Serge Koussevitsky, the Russian conductor who will lead the Boston Symphony orchestra this coming season.

"I will present in Boston music never heard before," he said, "music which now exists only in manuscripts which I have in my keeping, music written by men now living who will rank as high a century from now as Mozart and Beethoven. I have given some of their music to Paris. You have seen how it has been received. Some of it shall be America's first."

SERGE KONSEVITSKY

I have seen how Koussevitzky's music has been received in Paris. Music lovers in the French capital have gone mad over the Russian leader. But it is not alone for his introduction of new composers that they storm the doors of the Theatre Nationale de l'Opera for all his concerts.

America may be sure that Koussevitzky will present its musical public with auditions of the older classics, without a trace of modernity in his reading of them, their historic beauties reproduced painstakingly and enthusiastically, exactly as the modern Russian believes the older masters wished them rendered. America also may be sure he will be engaged during his entire stay in America on a passionate hunt for musical genius resident or native in the new world.

"Jazz music?" (He was answering a query). "I like all good music. And several Americans have written jazz which is truly good. I was in London recently, and dropped in late at night at a supper club. There was an orchestra of American boys there. The oldest could not have been more than 30. Some of those boys were improvising as they went along, and they were great players. I let my supper get cold listening to them. I stayed until a shockingly late hour. Those boys were fine musicians, but I learned that they were not particularly notable among America's jazz musicians—just a group of college students from a western state."

Mr. Koussevitzky is a man of one passion, music, and no hobbies. Music has been practically his entire life. At 12 he conducted a provincial theater orchestra in Russia, and was a composer. He is 52 now.

(Copyright, 1924, in United States and Canada by North American Newspaper Alliance. All rights reserved.)

BOSTON, MASS.
GLOBE
SEP 7 1924

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SEASON AND SOLOISTS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its 44th season in Symphony Hall on Oct 10 and 11. The Friday seats have all been resubscribed for. Saturday seats not thus taken are now on sale. Their number is considerably fewer than at this time last year.

The orchestra retains without change in personnel. The new interest is in the conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, who will be the first Russian to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr Koussevitzky sailed for America yesterday, and not long after arriving will assemble the orchestra for rehearsal.

Serge Koussevitzky has been active during the past Spring and Summer months appearing as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra at the "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris, and presiding over performances of Russian opera at the Grand Opera House there.

During the several years that this conductor has been heard in western Europe, he has been one of the most talked-about of European celebrities. His brilliant and forceful leadership is much remarked upon, and likewise, his evident sympathy, conviction and range as an interpretative artist. It was in his native Russia that Koussevitzky first became well known as a conductor.

His principal achievement there was the orchestra which he organized in Moscow and with which he traveled the length and breadth of his country, making symphonic music known in many parts where it had never been heard. At this time, as also later, he has been as eager to perform the established "classic" repertory as the music of living composers. It is since 1920 that he has become the dominant figure in the concert halls of London and Paris.

The list of soloists now announced is only partial and will be added to later. In choosing these assisting artists, the conductor is planning carefully to preserve the symphonic integrity of the programs. In this interest, each artist will appear in a certain orchestral score of importance with a solo part for which his genius is particularly suited.

Three composers who are also brilliant pianists and experienced as conductors will appear in works of their own. These are, Rachmaninoff, Stravinsky, Prokofieff. Serge Rachmaninoff has appeared several times as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His undisputed eminence as a piano virtuoso by no means over-shadows his importance as the composer of numerous scores, both orchestral and in smaller forms.

Igor Stravinsky is to come to America for the first time. To the daring score "Le Sacre du Printemps," which was performed at these concerts last season, and such famous ballets as "Petrouchka" and the "Fire Bird" he has recently added a concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in which he appeared at the "Concerts Koussevitzky" last Summer with great success.

Serge Prokofieff has been called the most talented of the younger generation of Russian composers, and is likewise a pianist of remarkable ability. He first came to America in 1918. Several of his works have been performed in this country, notably his satiric opera, "The Love for the Three Oranges," which was produced by the Chicago Opera Company. His Scythian Suite and his tone poem, "Sept 'ils sont Sept" have attracted a great deal of attention in Europe under the baton of Mr Koussevitzky.

The remaining artists have appeared on former occasions as soloists with this orchestra. They are Margaret Matzenaur, the Wagnerian mezzo-soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Albert Spalding, the distinguished American violinist, and Alfred Cortot, who is considered the greatest pianist of France; likewise Guy Maier and Lee Pattison, who will appear in music for two pianos, with orchestra.

DAMAGED PAGE

and Music by Philip

Above—Sergei Rachmaninoff, Pianist, Who Will Be a Soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Below — Albert Spalding, Violinist.

Serge Koussevitzky, the New Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra
Margaret Matzenauer, Soprano

Alfred Cortot, Pianist
Serge Prokovieff, Pianist

STRAND

The two photoplays to be shown during the first three days of this week at Gordon's Strand Theatre are "Her Marriage Vow," and "The Man Who Fights Alone," with William Farnum. The program will be changed on Thursday.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON,
MASS.
HERALD

SEP 7 1924

Announce Season Plans of Boston Symphony Orchestra

Serge Koussevitzky sailed for America yesterday (Sept. 6) to assume his duties as the new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Not long after arriving in America he will assemble the orchestra for rehearsal and prepare for the opening of the season which will take place in Symphony hall on Oct. 10 and 11. The orchestra to which Mr. Koussevitzky comes retains unchanged the personnel which met with such high and general praise last season.

For the regular series of 24 pairs of concerts all seats for the Friday afternoons have been resubscribed. Those for the Saturday evenings which have not been thus taken are now on sale—their number is considerably less than at this time last year.

In recent months, Serge Koussevitzky has been appearing notably as guest conductor of the London Symphony orchestra, and while in Paris he has been leading the "Concerts Koussevitzky" and Russian operas at the Grand Opera. In the last several years Mr. Koussevitzky has been probably the most talked about conductor in that part of the world. He is described as having all of the qualities of great leadership and as having the sympathies, convictions and range of the universal artist.

Serge Koussevitzky's first conspicuous activities as a conductor were in ussia, where as a young man he orized his own orchestra in Moscow. came to be greatly admired in his ry and looked upon as a propast for symphonic music, for he led to many remote parts of Rusith his orchestra, making known the established "classic" repertory, and the music of living composers as well.

He was not heard of in western Eupe as a conductor until 1920. From hen until now he has been the domant figure in the concert halls of ndon and of Paris. Mr. Koussevitzky be the first Russian to conduct the ton Symphony orchestra.

SOLOISTS

The list of soloists now announced is only partial and will be added to later. In choosing these assisting artists, the conductor is planning carefully to preserve the symphonic integrity of the programs. In this interest, each artist will appear in a certain orchestral score of importance with a solo part for which his genius is particularly suited. For example, three composers who are also brilliant pianists and experienced as conductors will appear in works of their own. These are Rachmaninoff, Stravinsky, Prokofieff. Serge Rachmaninoff has appeared several times as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra. His undisputed eminence as a piano virtuoso by no means overshadows his importance as the composer of numerous scores, both orchestral and in smaller forms.

Igor Stravinsky is to come to America for the first time this season. To the daring score "Le Sacre du printemps," which was performed at these concerts last season, and such famous ballets as "Petrouchka," and the "Fire Bird," he has recently added a concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in which he appeared at the "Concerts Koussevitzky" last summer with great success.

Serge Prokofieff has been called the most talented of the younger generation of Russian composers, and is likewise a pianist of remarkable ability. He first came to America in 1918. Several of his works have been performed in this country, notably his satiric opera, "The Love for the Three Oranges," which was produced by the Chicago Opera Company. His Svythian Suite and his tone poem, "Sept'ils sont Sept," have attracted a great deal of attention in Europe under the baton of Mr. Koussevitzky. He has given piano recitals in our principal cities. His pending appearance with this orchestra will be his first in Boston.

The remaining artists have appeared on former occasions as soloists with this orchestra. They are Marguerite Matzenaur, the Wagnerian mezzo-soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Albert Spalding, the distinguished American violinist, and Alfred Cortot, who is considered the greatest pianist of France; likewise Guy Maier and Lee Pattison, who will appear in music for two pianos, with orchestra.

Announce Season Plans of Boston Symphony Orchestra

Serge Koussevitzky sailed for America yesterday (Sept. 6) to assume his duties as the new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Not long after arriving in America he will assemble the orchestra for rehearsal and prepare for the opening of the season which will take place in Symphony hall on Oct. 10 and 11. The orchestra to which Mr. Koussevitzky comes retains unchanged the personnel which met with such high and general praise last season.

For the regular series of 24 pairs of concerts all seats for the Friday afternoons have been resubscribed. Those for the Saturday evenings which have not been thus taken are now on sale—their number is considerably less than at this time last year.

In recent months, Serge Koussevitzky has been appearing notably as guest conductor of the London Symphony orchestra, and while in Paris he has been leading the "Concerts Koussevitzky" and Russian operas at the Grand Opera. In the last several years Mr. Koussevitzky has been probably the most talked about conductor in that part of the world. He is described as having all of the qualities of great leadership and as having the sympathies, convictions and range of the universal artist.

Serge Koussevitzky's first conspicuous activities as a conductor were in Russia, where as a young man he organized his own orchestra in Moscow. He came to be greatly admired in his country and looked upon as a propagandist for symphonic music, for he travelled to many remote parts of Russia with his orchestra, making known not only the established "classic" repertory, and the music of living composers as well.

He was not heard of in western Europe as a conductor until 1920. From then until now he has been the dominant figure in the concert halls of London and of Paris. Mr. Koussevitzky will be the first Russian to conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra.

SOLOISTS

The list of soloists now announced is only partial and will be added to later. In choosing these assisting artists, the conductor is planning carefully to preserve the symphonic integrity of the programs. In this interest, each artist will appear in a certain orchestral score of importance with a solo part for which his genius is particularly suited. For example, three composers who are also brilliant pianists and experienced as conductors will appear in works of their own. These are Rachmaninoff, Stravinsky, Prokofieff. Serge Rachmaninoff has appeared several times as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra. His undisputed eminence as a piano virtuoso by no means overshadows his importance as the composer of numerous scores, both orchestral and in smaller forms.

Igor Stravinsky is to come to America for the first time this season. To the daring score "Le Sacre du printemps," which was performed at these concerts last season, and such famous ballets as "Petrouchka," and the "Fire Bird," he has recently added a concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in which he appeared at the "Concerts Koussevitzky" last summer with great success.

Serge Prokofieff has been called the most talented of the younger generation of Russian composers, and is likewise a pianist of remarkable ability. He first came to America in 1918. Several of his works have been performed in this country, notably his satiric opera, "The Love for the Three Oranges," which was produced by the Chicago Opera Company. His Svythian Suite and his tone poem, "Sept'ils sont Sept," have attracted a great deal of attention in Europe under the baton of Mr. Koussevitzky. He has given piano recitals in our principal cities. His pending appearance with this orchestra will be his first in Boston.

The remaining artists have appeared on former occasions as soloists with this orchestra. They are Marguerite Matzenaur, the Wagnerian mezzo-soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Albert Spalding, the distinguished American violinist, and Alfred Cortot, who is considered the greatest pianist of France; likewise Guy Maier and Lee Pattison, who will appear in music for two pianos, with orchestra.

REDUCTION

RATIO

14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
SEP 7 1924

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SEP 1924

New Boston Symphony Conductor, Koussevitzky, Tells His Plans

Famous Musician Likes American "Jazz"---His Programmes Outlined

Everybody wants to know about Koussevitzky—
What will he do when he comes to Boston?
What does he think of jazz and Americans?
What does he look like, how does he conduct, what is he like in private life, and hundreds of other such questions.

For the great Serge Koussevitzky has just sailed from France to take charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and he will be here this week.

Today the Sunday Post, through its correspondent in Paris, reveals Koussevitzky in the first interview that he has given regarding his coming to Boston.

This is an intimately human sketch of the great musician whose coming is the greatest musical sensation in years.

BY ALLEN RAYMOND

(Paris correspondent of the Boston Post and the North American Newspaper Alliance.)

Paris, Sept. 6.

"What I hope to do in America is to show the public that masterpieces of music are being written today as powerful, stirring and beautiful as the greatest of the past," says Serge Koussevi z'ky, the Russian conductor, who will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra this coming season.

Koussevitzky

In the twilight shadow of his Paris home, looking down through the trees upon the peaceful Seine, he outlined for readers of the Sunday Post his plans and hopes for his approachig career across the Atlantic.

"I will present in Boston music never heard before," he said; "music which now exists only in manuscripts which I have in my keeping; music written by men now living who will rank as high a century from now as Mozart and Beethoven. I have given some of their music to Paris. You have seen how it has been received. Some of it shall be America's first."

I have seen how Koussevitzky's music has been received in Paris. Music lovers in the French capital have gone mad over the Russian leader, literally frenzied in their idolatry.

But it is not alone for his introduction of new composers that they storm the doors of the Theatre Nationale de l'Opera for all his concerts.

America may be sure that Koussevitzky will present its musical public with auditions of the older classics, without a trace of modernity in his reading of them, their historic beauties reproduced painstakingly and enthusiastically, exactly as the modern Russian believes the older masters wished them rendered.

America also may be sure that this man will be engaged during his entire stay in America on a passionate hunt for musical genius resident or native in the new world.

"I will do in the new world what I have done in the old," was his reply to a request for an outline of his plans.

In the old world he has become known as a hunter for musical talent, and a patron of young composers. He believes there is genius in America, and he hopes to ferret it out. The breadth of territory which his search will cover may be indicated by an incident he told the interviewer.

Jazz Music

"Jazz music?" (He was answering a query.) "I like all good music. And several Americans have written jazz which is truly good. Besides writing it, your nation seems to have a talent for playing it.

"I was in London recently, and dropped in late at night for something to eat at a supper club where dancing was going on. There was an orchestra of American boys there. The oldest could not have been more than thirty. I had a table near them where I could hear them and watch them individually. Some of those boys were improvising as they went along, and they were great players.

"I let my supper get cold listening to them. I stayed until a shockingly late hour. Those boys were fine musicians, but I learned that they were not particularly notable among America's jazz musicians—just a group of college students from one of your Western States."

Mr. Koussevitzky is a man of one passion, music. He is a man of no hobbies. Over and above his talents, his outstanding quality is enthusiasm. He is as enthusiastic over the subject he expounds from his conductor's platform as is Billy Sunday over his. (Their methods of exposition differ.)

Music has been practically his entire life since the age when most boys are playing marbles. At the age of 12 he conducted a provincial theatre orchestra in Russia, and was a composer. Today he is 52 years old.

His Wife Also Musical

Mr. Koussevitzky is married. His wife is musical. Mrs. Koussevitzky is the sort of person to whom the young Russian composers dedicate their most ambitious works. A species of goddess, for Scriabine, Strawinsky and their fellows. She has great sympathy for them, is a tireless listener, an able and appreciative critic. She is more than well-to-do. She has published the music of more than one hungry genius, and has supplied food to many others.

In appearance, manner and dress, Mr. Koussevitzky might be a successful middle-aged business man, a forceful figure of no eccentricities, of middle height, stocky, un-athletic. Only his eyes inform you he is not. Few business men have eyes glowing with such dark strange fires as his, when enthusiasm is flaming in them. They are the eyes of a young reformer, an evangelist.

Would Appreciate Billy Sunday

The fact is, Mr. Koussevitzky IS an evangelist and a showman. He would appreciate both Billy Sunday and P. T. Barnum. This is what he told his interviewer of a trip he used to take in prewar Russia, with an orchestra of 100 players, in a steamboat on the Volga:

"I carried music through a vast section of Russia," he said. "Once every two years before the war I used to charter a big steamer, and make a journey of 2500 miles. We stopped at every big city and many small towns. We sent men ahead to advertise that we were coming. The peasants would flock to the river from villages for miles back into country which few Europeans have ever seen. And I took them the best that exists in music, new and old. Debussy, Ravel, Florent Schmitt, P. Ducas, Roger Ducasse, Fanelly, Elgar, Richard Strauss! I made them known in villages where there isn't any modern life as Europe and America know it.

"I took them into the back country and gave them to hundreds of thousands of Russian people, scattered over an area of 500,000 square miles. You should have seen them come to see and to hear us. And on these trips I found musicians who are now playing in the great capitals.

"They were marvellous, those journeys. They are not possible any more."

There is a pardonable pride that glows through the musician's story of his pre-war missionary tours. There is no doubt that Koussevitzky, like other artists, is an egotist, but his is not a blatant egotism. It is the self-confidence and pride of a man who has demonstrated his abilities, and who is enthusiastic over the place of music in the general scheme of things.

Music is the most important thing in the world to him. Therefore, it must count for a great deal with society at large.

As a small boy, he says, the orchestras he heard in Tver, the north Russian community where he was born, exerted an impelling fascination over him. His family were mercantile, middle-class folk, who were fond of music. It was early the centre of his existence, and though he experimented with various instruments when a boy, he always intended to direct an orchestra as his life work.

When he was 14, he entered the Conservatoire of the Moscow Philharmonic Society as a student of composition and orchestral conducting. In order to qualify for a scholarship he studied the double-bass, and became such a master of that resounding instrument that upon the termination of his study he obtained the post of double-bass soloist at the Moscow Imperial Opera. For several years thereafter he appeared in the principal cities of Russia as a double-bass virtuoso.

He never lost sight of his real aim, the conduct of a great orchestra. In 1909, after an intensive study of the interpretation of classics and moderns in an orchestra formed by him in Berlin, from students of the Berlin High School of Music, he returned to Russia and established his own symphony orchestra in Moscow. This body of musicians quickly became famous all over Russia, so that its appearance in Petrograd was always one of the great events of the Court season.

An impression of the great composer-conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, who is coming to lead Symphony Orchestra this season. This cartoon is from the Glasgow Evening News, Scotland, and shows the great conductor's varying moods.

It was with this group of players with which Koussevitzky toured the Volga. Then came the war. The first revolution, that of 1917, did not disturb him. He was appointed general conductor of the Russian State Orchestra by the Provisional government established by Kerensky. This orchestra formerly was the Court Orchestra.

Then came the Bolshevik uprising.

"I am not a politician," says the composer and conductor, speaking of it. "I am not an economist."

Then he pauses. He does not launch into the diatribes against the new regime, which explode from most of the Russian colony in Paris. He sits and broods.

Players Wore Mittens

"Life in Russia is impossible," he concludes. "There is no chance for artistic endeavor. I tried. I gave concerts in rooms that were freezing. The brass players wore mittens. You can't do it. It's impossible. Everything has gone to pieces."

There was a story floating about Paris that Koussevitzky and his compatriot, the basso, Chaliapine, had quarrelled over Bolshevism. Chaliapine managed to get along well with the Soviet chiefs. Koussevitzky left the country rather than try to carry on artistic endeavor under what he felt were impossible conditions. Koussevitzky denies the quarrel.

His Opinion on Chaliapine

"Chaliapine is a great artist and a great Russian," he says. When he and the basso met upon the Place de l'Opera, just in front of the Cafe de la Paix, for the first time since 1920, the two literally fell upon each other's necks. Shortly thereafter, Koussevitzky led the orchestra in the Opera when Chaliapine appeared, and led it in each of the basso's appearances thereafter.

The union of the two popular favorites in one performance almost caused a riot. The prices were quadrupled, and still the mob stormed the doors trying to get in.

I doubt if Koussevitzky ever quarrelled with anyone on Bolshevism or anything else aside from music. Therein lies all his interest, and all his capability of getting excited.

He is interested in choral music as well as orchestral, and in the union of the two. In Moscow he organized a choir of 250 voices to give choral works in conjunction with his symphony orchestra.

Always Seeking New Music

His chief interest undoubtedly is in the discovery of new music and making it known to the public. He introduced Debussy into Russia, and twice invited the great Frenchman to Moscow and Petrograd to conduct his own works. Many of the Debussy works in Koussevitzky's library are annotated by Debussy's own hand.

Koussevitzky was the warm friend, the discoverer and patron of Scriabine. The composer always considered Koussevitzky the best interpreter of his work. Koussevitzky was the first to perform Scriabine's "Prometheus" poem.

As part of his work in the field of new music, Koussevitzky and his wife are the publishers of "L'Edition Russe de Musique," which they began in Moscow in 1909 and now continue in Paris. The aim of this publishing business is to print the music of young Russians of talent who otherwise might have difficulty in getting their works printed. The recommendation of Koussevitzky is sufficient to make a sale for it once published in France.

This publishing business has printed the works of Strawinsky, Serge Rachmaninoff, Scriabine, Prokofieff, Gretchaninoff, and the famous "Treaty of Orchestration" of Rimsky-Korsakoff.

What Boston Will Hear

Mr. Koussevitzky gave me a list of the music which he was the first to perform in Paris, and which he will bring to America. Very little of it has been heard in the United States, but some of it has been heard in London, where Koussevitzky has acted as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestral in Manchester and Liverpool, where he has conducted the Philharmonic Society, and in Edinburgh and Glasgow, where he conducted the Scottish Symphony Orchestra. He is taking all these scores to Boston, and probably most of it, if not all, will be played there. But Mr. Koussevitzky says he will not force any particular kind of music down the throats of his listeners. He will experiment to find what his audiences like.

The Koussevitzky first performances have included these selections, and it may therefore be expected that these will be given in Boston.

Debussy: "Sarabande," "Danse."

Roland-Manuel: "Isabelle et Pantalon Overture," "Three Movements of Scarlatti."

Florent Schmitt: "Reves," "Mirages," Suite for Orchestra.

Darius Milhaud: "Second Suite of Protheus."

Arthur Honegger: "The Victorious Horace," "Chant de Joie," "Pacific 231."

Maurice Ravel: "Paintings From the Picture Show by Moussorgsky," "Alborada del Gracioso."

Alberic Magnard: "Fourth Symphony."

Arnold Bax: "The Garden of Fand."

W. Reed: "The Will o' Wisp."

Holbrooke: "Bronwen Overture."

Fr. Malipiero: "Pause del Silenzio," "Imprezioni dal Vero, Third Suite."

O. Respighi, "Antiche Danze ed Arie," "Concerto Gregoriano for violin and orchestra."

A. Tansman, "Scherzo Symphonique," "Legende."

M. Delage: "Overture for the Ballet de l'Avenir," "Three Poems for Voice and Orchestra."

A. Roussel: "Symphony, Op. 23."

A. Gretchaninoff: "A Liturgy fo[r] St. John Chrysostom."

Moussorgsky: Two scenes with soloists and chorus from the opera "Khovanchna."

Borodine: Two acts from the opera "Prince Igor," with chorus and soloists.

Moussorgsky: "The Defeat of Sennacherib," cantata for chorus and orchestra.

Kastalsky, "Fraternal Commemoration."

Liadoff: "Kikimora," "From the [Apo]calypsis."

Rachmaninoff: "The Island of De[ad]" "Third Concerto for Piano and Orche[stra]"

Rimsky-Korsakoff: "The Battle of [Kit]nietz," "The Flight From the Bu[m]ble Bee," "Suite" from the opera "[Le] Saltan."

Prokofieff: "Symphonie Class[ique]" "Second Concerto for Piano and [Or]chestra," "Third Concerto for Piano [and] Orchestra," "First Concerto for [Violin] and Orchestra," "Suite Scythe," "[Suite] from the opera "Love of Three Oran[ges]" "Sept! Ils Sont Sept!"

Scriabine: "Poem de l'Extase," "[Poem] of Fire" (Prometheus).

Strawinsky: "Octur" for wind in[stru]ments, "Wind Instruments Symph[onies]" (given in London), "Concerto for [Piano] and Wind Instruments," "Chant [du] Rossignol" ("Symphonic Poems").

Vivaldi: "Concerto," scored by A. S[cott]

Riegel: "Symphony in C Major."

Boccherin: "Symphony in C."

Stammitz: "Concerto for Strings."

Polaci: "Symphony in C Minor."

Locatelli: "A Funeral Symphony."

Corelly: "Concerto for Orchestra, No[s.]

Schubert: "Fifth Symphony."

Brahms: "Schicksalslied," with chorus

Hugo Wolf: "Der Feuerreiter," with chorus.

Manuel de Falla: "El Amor Brujo."

Lily Boulanger: "Poem Bouddhique."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SEP 192

Boston Symphony orchestra will have few soloists this year, reform having been initiated by Koussevitzky, new conductor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
SEP 8 1924

coast.

Q. How long has the Boston Symphony Orchestra been in existence?—J. M.

A. The Boston Symphony Orchestra completed its forty-second year last spring.

Q. How many desertions are there

The only harmless way to bleach the skin white is to mix the juice of two lemons with three ounces of Orchard White, which any druggist will supply for a few cents. Shake well in a bottle,

Whiten Skin with Lemon

one man slipped out of the doorway, another, who had waited outside, asked hopefully:

"Has he finished?"

"Yes," said the last sufferer grimly. "Long ago; but he won't stop."—Good Hardware.

"Reginald," said the Sunday school teacher, during a lesson on the baptismal covenant, "can you tell me the two things necessary to baptism?"

"Yes, ma'am," said Reginald, "Water and a baby."—Everybody's Magazine.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
SEP 7 1924

MAINE AND NEW HAMPSHIRE PI

ALLURING RUNS FOR MOTORISTS

Scenery and Vast Opportunities for Sport Attract Many Thousands of Autoists Each Year to Maine

BY J. C. KERRISON

Northern New England, or to be more exact, the State of Maine and the White Mountains of New Hampshire, is not only a year round playground of universal reputation, but is, and has been for more than three hundred years, a maker of American history. Nature has endowed this section with all that may be required in a vacation country. The most rugged coastline in the world, countless rivers, streams, lakes and ponds, wonderful mountains, fertile valleys and virgin forests, coupled with palatial hotels which only long ex-upon the peaceful Seine, he outlined for readers of the Sunday Post his plans and hopes for his approachig career across the Atlantic.

Koussevitzky

"I will present in Boston music never heard before," he said; "music which now exists only in manuscripts which I have in my keeping; music written by men now living who will rank as high a century from now as Mozart and Beethoven. I have given some of their music to Paris. I have seen how it has been received. Some of it shall be America's first."

I have seen how Koussevitzky's music has been received in Paris. Music lovers in the French capital have gone mad over the Russian leader, literally frenzied in their idolatry.

But it is not alone for his introduction of new composers that they storm the doors of the Theatre National de l'Opera for all his concerts.

America may be sure that Koussevitzky will present its musical public with auditions of the older classics without a trace of modernity in his readings of them, their historic beauties reproduced painstakingly and enthusiastically, exactly as the modern Russian masterpieces.

America also may be sure that this man will be engaged during his entire stay in America on a passionate hunt for musical genius resident or native in the new world.

"Jazz music?" (he was answering a query). "I like all good music. And several Americans have written jazz which is truly good.

"I was in London recently," he continued, "and dropped in late at night for something to eat at a supper club where dancing was going on. There was an orchestra of American boys there. The oldest could not have been more than 30. Some of those boys were improvising as they went along, and they were great players. I stayed until a shockingly late hour. Those boys were fine musicians, but I learned that they were not particularly notable among America's jazz musicians—just a group of college students from one of your western states."

* * *

Mr. Koussevitzky is married. His wife is musical. Mrs. Koussevitzky is the sort of person to whom the young Russian composers dedicate their most ambitious works. A species of goddess, for Scriabin, Stravinsky and their fellows. She has great sympathy for them, is a tireless listener, an able and appreciative critic. She is more than well-to-do. She has published the music of more than one hungry genius, and has supplied food to many others.

In appearance, manner and dress, Mr. Koussevitzky might be a successful, middle-aged business man—a forceful figure of no eccentricities, of middle height, stocky, unathletic.

The fact is, Mr. Koussevitzky is an evangelist and a showman. He would appreciate both Billy Sunday and P. T. Barnum.

This is what he told an interviewer of a trip he used to take in pre-war Russia with an orchestra of 100 players, in a steamboat on the Volga.

"I carried music through a vast section of Russia," he said. "Once every two years before the war I used to charter a big steamer and make a journey of 2,500 miles. We stopped at every big city and many small towns. The peasants would flock to the river from villages for miles back into the country which few Europeans have ever seen. And I took them the best that exists in music, new and old. Debussy, Ravel, Florent Schmitt, P. Dukas, Roger Ducasse, Elgar, Richard Strauss, I made them known in villages where there isn't any modern life as Europe and America know it.

"They were marvelous, those journeys. They are not possible any more."

When he was 14, he entered the conservatoire of the Moscow Philharmonic society as a student of composition and orchestral conducting. In order to qualify for a scholarship he studied the double bass and became such a master of that resounding instrument that upon the termination of his study he obtained a post at the Moscow Imperial opera. For several years thereafter he appeared in the principal cities of Russia as a double bass virtuoso.

* * *

He never lost sight of his real aim, to conduct a great orchestra. In 1909, after an intensive study of the interpretation of classics and moderns in an orchestra formed by him in Berlin from students of the Berlin High School of Music, he returned to Russia and established his own symphony orchestra in Moscow. This body of musicians quickly became famous all over Russia so that its appearance in Petrograd was always one of the great events of the court season. It was with this group of players with which Koussevitzky toured the Volga.

Then came the war. The first revolution, that of 1917, did not disturb him. He was appointed general conductor of the Russian State orchestra by the provisional government established by Kerensky. This orchestra formerly was the court orchestra.

Then came the bolshevik uprising. "Life in Russia is impossible," he concludes. "There is no chance for artistic endeavor. I tried. I gave concerts in rooms that were freezing. The brass players were mittens. You can't do it. It's impossible. Everything has gone to pieces."

Mr. Koussevitzky gave me a list of the music which he was the first to perform in Paris and which he will bring to America. But Mr. Koussevitzky says he will not force any particular kind of music down the throats of his listeners. He will experiment to find what his audiences like.

The Koussevitzky first performances which include works by Debussy, Roland-Manuel, Florent Schmitt, Milhaud, Honegger, Ravel, Magnard, Bax, Arnold Reed, Holbrooke, Malpiero, Respighi, Tansman, Delage, Roussel, Cretchaninoff, Moussorgsky, Borodin, Kastalsky, Liadov, Rachmaninoff, Rimsky-Korsakov, Prokofieff, Scriabin, Starvinsky, Vivaldi, Riegel, Boccherini, Stammnitz, Polaci, Locatelli, Conelli, Brahms, Hugo Wolff, Manuel de Falla and Lily Boulanger.

HAYNES SALES SHOW INCREASE

Outlook for Prosperity Better Than Ever

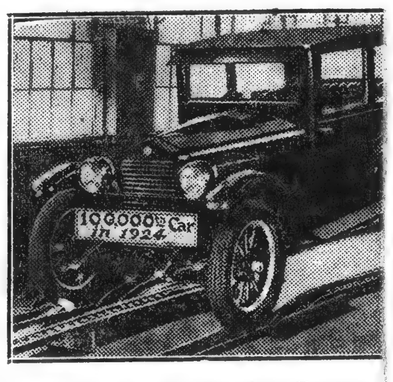
On Sept. 4th, Mr. E. F. Russell, factory manager of the Haynes Automobile Company, of Kokomo, Indiana, on a visit to the local Haynes distributor, J. C. Harvey, stated that the sales of Haynes cars during the past few weeks had shown a decided increase over the same period of last year, and the automobile industry as a whole is showing more activity with extremely bright prospects for a larger fall business.

He also stated that the outlook for sales for the Haynes never has been brighter than at the present time, and that the factory is making plans to take care of production for the large increase of closed car sales this fall. The present new model Haynes cars now on display according to Mr. Russell, are meeting with great approval and increased sales all over the country.

Mr. Russell says that conditions at the Haynes factory never were in better shape than at present to produce a high-grade automobile at a minimum cost with maximum quality.

J. C. Harvey, local distributor for Haynes, is also optimistic regarding the general automobile situation, and is outlining a big merchandising campaign.

100,000th Car for Hu



Here is the 100,000th Hudson-Essex ca leaving the final assen

First of the big motor companies to better the volume of 1923 business, the Hudson Motor Car Company has produced and sold its 100,000th car for 1924. This compares with 88,188 Hudson and Essex cars for all of 1923. The 100,000th car was an Essex Coach.

With Hudson and Essex Coaches comprising 75 per cent of the entire business, Hudson has enjoyed a banner year. It is now the first six-cylinder

For Pleasure Seekers

The new Reo Six "Special Touring," with balloon tires as standard equipment. This car combines an unusually attractive appearance with power, speed, comfort and ease of control. It is proving immensely popular

FLINT INCREASES DAILY OUTPUT

In former years, as the summer advanced the automotive industry noted [illegible] with society at large.

As a small boy, he says, the orchestras

TWENTY MILES TO A GALLON IN VELIE 56

The following letter was received from H. Morris. Ahlowalmaa of his study he obtained the post of double-bass soloist at the Moscow Imperial Opera. For several years thereafter he

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SEP 192

The Boston Symphony orchestra will have few soloists this year, reform having been initiated by Koussevitzky, new conductor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
SEP 8 1924

coast.

Q. How long has the Boston Symphony Orchestra been in existence?—J. M.

A. The Boston Symphony Orchestra completed its forty-second year last spring.

Q. How many deserti[illegible] are there

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SEP 1924

Famous Russian Musician to Direct Boston Symphony

Koussevitzky, Says Masterpieces Being Composed Today.

Paris, France, Aug. 30.—"What I hope to do in America is to show the public that masterpieces of music are being written today as powerful, stirring, and beautiful as the greatest of the past," says Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor who will lead the Boston symphony orchestra this coming season.

"I will present in Boston music never heard before," he said, "music which now exists only in manuscripts which I have in my keeping."

Music lovers in the French capital have gone mad over the Russian leader.

But it is not alone for his introduction of new composers that they storm the doors of the Theater Nationale de l'Opera for all his concerts.

America may be sure that Koussevitsky will present its musical public with auditions of the older classics, without a trace of modernity in his readings of them, their historic beauties reproduced painstakingly and enthusiastically.

America also may be sure that this man will be engaged during his entire stay in America on a passionate hunt for musical genius resident or native in the new world.

"Jazz music?" (he was answering a query). "I like all good music. And several Americans have written jazz which is truly good.

"I was in London recently," he continued, "and dropped in late at night for something to eat at a supper club where dancing was going on. There was an orchestra of American boys there. The oldest could not have been more than 30. Some of those boys were improvising as they went along, and they were great players. I stayed until a shockingly late hour. Those boys were fine musicians, but I learned that they were not particularly notable among America's jazz musicians—just a group of college students from one of your western states."

* * *

Mr. Koussevitzky is married. His wife is musical. Mrs. Koussevitzky is the sort of person to whom the young Russian composers dedicate their most ambitious works. A species of goddess, for Scriabin, Stravinsky and their fellows. She has great sympathy for them, is a tireless listener, an able and appreciative critic. She is more than well-to-do. She has published the music of more than one hungry genius, and has supplied food to many others.

In appearance, manner and dress, Mr. Koussevitzky might be a successful, middle-aged business man—a forceful figure of no eccentricities, of middle height, stocky, unathletic.

The fact is, Mr. Koussevitzky is an evangelist and a showman. He would appreciate both Billy Sunday and P. T. Barnum.

This is what he told an interviewer of a trip he used to take in pre-war Russia with an orchestra of 100 players, in a steamboat on the Volga.

"I carried music through a vast section of Russia," he said. "Once every two years before the war I used to charter a big steamer and make a journey of 2,500 miles. We stopped at every big city and many small towns. The peasants would flock to the river from villages for miles back into the country which few Europeans have ever seen. And I took them the best that exists in music, new and old. Debussy, Ravel, Florent Schmitt, P. Dukas, Roger Ducasse, Elgar, Richard Strauss, I made them known in villages where there isn't any modern life as Europe and America know it.

"They were marvelous, those journeys. They are not possible any more."

When he was 14, he entered the conservatoire of the Moscow Philharmonic society as a student of composition and orchestral conducting. In order to qualify for a scholarship he studied the double bass and became such a master of that resounding instrument that upon the termination of his study he obtained a post at the Moscow Imperial opera. For several years thereafter he appeared in the principal cities of Russia as a double bass virtuoso.

* * *

He never lost sight of his real aim, to conduct a great orchestra. In 1909, after an intensive study of the interpretation of classics and moderns in an orchestra formed by him in Berlin from students of the Berlin High School of Music, he returned to Russia and established his own symphony orchestra in Moscow. This body of musicians quickly became famous all over Russia so that its appearance in Petrograd was always one of the great events of the court season. It was with this group of players with which Koussevitzky toured the Volga.

Then came the war. The first revolution, that of 1917, did not disturb him. He was appointed general conductor of the Russian State orchestra by the provisional government established by Kerensky. This orchestra formerly was the court orchestra.

Then came the bolshevik uprising. "Life in Russia is impossible," he concludes. "There is no chance for artistic endeavor. I tried. I gave concerts in rooms that were freezing. The brass players were mit-

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

92

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
BULLETIN

SEP 81924

SYMPHONY LEADER SAYS JAZZ IS GOOD

Russian Artist Who Will Conduct Boston Orchestra, Hunts "American Beethoven"

BRINGS NEW MUSIC

Paris, Sept. 8.—The approaching arrival in America of Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor who will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, turns attention not only to the man himself but to what he, as a seeker after new genius, hopes to find in America.

Exponent of both the classic and the modern, he will search for talent—or better—and with no bias against jazz he may be the first to find an American Beethoven.

"What I hope to do in America is to show the public that masterpieces of music are being written today as powerful, stirring and beautiful as the greatest of the past," says Koussevitsky.

"I will present in Boston music never heard before," he said, "music which now exists only in manuscripts which I have in my keeping, music written by men now living who will rank as high a century from now as Mozart and Beethoven. I have given some of their music to Paris. Some of it shall be America's first.

"Jazz music?" "I like all good music. And several Americans have written jazz which is truly good. Besides writing it the Americans seem to have a talent for playing it.

"I was in London recently, and dropped in at a supper club where dancing was going on. There was an orchestra of American boys there. The oldest could not have been more than thirty. Some of those boys were improvising as they went along. Those boys were fine musicians, but I learned they were not particularly notable among American jazz musicians—just a group of college students from one of your western States."

Mr. Koussevitzky is a man of one passion, music. Over and above his talents, his outstanding quality is enthusiasm. Music has been practically his entire life since the age when most boys are playing marbles. At twelve he conducted a provincial theatre orchestra in Russia, and was a composer. Today he is fifty-two.

Mr. Koussevitsky is married. His wife is musical. Mrs. Koussevitzky is the sort of person to whom the young Russian composers dedicated their most ambitious works.

In appearance, manner and dress, Mr. Koussevitzky might be a successful middle-aged business man—a forceful figure of no eccentricities, of middle height, stocky, un-athletic. But few business men have eyes glowing with such dark strange fires as his, when enthusiasm is flaming in them. They are the eyes of a young reformer, an evangelist.

"I carried music through a vast section of Russia," he said. "Once every two years before the war I used to charter a big steamer and make a journey of 2,500 miles. We stopped at every big city and many small towns. We sent men ahead to advertise that we were coming. The peasants would flock to the river from villages for miles back into the country. And I took them the best that exists in music, new and old."

As a small boy, he says, the orchestras he heard in Tver, the north Russian community where he was born, exerted an impelling fascination over him. His family were mercantile, middle class folk who were fond of music. It was early the centre of his existence, and though he experimented with various instruments when a boy he always intended to direct an orchestra as his life work.

When he was fourteen, he entered the conservatoire of the Moscow Philharmonic Society as a student of composition and orchestral conducting. In order to qualify for a scholarship he studied the double bass and became such a master of it that upon the termination of his study he obtained the post of double bass at the Moscow Imperial Opera. For several years thereafter he appeared in the principal cities of Russia as a double bass virtuoso.

In 1909, after an intensive study of

LIKES AMERICAN MUSIC

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Russian composer, coming to this country to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, says American jazz is good music.

the interpretation of classics and moderns in an orchestra formed by him in Berlin from students of the Berlin High School of Music, he returned to Russia and established his own symphony orchestra in Moscow. This body of musicians quickly became famous all over Russia so that its appearance in Petrograd was always one of the great events of the court season. It was with this group of players with which Koussevitzky toured the Volga.

Then came the war. The first revolution, that of 1917, did not disturb him. He was appointed general conductor of the Russian State Orchestra by the provisional government established by Kerensky. This orchestra formerly was the court orchestra. Then came the Bolshevik uprising.

"I am not a politician," says the composer and conductor, speaking of it. "I am not an economist."

Then he pauses. He does not munch into the diatribes against the new regime which explode from most of the Russian colony in Paris. He sits and broods.

"Life in Russia is impossible," he concludes. "There is no chance for artistic endeavor. I tried. I gave concerts in rooms that were freezing. The bass players wore mittens. You can't do it. It's impossible. Everything has gone to pieces."

He is interested in choral music as well as orchestral, and in the union of the two. In Moscow he organized a choir of 250 voices to give choral works in conjunction with his symphony orchestra.

His chief interest undoubtedly is in the discovery of new music and making it known to the public. He introduced Debussy into Russia and twice invited the great Frenchman to Moscow and Petrograd to conduct his own works. Many of the Debussy works in Koussevitzky's library are annotated by Debussy's own hand.

Koussevitzky was the warm friend, the discoverer, and patron of Scriabin. The composer always considered Koussevitzky the best interpreter of his works. Koussevitzky was the first to perform Scriabin's "Prometheus" poem.

As part of his work in the field of new music, Koussevitzky and his wife are the publishers of l'Edition Russe de Musique, which they began in Moscow in 1909 and now continue in Paris. The aim of this publishing business is to print the music of young Russians of talent, who otherwise might have difficulty in getting their works printed.

(Copyright, 1924, by The Bulletin and the North American Newspapers Alliance.)

[Wedding

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
[illegible]

SEP 8 1924

Much interesting information concerning Serge Koussevitzky, who takes charge of the Boston Symphony orchestra this winter, is given by Ernest Newman in the American Mercury. This eminent Russian musician received his early training at home; that is, before he entered his teens, for at the age of twelve he was orchestra leader in his native town and for two years he composed whatever music was needed for the plays and conducted the orchestra between the acts.

By this time he had attained size enough to play the double-bass without a step ladder, so off he went to Moscow to continue his studies at the conservatory where stipendiares of the orchestral class had to choose it or one of the brass instruments. It was but a short time before he developed extraordinary facility with the double-bass, became soloist in the Imperial Opera at Moscow, and succeeded his teacher, the celebrated Rambaussec, as professor at the conservatory. He toured Europe as a soloist and composed a number of works for that instrument, including a concerto, which are in the repertory of every contrabassist of ability.

His main ambition, however, was all along to be a conductor. In 1907 he formed, out of the pupils of the Berlin Hochschule fur Musik, an orchestra with which he worked for two years, studying chiefly the classics and Wagner. He returned to Russia in 1909, and organized the Koussevitzky orchestra that soon became so famous; it was made up of the best players from the other Russian orchestras. The men were engaged by the year and were barred from giving their services to any other organization or at any other concerts than those of Koussevitzky.

For the performance of the choral works given at his Moscow concerts he formed a mixed choir of 250 voices; in Petrograd he used for this purpose the celebrated Archangelsky choir. The formal Moscow and Petrograd seasons ending at Easter, Koussevitzky, in the spring, gave Beethoven festivals, Bach festivals, Tchaikovsky festivals, Rimsky-Korsakov festivals, etc., in the two capital towns.

In the summer for many years he toured the provinces with his orchestra, taking it and various distinguished soloists into villages that had not only never heard an orchestra before, but had not even seen certain of the instruments; his annual voyages down the Volga with this company of musicians were among the most romantic events of the musical life of our time. In this way he introduced a number of classical and modern works to thousands who would otherwise never have heard a bar of them.

One of the objects of Koussevitzky has been breaking through routine. In the years between 1907 and the outbreak of the war, he introduced many novelties, native and foreign, to the Russian public, including Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" and Scriabine's third and fifth symphonies. He managed to carry on during the war, and after the 1917 revolution he was appointed director of the Russian state orchestras and remained as such until 1920, when he left his native land and in 1921 founded those Paris concerts of his that are now so famous.

In Paris, as elsewhere, Koussevitzky was not bound by custom, and during the four years from 1921 to 1924 has given annually two seasons of four concerts each, at which he has introduced an enormous number of new works and rediscovered or rearranged classics. He has also been very popular in London and in the big cities of continental Europe, and in Barcelona staged and conducted a number of Russian operas. Of his conducting, Mr. Newman says:

"America will find Koussevitzky's musicianship and his orchestral technique equal to any demands that are likely to be made on them. The question is not as to his competence, but what will be thought of his readings. Opinions will differ about him, as they do about every conductor. I can speak only of the impression he has made on myself after experience of him in music of all schools and all orders. He has a volcanic temperament, but I have never yet known it to run away with him. I have often found myself disagreeing with him; but I have never disagreed with him on the score that he had lost control over his own fire."

"On the contrary, it is precisely when his temperament is at boiling point that his hand on the regulator is steadiest and surest. When I have disagreed with him most acutely has been in moments when, I was pretty certain, the fire had, for purely physical reasons, gone out. I particularly remember a performance of Brahms's Third Symphony in which he took the third movement at so slow a pace that its real character seemed to me to be completely perverted; the gentle, unassuming, half-sad, half-playful poco allegretto became a brooding andante—almost an adagio. I am not in Koussevitzky's secrets.

"It is just possible that this is really how the third movement strikes him. But until I hear him play it again in the same way I shall prefer to believe the explanation to be simply that he was tired and had no idea how slow the tempo really was. He takes an enormous amount out of himself when he conducts, and the wonder to me always is how he manages to get through the quantity of work he does and to keep his nerves so steady and his head so cool through it all."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK

SEP 8 1924

Koussevitzky

Boston, the Hub, has made another revolution. Serge Koussevitzky, famed Russian conductor, a prophet of the new, a patron of the unknown, will direct the Boston Symphony this Winter. Last season it was Pierre Monteux, volcanic, sensational, whose introduction of Stravinsky's Sacre du Printemps was a dramatic event. Now comes a man whom they heralded in Moscow with bombs and cheers and acclaimed in Paris with appreciation even more explosive. What will he do? Great words thunder in the index.

"What I hope to do in America is to show the public that masterpieces of music as stirring, as beautiful as the greatest of the past are being written today. I will present, in Boston, music never heard before, music which exists only in manuscripts which I have in my keeping, music written by men now living who will rank as high a century from now as Mozart or Beethoven!" No enemy to Jazz is Koussevitzky. It is stated of him that in London one night, stopping at a supper-club for a bite, he heard some young Americans rendering their native melodies. He listened; his bite grew cold. "I like good music," said he.

Koussevitzky has always been more concerned with the reality of achievement than with the appearance of it. For diverse interests he substitutes his great and lonely passion; he indulges no hobbies, tolerates in himself no eccentricities. In countenance, he is grave; in dress and manner, he resembles a cosmopolitan man of business. Only his hands and eyes admit the implication that this business has to do with Art. He was born in Tver, in Northern Russia, and received his first employment as double bass in the Moscow Imperial Opera. He rose to become a conductor and toured Europe with his orchestra. Revolt he has always accepted; even Revolution, with red flags and black drums, did not stop his music. He gave concerts in deserted places, when it was so cold that the brass players had to wear mittens.

In France, he was famed as a hunter after talent and a friend of young composers. He introduced Paris to the works of several excellent musicians, hitherto unheard-of; his wife, known as one of the most charming women in Moscow, shared this interest. To her were dedicated the works of such young Russians as Scriabin and Stravinsky. With bread and meat she fed the inspiration of more than one hungry genius who discovered, during the War, that Art was long and food was short.

In spite of his amenity to what is untried, Koussevitzky takes no liberties with the classics. There is no trace of modernity in his reading of them, just as there is no affected classicism in his reading of the moderns. It is his theory that when one listens to a piece of music, one listens to a period of history, and if the background is anachronistic, one hears nothing. With scrupulous regard, he presents the works of the old masters as he believes they would wish them presented. Now he is looking for the American Beethoven.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
BULLETIN
SEP 10 1924

JAZZ AND THE CLASSICS

A distinguished Russian composer, coming here to conduct so severely a classical organization as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, admits that he finds jazz pleasing to the ear. SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY'S musical mind may be more attuned to the music of BRAHMS and BEETHOVEN, RIMSKY-KORSAKOW and TSCHAIKOWSKY, but he does not hesitate to say that some jazz may be truly good and that he believes some Americans have a talent for playing it.

Therein he sums up the whole case, for who will dispute so high an authority as M. SERGE? The classics, as all the world knows, can sound more cacophonous than jazz when they are badly played. The real complaint against the syncopated dance strain that is America's own is not that it is inherently bad, although a lot of muddled music has masqueraded as jazz, but that it makes so strong a bid for the amateur pianist, second-rate fiddler and the saxophone sheik. Good jazz, well played, is not, after all, the kind of music that will ever pass out of popular favor.

SUN
Pittsburgh, Pa.
SEP 12 1924

Jazz and the Classics.

(From the Philadelphia Bulletin.)

A distinguished Russian composer, coming here to conduct so severely a classical organization as the Boston symphony orchestra, admits that he finds jazz pleasing to the ear. Serge Koussevitsky's musical mind may be more attuned to the music of Brahms and Beethoven, Rimsky-Korsakow and Tschaikowsky, but he does not hesitate to say that some jazz may be truly good and that he believes some Americans have a talent for playing it.

Therein he sums up the whole case, for who will dispute so high an authority as M. Serge? The classics, as all the world knows, can sound more cacophonous than jazz when they are badly played. The real complaint against the syncopated dance strain that is America's own is not that it is inherently bad, although a lot of muddled music has masqueraded as jazz, but that it makes so strong a bid for the amateur pianist, second-rate fiddler and the saxophone sheik. Good jazz, well played, is not, after all, the kind of music that will ever pass out of popular favor.

* * *

Bolshevist World Rule

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BOSTON
MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
SEP 12 1924

KOUSSEVITZKY LANDS IN N Y

New Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra

NEW YORK, Sept 12—Serge Koussevitzky, one of the greatest musical directors in Europe, arrived today on the Aquitania to become conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the first Russian to attain this honor. The first concert under him will be produced Oct 20 at Boston.

Born in Tver, North Russia, in 1874, Koussevitzky remained in the homeland until 1920, becoming leader of Russia's greatest musical organizations, the Koussevitzky Orchestra of Moscow.

In the past four years he has appeared as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra, as well as in Barcelona, Madrid, Rome and Berlin.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
SEP 1924

Serge Koussevitzky, who will conduct the Boston Symphony this coming season, hopes to "ferret out" new music by unknown American composers, according to Allan Raymond, Paris correspondent of the North American Newspaper Alliance.

"In the Old World," says Mr. Raymond, "Koussevitzky is known as a hunter for musical talent and a patron of young composers. He believes there is genius in America," Mr. Raymond quotes Koussevitzky as saying: "What I hope to do in America is to show the public that masterpieces of music are being written today as powerful, striring and beautiful as the greatest of the past. I will present in Boston music never heard before, music which now exists only in manuscript which I have in my keeping, music written by men now living who will rank as high a century from now as Mozart or Beethoven. I have given some of their music to Paris. Some of it shall be America's first. I like all good music, and several musicians have written jazz which is truly good.

Weingartner and Koussevitzky

W. H. HADDON SQUIRE

London, May 2.

BY A happy combination of fortuitous circumstances London concert-goers have had recently an opportunity of comparing the art of two great conductors — Weingartner and Koussevitzky. Both, within a few days, conducted the Ninth Symphony; and perhaps many, if not most, of their listeners summed up a striking contrast in methods by the words "classical" and "romantic"; meaning, as one critic put it, that Weingartner conformed to a tradition, while Koussevitzky "made a personal matter of the work."

Each performance, in its way, justified the conception behind it, and was admittedly a fine one. Partisanship, however, will "out-vociferize even sound itself," and there has been much argument, public and private, as to which was the finer of the two interpretations.

Ludwig Wittgenstein has declared that most propositions and questions which have been written about philosophical matters are not false but senseless. "We cannot, therefore, answer questions of this kind at all, but only state their senselessness." Subservience to words used more or less vaguely, and a misunderstanding of the logic of language, justify the same form of reply to most of the questions propounded by writers on æsthetics. The time-worn antithesis of "classical" and "romantic" has today no meaning. Its fallaciousness had been exposed even before Cyril Scott pointed out, some years ago, that classicalism is based, at any rate in music, upon a gigantic misconception —the misconception that any great genius was ever classical in his own day. "No composer of the first rank has ever adhered to traditions; he has always overstepped them, and hence every masterpiece is the result of romanticism. Indeed, what pedants call classicalism is nothing but that transformation apparently brought about when the dust of years settles on what was once a romantic masterpiece."

Case Understated

Musical thought moves so rapidly now, Scott seems to have understated his case. In music, as literature, there are men who have seen their works transformed from romantic masterpieces into classics almost before the dust which they stirred up had settled down again. Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" and "Le Sacre du Printemps" were, one might almost say, born classics. "Classical" and "romantic," then, are labels like those used by the shopkeeper—adjectives that have a forced relation to the thing they are added to. It matters little whether these labels are stuck on works or artists.

When critics and admirers praise either Weingartner or Koussevitzky by disparaging the other, one is tempted to ask with Tchekhoff: "If criticism, on the authority of which you rely, knows what you and I don't know, why has it up till now not spoken? Why does it not reveal the truth and the immutable laws? If it knew, believe me, it would long ago have shown us what to do . . . But criticism maintains a dignified silence or gets out of it with idle trashy babble. If it seems to you authoritative it is because it is stupid, conceited, impudent and clamorous; because it is an empty barrel one cannot help hearing."

Tchekhoff, it will be seen, did not mince matters. His own standard was delightfully simple: "I divide all works into two classes; those I like and those I don't. I have no other criterion, and if you ask me why I like Shakespeare and don't like Zlatovratsky, I don't venture to answer."

"Right" and "Wrong" Readings

If those who accuse Weingartner of being too quiet or Koussevitzky of over-vehemence are questioned, it soon becomes apparent that the "right" interpretation is the one they like and the "wrong" the one they don't. Their belief that there is a single immutably "right" reading for every work is, of course, pure delusion. A dozen great conductors will give us a dozen different Ninth Symphonies, each, judged by any existing canons of criticism, as "right" as the others. Beauty is infinitely various. In every case, as Arthur Symons says of dissimilar forms of interpretive art, the beauty is different, but, once we have really attained beauty, there can be no question of superiority. "Beauty is always equally beautiful; the degrees exist only when we have not yet attained beauty." Interpretation is itself one of the paradoxes of musical art, being actually a special form of creation. The great interpreter re-creates for us a Ninth Symphony perhaps even more wonderful than that heard by Beethoven when he wrote it.

Some people, again, are inclined to make a habit of confusing composers with their statues. They approach and interpret the music of Bach and Beethoven, for example, as if it were written by marble busts; the fiery intensity of a Koussevitzky shocks them as the rugged force of Beethoven himself would have done. But then, classical composers rarely, if ever, live classical lives.

If Weingartner's art is sometimes labeled "objective" and Koussevitzky's "subjective," there has at least been one occasion when the latter's rôle was reversed. After the performance of a new Stravinsky work the composer complained bitterly that Koussevitzky had ruined the effect by playing it "with expression." The reply was that so far from playing the work with expression, neither he nor the orchestra knew whether they were playing the right notes. Yet, somehow, one can imagine Koussevitzky playing even wrong notes with expression. . . .

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SEP 1924

Jazz and the Classics

[From the Philadelphia Bulletin]

A distinguished Russian composer, coming here to conduct so severely a classical organization as the Boston Symphony Orchestra, admits that he finds jazz pleasing to the ear. Serge Koussevitsky's musical mind may be more attuned to the music of Brahms and Beethoven, Rimsky-Korsakow and Tschaikowsky, but he does not hesitate to say that some jazz may be truly good and that he believes some Americans have a talent for playing it.

Therein he sums up the whole case, for who will dispute so high an authority as M. Serge? The classics, as all the world knows, can sound more cacophonous than jazz when they are badly played. The real complaint against the syncopated dance strain that is America's own is not that it is inherently bad, although a lot of muddle music has masqueraded as jazz, but that it makes so strong a bid for the amateur pianist, second-rate fiddler and the saxophone sheik. Good jazz, well played, is not, after all, the kind of music that will ever pass out of popular favor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

BOSTON SYMPHONY LEADER ARRIVES

NEW YORK, Sept. 12 (AP)—Serge Koussevitzky, one of the greatest directors in Europe, arrived today on the Aquitania to become conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the first Russian to attain this honor. The first concert under him will be produced Oct. 20 at Boston.

Born in Tver, North Russia, in 1874, Koussevitzky remained in the homeland until 1920, becoming leader of Russia's greatest musical organization, the Koussevitzky Orchestra of Moscow.

In the last four years he has appeared as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra, as well as in Barcelona, Madrid, Rome and Berlin.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SEP 1924

GREAT MUSICIAN ON VISIT TO AMERICA

NEW YORK, Sept. 12. — Serge Koussevitzky, one of the greatest musical directors in Europe, arrived today on the Aquitania to become conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the first Russian to attain this honor. In the last four years he has appeared as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra, as well as in Barcelona, Madrid, Rome and Berlin.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From SEP 12 1924
TRAVELER
Boston, Mass.

BOSTON SYMPHONY DIRECTOR ARRIVES

Serge Koussevitzky First Russian to Lead Players

NEW YORK, Sept. 12—Serge Koussevitzky, one of the greatest musical directors in Europe, arrived today on the Aquitania to become conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, the first Russian to attain this honor. The first concert under him will be produced Oct. 20, at Boston.

Born in Tver, North Russia, in 1874, Koussevitzky remained in the homeland until 1920, becoming leader of Russia's greatest musical organization, the Koussevitzky orchestra of Moscow.

In the past four years he has appeared as guest conductor of the London Symphony orchestra, as well as in Barcelona, Madrid, Rome and Berlin.

94

THIS CLIPPING FROM

1924

Big Orchestra Leader Calls Jazz Music Good

New Conductor of Boston Symphony Is Bringing America Music Never Heard Here Before—Started Career On Bull Fiddle.

(Copyright, 1924, in U. S. and Canada by North American Newspaper Alliance. All rights reserved.)

The approaching arrival in America of Serge Koussevitzky to become conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra turns attention not only to the man himself but to what he, as a seeker after new genius, hopes to find in America. Exponent of both the classic and the modern, he will search here for talent—or better—and with no bias against jazz he may be the first to find an American Beethoven. Mr. Koussevitzky's following in Europe is of the enthusiastic sort usually created only by opera stars.

By ALLEN RAYMOND,

Paris Correspondent of the Scranton Times and the North American Newspaper Alliance.

Paris, Sept. 13.—"What I hope to do in America is to show the public that masterpieces of music are being written today as powerful, stirring, and beautiful as the greatest of the past," says Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor, who will lead the Boston Symphony orchestra this coming season.

—Photo by Lipnitzki, Paris.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY,
Comes To America This Season As Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In the twilight shadow of his Paris home, looking down through the trees upon the peaceful Seine, he outlined for readers of The Times his plans and hopes for his approaching career across the Atlantic.

"I will present in Boston music never heard before," he said, "music which now exists only in manuscripts which I have in my keeping, music written by men now living who will rank as high a century from now as Mozart and Beethoven. I have given some of their music to Paris. You have seen how it has been received. Some of it shall be America's first."

I have seen how Koussevitzky's music has been received in Paris. Music lovers in the French capital have gone mad over the Russian leader, literally frenzied in their idolatry.

But it is not alone for his introduction of new composers that they storm the doors of the Theater Nationale de l'Opera for all his concerts.

America may be sure that Koussevitzky will present its musical public with auditions of the older classics, without a trace of modernity in his reading of them, their historic beauties reproduced painstakingly and enthusiastically, exactly as the modern Russian believes the older masters wished them rendered.

America also may be sure that this man will be engaged during his entire stay in America on a passionate hunt for musical genius resident or native in the new world.

"I will do in the new world what I have done in the old," was his reply to a request for an outline of his plans.

In the old world he has become known as a hunter for musical talent, and a patron of young composers. He believes there is genius in America, and he hopes to ferret it out. The breadth of territory which his search will cover may be indicated by an incident he told the interviewer.

"Jazz music?" (he was answering a query). "I like all good music. And several Americans have written jazz which is truly good. Besides writing it, your nation seems to have a talent for playing it.

Finds Jazz Band Splendid.

"I was in London recently, and dropped in late at night for something to eat at a supper club where dancing was going on. There was an orchestra of American boys there. The oldest could not have been more than thirty. I had a table near them where I could hear them and watch them individually. Some of those boys were improvising as they went along, and they were great players. I let my supper get cold listening to them. I stayed until a shockingly late hour. Those boys were fine musicians, but I learned that they were not particularly notable among America's jazz musicians—just a group of college students from one of your western states."

Mr. Koussevitzky is a man of one passion, music. He is a man of no hobbies. Over and above his talents, his outstanding quality is enthusiasm. He is as enthusiastic over the subject he expounds from his conductor's platform as is Billy Sunday over his. (Their methods of exposition differ.)

Music has been practically his entire life since the age when most boys are playing marbles. At the age of twelve he conducted a provincial theater orchestra in Russia, and was a composer. Today he is fifty-two years old.

Mr. Koussevitzky is married. His wife is musical. Mrs. Koussevitzky is the sort of person to whom the young Russian composers dedicate their most ambitious works. A species of goddess, for Scriabin, Stravinsky and their fellows. She has great sympathy for them, is a tireless listener, an able and appreciative critic. She is more than well-to-do. She has published the music of more than one hungry genius, and has supplied food to many others.

In appearance, manner and dress, Mr. Koussevitzky might be a successful middle-aged business man—a forceful figure of no eccentricities, of middle height, stocky, unathletic. Only his eyes inform you he is not: few business men have eyes glowing with such dark strange fires as his, when enthusiasm is flaming in them. They are the eyes of a young reformer, an evangelist.

The fact is, Mr. Koussevitsky is an evangelist, and a showman. He would appreciate both Billy Sunday and P. T. Barnum.

This is what he told his interviewer of a trip he used to take in prewar Russia with an orchestra of 100 players, in a steamboat on the Volga.

Carried Music to Millions.

I carried music through a vast section of Russia," he said. "Once every two years before the war I used to charter a big steamer and make a journey of 2,500 miles. We stopped at every big city and many small towns. We sent men ahead to advertise that we were coming. The peasants would flock to the river from villages for miles back into country which few Europeans have ever seen. And I took them the best that exists in music, new and old. Debussy, Ravel, Florent Schmitt, P. Dukas, Roger Ducasse, Elgar, Richard Strauss. I made them known in villages where there isn't any modern life as Europe and America know it.

"I took them into the back country and gave them to hundreds of thousands of Russian people, scattered over an area of 500,000 square miles. You should have seen them come to see and hear us! And on these trips I found musicians who now are playing in the great capitals.

"They were marvelous, those journeys. They are not possible any more."

There is a pardonable pride that glows through the musician's story of his prewar missionary tours. There is no doubt that Koussevitzy, like other artists, is an egotist, but his is not a blatant egotism. It is the self confidence and pride of a man who has demonstrated his abilities and who is enthusiastic over the place of music in the general scheme of things.

Music is the most important thing in the world to him. Therefore it must count for a great deal with society at large.

As a small boy, he says, the orchestras he heard in Tver, the north Russian community where he was born, exerted an impelling fascination over him. His family were mercantile, middle class folk who were fond of music. It was early the center of his existence, and though he experimented with various instruments when a boy he always intended to direct an orchestra as his life work.

When he was fourteen, he entered the conservatoire of the Moscow Philharmonic society as a student of composition and orchestral conducting. In order to qualify for a scholarship he studied the double bass and became such a master of that resounding instrument that upon the termination of his study he obtained the post of double bass soloist at the Moscow Imperial opera. For several years thereafter he appeared in the principal cities of Russia as a double bass virtuoso.

Established Own Orchestra.

He never lost sight of his real aim, to conduct a great orchestra. In 1909, after an intensive study of the interpretation of classics and moderns in an orchestra formed by him in Berlin from students of the Berlin High School of Music, he returned to Russia and established his own symphony orchestra in Moscow. This body of musicians quickly became famous all over Russia so that its appearance in Petrograd was always one of the great events of the court season. It was with this group of players with which Koussevitzky toured the Volga.

Then came the war. The first revolution, that of 1917, did not disturb him. He was appointed general conductor of the Russian State orchestra by the provisional government established by Kerensky. This orchestra formerly was the court orchestra.

Then came the Bolshevik uprising. "I am not a politician," says the composer and conductor, speaking of it. "I am not an economist."

Then he pauses. He does not launch into the diatribes against the new regime which explode from the most of the Russian colony in Paris. He sits and broods.

"Life in Russia is impossible," he concludes. "There is no chance for artistic endeavor. I tried. I gave concerts in rooms that were freezing. The brass players wore mittens. You can't do it. It's impossible. Everything has gone to pieces."

There was a story floating about Paris that Koussevitzky and his compatriot, the basso, Chaliapin, had quarreled over Bolshevism. Chaliapin managed to get along well with the soviet chiefs. Koussevitzky left the country rather than try to carry on artistic endeavor under what he felt were impossible conditions. Koussevitzky denies the quarrel.

"Chaliapin is a great artist and a great Russian," he says. When he and the basso met upon the Place de l'Opera, just in front of the Cafe de la Paix, for the first time since 1920, the two literally fell upon each other's necks. Shortly thereafter Koussevitzky led the orchestra in the opera when Chaliapin appeared, and led it in each of the basso's appearances thereafter.

The union of the two popular favorites in one performance almost caused a riot. The prices were quadrupled, and still the mob stormed the doors trying to get in.

I doubt if Koussevitzky ever quarreled with anyone on bolshevism, or anything else aside from music. Therein lies all his interest and all his capability of getting excited.

New Finds Chief Interest.

He is interested in choral music as well as orchestral, and in the union of the two. In Moscow he organized a choir of 250 voices to give choral works in conjuncton with his symphony orchestra.

His chief interest undoubtedly is in the discovery of new music and making it known to the public. He introduced Debussy into Russia and twice invited the great Frenchman to Moscow and Petrograd to conduct his own works. Many of the Dabussy works in Koussevitzky's library are annotated by Debussy's own hand.

Koussevitzky was the warm friend, the discoverer, and patron of Scriabin. The composer always considered Koussevitzky the best interpreter of his works. Koussevitzky was the first to perform Scriabin's "Prometheus" poem.

As part of his work in the field of new music Koussevitzky and his wife are the publishers of l'Edition Russe de Musique, which they began in Moscow in 1909 and now continue in Paris. The aim of this publishing business is to print the music of young Russians of talent, who otherwise might have difficulty in getting their works printed. The recommendation of Koussevitzky is sufficient to make a sale of it once published in France.

This publishing business has printed the works of Stravinsky, Serge Gretchaninoff and the famous "Treaty of Orchestration" of Rimsky-Korsakoff.

Mr. Koussevitzky gave me a list of the music which he was the first to perform in Paris and which he will bring to America. Very little of it has been heard in the United States, but some of it has been heard in London, where Koussevitzky has acted as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra; in Manchester and Liverpool, where he has conducted the Philharmonic Society; and in Edinburgh and Glasgow, where he conducted the Scottish Symphony Orchestra. He is taking all of these scores to Boston, and probably most, if not all, will be played there. But Mr. Koussevitzky says that he will not force any particular kind of music down the throats of his listeners. He will experiment to find what his audiences like.

N.Y. times Sat C Sept 13 1924

SERGEI KUSSEVITSKY, CONDUCTOR, ARRIVES

Russian Who Is to Lead Boston Symphony Orchestra, on His First Visit to America.

A DIRECTOR AT 12 YEARS

He Brings Many New Compositions to Introduce Here After He Has Studied Our Tastes.

Sergei Kussevitsky, the Russian conductor who will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, arrived in New York yesterday morning on the Aquitania. Mr. Kussevitsky, accompanied by his wife, was met by William Brennan, manager of the orchestra. Later in the day they went to Boston. Mrs. Kussevitsky, who is also an excellent musician, is her husbands partner in the publishing business, "L'Edition Russe de Musique," which they founded together, particularly with the purpose of assisting young Russian composers.

The conductor's quick gestures and conversation, principally in French, showed his interest and almost childlike enthusiasm on his first visit to America.

He is a man of 50, of good height and figure, with thick, graying hair and mobile, expressive features. His manner is genial. He is full of questions as to the taste of American audiences and reiterated former statements that he had many new compositions to introduce in America, but would ascertain public taste before making final decisions about his programs. He is also, he said, particularly desirous of investigating the works of American composers.

He could not yet announce in detail his programs for either New York or Boston, but added that he had so much new music with him that his problem would be to condense rather than expand the lists he had partially prepared.

Most of Mr. Kussevitsky's conversation was carried on by gestures and a few disjointed phrases, his wife, who speaks English, translating for him.

The conductor, too, had a brilliant career. He was born in Tver, in the northern part of Russia in 1874. His first musical instruction was given him in his home. His progress was so precocious that at the age of 12 he became conductor, for two years, in the theatre of his native town. He had not only to conduct, but to compose music for the dramas performed in the theatre.

At 14 Kussevitsky entered the Moscow conservatory, where he became a pupil on the double-bass of Rambaussec and developed such virtuosity on this clumsy instrument that he succeeded his professor as teacher of it at the Conservatoire and later became the most famous double-bass virtuoso in the world.

All along, however, he had ambitions to become a conductor. In 1907 he formed an orchestra from the pupils of the Hochschule in Berlin, with which he worked two years, studying chiefly the classics and Wagner. Returning to Russia in 1909 he organized the Kussevitsky Orchestra, which soon became famous, and also gave performances at his Moscow concerts with a chorus of 250 voices. In the Summer, for many years, he toured the provinces with his orchestra and inauguarated the series of famous tours of the ports of the Volga. For these tours he engaged a special ship with a platform at the back and sailed from port to port, introducing in many places that had never heard an orchestra the work of great masters.

At the time of the Russian Kerensky revolution of 1917 Kussevitsky was appointed general conductor of the Russian State Orchestra, this orchestra having formerly been the court orchestra of the Czar. With the Bolshevik uprising he was forced to fly to Paris. Since then he has been very active as a guest conductor in London and English provinces, in Scotland, and in Paris, where in the last five seasons the Kussevitsky concerts at the opera have become more and more the musical "rage."

Kussevitsky has been much discussed in Europe for his interpretation of the classics as well as his virtuoso reading of modern music.

Kussevitsky will appear for the first time in America in Symphony Hall, Boston, Oct. 10, at the opening Boston Symphony concert of the season. His first New York appearance with the Boston Symphony will be in Carnegie Hall on Thanksgiving evening.

DR. ALEXIS CARREL RETURNS

REDUCTION

RATIO

14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
GLOBE
SEP 13 1924

BOSTON TO BE CENTER FOR MODERN MUSIC

Koussevitzky, New Conductor of Symphony Orchestra, Arrives—Says American Jazz Is Interesting, But Will Soon Pass

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

Boston is to be the world center for modern music if the plans of Serge Koussevitzky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, are carried out. Conductor Koussevitzky is the apostle of modern music—an international modern music, with no emphasis placed on any one school or any favored composer—he explained last night to reporters who were the first to greet the new conductor at the house he has taken for the season at 122 Pond st, Jamaica Plain.

Mr Koussevitzky arrived in the United States yesterday morning. He landed in New York from the Aquitania and boarded a train immediately to Boston. At the Back Bay station he was met and taken at once to the beautiful house where he will make his Boston home. In spite of his hard day—for it is quite nerve-racking for a man to make his first trip to the United States, go to Boston and settle in a new home, all within 24 hours—Mr Koussevitsky did not show any bad effects from his arduous day.

Talks Through Interpreter

He was sparkling with enthusiasm and energy as he met the reporters, answered their questions through an interpreter, Dr Vladimir Zederbaum. Mr Koussevitzky speaks only the sketchiest English, but he can talk Russian, French and German fluently.

The new conductor is probably one of the most delightful musicians that Boston has welcomed for many years. He radiates personal magnetism and charm. His infectious smile took all sting out of his refusals to go very deeply into his plans for the Symphony. "You must wait and see," was all he would say.

He admitted that Scriabine's "Poem de l'Extase" would be included in his first concert, and then, with his eyes roguish, he explained to one young woman reporter just what he planned to give at his second and third concerts. He carefully selected all the compositions in which she had showed an interest, and she was going into extasies of rapture over the fact that he shared her musical tastes, when he burst into laughter and she realized that he was gently "spoofing" her.

Paris Stands First

Mr Koussevitzky admitted that Paris, at present, stands first in its modern musical concerts. The conductor himself was noted in Paris for his remarkable concerts of modern music. After he left Russia, due to the political disturbances, Mr Koussevitzky conducted concerts all over Europe. He was considered one of the greatest musical geniuses in the world, but he was not entirely happy, due to the fact that he wanted his own orchestra.

"I did not like to conduct an orchestra after we had had only two or three rehearsals," he said. "I wanted to work with my own orchestra and present new music, and give new interpretations to old music. I determined that if I ever came to the United States it would not be as a guest conductor but as conductor of my own orchestra. And now I consider I am conducting the finest orchestra in America."

Mr Koussevitzky was asked to give his opinion on American jazz. He tried to answer in English and succeeded in astounding the interviewers by the remark, "American jazz—it is beautiful."

Some one explained it was a poor adjective to use, and after a conference in Russian he explained that he meant that jazz is interesting. "Jazz has been a great influence on the young composers," he added. "Therefore jazz is important. I do not think it will endure—it is like a fashion. One year you have a new hat, the next year you discard it for another style. Jazz will soon be discarded. But while it lasts it is of importance because of its influence on the modern composers."

Mr Koussevitzky explained that Stravinsky, one of the composers whose work he especially admires, not only likes jazz music but sits down and plays all the jazz instruments. Mr Koussevitzky denied that he had ever played jazz himself and most certainly he had never conducted a jazz orchestra.

"But why do you ask about jazz?" he wailed. "America seems to want my opinion on jazz more than anything else."

Expert on Double Bass

Mr Koussevitzky was born in the northern part of Russia. He is 50 years old, but looks immeasurably younger. He is an expert on the double-bass and planned to make a tour of this country to show his mastery of this instrument until the war interrupted his plans.

For several years he was double-bass soloist at the Moscow Imperial Opera. After an intensive study of the best classical and modern music Mr Koussevitzky established his own symphony orchestra in Moscow and conducted a series of symphony concerts in Moscow and Petrograd.

He was in the habit of making a biannual tour of the central provinces of his native country and he especially chartered one of the largest Volga steamers for his orchestra. A large party of friends and an orchestra of 85 musicians would make the trips, with all the necessary impedimenta, including a full-size concert grand piano. Concerts would be given at the principal places along the river. In the course of these musical crusades, Mr Koussevitzky often came across talented youths who might otherwise have never been discovered if it were not for these journeys. His last musical tour of the Volga was in 1914.

Mrs Koussevitzky has accompanied her husband in America.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE WORCESTER
MASS.
TELEGRAM
SEP 13 1924

COMES TO TAKE OVER SYMPHONY

Koussevitzky Arrives to Be First Russian Head of Boston Orchestra

NEW YORK, Sept 12.—Serge Koussevitzky, one of the greatest musical directors in Europe, arrived today on the Aquitania to become conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, the first Russian to attain this honor. The first concert under him will be produced Oct. 20 at Boston.

Born in Tver, North Russia, in 1874, Koussevitzky remained in the homeland until 1920, becoming leader of Russia's greatest musical organization, the Koussevitzky orchestra of Moscow.

In the past four years he has appeared as guest conductor of the London Symphony orchestra, as well as in Barcelona, Madrid, Rome and Berlin.

ESTABLISHED 1881
FROM REVIEW
SEP 13 1924
New York City

KUSSEVITSKY IS HERE TO CONDUCT BOSTON ORCHESTA

Spectacular Russian Leader Arrives on the Aquitania

SPEAKS NO ENGLISH

Will Offer Much Ultra Modern Music in Which He Is Specialist

Sergei Kussevitsky, Russian conductor, the most spectacular figure in the European musical world today next to his compatriot, Igor Stravinsky, arrived here yesterday on the Aquitania en route to Boston, whose symphony orchestra he will lead this season.

Mr. Kussevitsky, accompanied by his wife, was met by William Brennan, manager of the orchestra. Later in the day they went to Boston. Mrs. Kussevitsky, who is also an excellent musician, is her husband's partner in the publishing business. L'Edition Russe de Musique, which they founded together, particularly with the purpose of assisting young Russian composers.

The conductor's quick gestures and conversation, principally in French, showed his interest and almost child-like enthusiasm on his first visit to America.

He is a man of 50, of good height and figure, with thick, graying hair and mobile, expressive features. His manner is genial. He is full of questions as to the taste of American audiences and reiterated former statements that he had many new compositions to introduce in America, but would ascertain public taste before making final decisions about his programs. He is also, he said, particularly desirous of investigating the works of American composers.

He could not yet announce in detail his programs for either New York or Boston, but added that he had so much new music with him that his problem would be to condense rather than expand the lists he had partly prepared.

Most of Mr. Kussevitsky's conversation was carried on by gestures and a few disjointed phrases, his wife, who speaks English, translating for him.

The conductor has had a brilliant career. He was born in Tver, in the northern part of Russia, in 1874. His first musical instruction was given him in his home. His progress was so precocious that at the age of 12 he became conductor, for two years, in the theatre of his native town. He had not only to conduct, but to compose music for the dramas performed in the theatre.

At 14 Kussevitsky entered the Moscow Conservatories. There he became a pupil on the double-bass of Rambaussec and developed such virtuosity on this clumsy instrument that he succeeded his professor as teacher of it at the Conservatoire, and later became the most famous double-bass virtuoso in the world.

All along, however, he had ambitions to become a conductor. In 1907 he formed an orchestra from the pupils of the Hochschule in Berlin, with which he worked two years, studying chiefly the classics and Wagner. Returning to Russia in 1909 he organized the Kussevitsky Orchestra, which soon became famous, and also gave performances at his Moscow concerts with a chorus of 250 voices. In the summer, for many years, he toured the provinces with his orchestra and inaugurated the series of famous tours of the ports of the Volga. For these tours he engaged a special ship with a platform at the back and sailed from port to port, introducing in many places that had never heard an orchestra the work of great masters.

At the time of the Russian Kerensky revolution of 1917 Kussevitsky was appointed general conductor of the Russian State Orchestra, this orchestra having formerly been the court orchestra of the Czar. With the Bolshevist uprising he was forced to fly to Paris. Since then he has been very active as a guest conductor in London and the English provinces, in Scotland, and in Paris, where in the last five seasons the Kussevitsky concerts at the opera have become more and more the musical "rage."

Kussevitsky has been much discussed in Europe for his interpretation of the classics as well as his virtuoso readings of modern music.

He will appear for the first time in America in Symphony Hall, Boston, October 10, at the opening Boston Symphony concert of the season. His first New York appearance with the Boston Symphony will be in Carnegie Hall on Thanksgiving evening.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Times
Pawtucket-R. I.
SEP 13 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S NEW DIRECTOR LANDS

Promises Old and New in Best Music and Says Good Word for Jazz.

BOSTON Sept. 13—Musical conservatives need not fear that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will become a centre of undiluted modernism under the new regime, according to Serge Koussevitsky, the new conductor of the organization, who arrived in Boston last evening from New York, where he landed from the Aquitania earlier in the day.

While the best of the newer music will undoubtedly be given, any touch of radicalism will lie in the construction of the programme rather than in the pieces themselves. "Boston will not be shocked," he insisted emphatically.

Mr. Koussevitsky, who is in America for the first time, descended from the 7:45 p. m. train at Back Bay, accompanied by considerable of an entourage. Besides Mrs. Koussevitsky, there was his secretary, Dr. Vladimir Zederbaum, a valet, two servants and three members of the orchestra organization who had met him at the dock. The party at once entered machines and hurried to the house at 122 Pond street, Jamaica Plain, which has been taken for the year.

Still on the sunny side of 50, the new orchestra leader seems surprisingly youthful for a man who has set musical Europe by the ears.

Seated in the dining room of his new home, he began by explaining that he had long known of Boston as one of the chief music and intellectual centres of America. "My dear friend, Nikitsch continually spoke to me of the city," he said, "and his enthusiasm infected me. Besides, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is known throughout Europe as having the best musicians in the world."

When asked what motives had finally determined him to come to this country, he shook his head vigorously, smiled, and was evidently pleased. He had obviously been waiting for it.

"I have refused a number of offers from musical organizations in America," he said. "While I had my own orchestra in Russia, I declined all offers of engagements, as I naturally preferred to give the selections I chose in my own way. When that was disbanded I at once declared that the only place to which I would go permanently would be Boston. It was the only organization which could give me true satisfaction. I am flattered by the invitation."

The question of programmes was suggested. "In the first place," Mr. Koussevitsky began, "I am aware of the rumors about my radicalism, but I do not believe Boston will be shocked. I will not play bad music but only the best which is now being produced. In any event the modernity of the orchestra will consist not in new selections but in the arrangement of the programme.

"I think that a wrong idea about my radicalism has sprung from my Paris concerts. There it was my purpose to present a new musical art. Here it is entirely different. I am here for an entire season, so my programmes will contain both the old and the new. I believe in progress in art so I cannot leave out what is now being created by young composers."

When the usual question about jazz was asked he at once became enthusiastic. "I like it very much," he said heartily. "I consider it one of the most important elements of the new music. It has had great influence on most modern musicians of talent. You must realize that jazz has such an influence because it springs from life itself—the dance instinct."

SEP 13 1924

Koussevitzky, new leader of Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrives in New York from Europe and will present first program October 20.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
POST

SEP 13 1924

SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR IN BOSTON

Koussevitzky Takes Up Residence in Jamaica Plain

FAMOUS DOUBLE BASS AMONG HIS BAGGAGE

Promises Bruckner's Works Will Be Heard

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

NEW YORK, Sept. 12.—Seated on an upper deck of the Aquitania as she steamed up New York harbor today Serge Koussevitzky asked and answered many questions concerning Boston and his new post as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but the most urgent of his queries concerned the time of the first train that he could take to his destination.

For Mr. Koussevitzky, whose advent is turning toward Boston the eyes of the musical world, was quite as eager to reach our city as we have been to welcome him and, accordingly, this afternoon's 3 o'clock train from the Grand Central Terminal found him bound Bostonwards.

Continued From First Page

A man of medium height and medium build, with black hair that has distinctly grayed, features that are marked by a continual animation and a warm and cordial smile and manner is Serge Koussevitzky and a man whose enthusiasms are for new experiences as well as for things musical. As he sat upon the Cunarder's deck, his keen, arresting eyes, hidden for the time by dark glasses, he gave voice to his disappointment at the absence of excitements in this, his first trans-Atlantic voyage.

The ship might quite as well have been an excellent hotel for all the thrills he was able to derive from it complained Mr. Koussevitzky through his secretary, Mr. Zederbaum—for although he contributed an occasional remark in English or in French it was in his native Russian that Mr. Koussevitzky chiefly spoke.

Ship's Band Gets Cold Feet

A fellow-shipmate of Mr. Koussevitzky's on this voyage, by the way, was Tito Schipa of the Chicago Opera Company and a ship-board concert enlisted that tenor's services as soloist while two members of the faculty of the Eastman Conservatory of Music, a 'cellist and a pianist, likewise contributed to the music-making. Mr. Koussevitzky in his turn offered to conduct the ship's orchestra—but the members of that band, sad to relate, developed a case of "cold feet" and declined that honor with thanks!

With Mr. Koussevitzky is Mme. Koussevitzky and an entourage that includes, in addition to Mr. Zederbaum, a maid and a valet; while of luggage there was a quantity that came close to defeating Mr. Koussevitzky's ambition to depart for Boston by the 3 o'clock train, for there was one piece that was long in being located at the dock.

Home in Jamaica Plain

At the train gates came a second crisis: Maid and valet were not to be found. But Mr. Zederbaum succeeded in locating them just as the call "All Aboard" rang out and, escorted by Mr. Brennan and Mr. Burke of Symphony Hall, the Koussevitzkys were safely off for their temporary home at 122 Pond avenue, Jamaica Plain.

Not least among the possessions that accompany him by the way, is Mr. Koussevitzky's double-bass, carefully carried from the ship by two men. That Mr. Koussevitzky is the world's foremost virtuoso of that mammoth instrument is widely known, but the actual arrival of a conductor with an instrument of his own nevertheless conveys a feeling of his close sympathy with the players under him that may not always be duplicated.

Solo Work for the Tuba

Mr. Koussevitzky has a great and genuine interest in these players who are to be under his direction in this orchestra which he has heard so highly praised and in whose several abilities he has, of course, complete confidence.

Particularly did he make inquiries concerning the virtuosity of the performer upon the bass-tuba, for one of the scores that he is bringing with him is an orchestral arrangement, made especially for him by Ravel, of Musorgsky's "Pictures From an Exhibition," that contains an important solo passage for that instrument—perhaps the only one extant. That passage has brought invariable applause in Europe and Mr. Koussevitzky is solicitous concerning its reception here.

"Does the Boston concert season open with the first Symphony concert?" asked Mr. Koussevitzky. And when told that, strictly speaking, that honor would belong this year to Sousa's Band, the orchestral chief declared himself enchanted at the prospect of hearing that famous organization. The recital by Roland Hayes, which will likewise precede the first Symphony concert, also interested him in prospect, as did that of Schuman-Heink, regarding whose matrimonial status, incidentally, he made interested inquiries.

Mr. Koussevitzky's plans for his own season and that of the orchestra are already well laid, and upon the first programme, as foretaste of the new and invigorating music that we are to hear from him, will stand Honegger's "Pacific, 231," the piece which celebrates a locomotive and which was discussed at some length in a Sunday issue of the Post during the summer just ended. Index of the programmes for the first five Symphony concerts are completely mapped out with the exception of some American pieces.

Likes Carpenter's Works

Of the American composers and their music Mr. Koussevitzky feels that he knows too little, but it is his immediate purpose to pursue their acquaintance. For he believes that American music should receive performance, and he plans to make himself familiar with our American orchestral repertory. He is not always quite certain, however, just which composers of foreign blood now resident among us may be accounted truly "American," and he wished particularly to know whether the ex-Swiss Ernest Bloch is now considered by us an American.

The music of John Alden Carpenter, Mr. Koussevitzky already knows and admires; hence we may expect this season some of the other music from the author of the "Adventures in a Perambulator" with which Mr, Monteux bade farewell to Boston.

But it is not only new music of Europe and the music of our own Americans that Mr. Koussevitzky will bring to performance. That he will give place to a goodly porportion of the classics goes without the saying in the case of a musician of such broad sympathies and such fine scholarship as Mr. Koussevitzky, and not a little of his great European reputation as conductor has rested upon his ability to infuse with new vitality the works of Beethoven et al.

Reintroduce Bruckner

Some lesser known works of the older composers stand, too. "Upon his list, and he even gives a hint that through him Bruckner may in this, the centennial year of his birth, be reintroduced to Boston, where he has been too long neglected. Mr. Koussevitzky finds both the Eighth and the Ninth Symphonies truly great music; the Adagio of the former he describes as "Heavenly." It seems then a reasonable hope that this colossal Symphony in Germany, now considered the greatest since those of Beethoven, may be heard in Boston ere many months have passed.

Two days before he left Paris Mr. Koussevitzky was decorated with the Cross of the Legion of Honor. Paris loses him with regret. He has done much for French music. Beyond doubt or peradventure he will do much for American music and although we may have no decoration to bestow, we of Boston welcome him with honor to our midst.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra for season of 1924-25.

PHILADELPHIA, PENN.
RECORD

SEP 13 1924

TO LEAD BOSTON ORCHESTRA

New York, Sept. 12.—Serge Koussevitsky, one of the greatest musical directors in Europe, arrived today on the Aquitania to become conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the first Russian to attain this honor.

924 Pilot-Sat. Sept. 13

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY COMING TO BOSTON

The famous Boston Symphony Orchestra is about to have its first Russian Conductor, Serge Koussevitzky who arrived in America for the first time on Friday, Sept. 12, in readiness to start rehearsals for the opening of the Boston Symphony season in Symphony Hall on October 10th.

Koussevitzky was born in Tver in North Russia. He was active in music there and in Moscow even in his childhood. At the Moscow Conservatory it is required to study some special instrument and there he specialized in the double bass. It is charactaristic of Koussevitzky never to do things by halves and it was not long before he became the most prominent double bass virtuoso in Europe, touring with his instrument and composing for it.

So narrow a field, however, could not hold him long and in 1907 we find him serving his apprenticeship as conductor in Berlin. He returned to Moscow two years later and organized the Koussevitzky Orchestra, which soon came to be one of the most famous in Russia. He conducted series of symphonic and choral concerts in Petrograd, using in the latter capitol, the celebrated Archangelesky Choir. He gave Beethoven festivals, Bach festivals, Tchaikowsky festivals, Rimsky-Korsakov festivals, and even then became celebrated as an ardent and fearless champion of coming genius among the composers of Russia and other countries as well. In this interest he founded the Koussevitzky Music Edition which is one of the most important music publishing firms in Russia. The story is now common knowledge how he toured the length and breadth of his country with his orchestra, sailing along the Volga in a specially chartered steamer and giving free concerts in town after town to those who had never heard symphony music.

During the first years of the war he managed to continue his concerts although many from his orchestra were called to service. After the Revolution he was appointed Director of the Russian State Orchestras. In this post he remained until 1920 when he went to Western Europe.

In that part of the world he has become easily the most prominent conductor. He has appeared regularly as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra and in Paris given each season his now famous series of "Concertes Koussevitzky". He has conducted Russian operas such as "The Snow Maiden", "Pique-Dame", "Boris Godounov", and "Prince Igor".

Needless to say, great things are anticipated of this world celebrity as the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The soloists of the coming season of the 24 Friday afternoons and 24 Saturday evening concerts will include among others to be announced later, Serge Rachmaninoff, Serge Prokofleff, and Igor Stravinsky. Each of these a brilliant pianist as well as a composer will appear in music of his own. There will also be Alfred Cortot, the pianist; Albert Spalding, the violinist; Margaret Matzenauer, the mezzo-soprano; and Guy Maier and Lee Pattison in music for two pianos with orchestra.

The season tickets for these concerts are now on sale. All of the Friday afternoon seats are taken but a few are available for the Saturday evening series.

NE. SATURDAY. SEPT

New Conductor Arrives For Boston Symphony

Serge Koussevitsky, Russian, Comes on Aquitania After Triumphs Abroad

Among those arriving yesterday morning on the Aquitania was Serge Koussevitzky, the new Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give ten concerts at Carnegie Hall during the winter.

While this is Mr. Koussevitzky's first visit to America, he has been well known for some time in musical circles here as a prominent figure among European orchestral directors. Before the war he brought the symphony orchestra to parts of Russia where it had been hitherto unknown. He put his musicians on a boat on the Volga and gave concerts at various points along its banks. This unique series was given three times. In recent years Mr. Koussevitzky's greatest activity probably has been his annual spring series of concerts at the Paris Opera, devoted to modern music. The fear that he will give his Boston and New York patrons nothing but the latest music, however, is unfounded, he told a representative of The New York Herald Tribune last spring. "But," he says, "there is something beautiful in modern music which cannot be passed by."

Mr. Koussevitzky is the seventh in the line of conductors of the Boston Symphony, which opens its forty-fourth season next month, succeeeding Pierre Monteux. One thing, he said, which led him to accept the Boston engagement is the liberal amount of rehearsal which the orchestra allows. In European orchestras the opportunity for rehearsal is limited.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From ADVERTISER,
Boston, Mass.
SEP 13 1924

NEW SYMPHONY LEADER COMES FOR HUB DEBUT

By E. F. HARKINS.

Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra arrived in Boston last night.

Serge Koussevitzky.

This first Russian to be invited to lead Boston's most famous musical organization is now in his fiftieth year.

At twelve he was playing in a band in his birthplace, Tver; at fourteen he went to Moscow and entered the Conservatory. A few years later he became professor of double-bass at that institution and soloist in the orchestra at the Imperial Opera. Later on he toured through Europe as contrabass star.

POPULAR HERO

But it is as a conductor, not as soloist, that he finally achieved European renown. Fame came to him first when he organized the Koussevitzky Orchestra, which for years was popular in Moscow and Petrograd. He also took his orchestra on tours through the Volga valley towns. The festivals he conducted in the larger cities were features of every musical season, but he was not content to follow any beaten track exclusively, as most other leaders do. His professional visits to remote places made him an artistic hero of the first rank and at the same time gave evidence of the breadth of view which has always marked his work.

WINS FAME IN PARIS

After the revolution he became director of the subsidized government orchestra in Moscow and Petrograd, but as conditions were none too favorable for such independent work as he had been used to he left Russia four years ago and settled down in Paris.

There he has been giving orchestral concerts remarkable for their range of interest. He is fond of classic works, but he is also eager to introduce novelties. He said in Paris a few weeks ago that he hoped to discover a new Beethoven in the United States. He will evidently try to fill this large order, for he is an enthusiastic modernist.

ALL-AROUND ABILITY

He has won remarkable popularity in London, as Ernest Newman bears witness to in the current American Mercury. Newman discusses Koussevitzky's and Weingartner's London performances of the famous Ninth Symphony. The English critic says "Koussevitzky's Beethoven is the genuine classic, and Weingartner's the romantic." He also says—which will please the Hub conservatives — that Koussevitzky's conducting of classic symphonies is as masterly as his interpretation of the bizarre works of Scriabine and Stravinsky. He has also conducted opera from time to time.

In partnership with his wife, the distinguished Russian is also in the music publishing business.

AMUSEMENTS

kes."

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY LIKES AMERICAN JAZZ

Prominent European Conductor Arrives to Lead Boston Symphony This Season.

Serge Koussevitsky, one of the foremost orchestra conductors of Europe, arrived yesterday on the Aquitania. He succeeds Pierre Monteux as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

He made four attempts to reach the United States. He plays the double bass and his first appearances were arranged to show his mastery of this resounding instrument. The war and his enlistment in the Russian Army interrupted the tour.

Mr. Koussevitsky was quoted recently as saying he was on a search for "an American Beethoven." This he denied. "There was one Beethoven," he said, "and the past is gone." The statement, he said, probably grew out of his belief that America is to develop a new art form.

"Old Europe has worked out all forms of art and she is exhausted," he said. "She is now resting. But your country is young and fresh and is just beginning to respond to art stimuli. Your jazz music, it has great significance. I was in London recently and used to drop in at a supper club where young American boys were playing. I let my supper get cold listening to them. These boys were fine musicians. And the jazz music they played was good music."

He is accompanied by his wife.

END SUIT OVER FILM TITLE

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

SEP 13 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR ARRIVES

New York, Sept. 12.—Serge Koussevitzky, one of the greatest musical directors in Europe, arrived today on the Aquitania to become conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the first Russian to attain this honor. The first concern under him will be produced October 20 at Boston.

Born in Tver, North Russia, in 1874, Koussevitzky remained in the homeland until 1920, becoming leader of Russia's greatest musical organization, the Koussevitzky Orchestra of Moscow.

In the past four years he has appeared as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra, as well as in Barcelona, Madrid, Rome and Berlin.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

Koussevitzky Will Hold to Symphony Standards

New Leader of Boston Orchestra Promises up to Date Programs

By ELEANOR VERY

Serge Koussevitzky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, arrived in America on the Aquitania yesterday morning and by night was installed in his new home in Jamaica Plain. Accompanying him were Mme. Koussevitzky and Dr. Vladimir Zedderbaum, his secretary, and on the train from New York, J. H. Brennan, manager of the Symphony orchestra, and John N. Burk, publicity representative.

Koussevitzky, considered one of the foremost of European conductors, comes to Boston as successor to Pierre Monteaux, who has returned to his native France after five years in this country.

Koussevitsky is the first Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. He conducted his own orchestra in Moscow up to the time of the war. After the first Russian revolution he was appointed general conductor of the Russian State orchestra (formerly the court orchestra) by the provisional government. In 1920 he left Russia, as have so many of her artists, and has since that time pursued his career in Western Europe. He has performed in all the leading cities as guest conductor.

Perhaps his most famous accomplishment in the past four years has been his series of Concerts Koussevitzky in Paris, giving four concerts a season with his own orchestra. These concerts have been devoted to modern music and have been sensational.

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY

BOSTON ORCHESTRA FIRST

This is his first visit to America.

"I did not wish to come here as a guest conductor," Koussevitsky explained. "There is no satisfaction in conducting a strange orchestra with insufficient time for rehearsal. But I knew that if I were offered the position with the Boston Symphony orchestra—the best orchestra in America—I should accept because of the chance to have my own orchestra, my own instrument to work with."

Koussevitzky smilingly evaded the charge that he prefers the modernist music.

"I like all good music," he insisted. "Modern music, Russian music? I make no favorite. An artist must be international in his art."

Nevertheless it is well known that Koussevitzky has done much to popularize the works of the new composers. He was the first to make known in Russia the compositions of modern European composers.

TO PLAY SCRIABINE POEM

Koussevitzky was a close friend of the great Russian composer, Alexander Scriabine, and is regarded as unexcelled in the interpretation of his works. He will give the famous "Poem of Ectasy" a place on his opening program.

Koussevitzky is a man of great magnetism, handsome, distinguished, diplomatic and with a fine sense of humor.

"Boston expects to be electrified by one shock after another of modern music? But wait until I tell you of my program. On the first, Scriabine's "Poem of Ecstasy." On the second, "Le Sacre du Printemps," On the third—" he rolled his eyes exaggeratedly, and then, seeing that he was being breathlessly believed, burst into hearty laughter.

Of our own American Jazz he says: "It is not all good, but it is very interesting and very important—important because it has influenced all the new composers. Stravinsky, for one, plays it, and plays jazz instruments too. Crtainly it is to be regarded as music—like all music it takes its origin in the dance, in movement.

"But jazz music will not stay. It is like your hat—good today, tomorrow forgotten."

PROGRAMS WILL SURPRISE

Koussevitzky speaks little English, and in addition to his native Russian has French and German. He courteously spoke slowly enough to be easily understood by a less accomplished linguist.

It is Koussevitzky's intention to present to Boston a new construction in programs. This he will not explain in advance—"Wait and see," is his advice. Undoubtedly he will make his programs short, for that has been his custom abroad.

"I have new compositions to offer—yes, modern music as you say. But not only modern music—I will give you new interpretations of the old."

Koussevitky comes with the reputation of being both brilliantly original and passionately courageous. The new Symphony season will be anything but dull.

NEW SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR HERE

Continued from First Page

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

NORTH AMERICAN

SEP 13 1924

NEW SYMPHONY LEADER COMES FOR HUB DEBUT

PAGE SIXTEEN

By E. F. HARKINS.

Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra arrived in Boston last night.

Serge Koussevitzky.

This first Russian to be invited to lead Boston's most famous musical organization is now in his fiftieth year.

At twelve he was playing in a band in his birthplace, Tver; at fourteen he went to Moscow and entered the Conservatory. A few years later he became professor of double-bass at that institution and soloist in the orchestra at the Imperial Opera. Later on he toured through Europe as contrabass star.

POPULAR HERO

But it is as a conductor, not as soloist, that he finally achieved European renown. Fame came to him first when he organized the Koussevitzky Orchestra, which for years was popular in Moscow and Petrograd. He also took his orchestra on tours through the Volga valley towns. The festivals he conducted in the larger cities were features of every musical season, but he was not content to follow any beaten track exclusively, as most other leaders do. His professional visits to remote places made him an artistic hero of the first rank and at the same time gave evidence of the breadth of view which has always marked his work.

WINS FAME IN PARIS

After the revolution he became director of the subsidized government orchestra in Moscow and Petrograd, but as conditions were none too favorable for such independent work as he had been used to he left Russia four years ago and settled down in Paris.

There he has been giving orchestral concerts remarkable for their range of interest. He is fond of classic works, but he is also eager to introduce novelties. He said in Paris a few weeks ago that he hoped to discover a new Beethoven in the United States. He will evidently try to fill this large order, for he is an enthusiastic modernist.

ALL-AROUND ABILITY

He has won remarkable popularity in London, as Ernest Newman bears witness to in the current American Mercury. Newman discusses Koussevitzky's and Weingartner's London performances of the famous Ninth Symphony. The English critic says "Koussevitzky's Beethoven is the genuine classic, and Weingartner's the romantic." He also says——which will please the Hub conservatives — that Koussevitzky's conducting of classic symphonies is as masterly as his interpretation of the bizarre works of Scriabine and Strainsky. He has also conducted opera from time to time.

In partnership with his wife, the distinguished Russian is also in the music publishing business.

Tel. Chelsea 8800

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PITTSBURGH, PA.

POST

SEP 13 1924

RUSSIAN CONDUCTOR ARRIVES

NEW YORK, Sept. 12—Serge Koussevitzky, one of the greatest musical directors in Europe, arrived today on the Aquitania to become conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the first Russian to attain this honor. In the last four years he has appeared as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra, as well as in Barcelona, Madrid, Roce and Berlin.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

CINCINNATTI, OHIO

BILLBOARD

SEP 13 1924

97

Chance for American Talent in Boston?

ACCORDING to Allen Raymond, correspondent at Paris, France, for the North American Newspaper Alliance, Serge Koussevitsky, who will become conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra September 22, will arrive in America not only in his official capacity but in that of a musical explorer. "He will search here for talent," writes Mr. Raymond, "and, with no bias against jazz, he may be the first to find an American Beethoven"—a worthy object of unparalleled optimism. He emphasized the Russian conductor's eagerness in this search in the following interview:

"What I hope to do in America is to show the public that masterpieces of music are being written today as powerful, stirring and beautiful as the greatest of the past," says Koussevitsky. I will present in Boston music never heard before, music which now exists only in manuscripts which I have in my keeping, music written by men now living who will rank as high a century from now as Mozart or Beethoven. I have given some of their music to Paris. You have seen how it has been received. Some of it shall be America's first."

"I have seen," continues Mr. Raymond, "how Koussevitsky's music has been received in Paris. Music lovers in the French capital have greeted the Russian conductor with the explosive clamor of an appreciation which is truly Latin. But it is not alone for his introduction of new composers that they crowd thru the doors of the Theater Nationale for his concerts. Koussevitsky is capable of presenting the older classics without a trace of modernity in his reading and with a painstaking regard for their historic beauties, exactly as he believes the older masters would have them rendered.

"In the old world he has become known as a hunter for musical talent and a patron of young composers. He believes there is genius in America and he hopes to ferret it out. The territory which his search will cover may be indicated by his attitude toward jazz."

Finds Some Jazz Good

"I like all good music," says Koussevitsky, "and several musicians have written jazz which is truly good. I was in London recently and dropped in late for a bite at a supper club. American boys—the oldest could not have been more than thirty—were improvising as they went along, and they were great players. I let my supper get cold listening to them."

In appearance, manner and dress Mr. Koussevitsky might be a successful, middle-aged business man—a forceful figure of no eccentricities, of middle height, stock, unathletic. Only his eyes inform you of his art; few business men have eyes flaming with such enthusiasm. They are the eyes of a reformer, an evangelist. The fact is, he is an evangelist and a showman. He would appreciate both Billy Sunday and P. T. Barnum.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

REPUBLICAN

SEP 13 1924

ARRIVES TO LEAD BOSTON SYMPHONY

Serge Koussevitzky, Noted Russian Musician, Lands at New York

New York, Sept. 12—Serge Koussevitsky, one of the greatest musical directors in Europe, arrived today on the Aquitania to become conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, the first Russian to attain this honor. The first concert under him will be produced October 20 at Boston.

Born at Tver, North Russia, in 1874, Koussevitzky remained in the homeland until 1920, becoming leader of Russia's greatest musical organization, the Koussevitzky orchestra of Moscow. In the past four years, he has appeared as guest conductor of the London Symphony orchestra, as well as at Barcelona, Madrid, Rome and Berlin.

Tel. Chelsea 8800

THIS CLIPPING FROM

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.

NEWS

SEP 13 1924

NEW SYMPHONY LEADER

Russian Arrives to Take Charge of Boston Orchestra.

BOSTON, September 13.—Serge Koussevitzky, famous Russian conductor who has arrived here to take charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced that he had no intention of attempting to startle his audiences with sensational modern music. Jazz he praised because it "springs from life itself—the dance instinct."

Koussevitzky, who became known as a musical radical through his concerts at Paris, said that he would choose the master-pieces of all ages for his programs but added "as I believe in progress in art, I can not leave out what is being created by young composers." He explained that the modernity of his programs would lie "not in new selections but in the arrangement of the program."

THIS CLIPPING FROM

[illegible]

Noted Musician Arrives.

NEW YORK, Sept. 12.—Serge Koussevitzky, one of the greatest musical directors in Europe, arrived today on the Aquitania to become conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, the first Russian to attain this honor. In the last four years he has appeared as guest conductor of the London symphony orchestra as well as in Barcelona, Madrid, Rome and Berlin.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BALTIMORE, MD.

SUN

1924

To Conduct Boston Symphony.

New York, Sept. 12.—Serge Koussevitzky, one of the greatest musical directors in Europe, arrived today on the Aquitania to become conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the first Russian to attain this honor. In the last four years he has appeared as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra, as well as in Barcelona, Madrid, Rome and Berlin.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

[illegible]

Symphony Leader Arrives

NEW YORK, Sept. 12.—Serge Koussevitzky, one of the greatest musical directors in Europe, arrived today on the Aquitania to become conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the first Russian to attain this honor. He has appeared as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra, as well as in Barcelona, Madrid, Rome and Berlin.

Monitor - Sat. Sept 13

KOUSSEVITZKY, NEW SYMPHONY HEAD, ARRIVES

Shows Interest in American Composers—Cites Influence of Jazz

Serge Koussevitzky, who has arrived in Boston to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, vouchsafed to a representative of The Christian Science Monitor this morning a frugal, engagingly unrevelatory glimpse of his plans for the winter. By means of an amazing blend of Russian and German, with a delicte dusting of French and with graceful, sustained gestures M. Koussevitzy talked for 15 minutes. His voice is low pitched and rich. Hositality is to him in the realm of the arts. Overnight he appears to have fitted perfectly into the mysterious atmosphere that must always be present in a borrowed house.

While he welcomed his visitor and waited for his secretary, Dr. Vladimir Zederbaum, to come in and act aas interpreter his shrewd, kind eyes roamed about the charming drawing room filled with silver and amethyst lights, over the glistening black of a piano that wants tuning, out the window at the scrimitar of glimmering blue pond fringed with waving green fans. Absently he remarked, in amoment that might have been—but was not—very difficult, bereft aas it waas of a means of casual conversation, "Yess—it iss ver' interesting to be in Ah-merica. . . ." Pointedly he added as he studied the tight-wrapped roses in a mauve bowl, "I haf' only the mos' poor English—— My secretaire mus' help us a little. . . ."

Dr. Zederbaum translated the conductor's smiles and shrugs and soft speech into English. Upon each program there would be one work absolutely unknown to Boston audiences. Not a work necessarily unknown because it was either new or modern. Unknown in the sense of having just been discovered—by M. Koussevitzky. There are some very ancient composers, as well as modern ones—and some of their works are still unknown. For instance, there is Locatelli. 'Cellists who have played in Boston have played Locatelli, but they have not played all of Locatelli. There are yet other works—symphonic works.

M. Koussevitzky believes that at present Paris stands first in the concert world. He himself has conducted in Paris. Europe gave him, in many places, kindly attention when it became impressed upon him that Russia, with its network of political difficulties, was not a place in which a conductor might continue to do his best work. The work in Europe was hampered by his dislike for conducting orchestras in a guest capacity. He determined that if ever he came to the United States it would be as a conductor of his own orchestra. He says amiable and pleasant things of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to which he has been called as conductor.

Of his actual plans for the winter little is to be discovered in the few moments permitted. An admission that Scriabin's "Poème de l'Extase" will be on the first program. . . . A dignified and suitable proportion, throughout the winter, of modern music which, however, must not be construed as meaning even a wisp of radicalism. . . . A variety and a richness in the programs that, from his knowledge of music and the standards for such programs, Mr. Koussevitsky believes must please Boston audiences. But nothing during the interview that could be construed as in any way amounting to an announcement of specific plans.

A considerable and lively interest M. Koussevitzky id display in a suggestion concerning new American composers. Loeffler he is familiar with and delighted in. Carpenter is pleasantly known to him. He is anxious to find American talent and to bring it out. Obviously a man who has become known as an apostle of modern music—but never a fanatic about it—must be questioned concerning his opinion of so-called jazz.

He is careful in replying to such a question, this polished, serious Russian. "American jazz is beautiful—that is to say it has been a great influence on the young composers and that makes it important. It has harmonic richness and contour. It is, however, like a fashion and not likely to endure as it is now. One day it is here. Another day—it will be gone and in its place the development that its fleeting presence has influenced."

Until M. Koussevitzky appears at Symphony Hall there is apparently no telling whatever concerning his ambition for this new period in his career and in the music of Boston. But he appears reasonably to have assured himself that his plans will not tear down the idols.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

SEP 1924

(Other Romeikes May Disappoint)

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

SEP 1924

Unknown American composers with merit will come into their own through the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its leader Serge Koussevitzky, if the intention of the distinguished director to "ferret out" new music is carried out.

Koussevitzky is known as a hunter for musical talent and a patron of young musicians. He believes there is great genius in America, andh is statement concerning what he hopes to do toward helping to discover it follows:

"What I hope to do in America is to show the public that masterpiecen of music are being written to-day, as powerful, stirring and beautiful as the greatest of the past. I will present in Boston music never heard before, music which now exists only in manuscripts which I have in my keeping, music by men now living who will rank as high a century from now as Mozart or Beethoven. I have given some of this music to Paris. Some of it shall be America's first. I like all good music, and several musicians have written jazz which is truly good."

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY COMING TO BOSTON

The famous Boston Symphony Orchestra is about to have its first Russian Conductor, Serge Koussevitzky who arrived in America for the first time on Friday, Sept. 12, in readiness to start rehearsals for the opening of the Boston Symphony season in Symphony Hall on October 10th.

Koussevitzky was born in Tver in North Russia. He was active in music there and in Moscow even in his childhood. At the Moscow Conservatory it is required to study some special instrument and there he specialized in the double bass. It is charactaristic of Koussevitzky never to do things by halves and it was not long before he became the most prominent double bass virtuoso in Europe, touring with his instrument and composing for it.

So narrow a field, however, could not hold him long and in 1907 we find him serving his apprenticeship as conductor in Berlin. He returned to Moscow two years later and organized the Koussevitzky Orchestra, which soon came to be one of the most famous in Russia. He conducted series of symphonic and choral concerts in Petrograd, using in the latter capitol, the celebrated Archangelesky Choir. He gave Beethoven festivals, Bach festivals, Tchaikowsky festivals, Rimsky-Korsakov festivals, and even then became celebrated as an ardent and fearless champion of coming genius among the composers of Russia and other countries as well. In this interest he founded the Koussevitzky Music Edition which is one of the most important music publishing firms in Russia. The story is now common knowledge how he toured the length and breadth of his country with his orchestra, sailing along the Volga in a specially chartered steamer and giving free concerts in town after town to those who had never heard symphony music.

During the first years of the war he managed to continue his concerts although many from his orchestra were called to service. After the Revolution he was appointed Director of the Russian State Orchestras. In this post he remained until 1920 when he went to Western Europe.

In that part of the world he has become easily the most prominent conductor. He has appeared regularly as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra and in Paris given each season his now famous series of "Concertes Koussevitzky". He has conducted Russian operas such as "The Snow Maiden", "Pique-Dame", "Boris Godounov", and "Prince Igor".

Needless to say, great things are anticipated of this world celebrity as the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The soloists of the coming season of the 24 Friday afternoons and 24 Saturday evening concerts will include among others to be announced later, Serge Rachmaninoff, Serge Prokofieff, and Igor Stravinsky. Each of these a brilliant pianist as well as a composer will appear in music of his own. There will also be Alfred Cortot, the pianist; Albert Spalding, the violinist; Margaret Matzenauer, the mezzo-soprano; and Guy Maier and Lee Pattison in music for two pianos with orchestra.

The season tickets for these concerts are now on sale. All of the Friday afternoon seats are taken but a few are available for the Saturday evening series.

BRIDGEPORT
CONN.
TELEGRAM

SEP 13 1924

NEW CONDUCTOR HERE FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY

NEW YORK, Sept. 12.—Serge Koussevitzky, one of the greatest musical directors in Europe, arrived today on the Aquitania to become conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, the first Russian to attain this honor. The first concert under him will be produced October 20 at Boston.

Born in Tver, North Russia, in 1874, Koussevitzky remained in the homeland until 1920, becoming leader of Russia's greatest musical organization, the Koussevitzky orchestra of Moscow.

In the past four years he has appeared as guest conductor of the London Symphony orchestra, as well as in Barcelona, Madrid, Rome and Berlin.

[illegible]

Kreisler Returns

SEP 12 1924

MUSICIAN ARRIVES — Serge Koussevitzky, one of the greatest musical directors in Europe, arrived in New York yesterday on the Aquitania to become conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

[illegible] NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From SEP 13 1924
TRAVELER
Boston, Mass.

Koussevitzky Will Hold to Symphony Standards

New Leader of Boston Orchestra Promises up to Date Programs

By ELEANOR VERY

Serge Koussevitzky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, arrived in America on the Aquitania yesterday morning and by night was installed in his new home in Jamaica Plain.

FIRST RUSSIAN LEADER

Accompanying him were Mme. Koussevitzky and Dr. Vladmir Zedderbaum, his secretary, and on the train from New York, J. H. Brennan, manager of the Symphony orchestra, and John N. Burk, publicity representative.

Koussevitzky, considered one of the foremost of European conductors, comes to Boston as successor to Pierre Monteux, who has returned to his native France after five years in this country.

Koussevitsky is the first Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. He conducted his own orchestra in Moscow up to the time of the war. After the first Russian revolution he was appointed general conductor of the Russian State orchestra (formerly the court orchestra) by the provisional government. In 1920 he left Russia, as have so many of her artists, and has since that time pursued his career in western Europe. He has performed in all the leading cities as guest conductor.

Perhaps his most famous accomplishment in the past four years has been his series of Concerts Koussevitzky in Paris, giving four concerts a season with his own orchestra. These concerts have been devoted to modern music and have been sensational.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA FIRST

This is his first visit to America.

"I did not wish to come here as a guest conductor," Koussevitsky explained. "There is no satisfaction in conducting a strange orchestra with insufficient time for rehearsal. But I knew that if I were offered the position with the Boston Symphony orchestra—the best orchestra in America—I should accept because of the chance to have my own orchestra, my own instrument to work with."

Koussevitzky smilingly evaded the charge that he prefers the modernist music.

"I like all good music," he insisted. "Modern music, Russian music? I make no favorite. An artist must be international in his art."

Nevertheless it is well known that Koussevitzky has done much to popularize the works of the new composers. He was the first to make known in Russia the compositions of modern European composers.

TO PLAY SCRIABINE POEM

Koussevitzky was a close friend of the great Russian composer, Alexander Scriabine, and is regarded as unexcelled in the interpretation of his works. He will give the famous "Poem of Ecstasy" a place on his opening program.

Koussevitzky is a man of great magnetism, handsome, distinguished, diplomatic and with a fine sense of humor.

"Boston expects to be electrified by one shock after another of modern music? But wait until I tell you of my program. On the first, Scriabine's "Poem of Ecstasy." On the second, "Le Sacre du Printemps." On the third—" he rolled his eyes exaggeratedly, and then, seeing that he was being breathlessly believed, burst into hearty laughter.

Of our own American jazz he says: "It is not all good, but it is very interesting and very important—important because it has influenced all the new composers. Stravinsky, for one, plays it, and plays jazz instruments too. Certainly it is to be regarded as music—like all music it takes its origin in the dance, in movement.

"But jazz music will not stay. It is like your hat—good today, tomorrow forgotten."

PROGRAMS WILL SURPRISE

Koussevitzky speaks little English, and in addition to his native Russian has French and German. He courteously spoke slowly enough to be easily understood by a less accomplished linguist.

It is Koussevitzky's intention to present to Boston a new construction in programs. This he will not explain in advance—"Wait and see," is his advice. Undoubtedly he will make his programs short, for that has been his custom abroad.

"I have new compositions to offer—yes, modern music as you say. But not only modern music—I will give you new interpretations of the old."

Koussevitzky comes with the reputation of being both brilliantly original and passionately courageous. The new Symphony season will be anything but dull.

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

SEP 13 1924

New Conductor of Boston Symphony

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY

WON'T SHOCK MUSIC LOVERS

Will Play Only Best, Says Koussevitsky, New Symphony Leadder

REACHES CITY WITH A BIG ENTOURAGE

Musical conservatives need not fear that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will become a centre of undiluted modernism under the new regime, according to Serge Koussevitsky, the new conductor of the organization, who arrived in Boston last evening from New York, where he landed from the Aquitania earlier in the day.

While the best of the newer music will undoubtedly be given, any touch of radicalism will lie in the construction of the program rather in the pieces themselves. "Boston will not be shocked," he insisted emphatically.

HAS BIG ENTOURAGE

Mr. Koussevitsky, who is in America for the first time, descended from the 7:45 P. M. train at Back Bay, accompanied by considerable of an entourage. Besides Mrs. Koussevitsky, there was his secretary, Dr. Vladimir Zederbaum, a valet, two servants and three members of the orchestra organization who had met him at the dock. The party at once entered machines and hurried to the house at 122 Pond street, Jamaica Plain, which has been taken for the year.

Still on the sunny side of 50, the new orchestra leader seems surprisingly youthful for a man who has set musical Europe by the ears. He is slender, of medium height, with a smoothly shaven face and close-cropped graying hair, which increases the resemblance to a prosperous business man suggested by his stylishly cut sack suit and blue collar and shirt. In action the contours of his face and particularly his broad, infectious smile, are markedly reminiscent of his countryman, Balieff, of Chauve Souris fame. When he speaks he gesticulates violently and his words gush forth in such a flood that Dr. Zederbaum found some difficulty in restraining him last evening until he had translated his previous remarks. For Mr. oussevitsky, although fluent in Russian, French and German, is still a student of English and will not trust himself in that tongue.

Seated in the dining room of his new home, he began by explaining that he had long known of Boston as one of the chief musical and intellectual centres of America. "My dear friend, Nikitsch, continually spoke to me of the city," he said, "and his enthusiasm infected me. Besides, the Boston Symphony orchestra is known throughout Europe as having the best musicians in the world."

When asked what motives had finally determined him to come to this country, he shook his head vigorously, smiled, and was evidently pleased. He had obviously been waiting for it.

"I have refused a number of offers from musca organizations in America," he said. "While I had my own orchestra in Russia, I declined all offers of engagements as I naturally preferred to give the selections I chose in my own way. When that was disbanded I at once declared that the only place to which I would go permanently would be Boston. It was the only organization which could give me true satisfaction. I am flattered by the invitation."

TO PLAY ONLY BEST

The question of programs was suggested. "In the first place," Mr. Koussevitsky began, "I am aware of the rumors about my radicalism but I do not believe Boston will be shocked. I will not play bad music but only the best which is now being produced. In any event the modernity of the orchestra will consist not in new selections but in the arrangement of the program.

"I think that a wrong idea about my radicalism has sprung from my Paris concerts. There it was my purpose to present a new musical art. Here it is entirely different. I am here for an entire season, so my programs will contain both the old and the new. I believe in progress in art so I cannot leave out what is now being created by young composers."

When the usual question about jazz was asked he at once became enthusiastic. "I like it very much," he said heartily. "I consider it one of the most important elements of the new music. It has had great influence on most modern musicians of talent. You must realize that jazz has such an influence because it springs from life itself—the dance instinct."

Born in 1874, the new Boston Symphony conductor entered the Moscow Conservatory at the age of 14 and a few years later became famous as a double bass soloist. He was a man of independent wealth and after studying in Berlin founded his own orchestra in 1909. From that time until the war he toured Russia, giving free concerts. The war interfered with his work and although he still conducted under the Bolshevist government, he left Russia in 1920 to act as guest conductor in London, Paris and other musical centres. He is also the organizer of "L'Edition Busse de Musique," which was founded to publish the work of young Russian composers who had been unable to gain attention but whose work was notable.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES

SEP 13 1924

RUSSIAN CONDUCTOR KUSSEVITSKY HERE

New Leader of Boston Symphony Orchestra on His First Visit to America.

A DIRECTOR AT 12 YEARS

He Brings Many New Compositions to Introduce Here After He Has Studied Our Tastes.

Sergei Kussevitsky, the Russian conductor who will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, arrived in New York yesterday morning on the Aquitania. Mr. Kussevitsky, accompanied by his wife, was met by William Brennan, manager of the orchestra. Later in the day they went to Boston. Mrs. Kussevitsky, who is also an excellent musician, is her husband's partner in the publishing business. L'Edition Russe de Musique, which they founded together, particularly with the purpose of assisting young Russian composers. The conductor's quick gestures and conversation, principally in French, showed his interest and almost childlike enthusiasm on his first visit to America.

He is a man of 50, of good height and figure, with thick, graying hair and mobile, expressive features. His manner is genial. He is full of questions as to the taste of American audiences and reiterated former statements that he had many new compositions to introduce in America, but would ascertain public taste before making final decisions about his programs. He is also, he said, particularly desirous of investigating the works of American composers.

He could not yet announce in detail his programs for either New York or Boston, but added that he had so much new music with him that his problem would be to condense rather than expand the lists he had partly prepared.

Most of Mr. Kussevitsky's conversation was carried on by gestures and a few disjointed phrases, his wife, who speaks English, translating for him.

The conductor has had a brilliant career. He was born in Tver, in the northern part of Russia, in 1874. His first musical instruction was given him in his home. His progress was so precocious that at the age of 12 he became conductor, for two years, in the theatre of his native town. He had not only to conduct, but to compose music for the dramas performed in the theatre.

At 14 Kussevitsky entered the Moscow Conservatories. There he became a pupil on the double-bass of Rambaussec and developed such virtuosity on this clumsy instrument that he succeeded his professor as teacher of it at the Conservatoire and later became the most famous double-bass virtuoso in the world.

All along, however, he had ambitions to become a conductor. In 1907 he formed an orchestra from the pupils of the Hochschule in Berlin, with which he worked two years, studying chiefly the classics and Wagner. Returning to Russia in 1909 he organized the Kussevitsky Orchestra, which soon became famous, and also gave performances at his Moscow concerts with a chorus of 250 voices. In the Summer, for many years, he toured the provinces with his orchestra and inauguarated the series of famous tours of the ports of the Volga. For these tours he engaged a special ship with a platform at the back and sailed from port to port, introducing in many places that had never heard an orchestra the work of great masters.

At the time of the Russian Kerensky revolution of 1917 Kussevitsky was appointed general conductor of the Russian State Orchestra, this orchestra having formerly been the court orchestra of the Czar. With the Bolshevist uprising he was forced to fly to Paris. Since then he has been very active as a guest conductor in London and English provinces, in Scotland, and in Paris, where in the last five seasons the Kussevitsky concerts at the opera have become more and more the musical "rage."

Kussevitsky has been much discussed in Europe for his interpretation of the classics as well as his virtuoso readings of modern music.

He will appear for the first time in America in Symphony Hall, Boston, Oct. 10, at the opening Boston Symphony concert of the season. His first New York appearance with the Boston Symphony will be in Carnegie Hall on Thanksgiving evening.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

SEP 12 1924

TIME BY THE FORELOCK

Already a Concert-Schedule for October—Roland Hayes, Alma Gluck, John McCormack and the Philharmonic Orchestra of New York

SUNDAY afternoon, Oct. 5, in Symphony Hall, Roland Hayes, the tenor in the fineness of voice, skill, understanding and feeling that have now set him high in the concert-hall.

Friday afternoon, Oct. 10, and Saturday evening, Oct. 11, in Symphony Hall, the first Symphony Concerts of the new year, with Mr. Koussevitzky for the first times as conductor.

Sunday afternoon, Oct. 12, in Symphony Hall, Mme. Schumann-Heink with a voice, skill, homeliness and honesty that resist the years.

Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 17 and 18, in Symphony Hall, Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra continuing the Symphony Concerts.

Saturday afternoon, Oct. 18, in Symphony Hall, Alma Gluck, sought of old for charm of presence, voice and sentiment, returns anew to the concert-hall.

Sunday afternoon, Oct. 19, in Symphony Hall, John McCormack, the tenor in all the range and quality that have won him a manifold and constant public.

Tuesday evening, Oct. 21, in Jordan Hall, Félix Fox, expert and discerning pianist, playing music of Bach, Liszt, Brahms, Balakirev, Debussy, Griffes and Mason.

Thursday evening, Oct. 23, in Jordan Hall, a concert by Crystal Waters, not otherwise specified.

Friday afternoon, Oct. 24, and Saturday evening, Oct. 25, in Symphony Hall, Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra in a third pair of concerts.

Sunday afternoon, Oct. 26, in Symphony Hall, the Philharmonic Society of New York, with the clear-minded, firm-handed and quick-spirited Mr. van Hoogstraten conducting and Mme. Merö, the energetic, for assisting pianist. Beethoven's "Eroica Symphony"; Chaikovsky's Concerto in G-major, a seldom played piece: Strauss's "Til Eulenspiegel" and Strauss's Dance in "Salome" fill the program.

Sunday evening, Oct. 26, at the Copley-Plaza Hotel, a chamber concert by the Durell String Quartet and Lee Pattison, the pianist. They join hands in Chausson's Quintet.

Tuesday evening, Oct. 28, in Jordan Hall, Maurice Dumesnil, Parisian pianist, seeks fortune in Boston.

Thursday evening, Oct. 30, in Jordan Hall, Jean Nolen, Irish mezzo-soprano, returns in the agreeable talents she proved last spring.

Friday evening, Oct. 31, in Jordan Hall, Carmela Ippolito assisted by Mr. San Roma, the pianist, exhibits anew the ripening of her promise as virtuosa and musician.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. PAUL, MINN.
PIONEER PRESS

SEP 13 1924

NOTED MUSICIAN ARRIVES.

Serge Koussevitsky, New Boston Symphony Director, Reaches U. S.

(By Associated Press.)

New York, Sept. 12.—Serge Koussevitzky, one of the greatest musical directors in Europe, arrived today on the Aquitania to become conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, the first Russian to attain this honor.

In the last four years he has appeared as guest conductor of the London Symphony orchestra, as well as in Barselona, Madrid, Rome and Berlin.

ite Now a Star

years ago that Lucille LaVerne s in a local stock company—and he was fash- l to her at Now r of "S Up," at the Conley, one cess of last season in New York.

NOVELTIES IN SYMPHONY LIST

New Russian Conductor Promises Wide Variety and Much Color

Serge Koussevitzky landed in America today and is on his way to Boston to prepare for the opening of the forty-fourth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This is Koussevitzky's first trip to America. He is the first Russian to lead the orchestra.

Mr. Koussevitzky has brought with him a number of scores for performance in the course of the Symphony season, which are to have their first hearing in America.

The newer music to be heard will include three composers who will appear as soloists in their own works —Igor Stravinsky, Serge Prokofieff and Serge Rachmaninoff. The list of soloists, which will be added to later, also includes the following artists, each of whom is to be heard in a score of full symphonic importance: Albert Spalding, Margaret Matzenauer, Alfred Cortot, Guy Maier and Lee Pattison.

Amusements

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
EAGLE

SEP 13 1924

Famous Symphony Leader, Taking Charge in Boston, Warm in Praise of Jazz

"Springs from Life Itself—The Dance Instinct," Says Koussevitzky, Noted Russian Musical Radical.

Boston, Sept. 13 — Serge Koussevitzky, famous Russian conductor, who is here to take charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announced that he had no intention of attempting to startle his audiences with sensational modern music. Jazz he praised because it "springs from life itself—the dance instinct."

Koussevitzky, who became known as a musical radical through his concerts at Paris, said that he would choose the masterpieces of all ages for his programs, but added, "As I believe in progress in art, I cannot leave out what is being created by young composers." He explained that the modernity of his programs would lie "not in new selections, but in the arrangement of the program."

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From
Star-Eagle
Newark, N. J.

SEP 13 1924

Leader Says Jazz "Springs from Life"

BOSTON, Sept. 13 (AP).—Serge Koussevitzky, famous Russian conductor, who arrived here last night to take charge of the Boston Symphony orchestra, says he has no intention of attempting to startle his audience with sensational modern music. Jazz he praised because it "springs from life itself—the dance instinct."

Koussevitzky, who became known as a musical radical through his concerts at Paris, said that he would choose the masterpieces of all ages for his programs but added, "as I believe in progress in art, I cannot leave out what is being created by young composers." He explained that the modernity of his programs would lie "not in new selections but in the arrangement of the program."

100

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD

SEP 13 1924

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY LIKES AMERICAN JAZZ

Prominent European Conductor Arrives to Lead Boston Symphony This Season.

Serge Koussevitsky, one of the foremost orchestra conductors of Europe, arrived yesterday on the Aquitania. He succeeds Pierre Monteux as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

He made four attempts to reach the United States. He plays the double bass and his first appearances were arranged to show his mastery of this resounding instrument. The war and his enlistment in the Russian Army interrupted the tour.

Mr. Koussevitsky was quoted recently as saying he was on a search for "an American Beethoven." This he denied. "There was one Beethoven," he said, "and the past is gone." The statement, he said, probably grew out of his belief that America is to develop a new art form.

"Old Europe has worked out all forms of art and she is exhausted," he said. "She is now resting. But your country is young and fresh and is just beginning to respond to art stimuli. Your jazz music, it has great significance. I was in London recently and used to drop in at a supper club where young American boys were playing. I let my supper get cold listening to them. These boys were fine musicians. And the jazz music they played was good music."

He is accompanied by his wife.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
SE 1924

NEW CONDUCTOR OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ARRIVES IN N. Y.

Serge Koussevitzky First Russian to Attain the Position.

New York, Sept. 12.—Serge Koussevitzky, one of the greatest musical directors in Europe, arrived to-day on the Aquitania to become conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the first Russian to attain this honor. The first concert under him will be produced Oct. 20 at Boston.

Born in Tver, North Russia, in 1874, Koussevitzky remained in the homeland until 1920, becoming leader of Russia's greatest musical organization, the Koussevitzky Orchestra of Moscow.

In the past four years he has appeared as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchesstra, as well as in Barcelona, Madrid, Rome and Berlin.

Tel. Chelsea 8000

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAPH

SEP 13 1924

Gilbert Emert Here.

"I did not introduce Shaw to America, nor did Arnold Daly. Few people remember it, but it was Richard Mansfield. At that time Shaw was regarded as a whipper-snapper playwright and not to be treated seriously. Mansfield, who had a keen and discerning brain, knew otherwise. To him goes the honor."

So there's one less worry for you!

Gilbert Emert, the playwright and author of "Tarnish" and "The Hero," also came in rather quietly aboard the Aquitania, from a short sojourn abroad. So also did arrive Tito Schipa, tenor of the Chicago Opera; and Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER

SEP 13 1924

NOTED RUSS DIRECTOR COMES TO DIRECT BOSTON SYMPHONY

New York, Sept. 12.—Serge Koussevitzky, one of the greatest musical directors in Europe, arrived today on the Aquitania to become conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, the first Russian to attain this honor.

Born in Tver, North Russia, in 1874, Koussevitzky remained in the homeland until 1920, becoming leader of Russia's greatest musical organization, the Koussevitzky orchestra of Moscow.

In the past four years he has appeared as guest conductor of the London Symphony orchestra, as well as in Barcelona, Madrid, Rome and Berlin.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD

SEP 13 1924

FAMOUS DIRECTOR IS HUB ORCHESTRA HEAD

New York, Sept. 13.—Segre Koussevitzky, one of the greatest musical directors in Europe, arrived yesterday in the Aquitania to become conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the first Russian to attain this honor.

Born in Tver, North Russia, in 1874, Koussevitzky remained in the homeland until 1920, becoming leader of Russia's greatest musical organization, the Koussevitzky Orchestra of Moscow.

In the last four years he has appeared as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra, as well as in Barcelona, Madrid, Rome and Berlin.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

SEP 13 1924

NEW CONDUCTOR OF BOSTON SYMPHONY ARRIVES IN N. Y.

Serge Koussevitzky First Russian to Attain the Position.

New York, Sept. 12.—Serge Koussevitzky, one of the greatest musical directors in Europe, arrived to-day on the Aquitania to become conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the first Russian to attain this honor. The first concert under him will be produced Oct. 20 at Boston.

Born in Tver, North Russia, in 1874, Koussevitzky remained in the homeland until 1920, becoming leader of Russia's greatest musical organization, the Koussevitzky Orchestra of Moscow.

In the past four years he has appeared as guest conductor of the London Symphonesstra, as well as in Barcelona, Madrid, Rome and Berlin.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CINCINNATI,
OHIO
INQUIRER

SEP 13 1924

NEW DIRECTOR ARRIVES.

New York, September 12.—Serge Koussevitzky, one of the greatest musical directors in Europe, arrived today to become conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the first Russian to attain this honor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TRIBUNE

SEP 13 1924

New Conductor Arrives For Boston Symphony

Serge Koussevitsky, Russian, Comes on Aquitania After Triumphs Abroad

Among those arriving yesterday morning on the Aquitania was Serge Koussevitzky, the new Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give ten concerts at Carnegie Hall during the winter.

While this is Mr. Koussevitzky's first visit to America, he has been well known for some time in musical circles here as a prominent figure among European orchestral directors. Before the war he brought the symphony orchestra to parts of Russia where it had been hitherto unknown. He put his musicians on a boat on the Volga and gave concerts at various points along its banks. This unique series was given three times. In recent years Mr. Koussevitzky's greatest activity probably has been his annual spring series of concerts at the Paris Opera, devoted to modern music. The fear that he will give his Boston and New York patrons nothing but the latest music, however, is unfounded, he told a representative of The New York Herald Tribune last spring. "But," he says, "there is something beautiful in modern music which cannot be passed by."

Mr. Koussevitzky is the seventh in the line of conductors of the Boston Symphony, which opens its forty-fourth season next month, succeeeding Pierre Monteux. One thing, he said, which led him to accept the Boston engagement is the liberal amount of rehearsal which the orchestra allows. In European orchestras the opportunity for rehearsal is limited.

'Carmen' in Italian and French Given by Music Lovers

"Carmen," in a performance divided between Italian and French, was given last night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music by the Music Lovers' Grand Opera Company, with Emilia Vergeri displaying ample vivacity in the title role and a voice of variable merit. Dmitry Dobkin, who has been heard in recital, was a mild Don Jose with agreeable tones, while Maria Varnay was Micaela; Alberto Terrasi, Escamillo, and Martin Herodas a creditable Horodas. Mmes. Adrian and Segno ad Messrs. Molle, Baldi and Bozzo completed the cast, conducted by Salvatore Avitabile.

"The Barber of Seville" is announced for this afternoon, with "Il Trovatore" to-night.

Tel. Chelsea ...

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT,
MICH.
NEWS

SEP 13 1924

JAZZ MUSIC PRAISED BY RUSSIAN DIRECTOR

BOSTON, Sept. 13.—Serge Koussevitzky, famous Russian conductor, who arrived here last night to take charge of the Boston Symphonic Orchestra, announced he had no intention of attempting to startle his audiences with sensational modern music. Jazz he praised because it "springs from life itself—the dance instinct."

Koussevitzky, who became known as a musical radical through his concerts at Paris, said he would choose the masterpieces of all ages for his programs, but added, "as I believe in progress in art, I can not leave out what is being created by young composers."

He explained that the modernity of his program would lie "not in new selections, but in the arrangement of the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

SEP 13 1924

RUSSIAN TO CONDUCT SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Special to The Free Press.

New York, Sept. 12.—Serge Koussevitzky, one of the greatest musical directors in Europe, arrived today to become conductor of the Symphony orchestra, the first Russian to attain this honor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MILWAUKEE,
WIS.
SENTINEL

SEP 13 19...

The Boston symphony this winter is to be conducted by Serge Koussvitsky, who has the reputation of being a mighty hunter of new musical talent. It is said that he hopes to discover new music, which he may find worthy of programing. He is said to believe gratly in the ability of American as well as European composers and hopes "to show the public that masterpieces of music are being written today, as powerful, stirring and beautiful as the greatest of the past."

In this connection he says that he will present to Boston audiences music never heard before, which exists only in manuscripts which he has in his keeping, and which was written by men now living who will rank in a century with Mozart and Beethoven.

Some of it has been heard in Paris, and some of it will be first heard this winter in Boston. Koussevitzky says that he "likes all good music and that several musicians have written jazz which is truly good."

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

SEP 12 1924

KOUSSEVITZKY ARRIVES

Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra Reaches New York on Aquitania

New York, Sept. 12—Serge oKussevitzky arrived today on the Aquitania to become conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The first concert under him will be produced Oct. 20 at Boston.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. LOUIS,
MO.
GLOBE-DEMOCRAT

SEP 13 1924

Copyright, 1924, McNaught Syndicate

KOUSSEVITSKY ARRIVES TO LEAD BOSTON ORCHESTRA

NEW YORK, September 12.—Serge Koussevitsky, one of the greatest musical directors in Europe, arrived today on the Aquitania to become conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the first Russian to attain this honor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON
MASSACHUSETTS
AMERICAN

SEP 13 1924

HUB SYMPHONY HEAD ARRIVES IN NEW YORK

Serge Koussevitzky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived in New York on the Aquitania.

Koussevitzky comes as one of the greatest living European musical directors. He will make his first appearance here at a concert October 20.

During recent years, he has occupied the post of guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra and orchestras in Barcelona, Madrid, Rome and Berlin. He was born in Iver, North Russia, in 1874.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MILWAUKEE, WIS.
SENTINEL

SEP 1 1924

Russian Comes to Direct Boston Symphony Artists

NEW YORK, Sept. 12—(A. P.)—Serge Koussevitzky, one of the greatest musical directors in Europe, arrived today on the Aquitania to become conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, the first Russian to attain this honor. In the last four years he has appeared as guest conductor of the London Symphony orchestra, as well as in Barcelona, Madrid, Rome and Berlin.

(Other Romeikes May Disappoint)

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

SEP 1924

Serge Koussevitzky, one of the greatest musical directors in Europe, arrived in New York on the Aquitania to become conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, the first Russian to attain this honor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR

SEP 13 1924

BOSTON'S FIRST RUSSIAN SYMPHONY DIRECTOR LANDS

NEW YORK, Sept. 12.—Serge Koussevitzky, one of the greatest musical directors in Europe, arrived today to become conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, the first Russian to attain this honor.

220 WEST 19TH ST.,
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

SEP 13 1924

* *

First Russian Director of Boston Symphony Lands

New York, Sept. 12.—Serge Koussevitzky, one of the great musical directors in Europe, arrived today on the Aquitania to become conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, the first Russian to attain that honor. In the last four years he has appeared as guest conductor of the London symphony orchestra, as well as in Barcelona, Madrid, Rome, and Berlin.

* *

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
Grand Rapids Herald
SEP 14 1924

RUSSIAN TO CONDUCT SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

NEW YORK, Sept. 13.—Serge Koussevitzky, one of the greatest musical directors in Europe, arrived today to become conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, the first Russian to attain this honor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

SEP 14 1924

KOUSSEVITZKY, SOON TO COME TO AMERICA, OUTLINES PLANS

New Leader Of Boston Symphony Orchestra Hopes To Find Here Genius Rivaling That Of Beethoven.

PARIS.

"WHAT I hope to do in America is to show the public that masterpieces of music are being written today as powerful, stirring and beautiful as the greatest of the past," says Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor who will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra this coming season.

In his Paris home, looking down through the trees upon the peaceful Seine, Koussevitzky outlined his plans for his approaching career across the Atlantic.

"I will present in Boston music never heard before," he said, "music which now exists only in manuscripts which I have in my keeping, music written by men now living who will rank as high a century from now as Mozart and Beethoven. I have given some of their music to Paris. You have seen how it has been received. Some of it shall be America's first."

I HAVE seen how Koussevitzky's music has been received in Paris. Music lovers in the French capital have gone mad over the Russian leader, literally beside themselves in their idolatry.

America may be sure that Koussevitzky will present its musical public with auditions of the older classics, without a trace of modernity in his reading of them. America also may be sure that this man will be engaged during his entire stay in America on a passionate hunt for musical genius, resident or native, in the New World.

"Jazz music?" He was answering a query. "I like all good music. And several Americans have written jazz which is good. Besides writing it, your nation seems to have a talent for playing it.

"I was in London recently and dropped in late at night for something to eat at a supper club where dancing was going on. There was an orchestra of American boys there, the oldest could not have been more than 30. I had a table near them where I could hear them and watch them individually.

"Some of those boys were improvising as they went along, and they were great players. I let my supper get cold listening to them. I stayed until a shockingly late hour. Those boys were fine musicians, but I learned that they were not particularly notable among America's jazz musicians—just a group of college students from one of your Western States."

M. KOUSSEVITZKY is a man of one passion—music. He has no hobbies. Over and above his talents, his outstanding quality is enthusiasm. He is as enthusiastic over the subject he expounds from his conductor's platform as is Billy Sunday over his. Their methods of exposition differ, however.

Music has been practically his entire life since the age when most boys are playing marbles. At the age of 12 he conducted a provincial theater orchestra in Russia and was a composer. Today he is 52 years old.

His wife also is musical. Mme. Koussevitzky is the sort of person to whom the young Russian composers dedicate their most ambitious works. She has sympathy, is a tireless listener, an able and appreciative critic. She is more than well-to-do.

In appearance, manner and dress M. Koussevitzky might be a successful middle-aged business man—a forceful figure of no eccentricities, of middle height, stocky, unathletic. Only his eyes inform you he is not. Few business men have eyes glowing with such dark, strange fires as his when enthusiasm is flaming in them. They are the eyes of an evangelist.

THE fact is, Koussevitzky is an evangelist and a showman.

"Once every two years before the war I used to charter a big steamer and make a journey of 2,500 miles. We stopped at every big city and many small towns. We sent men ahead to advertise that we were coming.

"The peasants would flock to the river from villages for miles back into country which few Europeans have ever seen. And I took them the best that exists in music, new and old. Debussy, Ravel, Florent Schmitt, P. Dukas, Roger Ducasse, Elgar, Richard Strauss. I made them known in villages where there isn't any modern life as Europe and America know it.

"And on these trips I found musicians who now are playing in the great capitals.

"They were marvelous, those journeys. They are not possible any more."

KOUSSEVITZKY'S family were mercantile, middle-class folk who were fond of music. When a boy he always intended to direct an orchestra as his life work.

At 14 he entered the Conservatoire of the Moscow Philharmonic Society as a student of composition and orchestral conducting. In order to qualify for a scholarship, he studied the double bass and became such a master of that resounding instrument that upon the termination of his study he obtained the post of double bass soloist at the Moscow Imperial Opera. For several years thereafter he appeared in the principal cities of Russia as a double bass virtuoso.

The first revolution, that of 1917, did not disturb him. He was appointed general conductor of the Russian State Orchestra by the Provisional Government established by Kerensky. This orchestra formerly was the court orchestra.

Then came the Bolshevik uprising.

"I am not a politician," says the composer and conductor, speaking of it. "I am not an economist."

Then he pauses. He does not launch into the diatribes against the new regime which explode from most of the Russian colony in Paris. He sits and broods.

"Life in Russia is impossible," he concludes. "There is no chance for artistic endeavor. I tried. I gave concerts in rooms that were freezing. The brass players wore mittens. You can't do it. It's impossible. Everything has gone to pieces."

HE is interested in choral music as well as orchestral and in the union of the two. In Moscow he organized a choir of 250 voices to give choral works in conjunction with his symphony orchestra.

As part of his work in the field of new music, Koussevitzky and his wife are the publishers of l'Edition Russe de Musique, which they began in Moscow in 1909 and now continue in Paris. The aim of this publishing business is to print the music of young Russians of talent who otherwise might have difficulty in getting their works published. The recommendation of Koussevitzky is sufficient to make a sale for it.

[Copyright, 1924.]

106-110 SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From ADVERTISER,
Boston, Mass.
SEP 14 1924

Koussevitzky to Offer Many Novelties

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY has arrived in from Europe to prepare for the opening of the forty-fourth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, beginning Oct. 10. He is the first Russian to become leader of the Hub's famous orchestra.

Koussevitzky has won fame as conductor of the former Koussevitzky Orchestra of Moscow, as guest conductor the London Symphony Orchestra and with his "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris. He has also conducted Russian opera in Paris and Barcelona.

Kossevitzky's plans for the Boston Symphony season include first performances in America of many works which he has introduced in Europe. Some of the scores have been published by the Russian firm which bears his name. Established symphony music will predominate, however, on his pprograms.

Thrce compopsers will be included among the Swmphony soloists, Igor Stravinsky, Serge Prokofieff, and Serge Rachmaninoff. Other soloists already engaged are Margaret Matzenauer, Alfred Cortot, Albert Spalding, Guy Meier and Lee Pattison.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, first Russian leader of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

SEP 14 1924

KOUSSEVITZKY HERE

Serge Koussevitzky arrived in Boston Friday evening on his first trip to America, to prepare for the opening of the 44th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (Symphony hall, Oct. 10). He is the orchestra's first Russian leader.

Koussevitzky is of outstanding European fame as the conductor of the former Koussevitzky orchestra of Moscow, and during the last four seasons as guest conductor of annual series of concerts by the London Symphony Orchestra, of the annual double series of "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris, of concerts in other British and French cities and in Berlin, Rome, Warsaw, etc. He is also admired as the conductor of Russian operas at the Paris Opera and in Barcelona.

Mr. Koussevitzky's plans concerning the coming Boston Symphony Orchestra season include some first performances in America of a number of scores which he has introduced in Europe and which have occasioned much interest there. The music of these Mr. Koussevitzky has brought with him. Some of the scores have been published by the Russian firm which bears his name. The established symphonic repertory will duly predominate, however, on his program. Of the newer music to be heard three composers will be included, who will also appear as soloists in their own music. These will be Igor Stravinsky, Serge Prokofieff and Serge Rachmaninoff. The list of soloists, which will be added to later, also includes the following artists, each of whom is to be heard in a score of full symphonic importance: Margaret Matzenauer, Alfred Cortot, Albert Spalding and Guy Maier and Lee Pattison.

Sep 1924

Quoting the Paris correspondent of the North American Newspaper Alliance, Musical America points out that Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the Boston orchestra, is going to seek out new music over here. He is said to have a leaning for pioneering in new fields and is quoted as saying he expects to find something worthy of the best of the past maters. He says he already has manuscripts that he will interpret for American audiences for the first time.

102

Volcanic Temperament, But Kept Under Control

Koussevitsky, New Symphony Conductor, Producer of "Hysterical" Music

Boston Globe Sept. 14

No figure coming to Boston in years has stirred the interest of the music-following folks such a lively fashion as Serge Koussevitzky, who arrived in America yesterday for his first visit and to take up his baton as conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fact that he is the first Russian to hold that place and the news that he is known as a most unconventional person in a profession of unconventionalists has aroused curiosity. Through the courtesy of the American Mercury, the Globe is able to give its readers a musical picture of him, written by one of the music critics in England.

It shows how highly this volatile conductor of "hysterical" music stands in some respected musical circles.

By ERNEST NEWMAN,
Music Critic of the London Times

Serge Koussevitzky was born in Tver (North Russia) in 1874. He received his first musical education at home. What the nature or the extent of it may have been I do not know, but at the mature age of 12 he became chef d'orchestre in the theatre of his natal town, a post which he held for two years.

His duties were to compose whatever music might be required for the plays put one at the theatre, and to conduct the entr'actes. At 14 he went to Moscow to continue his studies.

According to the regulations of the Conservatoire, the stipendiares of the orchestral class had to choose, for special study, one of the brass instruments or the double-bass. Koussevitzky chose the latter, becoming the pupil of the celebrated Rambaussc.

On the double-bass he soon developed an extraordinary facility: he not only became the double-bass soloist in the orchestra of the Imperial Opera at Moscow, but succeeded his teacher as professor of the instrument at the Conservatoire.

For 10 years he toured Russia and Western Europe as a contrabass virtuoso, and composed a number of works for the instrument—including a concerto—that are now part of the repertoire of every contrabassist.

Organized Famous Orchestra

His main ambition, however, was all along to be a conductor. In 1907 he formed, out of the pupils of the Berlin Hochschule fur Musik, an orchestra with which he worked for two years, studying chiefly the classics and Wagner.

He returned to Russia in 1909 and organized the Koussevitzky Orchestra that soon became so famous; it was made up of the best players from the other Russion orchestras. The men were engaged by the year, and were barred from giving their services to any other organization, or at any other concerts than those of Koussevitzky.

For the performers of the choral works given at his Moscow concerts he formed a mixed choir of 250 voices; in Petrograd he used for this purpose the celebrated Archangelsky Choir. The formal Moscow and Petrograd seasons ending at Easter, Koussevitzky, in the Spring, gave Beethoven festivals, Bach festivals, Tchaikovsky festivals, Rimsky-Korsakov festivals, etc., in the two capital towns.

In the Summer, for many years, he toured the provinces with his orchestra, soloists into villages that had not only never heard an orchestra before, but had not even seen certain of the instruments; his annual voyages down the Volga with this company of musicians were among the most romantic events of the musical life of our time.

In this way he introduced a number of classical and modern works to thousands who would otherwise never have heard a bar of them.

Broke Away From Routine

One of his objects throughout his career has been to break away from routine. In those great years between 1907 and the outbreak of the war he introduced a number of novelties, native and foreign, to the Russian public, including works by Debussy, Ravel, Fanelli, Florent, Schmitt, Paul Dukas, Roger Ducasse, Bruckner, Mahler, Bantock, Tanelev, Prokoviev and others.

He gave Russian audiences their first introduction to Strawinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" and Scriabine's Third and Fifth symphonies ("The Divine Poem" and "Prometheus"). He was the first to make a popular success of Scriabine's "Poem of Ecstasy," which till then had not been understood.

He gave the still unpublished "Apres la lecture d'un Psaume" of Tanelev (for soli, orchestra and chorus), which is as yet unknown in Europe; Rachmaninov's "The Bells"; several early works of Prokoviev; works of the Polish Karlovicz, Szymanovsky, etc.

During the early part of the war he still managed to carry on. Most of the members of his own orchestra had been called up for service; but he continued to give concerts at Moscow and Petrograd with other orchestras, performing such works as the Ninth symphony and the D major mass of Beethoven, the B minor mass of Bach, and so on.

After the revolution in 1917 he was appointed director of the Russian State orchestras. He remained in Russia until 1920, when he left his native country to settle in Western Europe.

Many Russian Novelties

In 1921 he founded those Paris concerts of his that are now so famous. During the four years from 1921 to 1924 he has given annually in Paris two seasons of four concerts each, at which he has introduced a large number of Russian and other novelties.

He soon became extremely popular in London, and has conducted in several other English and Scotch towns, in Barcelona, Madrid, Rome, Berlin, Warsaw, etc. At Barcelona he both conducted and staged a number of Russian operas — Rimsky - Korsakov's "Snow Maiden," Tschaikovski's "Pique-Dame," Moussorgski's "Boris Godounov" and Borodin's "Prince Igor." In Paris he has given "Boris Godounov" and "Khovantchina."

To this record of the external life of Koussevitzky it may be added that in 1909 he and his wife founded the publishing business of "L'Edition Russe de Musique," the object of which was partly to give the younger Russian composers of talent an opportunity that otherwise might not have come their way, partly to prevent the exploitation that people of this kind have sometimes to submit to at the hands of purely commercial publishing houses.

America will find Koussevitzky's musicianship and his orchestral technique equal to any demands that are likely to be made on them. The question is not as to his competence, but what will be thought of his readings.

Steadiest When at Boiling Point

Opinions will differ about him, as they do about every conductor. I can speak only of the impression he has made on myself after experience of him in music of all schools and all orders.

He has a volcanic temperament, but I have never yet known it to run away with him. I have often found myself diagreeing with him; but I have never disagreed with him on the score that he had lost control over his own fire.

On the contrary, it is precisely when his temperament is at boiling point that his hand on the regulator is steadiest and surest. When I have disagreed with him most acutely has been in moments when, I was pretty certain, the fire had, for purely physical reasons, gone out.

I particularly remember a performance of Brahms' Third Symphony in which he took the third movement at so slow a pace that its real character seemed to me to be completely perverted; the gentle, unassuming, half-sad, half-playful poco allegretto became a brooding andante—almost an adagio

I am not in Koussevitsky's secrets. It is just possible that this is really how the third movement strikes him. But until I hear him play it again in the same way I shall prefer to believe the explanation to be simply that he was tired, and had no idea how slow the tempo really was.

He takes an enormous amount out of himself when he conducts, and the wonder to me always is how he manages to get through the quantity of work he does, and to keep his nerves so steady and his head so cool through it all.

Temperament Servant, Not Master

Richard Strauss once astonished the world by saying, apropos of "Tristan," "Believe me, the brain that could pour out that passionate music must have been as cold as ice." What seems like paradox in this, however, is no more than sober truth. The more an artist is on fire, the cooler have to be the head and hand that direct the fire.

Koussevitzky has this central ice in an extraordinary degree. I believe it would hardly be possible to raise some works to a higher pitch of nervous incandescence than he does; but the nervousness never gets out of hand. It is Koussevitzky's servant, not his master, the excitement is always under control; one great plastic line runs round and through the work.

American audiences will no doubt soon have an opportunity of testing the truth of this statement for themselves in such a work as Scriabine's "Poem of Ecstasy." Nervous excitement could hardly go further; yet there is never the least suggestion of nervous derangement. The music is hysterical, but not the performance. The distinction needs insisting on because it is too often forgotten when judging a conductor.

We do not blame a Salvini because he shows us Lear mad. Lear is mad. But to assume that, because the actor shows a mad Lear, he himself is mad, would be, as John Stuart Mill would say, to argue that because there is pepper in the soup there must be pepper in the cook.

Interpreting Hysteria

There are certain musical works that were born in a nervous excitement bordering on hysteria, and it is the conductor's business to reproduce for us the composer's mind when he wrote the work. But it is possible to handle an hysterical patient, or to make him the subject of a lecture on hysteria, without being hysterical yourself; indeed, the cooler you are the better your lecture will be, and the more your audience will understand of the true nature of hysteria. Koussevitsky keeps the "Poem of Ectasy" in a perpetual seethe, but there is no chaos in it, rather a cosmic shapliness and ordilness.

Some of Koussevitzky's tempi may appear on the slow side as measured by the metronome, but one gets no feeling of dragging, because of the intellectual control that sees the end in the beginning, and plans everything perfectly to scale. His "Tristan" Prelude and Liebestod may serve as an example of this.

I do not wish, however, to convey the impression that it is only in music of the romantic or nervous order that he shines. His tastes are exceedingly catholic, and I have found his Haydn and his Boccherini as masterly as his Scriabine or Strawinsky.

In genuinely classic music, indeed, his plastic line is ever surer and firmer than in romantic. In the latter he seems inclined now and then to "dramatize" more than the music will quite stand.

In Strauss' "Don Juan," for instance, many people feel that he takes the Donna Anna section rather too slowly. The explanation seems to be that he mentally dramatizes the character. Instead of describing it from the outside, he lets it speak for itself. Donna Anna thus, as it were, states her own case, tells her own story—and takes her own time about it, as she would do on the stage.

As Beethoven Would See Himself

Had I the requisite space, I would like to argue again here a thesis I put forward a little while ago when discussing Weingartner's and Koussevitzky's London performances of the Ninth Symphony—that Koussevitzky's Beethoven is the genuine classic and Weingarner's the romantic.

The popular belief, of course, is to the contrary—that the sober, elderly German gentleman shown us in the ordinary German reading is the true Beethoven, while the volcanic spirit that Koussevitzky makes of him is only Koussevitzky himself. I believe this to be a fallacy.

Koussevitzky, by playing the Ninth Symphony as if it had been written yesterday by a powerful genius, whose muscles were twice the size of those of the ordinary man, gives us, I contend, a Beethoven in which Beethoven would recognize himself. However, my American friends will soon have plentiful opportunities of deciding this and other questions concerning Koussevitzky for themselves.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

SEP 14 1924

Jazz Is Instructive, Says Noted Conductor

BOSTON, Sept. 13.—Jazz "springs from life itself—the dance instinct."

This is the verdict of Serge Koussevitzky, Russian conductor, who has arrived here to take charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He announced, however, that he would not "startle" his audience by introducing sensational modern music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

SEP 1924

NEW CONDUCTOR LOVER OF JAZZ

Boston Symphony Orchestra Leader Declares For Modern Music in Interview

BOSTON, Sept. 13. (United News)—Boston music lovers take their symphony orchestra with the same degree of concern Harvard undergrads take their football.

It follows, then, that the arrival of a new conductor for symphony—preceded by a reputation for modernity—rivals the advent of a new grid mentor at the Cambridge stadium.

And so, with the coming today of Serge Koussevitzky, 50 year old Russian conductor fresh from four seasons at Paris where he devoted his concerts to modern music with sensational success, the Cabots, Lodges, et als, manifested the same perturbation the lusty sons of John Harvard would in the installation of a new football coach famed for his new school of aerial attacks and trick kick formations.

Symphony opens October 10, and save for a few meagre crumbs of information, Koussevitzky has the Hub awaiting a surprise winter musical feast.

He Loves Jazz

His chief admission up to the end of his first day here—made albeit, via the interpreter route—are that he likes all good music, is interested in "ze American jazz," and that he intends to give modern composers a fair share of his programs.

When informed that Boston expects to be "shocked and electrified," he relayed the intelligence he would include Alexander Scriabine's "Poem de L'Extase" in his first program. He assured Beacon street, however, that he would not be swept away by radicalism whereupon the "street" breathed an audible sigh of relief.

As for American jazz, "it is beautiful," he said.

"That is to say, it has been a great influence on the young composers and that makes it important.

"It has harmonic richness and contour.

"It is, however, like a fashion and not likely to endure as it is now. One day it is here. Another day—it will be gone, and in its place the development that its fleeting presence has influenced."

Beyond the "Poeme de L'Extase" admission Koussevitzky would not divulge his plans for the winter, but he managed to leave the initial impression that, despite his reputation for modern music concerts he would shatter no Boston idols.

Tel. Chelsea 8800

THIS CLIPPING FROM

DETROIT,
MICH.
NEWS

SEP 14 1924

'REIGN OF RUSSIANS' IS FACED BY BOSTON

BOSTON, Sept. 13.—The phrasemakers already have dubbed the approaching season "The Reign of the Russians," for not only does Serge Koussevitzky take over the conductorship, but three other Russians will "assist" during the season. Rachmaninof will be here as pianist and composer; Stravinsky as composer and pianist; and Prokofiev as both, and possibly, conductor of his own works. The Symphony Orchestra begins its season Oct. 10-11, and has scheduled 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts, with, as usual, distinguished soloists thoughout the season.

REDUCTION RATIO 14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

Pittsburgh Press - Sept. 14.

SIX—THEATRICAL & PHOTOPLAY SECTION

Music-Season

KOUSSEVITZKY TO CONDUCT BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Characteristics of New Director—Toti Dal Monte With Chicago Opera—New San Carlo Members—Edward Burlingame Hill's Book on Modern French Music.

By Burt McMurtrie.

STUDYING the prospects of the musical season during the next eight months in Pittsburgh, the attention is drawn to the innovations, the new faces and new names listed on the concert, operate and recital calendar. Foremost among those noticed is the name of Serge Koussevitzky, selected by Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, as conductor of that organization starting this fall.

Koussevitzky, a Russian, received his early training at home; that is, before he entered his teens, for at the age of 12 he was orchestra leader in his native town and for two years he composed whatever music was needed for the plays and conducted the orchestra between acts.

By this time he had attained size enough to play the double-bass without a step ladder, so off he went to Moscow to continue his studies at the conservatory where stipendiares of the orchestral class had to choose it or one of the brass instruments. It was but a short time before he developed extraordinary facility with the double-bass, became soloist in the Imperial Opera at Moscow, and succeeded his teacher, the celebrated Rambaussec, as professor at the conservatory. He toured Europe as a soloist and composed a number of works for that instrument, including a concerto, which are in the repertory of every contrabassist of ability.

His main ambition, however, was all along to be a conductor. In 1907 he formed, out of the pupils of the Berlin Hochschule fur Musik, an orchesttra with which he worked for two years studying chiefly the classics and Wagner. He returned to Russia in 1909, and organized the Koussevitzky orchestra that soon became so famous.

For the performance of the choral works given at his Moscow concerts he formed a mixed choir of 250 voices; in Petrograd he used for this purpose the celebrated Archangelsky choir. The formal Moscow and Petrograd seasons ending at Easter, Koussevitzky, in the spring, gave Beethoven festivals, Bach festivals, Tchaikovsky festivals, Rimsky-Korsakov festivals, etc., in the two capital towns.

ANNUAL VOYAGES DOWN THE VOLGA.

In the summer for years he toured the provinces with his orchestra. His annual voyages down the Volga with this company of musicians were among the most romantic events of the musical life of our time.

One of the objects of Koussevitzky has been breaking through routine. In the years between 1907 and the out break of the war, he introduced many novelties, native and foreign, to the Russian public, including Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" and Scriabine's third and fifth symphonies. He managed to carry on during the war, and after the 1917 revolution he was appointed director of the Russian state orchestras and remained as such until 1920, when he left his native land and in 1921 founded those Paris concerts of his that are now so famous.

In Paris, as elsewhere Koussevitzky was not bound by custom, and during the four years from 1921 to 1924 has given annually two seasons of four concerts each, at which he has introduced an enormous number of new works and re-discovered or rearranged classics. He has also been very popular in London and in the big cities of continental Europe and in Barcelona staged and conducted a number of Russian operas.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TELEGRAPH
SEP 14 1924

LEARNED THE BASS FIDDLE.

Young Life of New Boston Symphony Conductor a Busy One.

Serge Koussevitzky, who is to take charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this Winter, was born in Tver, North Russia, in 1874. He received his first musical education at home. What the nature or the extent of it may have been I do not know, but at the mature age of 12 he became chef d'orchestre in the theatre of his natal town, a post which he held for two years. His duties were to compose whatever music might be required for the plays put on at the theatre and to conduct the entr'actes.

At 14 he went to Moscow to continue his studies. According to the regulations of the conservatoire, the stipendiares of the instruments or the double bass. Koussevitzky chose the latter, becoming the pupil of the celebrated Rambaussec.

On the double-bass he soon developed an extraordinary facility; he not only became the double-bass soloist in the orchestra of the Imperial Opera at Moscow but succeeded his teacher as professor of the instrument at the Conservatoire. For ten years he toured Russia and Western Europe as a contrabass virtuoso and composed a number of works for the instrument—including a concerto—that are now part of the repertoire of every contrabassist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM DETROIT,
MICH.
NEWS
SEP 14 1924

Seeks Musical Genius

NEW CONDUCTOR OF BOSTON SYMPHONY DUE SOON

(Copyright, 1924, in U. S. and Canada by North American Newspaper Alliance. All rights reserved.)

THE approaching arrival in America of Serge Koussevitzky, to become conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, turns attention not only to the man himself, but to what he, as a seeker after new genius, hopes to find in America. Exponent of both the classic and the modern, he will search here for talent—ar better—and with no bias against jazz he may be the first to find an American Beethoven. Mr. Koussevitzky's following in Europe is of the enthusiastic sort usually created only by opera stars.

By ALLEN RAYMOND.

Paris Correspondent of The Detroit News and the North American Newspaper Alliance.

PARIS, Sept. 13.—"What I hope to do in America is to show the public that masterpieces of music are being written today as powerful, stirring and beautiful as the greatest of the past," says Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor who will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra this coming season.

In the twilight shadow of his Paris home, looking down through the trees upon the peaceful Seine, he outlined for readers of The Detroit News his plans and hopes for his approaching career across the Atlantic.

"I will present in Boston music never heard before," he said, "music which now exists only in manuscripts which I have in my keeping, music written by men now living who will rank as high a century from now as Mozart and Beethoven. I have given some of their music to Paris. You have seen how it has been received. Some of it shall be America's first."

I have seen how Koussevitzky's music has been received in Paris. Music lovers in the French capital have gone mad over the Russian leader, literally frenzied in their idolatry.

STORMED THEATER.

But it is not alone for his introduction of new composers that they storm the doors of the Theatre Nationale de l'Opera for all his concerts.

America may be sure that Koussevitzky will present its musical public with auditions of the older classics, without a trace of modernity in his reading of them, their historic beauties reproduced painstakingly and enthusiastically, exactly as the modern Russian believes the older masters wished them rendered.

America also may be sure that this man will be engaged during his entire stay in America on a passionate hunt for musical genius resident or native in the new world.

In the old world he has become known as a hunter for musical talent, and a patron of young composers. He believes there is genius in America, and he hopes to ferret it out. The breadth of territory which his search will cover may be indicated by an incident he told the interviewer.

"Jazz music?" (He was answering a query). "I like all good music. And several Americans have written jazz which is truly good. Besides writing it, your nation seems to have a talent for playing it.

LIKES JAZZ BAND.

"I was in London recently, and dropped in late at night for something to eat at a supper club where dancing was going on. There was an orchestra of American boys there. The oldest could not have been more than 30. I had a table near them where I could hear them and watch them individually. Some of those boys were improvising as they went along, and they were great players. I let my supper get cold listening to them. I stayed until a shockingly late hour. Those boys were fine musicians, but I learned that they were not particularly notable among America's jazz musicians—just a group of college students from one of your western states."

Mr. Koussevitzky is a man of one passion—music. He is a man of no hobbies. Over and above his talents, his outstanding quality is enthusiasm. Music has been practically his entire life since the age when most boys are playing marbles. At the age of 12 he conducted a provincial theater orchestra in Russia, and was a composer. Today he is 52 years old.

WIFE IS "GODDESS."

Mr. Koussevitzky is married. His wife is musical. Mrs. Koussevitzy is the sort of person to whom the young Russian composers dedicate their most ambitious works. A species of goddess for Scriabin, Stravinsky and their fellows.

She has great sympathy for them, is a tireless listener, an able and appreciative critic. She is more than well-to-do. She has published the music of more than one hungry genius, and has supplied food to many others.

In appearance, manner and dress, Mr. Koussevitzky might be a successful middle-aged business man—a forceful figure of no eccentricities, of middle height, stocky, un-athletic. Only his eyes inform you he is not; few business men have eyes glowing with such dark strange fires as his, when enthusiasm is flaming in them. They are the eyes of a young reformer, an evangelist.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

The fact is, Mr. Koussevitzky is an evangelist, and a showman. He would appreciate both Billy Sunday and P. T. Barnum.

This is what he told his interviewer of a trip he used to take in pre-war Russia with an orchestra of 100 players, in a steamboat on the Volga.

CARRIED MUSIC TO MILLIONS.

"I carried music through a vast section of Russia," he said. "Once every two years before the war I used to charter a big steamer and make a journey of 2,500 miles. We stopped at every big city and many small towns. The peasants would flock to the river from villages for miles back into country which few Europeans have ever seen. And I took them the best that exists in music, new and old. Debussy, Ravel, Florent Schmitt, P. Dukas, Roger Ducasse, Elgar, Richard Strauss. I made them known in villages where there isn't any modern life as Europe and America know it.

"I took them into the back country and gave them to hundreds of thousands of Russian people, scattered over an area of 500,000 square miles. You should have seen them come to see and hear us. And on these trips I found musicians who are now playing in the great capitals."

As a small boy, he says, the orchestras he heard in Tver, the north Russian community where he was born, exerted an impelling fascination over him. His family were mercantile, middle class folk who were fond of music. It was early the center of his existence, and though he experimented with various instruments when a boy he always intended to direct an orchestra as his life work.

When he was 14 he entered the conservatoire of the Moscow Philharmonic Society as a student of composition and orchestral conducting. To qualify for a scholarship he studied the double bass and became such a master of that resounding instrument that upon the termination of his study he obtained the post of double bass soloist at the Moscow Imperial Opera.

ESTABLISHED OWN ORCHESTRA.

He never lost sight of his real aim, to conduct a great orchestra. In 1909 he established his own symphony orchestra in Moscow. This body of musicians quickly became famous all over Russia.

Then came the war. The first revolution, that of 1917, did not disturb him. He was appointed general conductor of the Russian State Orchestra by the provisional government established by Kerensky. This orchestra formerly was the court orchestra.

Then came the Bolshevik uprising. "Life in Russia now is impossible," he says. "There is no chance for artistic endeavor. I tried. I gave concerts in rooms that were freezing. The brass players wore mittens. You can't do it. It's impossible. Everything has gone to pieces."

NEW FINDS PLEASE.

He is interested in choral music as well as orchestral, and in the union of the two. In Moscow he organized a choir of 250 voices to give choral works in conjunction with his symphony orchestra.

His chief interest undoubtedly is in the discovery of new music and making it known to the public. He introduced Debussy into Russia and twice invited the great Frenchman to Moscow and Petrograd to conduct his own works. Many of the Debussy works in Koussevitzky's library are annotated by Debussy's own hand.

Koussevitzky was the warm friend, the discoverer and patron of Scriabin and was the first to perform Scriabin's "Prometheus" poem.

As part of his work in the field of new music, Koussevitzky and his wife are the publishers of l'Edition Russe de Musique, which they began in Moscow in 1909 and now continue in Paris. The aim of this publishing business is to print the music of young Russians of talent, who otherwise might have difficulty in getting their works printed.

This publishing business has printed the works of Stravinsky, Serge Rachmaninoff, Scriabin, Prokofieff Gretchaninoff and the famous "Treaty of Orchestration" of Rimsky-Korsakoff.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

104

Tel. Chelsea

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
GLOBE

SEP 14 1924

Volcanic Temperament, But Kept Under Control

Koussevitsky, New Symphony Conductor, Producer of "Hysterical" Music

No figure coming to Boston in years has stirred the interest of the music-following folks such a lively fashion as Serge Koussevitzky, who arrived in America yesterday for his first visit and to take up his baton as conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fact that he is the first Russian to hold that place and the news that he is known as a most unconventional person in a profession of unconventionalists has aroused curiosity. Through the courtesy of the American Mercury, the Globe is able to give its readers a musical picture of him, written by one of the music critics in England.

It shows how highly this volatile conductor of "hysterical" music stands in some respected musical circles.

By ERNEST NEWMAN,
Music Critic of the London Times

Serge Koussevitzky was born in Tver (North Russia) in 1874. He received his first musical education at home. What the nature or the extent of it may have been I do not know, but at the mature age of 12 he became chef d'orchestre in the theatre of his natal town, a post which he held for two years.

His duties were to compose whatever music might be required for the plays put one at the theatre, and to conduct the entr'actes. At 14 he went to Moscow to continue his studies.

According to the regulations of the Conservatoire, the stipendiares of the orchestral class had to choose, for special study, one of the brass instruments or the double-bass. Koussevitzky chose the latter, becoming the pupil of the celebrated Rambaussc.

On the double-bass he soon developed an extraordinary facility: he not only became the double-bass soloist in the orchestra of the Imperial Opera at Moscow, but succeeded his teacher as professor of the instrument at the Conservatoire.

For 10 years he toured Russia and Western Europe as a contrabass virtuoso, and composed a number of works for the instrument—including a concerto—that are now part of the repertoire of every contrabassist.

Organized Famous Orchestra

His main ambition, however, was all along to be a conductor. In 1907 he formed, out of the pupils of the Berlin Hochschule fur Musik, an orchestra with which he worked for two years, studying chiefly the classics and Wagner.

He returned to Russia in 1909 and organized the Koussevitzky Orchestra that soon became so famous; it was made up of the best players from the other Russion orchestras. The men were engaged by the year, and were barred from giving their services to any other organization, or at any other concerts than those of Koussevitzky.

For the performers of the choral works given at his Moscow concerts he formed a mixed choir of 250 voices; in Petrograd he used for this purpose the celebrated Archangelsky Choir. The formal Moscow and Petrograd seasons ending at Easter, Koussevitzky, in the Spring, gave Beethoven festivals, Bach festivals, Tchaikovsky festivals, Rimsky-Korsakov festivals, etc., in the two capital towns.

In the Summer, for many years, he toured the provinces with his orchestra, soloists into villages that had not only never heard an orchestra before, but had not even seen certain of the instruments; his annual voyages down the Volga with this company of musicians were among the most romantic events of the musical life of our time.

In this way he introduced a number of classical and modern works to thousands who would otherwise never have heard a bar of them.

Broke Away From Routine

One of his objects throughout his career has been to break away from routine. In those great years between 1907 and the outbreak of the war he introduced a number of novelties, native and foreign, to the Russian public, including works by Debussy, Ravel, Fanelli, Florent. Schmitt, Paul Dukas, Roger Ducasse, Bruckner, Mahler, Bantock, Tanelev, Prokoviev and others.

He gave Russian audiences their first introduction to Strawinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" and Scriabine's Third and Fifth symphonies ("The Divine Poem" and "Prometheus"). He was the first to make a popular success of Scriabine's "Poem of Ecstasy," which till then had not been understood.

He gave the still unpublished "Apres la lecture d'un Psaume" of Tanelev (for soli, orchestra and chorus), which is as yet unknown in Europe; Rachmaninov's "The Bells"; several early works of Prokoviev; works of the Polish Karlovicz, Szymanovsky, etc.

During the early part of the war he still managed to carry on. Most of the members of his own orchestra had been called up for service; but he continued to give concerts at Moscow and Petrograd with other orchestras, performing such works as the Ninth symphony and the D major mass of Beethoven, the B minor mass of Bach, and so on.

After the revolution in 1917 he was appointed director of the Russian State orchestras. He remained in Russia until 1920, when he left his native country to settle in Western Europe.

Many Russian Novelties

In 1921 he founded those Paris concerts of his that are now so famous. During the four years from 1921 to 1924 he has given annually in Paris two seasons of four concerts each, at which he has introduced a large number of Russian and other novelties.

He soon became extremely popular in London, and has conducted in several other English and Scotch towns, in Barcelona, Madrid, Rome, Berlin, Warsaw, etc. At Barcelona he both conducted and staged a number of Russian operas — Rimsky-Korsakov's "Snow Maiden," Tschaikovski's "Pique-Dame," Moussorgski's "Boris Godounov" and Borodin's "Prince Igor." In Paris he has given "Boris Godounov" and "Khovantchina."

To this record of the external life of Koussevitzky it may be added that in 1909 he and his wife founded the publishing business of "L'Edition Russe de Musique," the object of which was partly to give the younger Russian composers of talent an opportunity that otherwise might not have come their way, partly to prevent the exploitation that people of this kind have sometimes to submit to at the hands of purely commercial publishing houses.

America will find Koussevitzky's musicianship and his orchestral technique equal to any demands that are likely to be made on them. The question is not as to his competence, but what will be thought of his readings.

Steadiest When at Boiling Point

Opinions will differ about him, as they do about every conductor. I can speak only of the impression he has made on myself after experience of him in music of all schools and all orders.

He has a volcanic temperament, but I have never yet known it to run away with him. I have often found myself disagreeing with him; but I have never disagreed with him on the score that he had lost control over his own fire.

On the contrary, it is precisely when his temperament is at boiling point that his hand on the regulator is steadiest and surest. When I have disagreed with him most acutely has been in moments when, I was pretty certain, the fire had, for purely physical reasons, gone out.

I particularly remember a performance of Brahms' Third Symphony in which he took the third movement at so slow a pace that its real character seemed to me to be completely perverted; the gentle, unassuming, half-sad, half-playful poco allegretto became a brooding andante—almost an adagio.

I am not in Koussevitsky's secrets. It is just possible that this is really how the third movement strikes him. But until I hear him play it again in the same way I shall prefer to believe the explanation to be simply that he was tired, and had no idea how slow the tempo really was.

He takes an enormous amount out of himself when he conducts, and the wonder to me always is how he manages to get through the quantity of work he does, and to keep his nerves so steady and his head so cool through it all.

Temperament Servant, Not Master

Richard Strauss once astonished the world by saying, apropos of "Tristan," "Believe me, the brain that could pour out that passionate music must have been as cold as ice." What seems like paradox in this, however, is no more than sober truth. The more an artist is on fire, the cooler have to be the head and hand that direct the fire.

Koussevitzky has this central ice in an extraordinary degree. I believe it would hardly be possible to raise some works to a higher pitch of nervous incandescence than he does; but the nervousness never gets out of hand. It is Koussevitzky's servant, not his master, the excitement is always under control; one great plastic line runs round and through the work.

American audiences will no doubt soon have an opportunity of testing the truth of this statement for themselves in such a work as Scriabine's "Poem of Ecstasy." Nervous excitement could hardly go further; yet there is never the least suggestion of nervous derangement. The music is hysterical, but not the performance. The distinction needs insisting on because it is too often forgotten when judging a conductor.

We do not blame a Salvini because he shows us Lear mad. Lear is mad. But to assume that, because the actor shows a mad Lear, he himself is mad, would be, as John Stuart Mill would say, to argue that because there is pepper in the soup there must be pepper in the cook.

Interpretive Hysteria

There are certain musical works that were born in a nervous excitement bordering on hysteria, and it is the conductor's business to reproduce for us the composer's mind when he wrote the work. But it is possible to handle an hysterical patient, or to make him the subject of a lecture on hysteria, without being hysterical yourself; indeed, the cooler you are the better your lecture will be, and the more your audience will understand of the true nature of hysteria. Koussevitsky keeps the "Poem of Ecstasy" in a perpetual seethe, but there is no chaos in it, rather a cosmic shapliness and ordilir ness.

Some of Koussevitzky's tempi may appear on the slow side as measured by the metronome, but one gets no feeling of dragging, because of the intellectual control that sees the end in the beginning, and plans everything perfectly to scale. His "Tristan" Prelude and Liebestod may serve as an example of this.

I do not wish, however, to convey the impression that it is only in music of the romantic or nervous order that he shines. His tastes are exceedingly catholic, and I have found his Haydn and his Boccherini as masterly as his Scriabine or Strawinsky.

In genuinely classic music, indeed, his plastic line is ever surer and firmer than in romantic. In the latter he seems inclined now and then to "dramatize" more than the music will quite stand.

In Strauss' "Don Juan," for instance, many people feel that he takes the Donna Anna section rather too slowly. The explanation seems to be that he mentally dramatizes the character. Instead of describing it from the outside, he lets it speak for itself. Donna Anna thus, as it were, states her own case, tells her own story—and takes her own time about it, as she would do on the stage.

As Beethoven Would See Himself

Had I the requisite space, I would like to argue again here a thesis I put forward a little while ago when discussing Weingartner's and Koussevitzky's London performances of the Ninth Symphony—that Koussevitzky's Beethoven is the genuine classic and Weingarner's the romantic.

The popular belief, of course, is to the contrary—that the sober, elderly German gentleman shown us in the ordinary German reading is the true Beethoven, while the volcanic spirit that Koussevitzky makes of him is only Koussevitzky himself. I believe this to be a fallacy.

Koussevitzky, by playing the Ninth Symphony as if it had been written yesterday by a powerful genius, whose muscles were twice the size of those of the ordinary man, gives us, I contend, a Beethoven in which Beethoven would recognize himself. However, my American friends will soon have plentiful opportunities of deciding this and other questions concerning Koussevitzky for themselves.

Tel. Chelsea 8860

...e became a creation."

KOUSSEVITZKY HERE

Serge Koussevitzky arrived in Boston Friday evening on his first trip to America, to prepare for the opening of the 44th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (Symphony hall, Oct. 10). He is the orchestra's first Russian leader.

Koussevitzky is of outstanding European fame as the conductor of the former Koussevitzky orchestra of Moscow, and during the last four seasons as guest conductor of annual series of concerts by the London Symphony Orchestra, of the annual double series of "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris, of concerts in other British and French cities and in Berlin, Rome, Warsaw, etc. He is also admired as the conductor of Russian operas at the Paris Opera and in Barcelona.

Mr. Koussevitzky's plans concerning the coming Boston Symphony Orchestra season include some first performances in America of a number of scores which he has introduced in Europe and which have occasioned much interest there. The music of these Mr. Koussevitzky has brought with him. Some of the scores have been published by the Russian firm which bears his name. The established symphonic repertory will duly predominate, however, on his program. Of the newer music to be heard three composers will be included, who will also appear as soloists in their own music. These will be Igor Stravinsky, Serge Prokofieff and Serge Rachmaninoff. The list of soloists, which will be added to later, also includes the following artists, each of whom is to be heard in a score of full symphonic importance: Margaret Matzenauer, Alfred Cortot, Albert Spalding and Guy Maier and Lee Pattison.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK CITY
Bronx Home News

SEP 14 1924

Jazz need not arouse the disapprobation of the trained musician just because it is popular, in the opinion of Serge Koussevitzky, famous Russian conductor, who has arrived in this country to take charge of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Jazz springs from life itself, Koussevitzky said, adding, however, that he did not intend to include any of it in the symphony programs.

Sept 17
Advertiser-Jour
...culation—Over 500,000 E...

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, first Russian leader of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM MILWAUKEE, WIS.
LEADER

SEP 14 1924

Russian to Direct Boston Orchestra

NEW YORK — One of Europe's greatest musical directors, Serge Koussevitzky, arrived Friday on the Aquitania to become conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, the first Russian to attain this honor. In the last four years he has appeared as guest conductor of the London Symphony orchestra, as well as in Madrid, Rome and Berlin.

BOSTON, MASS.
GLOBE

SEP 14 1924

Why Have Symphony Soloists?

The announcement from the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, printed in this department of the Globe last Sunday, said of the partial list of soloists for the coming season then made public:

"In choosing these assisting artists, the conductor is planning carefully to preserve the integrity of the programs. In this interest each artist will appear in a certain orchestral score of importance with a solo part to which his genius is particularly suited."

This means a reversion to the policy followed by Dr Muck of controlling the choice of numbers to be given by soloists, and of considering them merely as extra performers added to the orchestra for special purposes. Mr Monteux was more complaisant than Muck had been in allowing soloists to give pieces which did not fit well into the program in which they occurred.

One remembers a prima donna from the Metropolitan Opera singing "Vissi d'arte" from "Tosca" as one of her numbers, though no other work by Puccini has been heard at these concerts, because musically speaking none of his work is good enough to be heard there. One also recalls a celebrated harpist performing an astonishing opus of his own, mostly for solo harp, but with a few notes occasionally from wood wind and percussion, which illustrated the harpist's dexterity, but was, musically speaking, far inferior to the hackneyed show pieces for violin by Vieuxtemps and Wieniawski, which are not played at these concerts again because they are not good enough as pure music.

One is tempted to ask why there should be any soloists at all at Boston Symphony concerts. For some years there were none at the New York concerts of this orchestra. They were again employed only to aid the sale of seats.

Business Reasons

The original motive in announcing "celebrated soloists" at these concerts was no doubt to aid the seat sale by enticing people whose idea of music worth hearing begins and ends with the name and photograph of a noted solo performer into contracting to endure a season of orchestra concerts. The Friday afternoon concerts here now sell out automatically every Spring for the following season, largely for social reasons. The costly seats for Saturday nights do not sell as readily, though very few of them are vacant at any single concert, and none at ones where there is to be a distinguished soloist.

After 43 seasons of Boston Symphony concerts the local public ought to realize that the one thing worth paying to hear at orchestra concerts is the orchestra in standard symphonic repertory.

Most soloists are at a disadvantage when heard in one or two numbers in the middle of an orchestral program and with orchestral accompaniment. They are more at home in the center of the Symphony Hall stage when an accompanist and a piano are its only other occupants. They usually, particularly the mature vocalists, require a few numbers to warmup on before they are capable of their best work. They have a vicious habit of using the great 18th century classics to warm up on. What wonder that Mozart airs at the Symphony are almost always poorly sung! In a dozen years one recalls only Melba who has given Mozart his due there.

Piano and violin concertos of any real musical merit are scarce indeed. There are two great piano concertos by Beethoven, and one violin concerto. Brahms has given us the same number. There is the Schumann piano concerto and two by Chopin. Can one add to this list any others as good?

Of the modern work only the third of Rachmaninoff's piano concertos is of much merit. Pizetti, whose sonatos for violin and for cello have successfully used forms thought by most moderns to be obsolete, could no doubt give us a piano concerto and a violin concerto, but he has not done it.

Stravinsky's Concertino

Stravinsky is to play us next Winter his own concertino for piano and orchestra. What other modern has done anything to relieve the shortage of show pieces for soloists? Numerous moderns, on the other hand, have used the piano as an incidental member of the orchestra, but when these works are played by the Symphony the pianist does not have his name in the program in big letters as soloist, but is treated as one of the orchestra.

Excerpts from Wagner's music dramas, except the few orchestral arrangements made or sanctioned by Wagner, should not be given at the Symphony concerts if we had many chances of hearing them elsewhere, because they do not fit into the program well and cannot give one unfamiliar with the operas from which they come any clear conception of the composer's intentions. But in this usually Wagnerless city one must be thankful that such excerpts are offered. There can be no objection to the overtures and preludes to Wagner operas, though some of them, like that to "Rheingold," are obviously unsuited to concert performance.

Other operatic excerpts are equally indefensible from an extreme purist point of view, but where is Boston to hear Mozart and Gluck if not at the Symphony from vocal soloists? Weber, also, we never hear in the opera house any more.

The common sense of the matter seems to be that if Boston had its own opera of high grade there should be no vocal soloists with the Symphony and only the very few and occasional instrumentalists needed when it is desired to give a concerto which no member of the orchestra can adequately perform. This means piano concertos only, because there are a number of violinists in the Boston Symphony capable of violin concerto playing, and several cellist, if cello concertos were ever deemed necessities.

But in order to keep down the deficit by attracting some relatively nonmusical subscribers it is at present necessary to advertise and offer added attractions, circus fashion. Since we must have soloists, it is well for the conductor to regulate strictly who they are and what they are to do.

The only really justifiable soloist is the conductor or performer of his own composition, like Stravinsky and Prokofiev, the coming season.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
PUBLIC LEDGER

SEP 14 1924

By FULLERTON WALDO

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY will be seen and heard in action during the coming season in Philadelphia, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra resumes its visits under the auspices of the Philadelphia Forum. Last season he had a nephew in the Philadelphia Orchestra, Fabien Sevitzky, a double-bass player, who shortened his name that he might avoid the semblance of trading on the fame of his distinguished relative.

Serge Koussevitzky was born at Tver, a town at the head of navigation on the Volga between Petrograd and Moscow, in 1874. He led a theatre orchestra in his own city at the tender age of twelve, and continued in this capacity until he was fourteen. In addition to directing the players he had frequently to compose music for them to perform.

Then the boy went to Moscow and began to study the double-bass with Rambaussec at the Conservatory. In time he succeeded his teacher, having acquired such dexterity upon the strings of the "bull fiddle" that he was named soloist in the Imperial Opera Orchestra.

For ten years Koussevitzky toured Europe as a concert virtuoso. He won renown for his performances such as, perhaps, no artist of the unwieldly instrument had won since Dragonetti and Bottesini. The somewhat meager literature for the "bass viol" was enriched by a concerto and other productions of his pen.

BUT he was anxious to return to the platform as conductor, and therefore in 1907 he organized an orchestra in Berlin with which for two years he gave performances of Wagner and the classics. Returning to Russia two years later, he created the orchestra to which his own name was given. This famous band drafted into its service members of other Russian orchestras who bound themselves to play at no concerts save those of Koussevitsky. He formed an auxiliary chorus of 250 at Moscow, and in Petrograd utilized the Archangelsky choir when he required supplementary voices.

After Easter, when the symphony musical season at Petrograd and at Moscow was closed, the indefatigable leader gave festivals devoted to individual composers—Beethoven, Bach, Rimsky-Korsakow, Tschaikowsky and others. During the summer he took his musicians to villages where they seemed almost as strange as Martians, and he made an annual musical crusade down the Volga, giving orchestral concerts all the way.

Wherever he went he gave people a chance to hear new music and various schools. Thus, he championed Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy," and played not merely Prokofieff, Stravinsky and other Russians, but such "outlanders" as Bruckner, Mahler, Debussy, Dukas and Klorent Schmitt. In visits to England he gave precedence to unfamiliar modern scores; in Spain he led the operas of Moussorgsky, Borodin, Tschaikowsky and Rimsky-Korsakow. Furthermore, with the aid of his wife he built up the publishing concern known as "L'Edition Russe de Musique" to give their welcome chance to many young Russian composers who otherwise would have despaired of seeing their work in print.

Koussevitzky became director of Russian state orchestras in 1917, and remained in his own country until 1920. He then began his concerts in Paris, and he has lived in that city ever since.

ERNEST NEWMAN, the able English critic, writes of him in the American Mercury that he has always sought to get away from routine. Says this authority:

"America will find Koussevitzky's musicianship and his orchestral technique equal to any demands that are likely to be made on them. The question is not as to his competence, but what will be thought of his readings. Opinions will differ about him, as they do about every conductor. I can speak only of the impression he has made on myself after experience of him in music of all schools and all orders.

"He has a volcanic temperament, but I have never yet known it to run away with him. I have often found myself disagreeing with him, but I have never disagreed with him on the score that he had lost control over his own fire.

"On the contrary, it is precisely when his temperament is at boiling point that his hand on the regulator is steadiest and surest. When I have disagreed with him most acutely has been in moments when I was pretty certain the fire had, for purely physical reasons, gone out.

"Some of Koussevitzky's tempi may appear on the slow side as measured by the metronome, but one gets no feeling of dragging, because of the intellectual control that sees the end in the beginning and plans everything perfectly to scale."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
[illegible]
New Britain, [illegible]
SEP 1 1924

AN AMERICAN BEETHOVEN.

Serge Koussevitsky, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who will take over the baton released by Pierre Monteaux after five years of notable service, will look for an American Beethoven.

Very kind of him to have an ear attuned to the possibilities of the present; but he probably will not succeed in locating the Yankee Beethoven.

It would be like attempting to find an American Shakespeare.

There are plenty of Americans who can write fine music, but not music that will outlive Beethoven's. Indeed, modern music, be it written in America or Europe, has a habit of threatening to die after a term of years. But Beethoven has been with us a long time and seems to have "that something" in it that defies the dust on the shelves.

Some recompense is necessary to induce the pseudo American Beethovens to become active, too. It requires musical genius to write a worthy symphony—as much genius as is required to paint a masterpiece or sculptor a great statue in marble or bronze. Yet the painter and the sculptor are well paid for their work; the writer of a symphony is not well paid. He is expected to expend the fires of his genius for the love of it and expect no pay.

Koussevitzky can test it out himself. Should he discover that American Beethoven he seeks, and consent to performing his symphony, what will be the terms? It will be found that the American Beethoven is expected to be satisfied with the honor of having the Boston Symphony play his work. Unlike a playwright, he will not obtain a percentage of the box office receipts; he probably will not receive cash for the privilege of playing his work, or if so it will not be more than a few hundred dollars; and he will be expected to furnish the parts for all the 100 instruments forming the orchestra—and to have these copies printed will cost the Yankee Beethoven several hundred dollars.

These conditions are the same with other Symphony orchestras. There are no funds in America for decent payment of American Beethovens.

Of course, there are men who write for the large orchestras, or write music intended to be played by these organizations. But they usually are conductors of orchestras who make their living as conductors and try to write symphonies or symphonic compositions as an avocation. Henry Hadley, perhaps our foremost serious composer, is one of these; Richard Strauss, of Salome and the symphonic poems fame, does the same in Europe. Beethoven in his day, as was the case with Haydn, got a fat portion of the box office receipts of first performances.

One must not confuse the writing of symphonies with the writing of operas. A new successful opera may make money for its composer. Yet Wagner required the backing of a Bavarian king to attain a surcease of financial worry. Rossini became rich as an opera composer. Coming down to modern times, Debussy at least made both ends meet as one, and Massenet did even better.

There has been a great and popular symphony written in America—by a foreigner. Dvorak penned the "New World" symphony when he was employed to teach music as one of the faculty of a New York conservatory. The symphony was not written to make money, although it probably yielded money for its composer by dint of the large sales of copies, especially arrangements.

If a composer of a symphony can write works of such universal popularity among music lovers as to justify the printing and sale of various arrangements of his works, he can, if he obtains a favorable contract with his publishers, see some money coming to him for his effort. But a mere performance by some great orchestra is more likely to bring expense than revenue.

The most striking example of how American Beethovens are aided in America is indicated at the annual North Shore music festival at Evanston, Ill. A prize of $1,000 is offered for the best orchestral composition submitted. The prize-winner is selected from a list of four or five compositions played. To permit the orchestra to play them, the composers must provide the parts for the 90 or more instruments. He can write them out himself—taking about a month—or pay several hundreds of dollars to have it done. Then he has the satisfaction of hearing his brain child played—once—and one chance out of four of earning $1,000. The prize-winner is played once again, and twice during the season by the Chicago symphony. This is called encouraging the American composer. It is to be hoped he finds the crumbs of encouragement so generously thrown under the table.

There are other "contests" with prizes attached. The Pittsfield, Mass., music festival, now under way, is a notable example. Good [illegible] of it as

---

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PENN.
PRESS

SEP 14 1924

KOUSSEVITZKY TO CONDUCT BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Characteristics of New Director—Toti Dal Monte With Chicago Opera—New San Carlo Members—Edward Burlingame Hill's Book on Modern French Music.

By Burt McMurtrie.

STUDYING the prospects of the musical season during the next eight months in Pittsburgh, the attention is drawn to the innovations, the new faces and new names listed on the concert, operate and recital calendar. Foremost among those noticed is the name of Serge Koussevitzky, selected by Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, as conductor of that organization starting this fall.

Koussevitzky, a Russian, received his early training at home; that is, before he entered his teens, for at the age of 12 he was orchestra leader in his native town and for two years he composed whatever music was needed for the plays and conducted the orchestra between acts.

By this time he had attained size enough to play the double-bass without a step ladder, so off he went to Moscow to continue his studies at the conservatory where stipendiares of the orchestral class had to choose it or one of the brass instruments. It was but a short time before he developed extraordinary facility with the double-bass, became soloist in the Imperial Opera at Moscow, and succeeded his teacher, the celebrated Rambaussec, as professor at the conservatory. He toured Europe as a soloist and composed a number of works for that instrument, including a concerto, which are in the repertory of every contrabassist of ability.

His main ambition, however, was all along to be a conductor. In 1907 he formed, out of the pupils of the Berlin Hochschule fur Musik, an orchesttra with which he worked for two years studying chiefly the classics and Wagner. He returned to Russia in 1909, and organized the Koussevitzky orchestra that soon became so famous.

For the performance of the choral works given at his Moscow concerts he formed a mixed choir of 250 voices; in Petrograd he used for this purpose the celebrated Archangelsky choir. The formal Moscow and Petrograd seasons ending at Easter, Koussevitzky, in the spring, gave Beethoven festivals, Bach festivals, Tchaikovsky festivals, Rimsky-Korsakov festivals, etc., in the two capital towns.

ANNUAL VOYAGES DOWN THE VOLGA.

In the summer for years he toured the provinces with his orchestra. His annual voyages down the Volga with this company of musicians were among the most romantic events of the musical life of our time.

One of the objects of Koussevitzky has been breaking through routine. In the years between 1907 and the out break of the war, he introduced many novelties, native and foreign, to the Russian public, including Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" and Scriabine's third and fifth symphonies. He managed to carry on during the war, and after the 1917 revolution he was appointed director of the Russian state orchestras and remained as such until 1920, when he left his native land and in 1921 founded those Paris concerts of his that are now so famous.

In Paris, as elsewhere Koussevitzky was not bound by custom, and during the four years from 1921 to 1924 has given annually two seasons of four concerts each, at which he has introduced an enormous number of new works and re-discovered or rearranged classics. He has also been very popular in London and in the big cities of continental Europe and in Barcelona staged and conducted a number of Russian operas.

[illegible] SOPRANO

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

SEP 14 1924

Russian Conductor Won't Shock Boston With Jazz Numbers

BOSTON, Sept. 13.—To present new music and to give new interpretations to old music is the aim of Serge Koussevitsky, new Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

But he emphatically denies he will "shock cultured Bostonians" by inclusion of "jazz" in his programs. Koussevitzky, just arrived here, and is under a one-year contract to lead the Boston Symphony.

He is 50 years old, an expert double-bass soloist and formerly was with the Moscow Impeiral Opera. He left Russia following the political upheaval there and gained recognition in Paris for his concerts of modern music.

He describes "jazz" as "interesting."

"It has been a great influence on the young composers," he points out. "Therefore it is important. But I don't think it will ndure—it is like a fashion.

"Jazz will soon be discarded," he added, "but while it lasts it is of importance because of its influence on modern composers."

The new conductor, while declining to reveal the nature of the program he plans for the winter season—which begins Oct. 10—did admit Scriabine's "Poem de Extase" would be given the opening night here.

BOSTON, MASS.
GLOBE

SEP 14 1924

Why Have Symphony Soloists?

The announcement from the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, printed in this department of the Globe last Sunday, said of the partial list of soloists for the coming season then made public:

"In choosing these assisting artists, the conductor is planning carefully to preserve the integrity of the programs. In this interest each artist will appear in a certain orchestral score of importance with a solo part to which his genius is particularly suited."

This means a reversion to the policy followed by Dr Muck of controlling the choice of numbers to be given by soloists, and of considering them merely as extra performers added to the orchestra for special purposes. Mr Monteux was more complaisant than Muck nad been in allowing soloists to give pieces which did not fit well into the program in which they occurred.

One remembers a prima donna from the Metropolitan Opera singing "Vissi d'arte" from "Tosca" as one of her numbers, though no other work by Puccini has been heard at these concerts, because musically speaking none of his work is good enough to be heard there. One also recalls a celebrated harpist performing an astonishing opus of his own, mostly for solo harp, but with a few notes occasionally from wood wind and percussion, which illustrated the harpist's dexterity, but was, musically speaking, far inferior to the hackneyed show pieces for violin by Vieuxtemps and Wieniawski, which are not played at these concerts again because they are not good enough as pure music.

One is tempted to ask why there should be any soloists at all at Boston Symphony concerts. For some years there were none at the New York concerts of this orchestra. They were again employed only to aid the sale of seats.

Business Reasons

The original motive in announcing "celebrated soloists" at these concerts was no doubt to aid the seat sale by enticing people whose idea of music worth hearing begins and ends with the name and photograph of a noted solo performer into contracting to endure a season of orchestra concerts. The Friday afternoon concerts here now sell out automatically every Spring for the following season, largely for social reasons. The costly seats for Saturday nights do not sell as readily, though very few of them are vacant at any single concert, and none at ones where there is to be a distinguished soloist.

After 43 seasons of Boston Symphony concerts the local public ought to realize that the one thing worth paying to hear at orchestra concerts is the orchestra in standard symphonic repertory.

Most soloists are at a disadvantage when heard in one or two numbers in the middle of an orchestral program and with orchestral accompaniment. They are more at home in the center of the Symphony Hall stage when an accompanist and a piano are its only other occupants. They usually, particularly the mature vocalists, require a few numbers to warmup on before they are capable of their best work. They have a vicious habit of using the great 18th century classics to warm up on. What wonder that Mozart airs at the Symphony are almost always poorly sung! In a dozen years one recalls only Melba who has given Mozart his due there.

Piano and violin concertos of any real musical merit are scarce indeed. There are two great piano concertos by Beethoven, and one violin concerto. Brahms has given us the same number. There is the Schumann piano concerto and two by Chopin. Can one add to this list any others as good?

Of the modern work only the third of Rachmaninoff's piano concertos is of much merit. Pizetti, whose sonatos for violin and for cello have successfully used forms thought by most moderns to be obsolete, could no doubt give us a piano concerto and a violin concerto, but he has not done it.

Stravinsky's Concertino

Stravinsky is to play us next Winter his own concertino for piano and orchestra. What other modern has done anything to relieve the shortage of show pieces for soloists? Numerous moderns, on the other hand, have used the piano as an incidental member of the orchestra, but when these works are played by the Symphony the pianist does not have his name in the program in big letters as soloist, but is treated as one of the orchestra.

Excerpts from Wagner's music dramas, except the few orchestral arrangements made or sanctioned by Wagner, should not be given at the Symphony concerts if we had many chances of hearing them elsewhere, because they do not fit into the program well and cannot give one unfamiliar with the operas from which they come any clear conception of the composer's intentions. But in this usually Wagnerless city one must be thankful that such excerpts are offered. There can be no objection to the overtures and preludes to Wagner operas, though some of them, like that to "Rheingold," are obviously unsuited to concert performance.

Other operatic excerpts are equally indefensible from an extreme purist point of view, but where is Boston to hear Mozart and Gluck if not at the Symphony from vocal soloists? Weber, also, we never hear in the opera house any more.

The common sense of the matter seems to be that if Boston had its own opera of high grade there should be no vocal soloists with the Symphony and only the very few and occasional instrumentalists needed when it is desired to give a concerto which no member of the orchestra can adequately perform. This means piano concertos only, because there are a number of violinists in the Boston Symphony capable of violin concerto playing, and several cellist, if cello concertos were ever deemed necessities.

But in order to keep down the deficit by attracting some relatively nonmusical subscribers it is at present necessary to advertise and offer added attractions, circus fashion. Since we must have soloists, it is well for the conductor to regulate strictly who they are and what they are to do.

The only really justifiable soloist is the conductor or performer of his own composition, like Stravinsky and Prokofiev, the coming season.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
PUBLIC LEDGER

SEP 14 1924

By FULLERTON WALDO

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY will be seen and heard in action during the coming season in Philadelphia, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra resumes its visits under the auspices of the Philadelphia Forum. Last season he had a nephew in the Philadelphia Orchestra, Fabien Sevitzky, a double-bass player, who shortened his name that he might avoid the semblance of trading on the fame of his distinguished relative.

Serge Koussevitzky was born at Tver, a town at the head of navigation on the Volga between Petrograd and Moscow, in 1874. He led a theatre orchestra in his own city at the tender age of twelve, and continued in this capacity until he was fourteen. In addition to directing the players he had frequently to compose music for them to perform.

Then the boy went to Moscow and began to study the double-bass with Rambaussec at the Conservatory. In time he succeeded his teacher, having acquired such dexterity upon the strings of the "bull fiddle" that he was named soloist in the Imperial Opera Orchestra.

For ten years Koussevitzky toured Europe as a concert virtuoso. He won renown for his performances such as, perhaps, no artist of the unwieldly instrument had won since Dragonetti and Bottesini. The somewhat meager literature for the "bass viol" was enriched by a concerto and other productions of his pen.

BUT he was anxious to return to the platform as conductor, and therefore in 1907 he organized an orchestra in Berlin with which for two years he gave performances of Wagner and the classics. Returning to Russia two years later, he created the orchestra to which his own name was given. This famous band drafted into its service members of other Russian orchestras who bound themselves to play at no concerts save those of Koussevitsky. He formed an auxiliary chorus of 250 at Moscow, and in Petrograd utilized the Archangelsky choir when he required supplementary voices.

After Easter, when the symphony musical season at Petrograd and at Moscow was closed, the indefatigable leader gave festivals devoted to individual composers—Beethoven, Bach, Rimsky-Korsakow, Tschaikowsky and others. During the summer he took his musicians to villages where they seemed almost as strange as Martians, and he made an annual musical crusade down the Volga, giving orchestral concerts all the way.

Wherever he went he gave people a chance to hear new music and various schools. Thus, he championed Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy," and played not merely Prokofieff, Stravinsky and other Russians, but such "outlanders" as Bruckner, Mahler, Debussy, Dukas and Klorent Schmitt. In visits to England he gave precedence to unfamiliar modern scores; in Spain he led the operas of Moussorgsky, Borodin, Tschaikowsky and Rimsky-Korsakow. Furthermore, with the aid of his wife he built up the publishing concern known as "L'Edition Russe de Musique" to give their welcome chance to many young Russian composers who otherwise would have despaired of seeing their work in print.

Koussevitzky became director of Russian state orchestras in 1917, and remained in his own country until 1920. He then began his concerts in Paris, and he has lived in that city ever since.

ERNEST NEWMAN, the able English critic, writes of him in the American Mercury that he has always sought to get away from routine. Says this authority:

"America will find Koussevitzky's musicianship and his orchestral technique equal to any demands that are likely to be made on them. The question is not as to his competence, but what will be thought of his readings. Opinions will differ about him, as they do about every conductor. I can speak only of the impression he has made on myself after experience of him in music of all schools and all orders.

"He has a volcanic temperament, but I have never yet known it to run away with him. I have often found myself disagreeing with him, but I have never disagreed with him on the score that he had lost control over his own fire.

"On the contrary, it is precisely when his temperament is at boiling point that his hand on the regulator is steadiest and surest. When I have disagreed with him most acutely has been in moments when I was pretty certain the fire had, for purely physical reasons, gone out.

"Some of Koussevitzky's tempi may appear on the slow side as measured by the metronome, but one gets no feeling of dragging, because of the intellectual control that sees the end in the beginning and plans everything perfectly to scale."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Herald
New Britain, Conn.
SEP 14 192

AN AMERICAN BEETHOVEN.

Serge Koussevitsky, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who will take over the baton released by Pierre Monteaux after five years of notable service, will look for an American Beethoven.

Very kind of him to have an ear attuned to the possibilities of the present; but he probably will not succeed in locating the Yankee Beethoven.

It would be like attempting to find an American Shakespeare.

There are plenty of Americans who can write fine music, but not music that will outlive Beethoven's. Indeed, modern music, be it written in America or Europe, has a habit of threatening to die after a term of years. But Beethoven has been with us a long time and seems to have "that something" in it that defies the dust on the shelves.

Some recompense is necessary to induce the pseudo American Beethovens to become active, too. It requires musical genius to write a worthy symphony—as much genius as is required to paint a masterpiece or sculptor a great statue in marble or bronze. Yet the painter and the sculptor are well paid for their work; the writer of a symphony is not well paid. He is expected to expend the fires of his genius for the love of it and expect no pay.

Koussevitzky can test it out himself. Should he discover that American Beethoven he seeks, and consent to performing his symphony, what will be the terms? It will be found that the American Beethoven is expected to be satisfied with the honor of having the Boston Symphony play his work. Unlike a playwright, he will not obtain a percentage of the box office receipts; he probably will not receive cash for the privilege of playing his work, or if so it will not be more than a few hundred dollars; and he will be expected to furnish the parts for all the 100 instruments forming the orchestra—and to have these copies printed will cost the Yankee Beethoven several hundred dollars.

These conditions are the same with other Symphony orchestras. There are no funds in America for decent payment of American Beethovens.

Of course, there are men who write for the large orchestras, or write music intended to be played by these organizations. But they usually are conductors of orchestras who make their living as conductors and try to write symphonies or symphonic compositions as an avocation. Henry Hadley, perhaps our foremost serious composer, is one of these; Richard Strauss, of Salome and the symphonic poems fame, does the same in Europe. Beethoven in his day, as was the case with Haydn, got a fat portion of the box office receipts of first performances.

One must not confuse the writing of symphonies with the writing of operas. A new successful opera may make money for its composer. Yet Wagner required the backing of a Bavarian king to attain a surcease of financial worry. Rossini became rich as an opera composer. Coming down to modern times, Debussy at least made both ends meet as one, and Massenet did even better.

There has been a great and popular symphony written in America—by a foreigner. Dvorak penned the "New World" symphony when he was employed to teach music as one of the faculty of a New York conservatory. The symphony was not written to make money, although it probably yielded money for its composer by dint of the large sales of copies, especially arrangements.

If a composer of a symphony can write works of such universal popularity among music lovers as to justify the printing and sale of various arrangements of his works, he can, if he obtains a favorable contract with his publishers, see some money coming to him for his effort. But a mere performance by some great orchestra is more likely to bring expense than revenue.

The most striking example of how American Beethovens are aided in America is indicated at the annual North Shore music festival at Evanston, Ill. A prize of $1,000 is offered for the best orchestral composition submitted. The prize-winner is selected from a list of four or five compositions played. To permit the orchestra to play them, the composers must provide the parts for the 90 or more instruments. He can write them out himself—taking about a month—or pay several hundreds of dollars to have it done. Then he has the satisfaction of hearing his brain child played—once—and one chance out of four of earning $1,000. The prize-winner is played once again, and twice during the season by the Chicago symphony. This is called encouraging the American composer. It is to be hoped he finds the crumbs of encouragement so generously thrown under the table.

There are other "contests" with prizes attached. The Pittsfield, Mass., music festival, now under way, is a notable example. Good

105

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PENN.
PRESS

SEP 14 1924

KOUSSEVITZKY TO CONDUCT BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Characteristics of New Director—Toti Dal Monte With Chicago Opera—New San Carlo Members—Edward Burlingame Hill's Book on Modern French Music.

By Burt McMurtrie.

STUDYING the prospects of the musical season during the next eight months in Pittsburgh, the attention is drawn to the innovations, the new faces and new names listed on the concert, operate and recital calendar. Foremost among those noticed is the name of Serge Koussevitzky, selected by Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra, as conductor of that organization starting this fall.

Koussevitzky, a Russian, received his early training at home; that is, before he entered his teens, for at the age of 12 he was orchestra leader in his native town and for two years he composed whatever music was needed for the plays and conducted the orchestra between acts.

By this time he had attained size enough to play the double-bass without a step ladder, so off he went to Moscow to continue his studies at the conservatory where stipendiares of the orchestral class had to choose it or one of the brass instruments. It was but a short time before he developed extraordinary facility with the double-bass, became soloist in the Imperial Opera at Moscow, and succeeded his teacher, the celebrated Rambaussec, as professor at the conservatory. He toured Europe as a soloist and composed a number of works for that instrument, including a concerto, which are in the repertory of every contrabassist of ability.

His main ambition, however, was all along to be a conductor. In 1907 he formed, out of the pupils of the Berlin Hochschule fur Musik, an orchesttra with which he worked for two years studying chiefly the classics and Wagner. He returned to Russia in 1909, and organized the Koussevitzky orchestra that soon became so famous.

For the performance of the choral works given at his Moscow concerts he formed a mixed choir of 250 voices; in Petrograd he used for this purpose the celebrated Archangelsky choir. The formal Moscow and Petrograd seasons ending at Easter, Koussevitzky, in the spring, gave Beethoven festivals, Bach festivals, Tchaikovsky festivals, Rimsky-Korsakov festivals, etc., in the two capital towns.

ANNUAL VOYAGES DOWN THE VOLGA.

In the summer for years he toured the provinces with his orchestra. His annual voyages down the Volga with this company of musicians were among the most romantic events of the musical life of our time.

One of the objects of Koussevitzky has been breaking through routine. In the years between 1907 and the out break of the war, he introduced many novelties, native and foreign, to the Russian public, including Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du Printemps" and Scriabine's third and fifth symphonies. He managed to carry on during the war, and after the 1917 revolution he was appointed director of the Russian state orchestras and remained as such until 1920, when he left his native land and in 1921 founded those Paris concerts of his that are now so famous.

In Paris, as elsewhere Koussevitzky was not bound by custom, and during the four years from 1921 to 1924 has given annually two seasons of four concerts each, at which he has introduced an enormous number of new works and re-discovered or rearranged classics. He has also been very popular in London and in the big cities of continental Europe and in Barcelona staged and conducted a number of Russian operas.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN

SEP 14 1924

Russian Conductor Won't Shock Boston With Jazz Numbers

BOSTON, Sept. 13.—To present new music and to give new interpretations to old music is the aim of Serg Koussevitsky, new Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

But he emphatically denies he will "shock cultured Bostonians" by inclusion of "jazz" in his programs. Koussevitzky, just arrived here, and is under a one-year contract to lead the Boston Symphony.

He is 50 years old, an expert double-bass soloist and formerly was with the Moscow Impeiral Opera. He left Russia following the political upheaval there and gained recognition in Paris for his concerts of modern music.

He describes "jazz" as "interesting."

"It has been a great influence on the young composers," he points out. "Therefore it is important. But I don't think it will ndure—it is like a fashion.

"Jazz will soon be discarded," he added, "but while it lasts it is of importance because of its influence on modern composers."

The new conductor, while declining to reveal the nature of the program he plans for the winter season—which begins Oct. 10—did admit Scriabine's "Poem de Extase" would be given the opening night here.

REDUCTION

RATIO

17x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

A3

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

INFORMATION OBSCURED

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. LOUIS, MO.
GLOBE-DEMOCRAT
SEP 14 1924

BOSTON'S NEW SYMPHONY HEAD

Serge Koussevitzky, Hailed as Greatest of Orchestra Conductors, Is Bringing America Music Never Heard Before—Says Jazz Is Good.

Copyright, 1924, in U. S. and Canada by North American Newspaper Alliance. All rights reserved.

The supreme leading artist in America of Serge Koussevitzky, famous Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has been hailed by many as the greatest living conductor, and by others as the greatest conductor of symphonic music in America. Exponent of the modern school of music, he has aroused storms of protest—and wild enthusiasm—by his interpretations of the works of Debussy, Ravel, Florent Schmitt and other modern composers. He is also an enthusiastic jazz fan and an American artist usually created only by opera stars.

BY ALLEN RAYMOND
Paris Correspondent of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat and Serge Koussevitzky, Like Other Artists, Is an Egotist, but His Is not a Blatant Egotism. It is the self-confidence and pride of a man who has devoted himself to his ability and who is enthusiastic over the place of music in the great scheme of things.

Music is the most important thing in the world, he says, and must count for more in modern society at large.

As a small boy, he says, the orchestras he heard in Russia and North America impressed him. Yet, he was born, reared and began his career in the center of musical excitement, and though he experimented with various musical instruments when a boy he always intended to be a conductor. It was his work.

When he was 13 he entered the conservatories of the Moscow Philharmonic Society as a student of composition and orchestral conducting. In order to qualify for a scholarship he studied the double bass and became such a master of that cumbersome instrument that upon the termination of his study he obtained the post of double bass soloist in the Imperial Opera at the Moscow Imperial Theatres. For several years thereafter he appeared in the principal cities of Russia as a double bass virtuoso.

Established Own Orchestra.

His career not in sight of his real aim, he conducted a great orchestra. In 1909, after an intensive study of the most important works of classic and modern in an orchestra in front of him in Berlin from students of the Berlin High School of Music, he returned to Russia and established his own symphony orchestra in Moscow. This body of musicians quickly became famous all over Russia, and that its appearance in Petrograd was always one of the great events of the concert season. It was with this group of players that Koussevitzky toured the Volga.

Then came the war. The first revolution, that of 1917, did not disturb him. He was appointed general conductor of the Russian State Orchestra by the provisional government established by Kerensky. This orchestra formerly was the court orchestra.

Then came the Bolshevik uprisings.

"I am not a politician," says the composer and conductor, speaking of it. "I am not an economist."

Then he pauses. He does not launch into diatribes against the new regime which explode from most of the Russian colony in Paris. He sits and broods.

"Life in Russia is impossible," he concludes. "There is no chance for artistic endeavor. I tried. I gave concerts in rooms that were freezing. The brass players wore their overcoats. You can't do it. It's impossible. Everything has gone to pieces."

There was a story floating about Paris that Koussevitzky, his compatriot, the basso, Chaliapin, had quarrelled over Boris Chaliapin managed to get jobs with the Soviet chiefs. Koussevitzky left the country rather than in every artistic endeavor. It is what he felt were impossible conditions. Koussevitzky denies the quarrel.

"Chaliapin is a great artist and a great Russian," he says. When he and the basso met between the Place de l'Opera, just in front of the Café de la Paix for the first time since 1920, the two men put their arms around each other's necks. Shortly thereafter Koussevitzky led the orchestra in the opera when Chaliapin appeared, and led in each of the basso's appearances thereafter.

The union of the two popular favorites in one performance almost caused a riot. The prices were quadrupled, and still the mob stormed the door trying to get in.

I doubt if Koussevitzky ever quarreled with anyone on Bolshevism, or anything else aside from music. Therein lies all his interest and all his capability of getting excited.

New Finds Chief Interest.

He is interested in choral music as well as orchestral, and in the union of the two. In Moscow he organized a choir of 250 voices to give choral works in conjunction with his symphony orchestra.

His chief interest undoubtedly is in the discovery of new music and making it known to the public. He introduced Debussy into Russia and twice invited the great Frenchman to Moscow and Petrograd to conduct his own works. Many of the Debussy works in Koussevitzky's library are annotated by Debussy's own hand.

Koussevitzky was the warm friend, the discover, and patron of Scriabin. The composer always considered Koussevitzky the best interpreter of his works. Koussevitzky was the first to perform Scriabin's "Prometheus" poem.

As part of his work in the field of new music, Koussevitzky and his wife are the publishers of l'Edition Russe de Musique, which they began in Moscow in 1909 and now continue in Paris. The aim of this publishing business is to print the music of young Russians of talent, who otherwise might have difficulty in getting their works printed. The recommendation of Koussevitzky is sufficient to make a sale for it, once published in France.

This publishing business has printed the works of Stravinsky, Serge Rachmaninoff, Scriabin, Prokofieff, Gretchaninoff and the famous "Treaty of Orchestration" of Rimsky-Korsakoff.

Koussevitzky gave me a list of the music which he was the first to perform in Paris and which he will bring to America. Very little of it has been heard in the United States, but some of it has been heard in London, where Koussevitzky has acted as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra in Manchester and Liverpool, where he has conducted the Philharmonic Society, and in Edinburgh and Glasgow, where he conducted the Scottish Symphony Orchestra. He is taking all these scores to Boston, and probably must, if not all, will be played there. But Koussevitzky says he will not force any particular kind of music down the throats of his listeners. He will experiment to find what his audiences like.

His First Performances.

The Koussevitzky first performances included:

Debussy — Sirènes, scored by Ravel; Danse, scored by Ravel.

Roland-Manuel—Isabelle et Pantalon, overture; three movements of Scarlatti.

Florent Schmitt—Reves; Mirages; suite for orchestra.

Darius Milhaud—Second Suite of Prometheus.

Arthur Honegger—The Victorious Horace; Chant de Joie; "Pacific 231."

Maurice Ravel—Paintings from the Picture Show, by Moussorgsky, scored by Ravel; Alborada del Gracioso.

Alberic Magnard—Fourth Symphony.

Arnold Bax—The Garden of Fand.

W. Reed—The Will o' the Wisp.

Holbrooke—Brenwen Overture.

Fr. Maipiero—Pause del Silenzio; Impressioni dal Vero, third suite.

O. Respighi—Antiche Danze ed Arie; Concerto Gregoriano for violin and orchestra.

A. Tansman—Scherzo Symphonique; Lecarde.

M. Ivelage—Overture for the Ballet, de l'Avenir; Three poems for voice and orchestra.

A. Roussel—Symphony, Op. 23.

A. Gretchaninoff—A liturgy for St. John Chrysostom.

Moussorg-sky—Two scenes, with soloists and chorus, from the opera "Khovanchina."

Borodine—Two acts from the opera "Prince Igor," with chorus and soloists.

Moussorgsky—The defeat of Sennacherib, cantata for chorus and orchestra.

Kastalsky—Fraternal commemoration.

Lisdoff-Kiklimora, from "The Apocalypsis."

Rachmaninoff—"The Island of Death," third concerto for piano and orchestra.

Rimsky-Korsakoff—"The Battle of Kejeniez," "The Flight from the Bumblebee," suite from the opera "Tzar Sultan."

Prokoffeff—Symphonie Classique; Second Concerto for piano and orchestra; third Concerto for piano and orchestra; First Concerto for violin and Orchestra; Suite Scythe; suite from the opera "Love of Three Oranges; Sept! Ils Sont Sept!"

Scriabin—"Poem de l'Extase," "Poem of Fire" (Prometheus).

Stravinsky—Octuor for wind Instruments; "Wind Instruments Symphos" (given in London); concerto for piano and wind instruments; "Chant du Rossignol" (symphonic poem).

Vivaldi—Concerto, scored by A. Sliotl.

Ricci—Symphony in C major.

Boccherin—Symphony in O.

Locatelli—Concerto for strings.

Polaci—Symphony in C minor.

Locatelli—A funeral symphony.

Torelli—Concerto for orchestra, No. 3.

Brahms—"Schicksalslied," with chorus.

Hugo Wolf—"Der Feuerreiter," with chorus.

Manuel de Falla—"El Amor Brujo."

Lily Boulanger—Poems Hindouhique."

Why Have Symphony Soloists?

Business Reasons

KOUSSEVITZKY, SOON TO COME TO AMERICA, OUTLINES PLANS

New Leader Of Boston Symphony Orchestra Hopes To Find Here Genius Rivaling That Of Beethoven.

Paris.

"WHAT I hope to do in America is to show the public that masterpieces of music are being written today as powerful, stirring and beautiful as the greatest of the past," says Serge Koussevitzky, noted conductor who will soon be the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season.

In Paris, home, today a man engaged in composing for concerts, Serge Koussevitzky is noted in Paris for his approaching crusade across the Atlantic.

"I am going to play music never heard before," he said. "music which now exists only in manuscripts which I have in my keeping music written by men now living who will rank as high a century from now as Mozart and Beethoven. I have given some of their music in Paris. You have seen how it has been received. Some of it shall be America's first."

I HAVE seen how Koussevitzky's music has been received in Paris. Music lovers in the French capital have gone mad over the Russian leader, literally frenzied in their idolatry.

America may be sure that Koussevitzky will present its musical public with auditions of the oldest classics, without a trace of modernity in his reading of them. America also may be sure that this man will be engaged during his entire stay in America on a passionate hunt for musical genius, resplendent or native, in the New World.

"Jazz music?" He was answering a query. "I like all good music. And several Americans have written jazz which is good. Besides writing in some nation seems to have a talent for playing it.

"I was in London recently and dropped in late at night for something to eat at a supper club where dancing was going on. There was an orchestra of American boys there. The oldest could not have been more than 20. I had a table near them where I could hear them and watch them individually.

"Some of those boys were improvising as they went along, and they were great players. I let my supper get cold listening to them. I stayed until a shockingly late hour, against the new regime which explode from most of the Russian colony in Paris. He sits and broods.

"Life in Russia is impossible," he concludes. "There is no chance for artistic endeavor. I tried. I gave concerts in rooms that were freezing. The brass players wore their overcoats. You can't do it. It's impossible. Everything has gone to pieces."

HE is interested in choral music as well as orchestral and in the union of the two. In Moscow he organized a choir of 250 voices to give choral works in conjunction with his symphony orchestra.

As part of his work in the field of new music, Koussevitzky and his wife are the publishers of l'Edition Russe de Musique, which they began in Moscow in 1909 and now continue in Paris. The aim of this publishing business is to print the music of young Russians of talent who otherwise might have difficulty in getting their works published. The recommendation of Koussevitzky is sufficient to make a sale for it.

(Copyright, 1924.)

KOUSSEVITZKY'S family were mercantile, middle-class folk who were fond of music. When a boy he always intended to direct an orchestra as his life work.

At 14 he entered the Conservatoire of the Moscow Philharmonic Society as a student of composition and orchestral conducting. In order to qualify for a scholarship, he studied the double bass and became such a master of that resounding instrument that upon the termination of his study he obtained the post of double bass soloist at the Moscow Imperial Opera. For several years thereafter he appeared in the principal cities of Russia as a double bass virtuoso.

Then came the Bolshevik uprising.

"I am not a politician," says the composer and conductor, speaking of it. "I am not an economist."

Then he pauses. He does not launch into diatribes against the new regime which explode from most of the Russian colony in Paris. He sits and broods.

"Life in Russia is impossible," he concludes. "There is no chance for artistic endeavor. I tried. I gave concerts in rooms that were freezing. The brass players wore their overcoats. You can't do it. It's impossible. Everything has gone to pieces."

HE is interested in choral music as well as orchestral and in the union of the two. In Moscow he organized a choir of 250 voices to give choral works in conjunction with his symphony orchestra.

As part of his work in the field of new music, Koussevitzky and his wife are the publishers of l'Edition Russe de Musique, which they began in Moscow in 1909 and now continue in Paris. The aim of this publishing business is to print the music of young Russians of talent who otherwise might have difficulty in getting their works published. The recommendation of Koussevitzky is sufficient to make a sale for it.

(Copyright, 1924.)

"An apple every day
May keep the doc away," said Hugh.
"But if the apple's green,
It's sure to bring him P. D. Q."
—Cincinnati Enquirer.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

INFORMATION OBSCURED

P 106

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. LOUIS, MO.
GLOBE-DEMOCRAT
SEP 14 1924

BOSTON'S NEW SYMPHONY HEAD

Serge Koussevitzky, Hailed as Greatest of Orchestra Conductors, Is Bringing America Music Never Heard Before—Says Jazz Is Good.

Copyright, 1924, in U. S. and Canada by North American Newspaper Alliance. All rights reserved.

The approaching arrival in America of Serge Koussevitzky to become conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, turns not only to the man himself, but to what he, as a seeker after new talent, may search here to find in America. Exponent of both the classic and the modern, he first to look for talent—or better—and with no bias against jazz. He is of the enthusiastic sort usualy created only by opera stars.

BY ALLEN RAYMOND
Paris Correspondent of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat and the North American Newspaper Alliance.

PARIS.—"What I hope to do in America is to show the public that masterpieces of music are being written today as powerful, stirring and beautiful as the greatest of the past," says Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor who will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra this coming season.

In the twilight shadow of his Paris home, looking down through the trees upon the peaceful Seine, he outlined for readers of the GLOBE-DEMOCRAT his plans and hopes for his approaching career across the Atlantic.

"I will present in Boston music never heard before," he said, "music which now exists only in manuscripts which I have in my keeping, music written by men now living who will rank as high a century from now as Mozart and Beethoven. I have given some of their music to Paris. You have seen how it has been received. Some of it shall be America's first."

I have seen how Koussevitzky's music has been received in Paris. Music lovers in the French capital have gone mad over the [illegible] leader, literally frenzied in their idolatry.

But it is not alone for his introduction of new composers that they storm the doors of the Theater Na[illegible]Opera for all his con[illegible]ate the conveniences of this age of other days—not so easy to appreciate the glories of mansions and castles of jobs.

It seems to be easy to dream of Tutankhamen's tomb has revealed evidence that 3500 years ago there were workmen who bungled their middle ages was no curiosity—but it may be that it was done when the workers were not in good voice. civilization. Poor work in the ers' hearts—of the glories of the old lies erected in the joy of the workwho sang at their jobs—of the beauwritten about the blithe artisans tacy. A good deal of guff has been lection ascribed to it by popular builders was not always the perfect—certainly the workmanship of the masculine contingent, is said to have been in the London music halls with Charlie Chaplin before that master of the shuffle foot and trick mustache ever thought of coming to the United States. The Chaplin-Harcourt act was known as "A Night in an English Music Hall" and was a real hit after the London 'alls' audiences once got the hang of it.

In the "Red Hot" company are other singers and dancers and the usual chorus of twenty-four coryphees.

Cottage Outclasses Castle.

Merle Thorpe in the Nation's Business.

Large corporations have done notableswork in providing houses for their employes, with detached cottages having "all modern conveniences" a frequent feature, says a report of the National Civic Federation of New York. Progressive federation believes, is a noticeable characteristic of the times in the United States. And so it is.

The cottage of today outdoses the mansion and the castle of an earlier time in facilities for living and doing. Not many years ago, only a few houses had the conveniences of electricity for light and power, gas for cooking and heating, and the facility of telephone communication. Like as not, many of the stately old buildings were what the fiction writers made them. In reality they were probably crude and uncomfortable shelters for their tenants.

(Certainly the workmanship of the builders was not always the perfection ascribed to it by popular fancy. A good deal of guff has been written about the blithe artisans who sang at their jobs—of the beauties erected in the joy of the workers' hearts—of the glories of the old civilization. Poor work in the middle ages was no curiosity—but it may be that it was done when the workers were not in good voice. Tutankhamen's tomb has revealed evidence that 3500 years ago there were workmen who bungled their jobs.

It seems to be easy to dream of the glories of mansions and castles of other days—not so easy to appreciate the conveniences of this age been received. Some of it shall be America's first."

I have seen how Koussevitzky's music has been received in Paris. Music lovers in the French capital have gone mad over the [illegible] leader, literally frenzied in their idolatry.

But it is not alone for his introduction of new composers that they storm the doors of the Theater Na- [illegible] Opera for all his con-

[illegible] plete the conveniences of [illegible] other days—not so easy to appre- [illegible] the glories of mansions and castles [illegible] It seems to be easy to dream of [illegible] jobs.

[illegible] the workers were not in good voice. [illegible] Tutankhamen's tomb has provided [illegible] evidence that 3500 years ago there [illegible] were workmen who bungled their [illegible] jobs, [illegible] middle ages was no originality—but [illegible] craftsmanship. Poor work in the old [illegible] days, hearts—of the glories of the work- [illegible] ers sank at their jobs—of the beauti- [illegible] ties erected in the joy of the [illegible] written about the blithe artisans [illegible] lacy. A good deal of guff has been [illegible] built in by popular [illegible] fiction ascribed to it by popular [illegible] tastes.

(Certainly the workmanship of the [illegible] builders was not always the per- [illegible] fection written about. A good deal of guff has been written about the blithe artisans who sank at their jobs—of the beauties erected in the joy of the workers' hearts—of the glories of the old craftsmanship. Poor work in the middle ages was no originality—but it may be that it was done when the workers were not in good voice. Tutankhamen's tomb has provided evidence that 3500 years ago there were workmen who bungled their jobs.

It seems to be easy to dream of the glories of mansions and castles of other days—not so easy to appreciate the conveniences of this age.

The cottage of today outdoes the mansion and the castle of an earlier time in facilities for living and doing. Not many years ago, only a few houses had the conveniences of electricity for light and power, gas for cooking and heating, and the facility of telephone communication. Like as not, many of the stately old buildings were what the fiction writers made them. In reality they were probably crude and uncomfortable shelters for their tenants.

(Certainly the workmanship of the builders was not always the perfection ascribed to it by popular fancy. A good deal of guff has been written about the blithe artisans who sank at their jobs—of the beauties erected in the joy of the workers' hearts—of the glories of the old craftsmanship. Poor work in the middle ages was no originality—but it may be that it was done when the workers were not in good voice. Tutankhamen's tomb has provided evidence that 3500 years ago there were workmen who bungled their jobs.

It seems to be easy to dream of the glories of mansions and castles of other days—not so easy to appreciate the conveniences of this age.

The cottage of today outdoes the mansion and the castle of an earlier time in facilities for living and doing. Not many years ago, only a few houses had the conveniences of electricity for light and power, gas for cooking and heating, and the facility of telephone communication. Like as not, many of the stately old buildings were what the fiction writers made them. In reality they were probably crude and uncomfortable shelters for their tenants.

(Certainly the workmanship of the builders was not always the perfection ascribed to it by popular fancy. A good deal of guff has been written about the blithe artisans who sank at their jobs—of the beauties erected in the joy of the workers' hearts—of the glories of the old craftsmanship. Poor work in the middle ages was no originality—but it may be that it was done when the workers were not in good voice. Tutankhamen's tomb has provided evidence that 3500 years ago there were workmen who bungled their jobs.

Cottage Outclasses Castle.

Merle Thorpe in the Nation's Business.

Large corporations have done notable work in providing houses for their employes, with detached cottages having "all modern conveniences," a frequent feature, says a report of the National Civic Federation of New York. Progressive concerns in building for the masses, the federation believes, is a noticeable characteristic of the times in the United States. And so it is.

The cottage of today outdoes the mansion and the castle of an earlier time in facilities for living and doing. Not many years ago, only a few houses had the conveniences of electricity for light and power, gas for cooking and heating, and the facility of telephone communication. Like as not, many of the stately old buildings were what the fiction writers made them. In reality they were probably crude and uncomfortable shelters for their tenants.

In the "Red Hot" company are other singers and dancers and the usual chorus of twenty-four dancers.

In the "Red Hot" company are other singers and dancers and the usual chorus of twenty-four dancers.

Merle Thorpe in the Nation's Business.

Large corporations have done notable work in providing houses for their employes, with detached cottages having "all modern conveniences," a frequent feature, says a report of the National Civic Federation of New York. Progressive concerns in building for the masses, the federation believes, is a noticeable characteristic of the times in the United States. And so it is.

Cottage Outclasses Castle.

Merle Thorpe in the Nation's Business.

Large corporations have done notable work in providing houses for their employes, with detached cottages having "all modern conveniences," a frequent feature, says a report of the National Civic Federation of New York. Progressive concerns in building for the masses, the federation believes, is a noticeable characteristic of the times in the United States. And so it is.

The cottage of today outdoes the mansion and the castle of an earlier time in facilities for living and doing. Not many years ago, only a few houses had the conveniences of electricity for light and power, gas for cooking and heating, and the facility of telephone communication. Like as not, many of the stately old buildings were what the fiction writers made them. In reality they were probably crude and uncomfortable shelters for their tenants.

(Certainly the workmanship of the builders was not always the perfection ascribed to it by popular fancy. A good deal of guff has been written about the blithe artisans who sank at their jobs—of the beauties erected in the joy of the workers' hearts—of the glories of the old craftsmanship. Poor work in the middle ages was no originality—but it may be that it was done when the workers were not in good voice. Tutankhamen's tomb has provided evidence that 3500 years ago there were workmen who bungled their jobs.

It seems to be easy to dream of the glories of mansions and castles of other days—not so easy to appreciate the conveniences of this age

REDUCTION RATIO 14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
Herald
Birmingham Ala
SEP 14 1924

Great Orchestra Conductor Finds Much Good In Jazz; Still Seeks New Talent

Serge Koussevitsky Comes Here After Wildest Enthusiasm In Europe

NEW YORK, Sept. 13.—Serge Koussevitzky, one of the greatest musical directors in Europe, arrived yesterday on the Aquitania to become conductor of the Boston Symophony orchestra, the first Russian to attain this honor. In the last your years he has appeared as guest conductor of the London Symphony orchestra, as well as in Barcelona, Madrid, Rome and Berlin.

The arrival in America of Serge Koussevitsky to become conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, turns attention not only t othe man himself but to what he, as a seeker after new genius, hopes t find in America. Exponent of both the classic and the modern, he will search here for talent—or better—and with no bias against jazz he may be the first to find an American Beethoven. Mr. Koussevitsky's following in Europe is of the enthusiastic sort usually created only by opera stars. The following interview was secured just before his departure from Paris for the United States.

(Copyright, 1924, in U. S. and Canada by the North American Newspaper Alliance, for The Age-Herald. All rights reserved.

By ALEEN RAYMOND

"What I hope to do in America is to show the public that masterpieces of music are being written today as powerful, stirring, and beautiful as the greatest of the past," says Serge Kousessevitsky, the Russian conductor who will lead the Boston Symphony orchestra this coming season.

In the twilght shadow of his Paris home, looking down through the trees upon the peaceful Seine, he outlined for readers of The Age-Herald his plans and hops for his approaching career across the Atlantic.

"I will present in Boston music never heard before," he said, "music which now exists only in manuscripts which I have in my keeping, music written by men now living who will rank as high a century from now as Mozart and Beethoven. I have given some of their music to Paris. You have seen how it has been received. Som of it shall be America's first."

I have seen how Koussevitsky's music has been received in Paris. Music lovers in the French capital have gone mad over the Russian leadr, litrally frenzied in their idolatry.

But it is not alone for his introduction of new composers that they storm the doors of the Theatre Nationale de l'Opera for all his concerts.

American may be sure that Koussevitsky will present its musical public with auditions of the older classics, without a trace of modernity in his reading of them, their historic beauties reproduced painstakingly and enthusiastically, exactly as the modern Russian believes the older masters wished them rendered.

America also may be sure that this man will be engaged during his entire stay in America on a passionate hunt for musical genius resident or native in the new world.

"I will do in the new world what I have done in the old," was his reply to a request for an outline of his plans.

In the old world he has become known as a hunter for musical talent, and a patron of young composers. He believes there is genius in America, and he hopes to ferret it out. The breadth of territory which his search will cover may be indicated by an incident he told the interviewer.

"Jazz music?" (He was answering a question). "I like all good music. And several Americans have written jazz which is truly good. Besides writing it, your nation seems to have a talent for playing it.

Finds Jazz and Band Splendid

"I was in London recently, and dropped in late at night for something to eat at a supper club where dancing was going on. There was an orchestra of American boys there. The oldest could not have been more than 30. I had a table near them where I could hear them and watch them individually. Some of those boys were improvising as they went along, and they were great players. I let my supper get cold listening to them. I stayed until a shockingly late hour. Those boys were fine musicians, but I learned that they were not particularly notable among America's jazz musicians—just a group of college students from one of your western states."

Mr. Koussevitzky is a man of one passion, music. He is a man of no hobbies. Over and above his talents, his outstanding quality is enthusiasm. He is as enthusiastic over the subject he expounds from his conductor's platform as is Billy Sunday over his. (Their methods of exposition differ).

Music has been practically his entire life since the age when most boys are playing marbles. At the age of 12 he conducted a provincial theatre program in Russia, and was a composer. Today he is 52 years old.

Mr. Koussevitzky is married. His wife is musical. Mrs. Koussevitzky is the sort of person to whom the young Russian composers dedicate their most ambitious works. A species of goddess, for Scriabin, Stravinsky, and their fellows. She has great sympathy for them, is a tireless listener, an able and appreciative critic. She is more than well-to-do. She has published the music of more than one hungry genius, and she has supplied food to many others.

In appearance, manner, and dress, Mr. Koussevitzky might be a successful middle-aged business man—a forceful figure of no eccentricities, of middle height, stocky, unathletic. Only his eyes inform you he is not; few business men have eyes glowing with such dark strange fires as his, when enthusiasm is flaming in them. They are the eyes of a young reformer, an evanlist.

The fact is, Mr. Koussevitzky is an evangelist, and a showman. He would appreciate both Billy Sunday and P. T. Barnum.

This is what he told his interviewer of a trip he used to take in pre-war Russia with an orchestra of 100 players, in a steamboat on the Volga.

Carried Music To Millions

"I carried music through a vast section of Russia," he said. "Once every two years before the war I used to charter a big steamer and make a journey of 2,500 miles. We stopped at every big city and many small towns. We sent men ahead to advertise that we were coming. The peasants would flock to the river from villages for miles back into country which few Europeans have ever seen. And I took them the best that exists in music, new and old. Debussy, Ravel, Florent Schmitt, P. Dukas, Roger Ducasse, Elgar, Richard Strauss. I made them known in village where there isn't any modern life as Europe and America know it.

"I took them into the back country and gave them hundreds of thousands of Russian people, scattered over an area of 500,000 square miles. You should have seen them come to see and hear us! And on these trips I found musicians who now are now playing in great capitals.

"They were marvelous, those journeys. They are not possible any more."

There is a pardonable pride that glows throughout the musiican's story of his pre-war missionary tours. There is no doubt that Koussevitzky, like other artists, is an egotist, but his is not a blatant egotism. It is the self confidence and pride of a man who has demonstrated his abilities and who is enthusiastic over the place of music in the general scheme of things.

Music is the most important thing in the world to him. Therefore it must count for a great deal with society at large.

As a small boy, he says, the orchestras he heard in Tver, the north Russian community where he was born, exerted an impelling fascination over him. His family were mercantile, middle class folk, who were fond of music. It was early the center of his existence, and though he experimented with various instruments when a boy he always intended to direct an orchestra as his life work.

When he was 14, he entered the conservatories of the Moscow Philharmonic society as a student of composition and orchestral conducting. In order to qualify for a scholarship he studied the double bass and became such a master of that resounding instrument that upon the termination of his study he obtained the post of double bass soloist at the Moscow Imperial opera. For several years thereafter he appeared in the principal cities as a double bass virtuoso.

Established Own Orchestra

He never lost sight of his real aim, to conduct a great orchestra. In 1909, after an intesive study of the interpretation of classic and moderns in an orchestra formed by him in Berlin from students of the Berlin High School of Music, he returned to Russia and established his own spmphony orchestra in Moscow. This body of musicians quickly became famous all over Russia so that its appearance in Petrograd was always one of the great events of the court season. It was with this group of players with which Kossevitzky toured the Volga.

Then came the war. The first revolution, that of 1917, did not disturb him. He was appointed general conductor of the Russian State orchestra by the provisional government established by Kerensky. This orchestra formerly was the court orchestra.

Then came the Bolshevik uprising.

"I am not a politician," says the composer and conductor, speaking of it. "I am not an economist."

Then he pauses. He does not launch into the diatribes against the new regime which explode from most of the Russian colony in Paris. He sits and broods.

"Life in Russia is impossible," he concludes. "There is no chance for artistic endeavor. I tried. I gave concerts in rooms that were freezing. The brass players wore mittens. You can't do it. It's impossible. Everything has gone to pieces."

There was a story floating about Paris that Koussevitsky and his compatriot, the basso, Chaliapin, had quarreled over Bolshevism. Chaliapin managed to get along well with the Soviet chiefs. Koussevitsky left the country rather than try to carry on artistic endeavor under what he felt were impossible conditions. Koussevitsky denies the quarrel.

"Chaliapin is a great artist and a great Russian," he says. When he and the basso met upon the Place de l'Opera, just in front of the Cafe de la Paix, for the first time since 1920, the two literally fell upon each other's necks. Shortly thereafter Koussevitsky led the orchestra in the opera when Chaliapin appeared, and led it in each of the basso's appearances thereafter.

The union of the two popular favorites in one performance almost caused a riot. The prices were quadrupled, and still the mob stormed the doors trying to get in.

I doubt if Koussevitsky ever quarreled with anyone on Bolshevism, or anything else aside from music. Therein lies all his interest and all his capability of getting excited.

He is interested in choral music as well as orchestral, and in the union of the two. In Moscow he organized a choir of 250 voices to give choral works in conjunction with his symphony orchestra.

His chief interest undoubtedly is in the discovery of new music and making it known to the public. He introduced Debussy into Russia and twice invited the great Frenchman to Moscow and Petrograd to conduct his own works. Many of the Debussy works in Koussevitsky's library are annotated by Debussy's own hand.

Koussevitsky was the farm friend, the discoverer, and patron of Scriabin. The composer always considered Koussevitsky the best interpreted of his works. Koussevitsky was the first to perform Scriabin's "Prometheus" poem.

As part of his work in the field of new music, Koussevitzky and his wife are the publishers of l'Edition Russe de Musique, which they began in Moscow in 1909 and now continue in Paris. The aim of this publishing business is to print the music of young Russians of talent, who otherwise might have difficulty in getting their works printed. The recommendation of Koussevitzky is sufficient to make a sale for it once published in France.

This publishing business has printed the works of Stravinsky, Serge Rachmaninoff, Scriabin, Prokofieff, Gretchaninoff, and the famous "Treaty of Orchestration" of Rimsky-Korsakoff.

Mr. Koussevitzky gave me a list of the music which he was the first to perform in Paris and which he will bring to America. Very little of it has been heard in the United States but some of it has been heard in London where Koussevitzky has acted as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra; in Manchester and Liverpool, where he has conduced the Philharmonic Society; and in Edinburg and Glasgow, where he conducted the Scottish Symphony Orchestra. He is taking all these scores to Boston, and probably most, if not all, will be played there. But Mr. Koussevitzky says he will not force any particular kind of music down the throats of his listeners. He will experiment to find what his audiences like.

His First Performances.

The Koussevitzky first performances included:

Debussy: Sarabande, scored by Ravel; Danse, scored by Ravel.

Roland-Manuel: Isabelle et Pantalon, overture; three movements of Scarlatti.

Florent Schmitt: Reves; Mirages, suite for orchestra.

Darius Milhaud: Seconc suite of Protheus.

Arthur Honegger: The Victorious Horace; Chant de Jois; "Pacific 231."

Maurice Ravel: Paintings from the Picture Show by Moussorgsky, scored by Ravel; Alborada del Gracioso.

Alberic Magnard: Fourth Symphony.

Arnold Bax: The Garden of Fand.

W. Reed: The Will o' the Wisp.

Holbrooke: Bronwen Overture.

Fr. Malpiero: Pause del Silenzio; Imprezioni dal Vero, third suite.

O. Respighi: Antiche Danze de Arie; Concerto Gregoriano for violin and orchestra.

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY

Who comes to America this season as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchsetra—Photo by Lipnitzki, Paris.

VICTIM OF AUTO STILL UNCONSCIOUS

Little Hope Held For Recovery Of George Burnett

George W. Burnett, 16-year-old messenger boy for the Western Union, whose skull was fractured in an automobile accident Friday, was still unconscious at the Birmingham General hospital Saturday night, attendants stated.

The boy was injured when his bicycle collided with a truck at the entrance at the Terminal subway. Besides the head injury he suffered severe body bruises and attendants believe he is injured internally. Little hope is held for his recovery.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
SEP 14 1924

Koussevitzky Seeks American Beethoven

Serge Koussevitzky, who takes up the baton for the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of this month, intends to have his eyes and ears open for the possible discovery of an American Beethoven. That is what Allen Raymond, Paris correspondent of the North American Newspaper Alliance, says in an interview he had with the conductor.

"He will search here for talent," says Mr. Raymond, "and, with no bias against jazz, he may be the first to find an American Beethoven." In the conductor's own words: "What I hope to do in America is to show the public that masterpieces of music are being written to-day as powerful, stirring and beautiful as the greatest of the past.

"I will present in Boston music never heard before, music which now exists only in manuscripts which I have in my keeping, music written by men now living who will rank as high a century from now as Mozart or Beethoven. I have given some of their music to Paris. You have seen how it has been received. Some of it shall be America's first."

In his search for good music, Koussevitzky even explores jazz, and likes it if it is good jazz. He finds that several composers have written jazz which he calls good. At a London supper club he was so interested in listening to a group of young Americans performing jazz that he let his supper get cold.

Mr. Raymond bears witness to the enthusiastic manner in which Parisians have received the Koussevitzky concerts of late. "Music lovers in the French capital," he says, "have greeted the Russian conductor with the explosive clamor of an appreciation which is truly Latin. But it is not alone for his introduction of new composers that they crowd through the doors of the Theatre Nationale for his concerts. Koussevitzky is capable of presenting the older classics without a trace of modernity in his reading and with a painstaking regard for their historic beauties, exactly as he believes the older masters would have them rendered.

"In the Old World he has become known as a hunter for musical talent and a patron of young composers. He believes there is geninus in America, and he hopes to ferret it out. The territory which his search will cover may be indicated by his attitude toward jazz."

A week earlier than customary the Berkshire chamber music festival will open Sept. 17 at Pittsfield, Mass., and continue through the 19th. It is the sixth of the series, and as usual is carried out under the direction and patronage of Mrs. Frederick S. Coolidge.

The opening concert will be given on the afternoon of the 17th by the Festival Quartet of South Mountain, assisted by Mischa Levitzki, pianist. The quartet is composed of William Kroll, first violin; Karl Kraeuter, second violin; Hugo Kortschak, viola, and Willem Willeke, 'cello. They will play quartets by Mozart and D'Indy, and a quintet by Suk.

The following morning a Bach programme will be played by Harold Samuel, pianist; George Enesco, violinist, and Fraser Gange, baritone. An American programme is scheduled for the afternoon with numbers by Carpenter, Sowerby and Samuel Gardner, the Providence violinist. His Quintet in F-minor for piano and strings is the selection. The artists will be Leo Sowerby and Carl Friedberg, pianists; Jacques Gordon, violinist; Hans Kindler, 'cellist, and the Festival Quartet.

Beethoven, Brahms and Chausson are on the programme for the morning of the 19th, the artists being Olga Samaroff, pianist; Georges Enesco and Thaddeus Rich, violinists; Hans Kindler, 'cellist, and the Rich Quartet of Philadelphia, consisting of Thaddeus Rich, Hans Kindler, Harry Aleinikoff, second violin, and Romain Verney, viola.

Wallingford Riegger, composer of "La Belle Dame Sans Merci," the 1924 prize competition, will conduct this work at the final vocal concert in the afternoon. It is a setting of Keat's poem of the same title. Among the interpreters are Dorothy Moulton and Edith Bennett, sopranos; Charles Stratton, tenor, and the Lenox String Quartet of New York, whose members are Sandor Harmatt, first violin; Wolfe Wolfinsohn, second violin; Nicholas Moldavan, viola, and Emmeran Stocher, 'cello.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
SEP 15 1924

The new conductor of the Boston Symphony, Serge Koussevitsky, on reaching the Hub informed the eager reporters that he had no idea of deluging his programs with modernism in music. That is wise, surely—more especially from the standpoint of those responsible for the finances of this famous, but by no means money-making, organization. To invite the disgust of several hundred conservative patrons of music by wilfully shocking them would mean an incurable deficit and the ultimate ruin of a very useful and laudable institution. Inviting Koussevitsky to take up the baton wielded by the very able and popular Monteux has seemed to us a rather rash experiment, but not a little depends on the manner of man the new leader turns out to be. His introductory remarks are reassuring.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
SEP 1924

To Conduct Orchestra

Copyright Underwood & Underwood.

Serge Koussevitzky

Arriving at New York on S. S. Aquitania, Serge Koussevitzky, famous Russian musician, who has been engaged to conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra this season. For the past four years he has been one of the outstanding figures in musical circles of London and Paris, but this is his first visit here. Koussevitzky was first known, in Russia, as a remarkable virtuoso on the double bass, but he then assembled his own orchestra from Russia's best instrumentalists and toured the whole Empire, even chartering a steamer and sailing the length of the Volga.

108

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WATERBURY, CONN.
AMERICAN

SEP 15 1924

KOUSSEVITZKY, GREAT RUSSIAN CONDUCTOR, PRAISES OUR JAZZ

Coming to America to Lead Boston Symphony Orchestra for Season.

TO SEEK NEW BEETHOVEN

Believes Unfound Musical Genius Here and Proposes to Locate It.

BY ALLEN RAYMOND.

Paris Correspondent of The Republican-American and the North American Newspaper Alliance.

Paris, Sept.—"What I hope to do in America is to show the public that masterpieces of music are being written today as powerful, stirring, and beautiful as the greatest of the past," says Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor who will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra this coming season.

In the twilight shadow of his Paris home, looking down through the trees upon the peaceful Seine, he outlined for readers of The American-Republican his plans and hopes for his approaching career across the Atlantic.

"I will present in Boston music never heard before," he said, "music which now exists only in manuscripts which I have in my keeping, music written by men now living who will rank as high a century from now as Mozart and Beethoven. I have given some of their music to Paris. You have seen how it has been received. Some of it shall be America's first."

I have seen how Koussevitzky's music has been received in Paris. Music lovers in the French capital have gone mad over the Russian leader, literally frenzied in their idolatry.

But it is not alone for his introduction of new composers that they storm the doors of the Theater Nationale de l'Opera for all his concerts.

America may be sure that Koussevitzky will present its musical public with auditions of the older classics, without a trace of modernity in his reading of them, their historic beauties reproduced painstakingly and enthusiastically, exactly as the modern Russian believes the older masters wished them rendered.

Will Seek Genius.

America also may be sure that this man will be engaged during his entire stay in America on a passionate hunt for musical genius resident or native in the new world.

"I will do in the new world what I have done in the old," was his reply to a request for an outline of his plans.

In the old world he has become known as a hunter for musical talent, and a patron of young composers. He believes there is genius in America, and he hopes to fetter it out. The breadth of territory which his search will cover may be indicated by an incident he told the interviewer.

"Jazz music?" (He was answering a query.) "I like all good music. And several Americans have written jazz whic his truly good. Besides writing it, your nations seems to have a talent, for playing it.

Finds Jazz Band Splendid.

"I was in London recently, and dropped in late at night for something to eat at a supper club where dancing was going on. There was an orchestra of American boys there. The oldest could not have been more than 30. I had a table near them where I could hear them and watch them individually. Some of those boys were improvising as they went along, and they were great players. I let my supper get cold listening to them. I stayed until a shockingly late hour. Those boys were fine musicians, but I learned that they were not particularly notable among America's jazz musicians,—just a group of college students from one of your western states."

Mr. Koussevitzky is a man of one passion, music. He is a man of no hobbies. Over and above his talents, his outstanding quality is enthusiasm. He is as enthusiastic over the subject he expounds from his conductor's platform as is Billy Sunday over his. (Their methods of exposition differ.)

GREAT RUSSIAN LEADER.

Serge Koussevitzky Who is coming here to lead the Boston Symphony orchestra and search for musical genius in this country.

Music has been practically his entire life since the age when most boys are playing marbles. At the age of 12 he conducted a provincial theater orchestra in Russia, and was a composer. Today he is 52 years old.

Mr. Koussevitzky is married. His wife is musical. Mrs. Koussevitzky is the sort of person to whom the young Russian composers dedicate their most ambitious works. A species of goddess, for Scriabin, Stravinsky, and their fellows. She has great sympathy for them, is a tireless listener, an able and appreciative critic. She is more than well-to-do. She has published the music of more than one hungry genius, and has supplied food to many others.

In apearance, manner and dress, Mr. Koussevitzky might be a successful middle-aged business man—a forceful figure of no eccentricies, of middle height, stocky, un-athletic. Only his eyes inform you he is not: few business men have eyes glowing with such dark strange fires as his, when enthusiasm is flaming in them. They are the eyes of a young reformer, an evangelist.

The fact is, Mr. Koussevitzky is an evangelist, and a showman. He would appreciate both Billy Sunday and P. T. Barnum.

This is what he told his interviewer of a trip he used to take in prewar Russia w tihonar war Russia with an orchestra of 100 players, in a steamboat on the Volga.

Carried Music to Millions.

I carried music through a vast section of Russia," he said. "Once every two years before the war I used to charter a big steamer and make a journey of 2,500 miles. We stopped at every big city and many small towns. We sent men ahead to advertise that we were coming. The peasants would flock to the river from villages for miles back into country which few Europeans have ever seen. And I took them the best that exists in music, new and old. Debussy, Ravel, Florent Schmitt, P. Dukas, Roger Ducasse, Elgar, Richard Strauss. I made them known in villages where there isn't any modern life as Europe and America know it.

"I took them into the back country and gave them to hundreds of thousands of Russian people scattered over an area of 500,000 square miles. You should have seen them come to see and hear us! And on these trips I found musicians who now are playing in the great capitals.

"They were marvelous, those journeys. They are are not possible any more."

There is a pardonable pride that glows through the musician's story of his pre-war missionary tours There is no doubt that Koussevitzky, like other artists, is an egotist, but his is not a blatant egotism. It is the self confidence and pride of a man who has demonstrated his abilities and who is enthusiastic over the place of music in the general scheme of things.

most of the Russian colony in Paris. He sits ar oods

"Life in Russia is impossible," he concludes. "There is no chance for artistic endeavor. I tried. I gave concerts in rooms that were freezing. The brass players wore mittens. You can't do it. It's impossible. Everything has gone to pieces."

There was a story floating about Paris that Koussevitzky and his compatriot, the basso, Chaliapin, had quarreled over Bolshevism. Chaliapin managed to get along well with the Soviet chiefs. Koussevitzky left the country rather than try to carry on artistic endeavor under what he felt were impossible conditions. Koussevitzky denies the quarrel.

"Chaliapin is a great artist and a great Russian," he says. When he and the basso met upon the Place de l'Opera, just in front of the Cafe de la Paix, for the first time since 1920, the two literally fell upon each other's necks. Shortly thereafter Koussevitzky led the orchestra in the opera when Chaliapin appeared, and led it in each of the basso's appearances thereafter.

The union of the two popular favorites in one performance almost caused a riot. The prices were quadrupled, and still the mob stormed the doors trying to get in.

I doubt if Koussevitzky ever quarreled with anyone on Bolshevism, or anything else aside from music. Therein lies all his interest and all his capability of getting excited.

New Finds are Chief Interest.

He is interested in choral music as well as orchestral, and in the union of the two. In Miscow he organized a choir of 250 voices to give choral works in conjunction with his symphony orchestra.

His chief interest undoubtedly is in the discovery of new music and making it known to the publics. He introduced Debussy into Russia and twice invited the great Frenchman to Moscow and Petrograd to conduct his own works. Many of the Debussy works in Koussevitzky's library are annotated by Debussy's own hand.

Koussevitzky's was the warm friend, the discoverer, and patron of Scriabin. The composer always considered Koussevitzky the best interpreter of his works. Koussevitzky was the first to perform Scriabin's "Prometheus" poem.

As part of his work in the field of new music, Koussevitzky and his wife are the publishers of l'Edition Russe de Musque, which they begna in Moscow in 1909 and now continue in Paris. The aim of this publishing business is to print the music of young Russians of talent, who otherwise might have difficulty in getting their works printed. The recommendation of Koussevitzky is sufficient to make a sale for it once published in France.

This publishing business has printed the works of Stravinsky, Serge Rachmaninoff, Scriabin, Prokofieff, Gretchaninoff, and the famous "Treaty of Orchestration" of Rimsky-Korsakoff.

Mr. Koussevitzky gave me a list of the music which he was the first to perform in Paris and which he will bring to America.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

SEP 19 4

BOSTON IS CALM UPON ADVENT OF MUSICIAN

New Symphony Conductor's Arrival Causes No Break In Beacon Street Placidity.

BOSTON, Sept. 14.—(United News) Boston music lovers take their symphony orchestra with the same degree of concern Harvard undergrads take their football.

It follows, then, that the arrival of a new conductor for symphony preceded by a reputation for modernity—rivals the advent of a new grid mentor at the Cambridge stadium.

And so, with the coming today of Serge Koussevitzky, 50-year-old Russian conductor fresh from four seasons at Paris where he devoted his concerts to modern music with sensational success, the Cabots, Lodges, et als, manifested the same perturbation the lusty sons of John Harvard would in the installation of a new football coach famed for his new school of aerial attacks and trick kick formations.

Symphony opens October 10, and save for a few meagre crumbs of information, Koussevitzky has the hub awaiting a surprise winter musical feast.

His chief admissions up to the end of his first day here made, albeit, via the interpreter route—are that he likes all good music, is interested in "Ze American Jazz," and that he intends to give modern composers a fair share of his programs.

When informed that Boston expects to be 'shocked and electrified,' he relayed the intelligence he would include Alexander Scriabine's "Poem de l'Extase" in his first program. He assured Beacon street, however, that he would not be swept away by radicalism, whereupon the "street" breathed an audible sigh of relief.

As for American jazz, "it is beautiful," he said.

That is to say, it has been a great influence on the young composers and that makes it important.

"It has harmonic richness.

"It is, however, like a fashion and not likely to endure as it is now. One day it is here. Another day—it will be gone, and in its place the development that its fleeting presence has influenced."

Beyond the "Poeme de l'Extase" admission, Koussevitzky would not divulge his plans for the winter, but he managed to leave the initial impression that, despite his reputation for modern music concerts he would shatter no Boston idols.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
TRIBUNE

SEP 1 5 1924

Russian to Conduct Symphony at Boston

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.
Koussevitzky, famous Russian musician who arrived in New York last week, will conduct the Boston symphony orchestra this season. For the past four years he has been one of the outstanding musical figures in London and Paris but this is his first visit to the United States.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

[illegible]

SEP 1924

Koussevitzky, the new leader of Boston Symphony orchestra, arrives in New York from Europe and will present first program Oct. 20.

must count for a great deal with society at large.

As a small boy, he says, the orchestras he heard in Ter, the north Russian community where he was born, exerted an impelling fascination over him. His family were mercantile, middle class folk who were fond of music. It was early the center of his existence and though he experimented with various instruments when a boy he always intended to direct an orchestra as his life work.

When he was 14, he entered the conservatoire of the Moscow Philharmonic society as a student of composition and orchestral conducting. In order to qualify for a scholarship he studied the double bass and became such a master of that resounding instrument that upon the termination of his study he obtained the post of double bass soloist at the Moscow Imperial Opera. For several years thereafter he appeared in the principal cities of Russia as a double bass virtuoso.

Established Own Orchestra.

He never lost sight of his real aim, to conduct a great orchestra. In 1909, after an intensive study of the interpretation of classics and moderns in an orchestra formed by him in Berlin from students of the Berlin high school of Music, he returned to Russia and established his own symphony orchestra in Moscow. This body of musicians quickly became famous all over Russia so that its appearance in Petrograd was always one of the great events of the court season. It was with this group of players with which Koussevitzky toured the Volga.

Then came the war. The first revolution, that of 1917, did not disturb him. He was appointed genesal conductor of the Russian State orchestra by the provisional government established by Kerensky. This orchestra formerly was the court orchestra.

Then came the Bolshevik uprising. 'I am not a politician," says the composer and conductor, speaking of it. 'I am not an economist."

Then he pauses. He does not launch into the diatribes against the new regime which explode from

THIS CLIPPING FROM ATLANTA, GA.
CONSTITUTION
SEP 15 1924

New Boston Symphony Leader

:: FORGOT HIS SUPPER WHILE JAZZ BAND PLAYED ::

Hopes to Learn From Jazz

BY ALLEN RAYMOND.
Paris Correspondent of The Constitution and the North American Newspaper Alliance.

Paris, August 14.—"What I hope to do in America is to show the public that masterpieces of music are being written today as powerful, stirring and beautiful as the greatest of the past," says Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor who will lead the Boston Symphony orchestra this coming season.

In the twilight shadow of his Paris home, looking down through the trees upon the peaceful Seine, he outlined his plans and hopes for his approaching career across the Atlantic.

"I will present in Boston music never heard before," he said, "music which now exists only in manuscripts which I have in my keeping, music written by men now living who will rank as high a century from now as Mozart and Beethoven. I have given some of their music to Paris. You have seen how it has been received. Some of it shall be America's first."

I have seen how Koussevitzky's music has been received in Paris. Music lovers in the French capital have gone mad over the Russian leader, literally frenzied in their idolatry.

But it is not alone for his introduction of new composers that they storm the doors of the Theatre Nationale de l'Opera for all his concerts.

Present Old Classics.

America may be sure that Koussevitzky will present its musical public with auditions of the older classics, without a trace of modernity for musical genius resident or native in the reading of them, their historic beauties reproduced painstakingly and enthusiastically, exactly as the modern Russian believes the older masters wished them rendered.

America also may be sure that this man will be engaged during his entire stay in America on a passionate hunt in the new world.

"I will do in the new world what I have done in the old," was his reply to a request for an outline of his plans.

In the old world he has become known as a hunter for musical talent, and a patron of young composers. He believes there is genius in America, and he hopes to ferret it out. The breadth of territory which his search will cover may be indicated by an incident he told the interviewer.

"Jazz music?" (He was answering a query.) "I like all good music. And several Americans have written jazz which is truly good. Besides writing it, your nation seems to have a talent for playing it.

Finds Jazz Band Splendid.

"I was in London recently, and dropped in late at night for something to eat at a supper club where dancing was going on. There was an orchestra of American boys there. The oldest could not have been more than 30. I had a table near them where I could hear them and watch them individually. Some of those boys were improvising as they went along, and they were great players. I let my super was cold listening to them. I stayed until a shockingly late hour. Those boys were fine musicians, but I learned that they were not particularly notable among America's jazz musicians—just a group of college students from one of your western states."

Mr. Koussevitzky is a man of one passion, music. He is a man of no hobbies. Over and above his talents, his outstanding quality is enthusiasm. He is as enthusiastic over the subject he expounds from his conductor's platform as is Billy Sunday over his. (Their methods of exposition differ.)

Orchestra Leader at 12 Years.

Music has been practically his entire life since the age when most boys are playing marbles. At the age of 12 he conducted a provincial theater orchestra in Russia, and was a composer. Today he is 52 years old.

Mr. Koussevitzy is married. His wife is musical. Mrs. Koussevitzky is the sort of person to whom the young Rusian composers dedicate their ambitious works. A species of goddess, for Scriabin, Stravinsky and their fellows. She has great sympathy for them, is a tireless listener, an able and appreciative critic. She is more than well-to-do. She has published the music of more than one hungry genius, and has supplied food to many others.

In appearance, manner and dress Mr. Koussevitzky might be a successful middle-aged business man—a forceful figure of no eccentricities, of middle height, stocky, unathletic. Only his eyes inform you he is not, few business men have eyes glowing with such dark strange fires as his, when enthusiasm is flaming in them. They are the eyes of a young reformer, an evangelist.

The fact is, Mr. Koussevitzky is an evangelist, and a showman. He would appreciate both Billy Sunday and P. T. Barnum.

This is what he told his interviewer of a trip he used to take in prewar Russia with an orchestra of 100 players, in a steamboat on the Volga.

Carried Music to Millions.

I carried music through a vast section of Russia," he said. "Once every two years before the war I used to charter a big steamer and make a journey of 2,500 miles. We stopped at every big city and many small towns. We sent men ahead to advertise that we were coming. The peasants would flock to the river from villages for miles back into country which few Europeans have ever seen. And I took them the best that exists in music, new and old. Debussy, Ravel, Florent Schmitt, P. Dukas, Roger Ducasse, Elgar, Richard Strauss. I made them known in villages where there isn't any modern life as Europe and America know it.

"I took them into the back country and gave them to hundreds of thousands of Russian people, scattered over an area of 500,000 square miles. You should have seen them come to see and hear us! And on these trips I found musicians who now are playing in the great capitals.

"They were marvelous, those journeys. They are not possible any more."

Pride Is Pardonable.

There is a pardonable pride that glows through the musician's story of his pre-war missionary tours. There is no doubt that Koussevitzky, like other artists, is an egotist, but his is not a blatant egotism. It is the self-confidence and pride of a man who has demonstrated his abilities and who is enthusiastic over the place of music in the general scheme of things.

Music is the most important thing in the world to him. Therefore, it must count for a great deal with society at large.

As a small boy, he says, the orchestras he heard in Tver, the north Russian community where he was born, exerted an impelling fascination over him. His family were mercantile, middle-class folk who were fond of music. It was early the center of his existence, and though he experimented with various instruments when a boy, he always intended to direct an orchestra as his life work.

When he was 14, he entered the conservatoire of the Moscow Philharmonic society as a student of composition and orchestral conducting. In order to qualify for a scholarship he studied the double bass and became such a master of that resounding instrument that upon the termination of his study he obtained the post of double bass soloist at the Moscow Imperial opera. For several years thereafter he appeared in the principal cities of Russia as a double bass virtuoso.

Established Own Orchestra.

He never lost sight of his real aim, to conduct a great orchestra. In 1909, after an intensive study of the interpretation of classics and moderns in an orchestra formed by him in Berlin from students of the Berlin High School of Music, he returned to Russia and established his own symphony orchestra in Moscow. This body of musicians quickly became famous all over Russia so that its appearance in Petrograd was always one of the great events of the court season. It was with this group of players with whcih Koussevitzky toured the Volga.

Then came the war. The first revolution, that of 1917, did not disturb him. He was appointed general conductor of the Russian State orchestra by the provisional government established by Kerensky. This orchestra formerly was the court orchestra.

Then came the bolshevik uprising.

"I am not a politician," says the composer and conductor, speaking of it. "I am not an economist."

Then he pauses. He does not launch into the diatribes against the new regime which explode from most of the Russian colony in Paris. He sits and broods.

Life in Russia Impossible.

"Life in Russia is impossible," he concludes. "There is no chance for artistic endeavor. I tried. I gave concerts in rooms that were freezing. The brass players wore mittens. You can't do it. It's impossible. Everything has gone to pieces."

There was a story floating about Paris that Koussevitzky and his compatriot, the basso, Chaliapin, had quarreled over Bolshevism. Chaliapin managed to get along well with the soviet chiefs. Koussevitzky left the country rather than try to carry on artistic endeavor under what he felt were impossible conditions. Koussevitzky denies the quarrel.

"Chaliapin is a great artist and a great Russian," he says. When he and the basso met upon the Place de l'Opera, just in front of the Cafe de la Paix, for the first time since 1920, the two literally fell upon each other's necks. Shortly thereafter Koussevitzky led the orchestra in the opera when Chaliapin appeared, and led it in each of the basso's appearance thereafter.

The union of the two popular favorites in one performance almost caused a riot. The prices were quadrupled, and still the mob stormed the doors trying to get in.

I doubt if Koussevitzky ever quarreled with anyone on Bolshevism, or anything else aside from music. Therein lies all his interest and all his capability of getting excited.

New Finds Are Chief Interest.

He is interested in choral music as well as orchestral, and in the union of the two. In Moscow he organized a choir of 250 voices to give choral works in conjunction with his symphony orchestra.

His chief interest undoubtedly is in the discovery of new music and making it known to the public. He introduced Debussy into Russia and twice invited the great Frenchman to Moscow and Petrograd to conduct his own works. Many of the Debussy works in Koussevitzky's library are annotated by Debussy's own hand.

Koussevitzky was the warm friend, the discoverer, and patron of Scriabin. The composer always considered Koussevitzky the best interpreter of his works. Koussevitzky was the first to perform Scriabin's "Prometheus" poem.

As part of his work in the field of new music, Koussevitzky and his wife are the publishers of l'Edition Russe de Musique, which they began in Moscow in 1909 and now continue in Paris. The aim of this publishing business is to print the music of young Russians of talent, who otherwise might have difficulty in getting their works printed. The recommendation of Koussevitzky is sufficient to make a sale for it, once published in France.

Many Stars Represented.

This publishing business has printed the works of Stravinsky, Serge Rachmaninoff, Scriabin, Prokofieff, Gretchaninoff, and the famous "Treaty of Orchestration" of Rimsky-Korsakoff.

Mr. Koussevitzky gave me a list of the music which he was the first to perform in Paris and which he will bring to America. Very little of it has been heard in the United States, but some of it has been heard in London, where Koussevitzky has acted as guest conductor of the London Symphony orchestra; in Manchester and Liverpool, where he has conducted the Philharmonic society; and in Edinburg and Glasgow, where he conducted the Scottish Symphony orchestra. He is taking all these scores to Boston, and probably most, if not all, will be played there. But Mr. Koussevitzky says he will not force any particular kind of music down the throats of his listeners. He will experiment to find what his audiences like.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
SEP 15 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT CAPITOL FEB. 1

Serge Koussevitzky, New Director, Will Conduct Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will give a concert in the Capitol Theater, February 1, 1925, will be directed by Serge Koussevitzky, who has been engaged to take charge of the orchestra this winter. He is a musical genius of a high order, was born in Tver, north Russia, in 1874, received his first musical education at home and when twelve years old became chief of the orchestra in the theater in his native town, where he conducted the orchestra for two years. Then he went for study to the conservatory at Moscow, where he chose for special study the double-bass soloist in the orchestra of the Imperial Opera at Moscow, and succeeded his teacher as professor of the instrument at the Conservatoire. He toured Russia and western Europe as a contrabass virtuoso, and composed a number of works for the instrument, including a concerto, that are now a part of the repertoire of every contrabassist.

In 1907 he formed from the pupils of the Berlin Hochschule for Music an orchestra which he conducted for two years and then returned to Russia and organized the famous Koussevitzky Orchestra, made up of the best players of other Russian orchestras. For the Moscow concerts he formed a mixed choir of 250 voices for the production of choral works, and in Petrograd engaged the celebrated Archangelsky Choir. He remained in Russia until 1921 when he founded a series of concerts in Paris which have become famous. He went to London where he became very popular and conducted concerts in other English and Scotch cities and towns, also in Barcelona, Madrid, Rome, Berlin, Warsaw and other European cities.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
SEP 15 1924

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

Mr. Koussevitzky Gathers His First American Laurels—In the Smiling Art of the Arrival-Interview He Warily Prevails—Mr. Enesco to Revisit Boston

A MONTH hence many of us will applaud Mr. Koussevitzky as conductor in symphonic music. For the present we may all applaud his address as man of the world. He has run his first gauntlet in America—the reporters on pierside and station-platform—with skill, discretion, good will and mutual satisfaction. He gave not a moment of uneasiness to those anxious folk, the managerial bystanders. He stumbled into no musical or social error. He was not too reticent, nor yet too voluable. He endured with smiling patience a question about an "American Beethoven"—the peak of pierside queries. He was well prepared with all the station-platform formulas proper to the arrival in America of an eminent European musician—the word about jazz; the compliments to a new environment and a new public, the reciprocal enquiries about both; the sentences that groped amiably around native composers. He turned not a hair when one of the most amusing explorers emitted those portentous words "musical radicalism." He merely brushed them away with warm-hearted praise of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and adroit counter-questions about its audiences.

So much for New York, and for Boston as well until the landing party, so to say, halted in the suburban house in which the conductor is to dwell. Then the conversation took a more pressing turn. His programs for his first concerts? Mr. Koussevitzky recounted a pleasing anecdote of Stravinsky and the instruments of a jazz-band. Were those programs to contain many "awful" modernist-pieces? Mr. Koussevitzky recalled an entertaining incident in his early days as a player, in Russia, upon the double-bass. "But it is stated that you have already sent over five programs?" As one who yields gracefully, the conductor sketched them, and the like were never before known in the orchestral heavens above or the orchestral earth beneath. Beamingly he ended—and plainly Mr. Koussevitzky was sufficiently Americanized to guy. And so it went—back to the generalities and commonplaces. After all, a renowned musician with a quick wit and a lively spirit, may not wander over half Europe and not become expert in the wiles of the interviewed.

Mr. Koussevitzky is a stranger in a strange land. He had barely trodden its soil when he was asked to share in one of its hallowed rites—the arrival-interview. He complied like a man of good will, plastic to the necessities of the moment. At first hand he knew nothing of America, nothing of Boston and New York, nothing of the orchestra that he will command or of the publics to whom he will minister. Only tenatively has he prepared five programs until he can survey the testing ground which is the Symphony Concerts. Hence the smoke-screen of courteous generalities, the counter-manœuvres with agreeable anecdotage. Again a man of the world is Mr. Koussevitzky. He looks about and chooses his own time and season. Nine months hence, he will surely be amusing—not to say informing—when he joins in the companion-rite, the interview of departure. Long since in Europe they interpreted his smile as "Wait and See."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON
MASSACHUSETTS
AMERICAN
SEP 15 1924

NEW SYMPHONY CHIEF AND WIFE IN BOSTON

Serge Koussevitsky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, his wife and a corps of servants are installed in the conductor's new home at No. 122 Pond street, Jamaica Plain. The Koussevitsky party motored directly to their new home after arrival in Boston from New York, where they debarked following the trip from Europe. In the party, besides the conductor and his wife were his secretary, Dr. Vladimir Zederbaum, a valet and two additional servants. The Jamaica Plain residence had been leased in advance by friends, for a period of one year.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
SEP 15 1924

—Copyright by Underwood.

Serge Koussevitzky, famous Russian musician, the only great conductor whom America has not seen in action, arrived in New York yesterday on the S. S. Aquitania. He has been engaged to conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra this season. For the past four years he has been one of the outstanding figures in musical circles of London and Paris.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
SEP 15 1924

Serg Will Slap Boston—Gently—on the Wrist

Boston, Sept. 15.—To present new music and to give new interpretations to old music, is the aim of Serg Koussevitsky, new Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

But he emphatically denies he will "shock culuturured Bostonians" by inclusion of "jazz" in his programs. Koussevitzky just arrived here, and is under a one year contract to lead the Boston Symphony.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

2.0

2.2

2.5

2.8

3.2

3.6

4.0

4.5

5.0

5.6

6.3

7.1

8.0

9.0

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

COLORED PAPER

110

Tel. Chelsea 8800

THIS CLIPPING FROM ATLANTA, GA.
CONSTITUTION

SEP 15 1924

New Boston Symphony Leader

:: FORGOT HIS SUPPER WHILE JAZZ BAND PLAYED ::

Hopes to Learn From Jazz

BY ALLEN RAYMOND.
Paris Correspondent of The Constitution and the North American Newspaper Alliance.

Paris, August 14.—"What I hope to do in America is to show the public that masterpieces of music are being written today as powerful, stirring and beautiful as the greatest of the past," says Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor who will lead the Boston Symphony orchestra this coming season.

In the twilight shadow of his Paris home, looking down through the trees upon the peaceful Seine, he outlined his plans and hopes for his approaching career across the Atlantic.

"I will present in Boston music never heard before," he said, "music which now exists only in manuscripts which I have in my keeping, music written by men now living who will rank as high a century from now as Mozart and Beethoven. I have given some of their music to Paris. You have seen how it has been received. Some of it shall be America's first."

I have seen how Koussevitzky's music has been received in Paris. Music lovers in the French capital have gone mad over the Russian leader, literally frenzied in their idolatry.

But it is not alone for his introduction of new composers that they storm the doors of the Theatre Nationale de l'Opera for all his concerts.

Present Old Classics.

America may be sure that Koussevitzky will present its musical public with auditions of the older classics, without a trace of modernity for musical genius resident or native in the reading of them, their historic beauties reproduced painstakingly and enthusiastically, exactly as the modern Russian believes the older masters wished them rendered.

America also may be sure that this man will be engaged during his entire stay in America on a passionate hunt in the new world.

"I will do in the new world what I have done in the old," was his reply to a request for an outline of his plans.

In the old world he has become known as a hunter for musical talent, and a patron of young composers. He believes there is genius in America, and he hopes to ferret it out. The breadth of territory which his search will cover may be indicated by an incident he told the interviewer.

"Jazz music?" (He was answering a query.) "I like all good music. And several Americans have written jazz which is truly good. Besides writing it, your nation seems to have a talent for playing it.

Finds Jazz Band Splendid.

"I was in London recently, and dropped in late at night for something to eat at a supper club where dancing was going on. There was an orchestra of American boys there. The oldest could not have been more than 30. I had a table near them where I could hear them and watch them individually. Some of those boys were improvising as they went along, and they were great players. I let my supper was cold listening to them. I stayed until a shockingly late hour. Those boys were fine musicians, but I learned that they were not particularly notable among America's jazz musicians—just a group of college students from one of your western states."

Mr. Koussevitzky is a man of one passion, music. He is a man of no hobbies. Over and above his talents, his outstanding quality is enthusiasm. He is as enthusiastic over the subject he expounds from his conductor's platform as is Billy Sunday over his. (Their methods of exposition differ.)

Orchestra Leader at 12 Years.

Music has been practically his entire life since the age when most boys are playing marbles. At the age of 12 he conducted a provincial theater orchestra in Russia, and was a composer. Today he is 52 years old.

Mr. Koussevitzy is married. His wife is musical. Mrs. Koussevitzky is the sort of person to whom the young Rusian composers dedicate their ambitious works. A species of goddess, for Scriabin, Stravinsky and their fellows. She has great sympathy for them, is a tireless listener, an able and appreciative critic. She is more than well-to-do. She has published the music of more than one hungry genius, and has supplied food to many others.

In appearance, manner and dress Mr. Koussevitzky might be a successful middle-aged business man—a forceful figure of no eccentricities, of middle height, stocky, unathletic. Only his eyes inform you he is not, few business men have eyes glowing with such dark strange fires as his, when enthusiasm is flaming in them. They are the eyes of a young reformer, an evangelist.

The fact is, Mr. Koussevitzky is an evangelist, and a showman. He would appreciate both Billy Sunday and P. T. Barnum.

This is what he told his interviewer of a trip he used to take in prewar Russia with an orchestra of 100 players, in a steamboat on the Volga.

Carried Music to Millions.

I carried music through a vast section of Russia," he said. "Once every two years before the war I used to charter a big steamer and make a journey of 2,500 miles. We stopped at every big city and many small towns. We sent men ahead to advertise that we were coming. The peasants would flock to the river from villages for miles back into country which few Europeans have ever seen. And I took them the best that exists in music, new and old, Debussy, Ravel, Florent Schmitt, P. Dukas, Roger Ducasse, Elgar, Richard Strauss. I made them known in villages where there isn't any modern life as Europe and America know it.

"I took them into the back country and gave them to hundreds of thousands of Russian people, scattered over an area of 500,000 square miles. You should have seen them come to see and hear us! And on these trips I found musicians who now are playing in the great capi-

"They were marvelous, those journeys. They are not possible any tals.

more."

Pride Is Pardonable.

There is a pardonable pride that glows th ugh the musician's story of his pre-war missionary tours. There is no doubt that Koussevitzky, like other artists, is an egotist, but his is not a blatant egotism. It is the self-confidence and pride of a man who has demonstrated his abilities and who is enthusiastic over the place of music in the general scheme of things.

Music is the most important thing in the world to him. Therefore, it must count for a great deal with society at large.

As a small boy, he says, the orchestras he heard in Tver, the north Russian community where he was born, exerted an impelling fascination over him. His family were mercantile, middle-class folk who were fond of music. It was early the center of his existence, and though he experimented with various instruments when a boy, he always intended to direct an orchestra as his life work.

When he was 14, he entered the conservatoire of the Moscow Philharmonic society as a student of composition and orchestral conducting. In order to qualify for a scholarship he studied the double bass and became such a master of that resounding instrument that upon the termination of his study he obtained the post of double bass soloist at the Moscow Imperial opera. For several years thereafter he appeared in the principal cities of Russia as a double bass virtuoso.

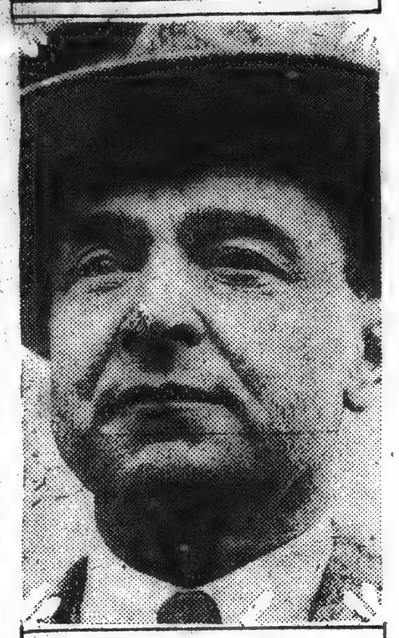
Established Own Orchestra.

He never lost sight of his real aim, to conduct a great orchestra. In 1909, after an intensive study of the interpretation of classics and moderns in an orchestra formed by him in Berlin from students of the Berlin High School of Music, he returned to Russia and established his own symphony orchestra in Moscow. This body of musicians quickly became famous all over Russia so that its appearance in Petrograd was always one of the great events of the court season. It was with this group of players with whcih Koussevitzky toured the Volga.

Then came the war. The first revolution, that of 1917, did not distur-

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
Christian Science Monitor
SEP 16 1924

AMERICA TO HEAR THIS CONDUCTOR



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Serge Koussevitzky, famous Russian musician, has been engaged to conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra this season. For the past four years he has been one of the outstanding figures in musical circles of London and Paris but this is his first visit to America.

(Other Komedies May Disappoint)

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE Post Courier
SEP 16 1924

DISTINGUISHED IMPORTATION—Serge Koussevitsky, the only living great orchestra conductor America has not heard, has arrived to conduct the Boston Symphony this season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

SEP 16 1924

BOSTON OBTAINS RUSSIAN TO LEAD ITS ORCHESTRA

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

This famous Russian musician has been engaged to conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra this season. For the past four years he has been one of the outstanding figures in musical circles of London and Paris, but this is his first visit here. Koussevitzky was first known, in Russia, as a remarkable virtuoso on the double bass, but he then assembled his own orchestra from Russia's best instrumentalists and toured the whole empire, even chartering a steamer and sailing the length of the Volga.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

SEP 16 1924

BOSTON OBTAINS RUSSIAN TO LEAD ITS ORCHESTRA

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

This famous Russian musician has been engaged to conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra this season. For the past four years he has been one of the outstanding figures in musical circles of London and Paris, but this is his first visit here. Koussevitzky was first known, in Russia, as a remarkable virtuoso on the double bass, but he then assembled his own orchestra from Russia's best instrumentalists and toured the whole empire, even chartering a steamer and sailing the length of the Volga.

SEP 1924

DISTINGUISHED IMPORTATION—Serge Koussevitsky, the only living great orchestra conductor America has not heard, has arrived to conduct the Boston Symphony this season.

FALL RIVER, MASS.
HERALD

SEP 16 1924

ESTABLISHED 1881
From Journal of Commerce
NEW YORK
SEP 16 1924

NOTED MUSICIAN ARRIVES.

Serge Koussevitzky, one of the greatest musical directors in Europe, arrived this week on the Aquitania to become conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, the first Russian to attain this honor.

DOUBLE BASS VIRTUOSO.

Serge Koussevitsky, noted conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, arrived in New York Sept. 12, on the Aquitania, accompanied by Madame Koussevitsky, his secretary, a maid and a valet. He brought with him his double bass, the instrument upon which he is the world's foremost virtuoso. An interesting fact is that he was decorated with the Cross of the Legion of Honor two days before leaving Paris. He will conduct the first concerts in this country Oct. 10 and 11.

110

COLORED PAPER

Tel. Chelsea 6800

THIS CLIPPING FROM ATLANTA, GA.
CONSTITUTION

SEP 15 1924

New Boston Symphony Leader

:: FORGOT HIS SUPPER WHILE JAZZ BAND PLAYED ::

Hopes to Learn From Jazz

BY ALLEN RAYMOND,
Paris Correspondent of The Constitution and the North American Newspaper Alliance.

Paris, August 14.—"What I hope to do in America is to show the public that masterpieces of music are being written today as powerful, stirring and beautiful as the greatest of the past," says Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor who will lead the Boston Symphony orchestra this coming season.

In the twilight shadow of his Paris home, looking down through the trees upon the peaceful Seine, he outlined his plans and hopes for his approaching career across the Atlantic.

"I will present in Boston music never heard before," he said, "music which now exists only in manuscripts which I have in my keeping, music written by men now living who will rank as high a century from now as Mozart and Beethoven. I have given some of their music to Paris. You have seen how it has been received. Some of it shall be America's first."

I have seen how Koussevitzky's music has been received in Paris. Music lovers in the French capital have gone mad over the Russian leader, literally frenzied in their idolatry.

But it is not alone for his introduction of new composers that they storm the doors of the Theatre Nationale de l'Opera for all his concerts.

Present Old Classics.

America may be sure that Koussevitzky will present its musical public with auditions of the older classics, without a trace of modernity for musical genius resident or native in the reading of them, their historic beauties reproduced painstakingly and enthusiastically, exactly as the modern Russian believes the older masters wished them rendered.

America also may be sure that this man will be engaged during his entire stay in America on a passionate hunt in the new world.

"I will do in the new world what I have done in the old," was his reply to a request for an outline of his plans.

In the old world he has become known as a hunter for musical talent, and a patron of young composers. He believes there is genius in America, and he hopes to ferret it out. The breadth of territory which his search will cover may be indicated by an incident he told the interviewer.

"Jazz music?" (He was answering a query.) "I like all good music. And several Americans have written jazz which is truly good. Besides writing it, your nation seems to have a talent for playing it.

Finds Jazz Band Splendid.

"I was in London recently, and dropped in late at night for something to eat at a supper club where dancing was going on. There was an orchestra of American boys there. The oldest could not have been more than 30. I had a table near them where I could hear them and watch them individually. Some of those boys were improvising as they went along, and they were great players. I let my supper was cold listening to them. I stayed until a shockingly late hour. Those boys were fine musicians, but I learned that they were not particularly notable among America's jazz musicians—just a group of college students from one of your western states."

Mr. Koussevitzky is a man of one passion, music. He is a man of no hobbies. Over and above his talents, his outstanding quality is enthusiasm. He is as enthusiastic over the subject he expounds from his conductor's platform as is Billy Sunday over his. (Their methods of exposition differ.)

Orchestra Leader at 12 Years.

Music has been practically his entire life since the age when most boys are playing marbles. At the age of 12 he conducted a provincial theater orchestra in Russia, and was a composer. Today he is 52 years old.

Mr. Koussevitzy is married. His wife is musical. Mrs. Koussevitzky is the sort of person to whom the young Rusian composers dedicate their ambitious works. A species of goddess, for Scriabin, Stravinsky and their fellows. She has great sympathy for them, is a tireless listener, an able and appreciative critic. She is more than well-to-do. She has published the music of more than one hungry genius, and has supplied food to many others.

In appearance, manner and dress Mr. Koussevitzky might be a successful middle-aged business man—a forceful figure of no eccentricities, of middle height, stocky, unathletic. Only his eyes inform you he is not, few business men have eyes glowing with such dark strange fires as his, when enthusiasm is flaming in them. They are the eyes of a young reformer, an evangelist.

The fact is, Mr. Koussevitzky is an evangelist, and a showman. He would appreciate both Billy Sunday and P. T. Barnum.

This is what he told his interviewer of a trip he used to take in prewar Russia with an orchestra of 100 players, in a steamboat on the Volga.

Carried Music to Millions.

I carried music through a vast section of Russia," he said. "Once every two years before the war I used to charter a big steamer and make a journey of 2,500 miles. We stopped at every big city and many small towns. We sent men ahead to advertise that we were coming. The peasants would flock to the river from villages for miles back into country which few Europeans have ever seen. And I took them the best that exists in music, new and old, Debussy, Ravel, Florent Schmitt, P. Dukas, Roger Ducasse, Elgar, Richard Strauss. I made them known in villages where there isn't any modern life as Europe and America know it.

"I took them into the back country and gave them to hundreds of thousands of Russian people, scattered over an area of 500,000 square miles. You should have seen them come to see and hear us! And on these trips I found musicians who now are playing in the great capi-

"They were marvelous, those journeys. They are not possible any tals.

more."

Pride Is Pardonable.

There is a pardonable pride that glows through the musician's story of his pre-war missionary tours. There is no doubt that Koussevitzky, like other artists, is an egotist, but his is not a blatant egotism. It is the self-confidence and pride of a man who has demonstrated his abilities and who is enthusiastic over the place of music in the general scheme of things.

Music is the most important thing in the world to him. Therefore, it must count for a great deal with society at large.

As a small boy, he says, the orchestras he heard in Tver, the north Russian community where he was born, exerted an impelling fascination over him. His family were mercantile, middle-class folk who were fond of music. It was early the center of his existence, and though he experimented with various instruments when a boy, he always intended to direct an orchestra as his life work.

When he was 14, he entered the conservatoire of the Moscow Philharmonic society as a student of composition and orchestral conducting. In order to qualify for a scholarship he studied the double bass and became such a master of that resounding instrument that upon the termination of his study he obtained the post of double bass soloist at the Moscow Imperial opera. For several years thereafter he appeared in the principal cities of Russia as a double bass virtuoso.

Established Own Orchestra.

He never lost sight of his real aim, to conduct a great orchestra. In 1909, after an intensive study of the interpretation of classics and moderns in an orchestra formed by him in Berlin from students of the Berlin High School of Music, he returned to Russia and established his own symphony orchestra in Moscow. This body of musicians quickly became famous all over Russia so that its appearance in Petrograd was always one of the great events of the court season. It was with this group of players with whoih Koussevitzky toured the Volga.

Then came the war. The first revolution, that of 1917, did not disturb

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE Atlanta
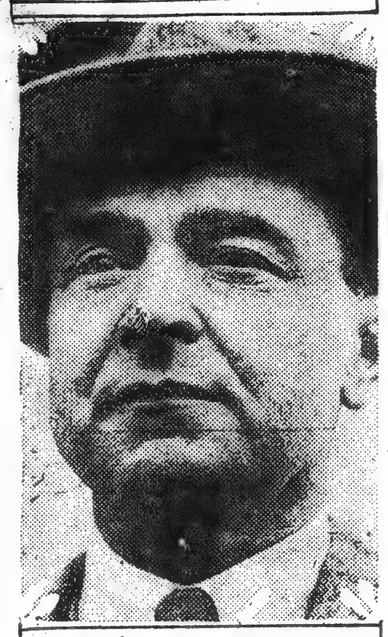
SEP 1924

AMERICA TO HEAR THIS CONDUCTOR



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Serge Koussevitzky, famous Russian musician, has been engaged to conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra this season. For the past four years he has been one of the outstanding figures in musical circles of London and Paris but this is his first visit to America.

(Other Kohelikes May Disappoint)

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
Post
SEP 1924

DISTINGUISHED IMPORTATION—Serge Koussevitsky, the only living great orchestra conductor America has not heard, has arrived to conduct the Boston Symphony this season

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

SEP 16 1924

BOSTON OBTAINS RUSSIAN TO LEAD ITS ORCHESTRA

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

This famous Russian musician has been engaged to conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra this season. For the past four years he has been one of the outstanding figures in musical circles of London and Paris, but this is his first visit here. Koussevitzky was first known, in Russia, as a remarkable virtuoso on the double bass, but he then assembled his own orchestra from Russia's best instrumentalists and toured the whole empire, even chartering a steamer and sailing the length of the Volga.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS

SEP 16 1924

BOSTON OBTAINS RUSSIAN TO LEAD ITS ORCHESTRA

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

This famous Russian musician has been engaged to conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra this season. For the past four years he has been one of the outstanding figures in musical circles of London and Paris, but this is his first visit here. Koussevitzky was first known, in Russia, as a remarkable virtuoso on the double bass, but he then assembled his own orchestra from Russia's best instrumentalists and toured the whole empire, even chartering a steamer and sailing the length of the Volga.

SEP 1924

DISTINGUISHED IMPORTATION—Serge Koussevitsky, the only living great orchestra conductor America has not heard, has arrived to conduct the Boston Symphony this season.

FALL RIVER, MASS.
HERALD

SEP 16 1924

ESTABLISHED 1881
From

NOTED MUSICIAN ARRIVES.

Serge Koussevitzky, one of the greatest musical directors in Europe, arrived this week on the Aquitania to become conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, the first Russian to attain this honor.

DOUBLE BASS VIRTUOSO.

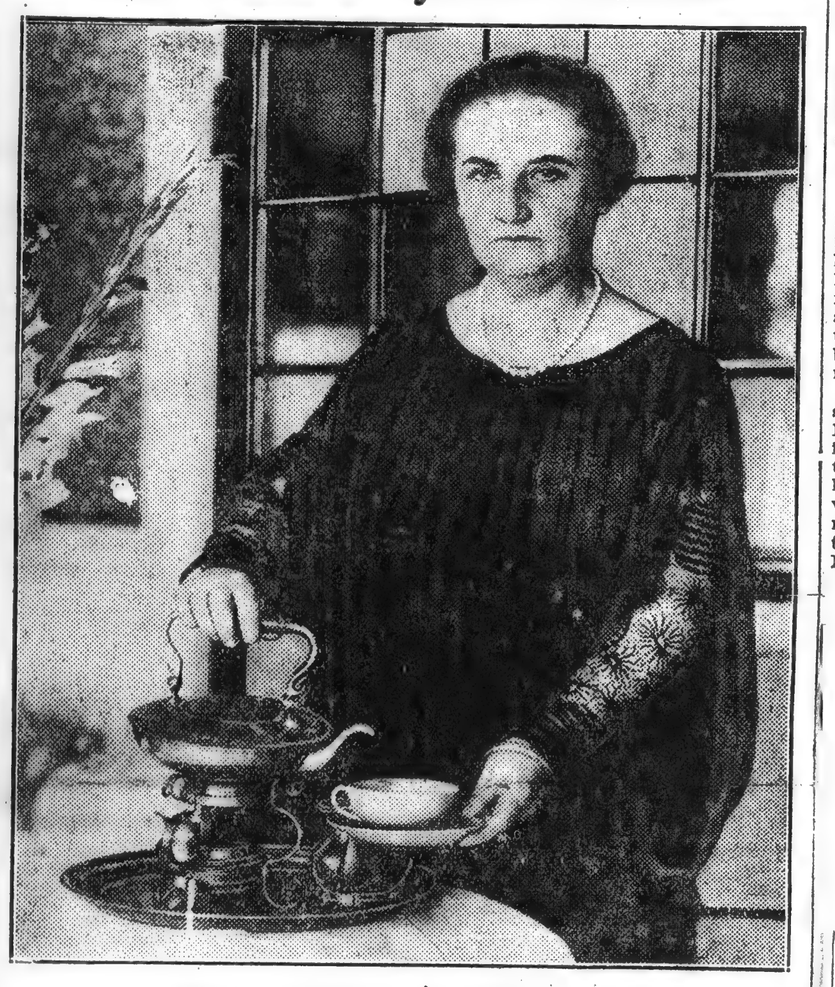
Serge Koussevitsky, noted conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, arrived in New York Sept. 12, on the Aquitania, accompanied by Madame Koussevitsky, his secretary, a maid and a valet. He brought with him his double bass, the instrument upon which he is the world's foremost virtuoso. An interesting fact is that he was decorated with the Cross of the Legion of Honor two days before leaving Paris. He will conduct the first concerts in this country Oct. 10 and 11.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
POST

SEP 16 1924

CONDUCTOR'S WIFE DEVOTED TO HOME

Mrs. Koussevitzky's Hobby Is Sculpture, but Her Chief Aim Is to Insure Husband's Physical Comfort



MME. NATHALIE KOUSSEVITZKY
Wife of the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who says it is her chief duty to look after the physical welfare and comfort of her husband.

BY RUTH MANSFIELD

Tall, unassuming, with a quiet dignity enhanced by a smart black gown bearing the indelible stamp of Paris, Mme. Nathalie Koussevitzky, wife of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's new conductor, made her bow to the American public yesterday.

SOCIAL FAME NOT SOUGHT

In her first interview granted since her arrival here in the United States, Mme. Koussevitzky told a Post reporter that she had no aspirations to make the temporary Koussevitzky home at 122 Pond street, Jamaica Plain, a social centre for the musical genius of the world. Neither did she bring a trunkful of hats and two trunkfuls of Parisian gowns to wear doing the housework of the traditional artist's wife.

Fame of this type does not appeal to the tall, well-built blonde woman, who frankly admits to being 40 years old. She told the interviewer she was perfectly happy to be known simply as "the wife of Serge Koussevitzky, musician and conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

Doesn't Like to Cook

"Cook? Oh, I don't like it," she said with something so near a shudder that all visions of meals prepared for the artist-husband by her own dainty hands vanished at once. "I can cook—I had to learn during the revolution, but now my knowledge along that line is confined largely to making tea."

And then she consented to brew just a bit of Russia's favorite beverage while a Post photographer took pictures of her, giving the reporter a minute to notice that the straight-line black georgette gown was very chic with its many tiny pleats, its tight lace sleeves and its girdling of lace. Taupe colored stockings with black satin slippers completed her costume. The new director's wife is evidently fond of beautiful jewelry, for she wore a choker pearl necklace, large sapphire, and diamond rings and several bracelets set with the same stones.

Go to Every Concert

"The duties of a director's wife?" she queried as she resumed the interview after the picture taking. "I shall go to the concerts every week. I don't know whether my seats are reserved or not, but Mr. Koussevitzky will not direct unless I am there. I go always. Rather far back in the hall I hope they will be," she added, explaining that the music of a symphony orchestra sounded better blended when not too near the front of the hall.

"I shall supervise the house. So much depends on a man's physical comfort. But as for entertaining, we shall have little time for that. Mr. Koussevitzky must work hard and I—I hope to fix up a little studio."

Skilled at Sculpture

Sculpture is Mme. Koussevitzky's hobby and as an amateur she has won not a little fame for herself in Russia. She said she hoped to continue her work while in this country, provided she can find a studio with suitable light.

Music, however, is her first love, she revealed, with which she was brought up from girlhood. Constantine Ouchkoff's large home in Moscow was the centre of music-loving, music-gifted people, and it was here that Nathalie Ouchkoff, the land-owner's youngest daughter met and mingled with Rachmaninoff, Chaliapin, Roerich and scores of other celebrities. But among these people, she fell in love with a rising young double bass artist, her present husband.

"We ran away to Dresden to get married," she said. "Papa came along with us but we simply had to escape a large wedding. Yes, it was just 19 years ago."

The revolution caught the artist and his wife in its coils, like many another celebrity—it squeezed away the wealth and property of her father, who died during the struggle.

"But the Bolshevists were kinder to professional people. My husband lost his musical library, said to be the best in Russia, and his musical instruments, all except his Amati second double bass. Even with the loss of his musical library, we managed to bring three trunkfuls of scores and music along with us."

No Flappers in Russia

Mme. Koussevitzky admitted that in her first few days here—for it is her first trip to this country—she had hardly become acquainted. In fact, she hadn't heard the word "flapper" in her five days here, didn't know what it was and confessed, after her secretary interpreted the reporter's description of bobbed hair and cigarettes, she had never met one.

"No, there was no short hair in Russia when I left there, four years ago. But in Paris—everywhere. I don't like it except on young people, but over there, the very old women have short hair. As for cigarette smoking, every woman has smoked in Russia since the revolution. Before then, it was only the old women who used cigarettes. Now—we all do."

Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO,
ILL.
JOURNAL

SEP 16 19

MUSIC

By EUGENE STINSON

The migration of European conductors continues. Koussevitzky has arrived in America to take charge of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Stravinsky, who is coming over as guest of the New York Philharmonic, has recently accepted an invitation to conduct some special performances this season for the Cleveland Symphony. Ignatz Waghalter, for twelve years conductor of the German Opera house in Berlin, has arrived in America, and has been engaged to act as general director of some performances of "The Ring of the Nibelung" to be sung in English under the supervision of Andreas Dippel.

There is another side to the matter. Most of the American orchestra's conductors are returning, or are about to return from European vacations or engagements. Frederick Stock, conductor of the Chicago Symphony orchestra, is due here the first of October, and will undoubtedly bring with him his customary portfolio of orchestral novelties.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch, head of the Detroit orchestra, is conducting three European concerts this month, two in Berlin and one in Amsterdam. The Holland city is the home of the chief conductor of the New York Philharmonic, Willem Mengelberg.

Walter Damrosch, who gave a Beethoven cycle in Paris last spring, brought back with him many new scores with which to agitate his audiences. At least the names they bear—Honegger and Malipiero among them—suggest the less contemplative delights of symphonic adventuring. And in a list of traveling European conductors, do not omit the names of the opera time beaters.

Sowerby, the

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
~~CITIZEN~~

SEP 16 1924

RUSSIAN CONDUCTOR — Serge Koussevitzky, famous Russian musician, who has been engaged to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, has just arrived here on the steamship Aquitania

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

SEP 1924

DISTINGUISHED IMPORTATION—Serge Koussevitsky, the only living great orchestra conductor America has not heard, has arrived to conduct the Boston Symphony this season.

112

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
NEWS

SEP 17 1924

Bain photo.

COMES TO AMERICA—Serge Koussevitzky, noted European musician and orchestra conductor, has come to America to take charge of the Boston symphony orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Times
SEP 15 1924

DISTINGUISHED IMPORTATION—Serge Koussevitsky, the only living great orchestra conductor America has not heard, has arrived to conduct the Boston Symphony this season.

Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

SEP 18 1924

NOTES and LINES
By PHILIP HALE

The conductors of the London Symphony orchestra this season—it begins Oct. 20—will be Albert Coates, Furtwaengler, Weingartner, Schneevoight—he conducted a concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra last season, a violent conductor—and Koussevitzky, or, as the Daily Telegraph prefers, "Kussevitzky." No doubt the "o" is inserted in France and America, so that the pronunciation "Cussevitsky" will not grate on the ears of those acquainted with foreign tongues.

The Telegraph says that Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct the two final concerts of the London orchestra in May.

(Other Romeikes May Disappoint)

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

SEP 1924

DISTINGUISHED IMPORTATION—Serge Koussevitsky, the only ~~living~~ great orchestra conductor America has not heard, has arrived to conduct the Boston Symphony this season.

(Other Romeikes ...y Disappoint)

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

SEP 1924

DISTINGUISHED IMPORTATION—Serge Koussevitsky the only living great orchestra conductor America has not heard, has arrived to conduct the Boston Symphony this season.

Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM

SEP 1924

Who's Who
In The Day's News

SERGE KAUSSEVITZKY

"What I hope to do in America is to show the public that masterpieces of music are being written today as powerful, stirring and beautiful as the greatest of the past," says Serge Koussevitzky, the only great living orchestra conductor for America has not heard. He recently arrived in this country to conduct for a season.

The conductor has had a brilliant career. He was born in Tver, in the northern part of Russia in 1874. His first musical instruction was given him in his home. His progress was so precocious that at the age of 12 he became conductor, for two years in the theatre of his native town. He had not only to conduct, but to compose music for the dramas performed in the theatre.

At 14 Kossevitsky entered the Moscow conservatory. There he became a pupil on the double-bass of Rambaussec and developed such virtuousity on this clumsy instrument that he succeeded his professor as teacher of it at the Conservatoire and later became the most famous double-bass virtuoso in the world.

Forms Student Orchestra.

All along, however, he had ambitions to become a conductor. In 1907 he formed an orchestra from the pupils of the Hochschule in Berlin, with which he worked two years, studying chiefly the classics and Wagner. Returning to Russia in 1909 he organized the Kussevitsky Orchestra, which soon became famous, and also gave performances at his Moscow concerts with a chorus of 250 voices. In the Summer, for many years, he toured the provinces with his orchestra and inaugurated the series of famous tours of the ports of the Volga. For these tours he engaged a special ship with a platform at the back and sailed from port to port, introducing in many places that had never heard an orchestra the work of great masters.

Red Revolt Halts Work.

At the time of the Russian Kerensky revolution of 1917 Kussevitsky was appointed general conductor of the Russian State Orchestra, this orchestra having formerly been the court orchestra of the Czar. With the Bolshevik uprising he was forced to fly to Paris. Since then he has been very active as a guest conductor in London and English provinces, in Scotland, and in Paris, where in the last five seasons the Kussevitsky concerts at the opera have become more and more musical "rage."

Kussevitsky has been much discussed in Europe for his interpretation of the classics as well as his virtuoso reading of modern music.

Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM DENVER, COLO.
TIMES

SEP 18 1924

DISTINGUISHED IMPORTATION—Serge Koussevitsky, the only living great orchestra conductor America has not heard, has arrived to conduct the Boston Symphony this season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LOUISVILLE, KY.
HERALD

SEP 18 1924

Of course you know Serge Koussevitsky?

He is coming over to lead the Boston Symphony and he likes American "jazz."

There was Beethoven, he says, and he is gone.

Serge is a diplomat, musician or no.

Somersworth.

Was there no tight rope walker in Somersworth that season?

Herald Tribune, Sept 18

The conductors of the London Symphony orchestra this season—it begins Oct. 20—will be Albert Coates, Furtwaengler, Weingartner, Schneevoight—he conducted a concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra last season, a violent conductor—and Koussevitzky, or, as the Daily Telegraph prefers, "Kussevitzky." No doubt the "o" is inserted in France and America, so that the pronunciation "Cussevitzky" will not grate on the ears of those acquainted with foreign tongues.

The Telegraph says that Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct the two final concerts of the London orchestra in May.

BEST BY ATTEST

Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS

220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
MUSICAL COURIER
SEP 18 1924

KOUSSEVITZKY, ARRIVING IN BOSTON, ASSURES CONSERVATIVES THEY WILL NOT BE SHOCKED

American Composers on Program—Selection of Soloists Designed to Maintain Symphonic Integrity of Concerts—Hayes to Open Sunday Concerts—Registration at New England Conservatory

Boston, Mass., September 13.—Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived in Boston last evening from New York, where he landed from the Aquitania yesterday morning. The celebrated Russian leader, who is making his first trip to this country, was accompanied by quite an entourage, including Mme. Koussevitzky; his secretary, Dr. Vladimir Zederbaum; a valet and two servants. Manager W. H. Brennan of the orchestra; J. N. Burk, press representative at Symphony Hall, and Warren Storey Smith, music critic of the Boston Post, had met him at quarantine. Upon their arrival at Back Bay, the party at once motored to the house at 122 Pond street, Jamaica Plain, which has been taken for the year.

Through Dr. Zederbaum, Mr. Koussevitzky told the newspapermen that he had long known of Boston as one of the principal musical and intellectual centers of America. "My dear friend, Nikisch, often spoke to me of this city," he said, "and his enthusiasm infected me. Moreover, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is reputed throughout Europe to number some of the greatest musicians of the world in its ranks. I have declined several offers from musical organizations in America. While I had my own orchestra in Russia I refused all offers of engagements, as I naturally preferred to give the pieces I chose in my own way. When my orchestra was disbanded I felt that the only post which I would accept in this country would be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was the only organization which could give me true satisfaction. I am indeed flattered by the invitation."

Both Old and New on Programs.

The question of programs arose. "In the first place," Mr. Koussevitzky began, "I am aware of the rumors about my radicalism, but I do not believe Boston will be shocked. I will not play bad music but only the best which is now being produced. At all events, any modernism will consist not so much in new selections as in the arrangement of the programs. I think that an erroneous idea about my radicalism has sprung from my Paris concerts. It was my purpose there to present a new musical art. Here it is entirely different. I am here for an entire season, so my programs will contain both the old and the new. Since I believe in progress in art I cannot leave out what is now being created by young composers."

Answering the inevitable query regarding jazz, Mr. Koussevitzky declared with spirit, "I like it very much. I consider it one of the most important elements of the new music. It has had great influence on most modern musicians of talent. You surely appreciate the fact that jazz has such a potent influence because it springs from life itself—the dance instinct."

Of American composers and their music, the Slav conductor feels that he knows too little, according to Mr. Smith, music critic of the Boston Post, who accompanied Mr. Koussevitzky from New York; but it is his immediate purpose to study them. "For he believes that American music should receive performance," writes Mr. Smith "and he plans to make himself familiar with our American orchestral repertory. He is not always quite certain, however, just which composers of foreign blood now resident among us may be accounted truly American, and he wished particularly to know whether the ex-Swiss Ernest Bloch is now considered by us an American.

"The music of John Alden Carpenter, Mr. Koussevitzky already knows and admires; hence we may expect this season some of the other music from the author of the Adventures in a Perambulator, with which Mr. Monteux bade farewell to Boston.

"But it is not only new music of Europe and the music of our own Americans that Mr. Koussevitzky will bring to performance. That he will give place to a goodly porportion of the classics goes without the saying in the case of a musician of such broad sympathies and such fine scholarship as Mr. Koussevitzky, and not a little of his great European reputation as conductor has rested upon his ability to infuse with new vitality the works of Beethoven et al."

Photo by Garduna

ANDRES DE SEGUROLA,

distinguished basso, formerly with the Metropolitan Opera Company f seasons, who announces that he has decided to take a very limited n pupils owing to repeated requests from artists and students. Mr. de wide theatrical experience equips him thoroughly for this phase of his will also inaugurate a series of Artistic Mornings (Pro-American Art) i ball-room of the Hotel Plaza, beginning on November 13.

Symphony Soloists.

The powers that be at Symphony Hall are nothing if not hospitable. Hence, during this first year of the Russian dynasty in musical Boston, everything possible will be done to help Mr. Koussevitzky feel at home. Accordingly, the tentative list of soloists announced for this season includes Serge Prokofieff, Igor Stravinsky and Serge Rachmaninoff—all appearing in performances of their own works. Other artists already engaged are Margaret Matzenauer, contralto; Albert Spalding, violinist, and Guy Maier and Lee Pattison, the two-piano team. A statement from the management informs us that in deciding upon these soloists and others to be announced, "the conductor is considering not solely their abilities as virtuosi, but also certain scores of orchestral importance for the solo parts of which the genius of each is particularly suited. . . . In this way, the programs will have the additional interest of celebrated musical personalities, while never forfeiting their symphonic integrity." That were indeed a consummation devoutly to be desired, and it is to be hoped that Mr. Koussevitzky will not permit himself to be swerved from this noble purpose.

Honegger on First Program.

The new conductor's plans for the season that impends have been more or less shaped. They include first performances in America of a number of compositions which he has introduced in Europe and which have occasioned much interest there. Some of the scores have been published by the Russian firm that bears his name. The established symphonic repertory will predominate, however.

The selection of pieces for the first five symphony concerts has been completed, and it is interesting to note that the opening program, for the concerts of October 10 and 11, lists Honegger's Pacific, 231, the work which was inspired by a locomotive. Another promising score scheduled for early performance is Ravel's orchestral transcription of Moussorgsky's Pictures from an Exhibition, highly imaginative piano pieces, introduced here by Mr. Bauer a few seasons ago.

All in all, this promises to be a very stimulating year at Symphony Hall, and those who have the best interests of the orchestra at heart will give Mr. Koussevitzky the cordial welcome which his reputation merits and the hearty encouragemtnt that he will need if the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to be restored to its early glories.

Hayes to Open Sunday Concerts.

Roland Hayes, who has returned from numerous successes in Europe, is to undertake this season an extensive tour of America which will culminate in the spring on the Pacific Coast. He will start the tour in Boston with a concert on Sunday afternoon, October 5, in Symphony Hall. This concert will open the season of Sunday afternoon concerts, which will also include an appearance by Mme. Schumann-Heink on Sunday, October 12, and a concert by John McCormack, on October 19.

106-110 SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From
TIMES UNION
Albany, N. Y.
SEP 19 1924

DISTINGUISHED IMPORTATION—Serge Koussevitsky, the only living great orchestra conductor America has not heard, has arrived to conduct the Boston Symphony this season.

BEST BY ATTEST

Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS

220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
MUSICAL COURIER
SEP 18 1924

KOUSSEVITZKY, ARRIVING IN BOSTON, ASSURES CONSERVATIVES THEY WILL NOT BE SHOCKED

American Composers on Program—Selection of Soloists Designed to Maintain Symphonic Integrity of Concerts—Hayes to Open Sunday Concerts—Registration at New England Conservatory

Boston, Mass., September 13.—Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived in Boston last evening from New York, where he landed from the Aquitania yesterday morning. The celebrated Russian leader, who is making his first trip to this country, was accompanied by quite an entourage, including Mme. Koussevitzky; his secretary, Dr. Vladimir Zederbaum; a valet and two servants. Manager W. H. Brennan of the orchestra; J. N. Burk, press representative at Symphony Hall, and Warren Storey Smith, music critic of the Boston Post, had met him at quarantine. Upon their arrival at Back Bay, the party at once motored to the house at 122 Pond street, Jamaica Plain, which has been taken for the year.

Through Dr. Zederbaum, Mr. Koussevitzky told the newspapermen that he had long known of Boston as one of the principal musical and intellectual centers of America. "My dear friend, Nikisch, often spoke to me of this city," he said, "and his enthusiasm infected me. Moreover, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is reputed throughout Europe to number some of the greatest musicians of the world in its ranks. I have declined several offers from musical organizations in America. While I had my own orchestra in Russia I refused all offers of engagements, as I naturally preferred to give the pieces I chose in my own way. When my orchestra was disbanded I felt that the only post which I would accept in this country would be with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was the only organization which could give me true satisfaction. I am indeed flattered by the invitation."

BOTH OLD AND NEW ON PROGRAMS.

The question of programs arose. "In the first place," Mr. Koussevitzky began, "I am aware of the rumors about my radicalism, but I do not believe Boston will be shocked. I will not play bad music but only the best which is now being produced. At all events, any modernism will consist not so much in new selections as in the arrangement of the programs. I think that an erroneous idea about my radicalism has sprung from my Paris concerts. It was my purpose there to present a new musical art. Here it is entirely different. I am here for an entire season, so my programs will contain both the old and the new. Since I believe in progress in art I cannot leave out what is now being created by young composers."

Answering the inevitable query regarding jazz, Mr. Koussevitzky declared with spirit, "I like it very much. I consider it one of the most important elements of the new music. It has had great influence on most modern musicians of talent. You surely appreciate the fact that jazz has such a potent influence because it springs from life itself—the dance instinct."

Of American composers and their music, the Slav conductor feels that he knows too little, according to Mr. Smith, music critic of the Boston Post, who accompanied Mr Koussevitzky from New York; but it is his immediate purpose to study them. "For he believes that American music should receive performance," writes Mr. Smith "and he plans to make himself familiar with our American orchestral repertory He is not always quite certain, however just which composers of foreign blood now resident among us may be accounted truly American, and he wished particularly to know whether the ex-Swiss Ernest Bloch is now considered by us an American.

"The music of John Alden Carpenter, Mr. Koussevitzky already knows and admires; hence we may expect this season some of the other music from the author of the Adventures in a Perambulator, with which Mr. Monteux bade farewell to Boston.

"But it is not only new music of Europe and the music of our own Americans that Mr. Koussevitzky will bring to performance. That he will give place to a goodly porportion of the classics goes without the saying in the case of a musician of such broad sympathies and such fine scholarship as Mr. Koussevitzky, and not a little of his great European reputation as conductor has rested upon his ability to infuse with new vitality the works of Beethoven et al."

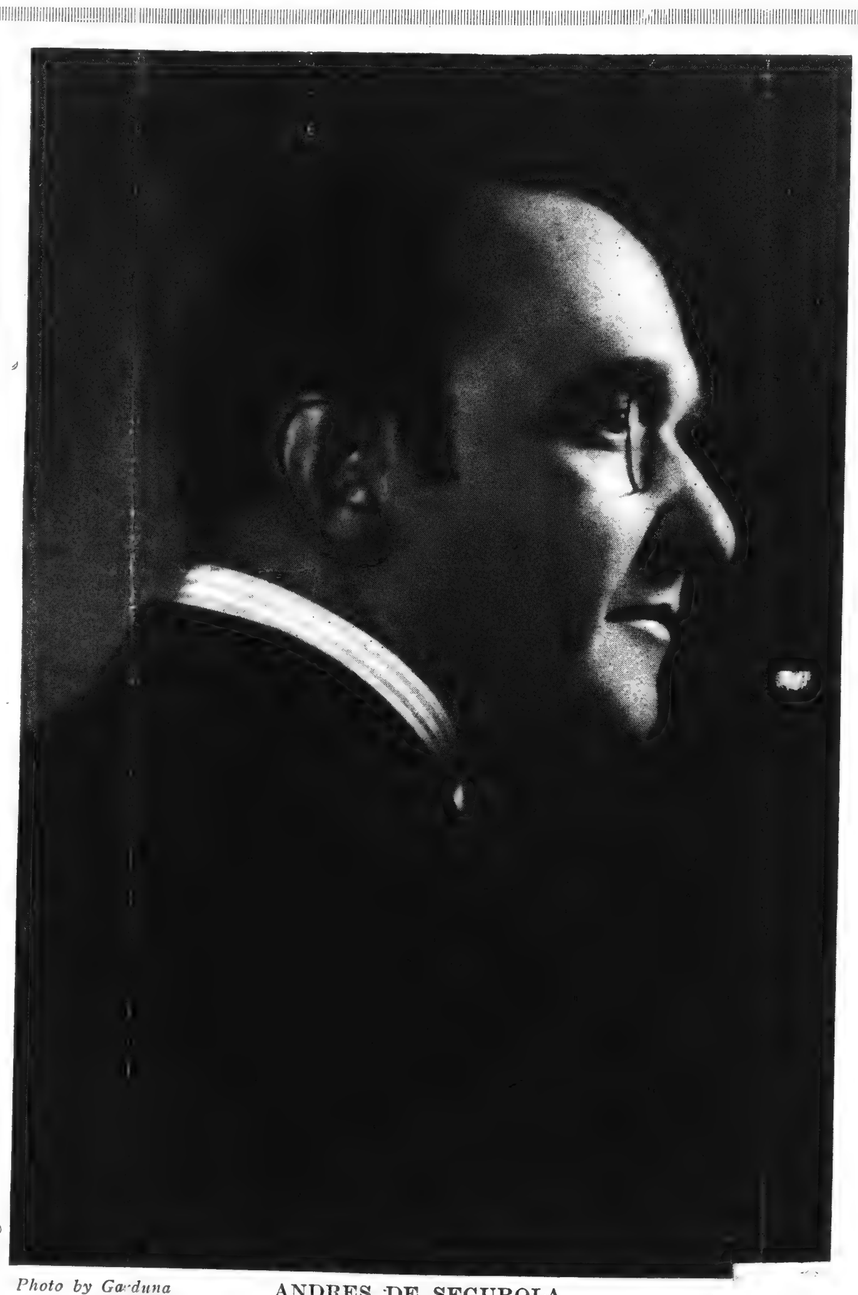

Photo by Gerduna ANDRES DE SEGUROLA,

distinguished basso, formerly with the Metropolitan Opera Company seasons, who announces that he has decided to take a very limited pupils owing to repeated requests from artists and students. Mr. de wide theatrical experience equips him thoroughly for this phase of his will also inaugurate a series of Artistic Mornings (Pro-American Art) i ball-room of the Hotel Plaza, beginning on November 13.

SYMPHONY SOLOISTS.

The powers that be at Symphony Hall are nothing if not hospitable. Hence, during this first year of the Russian dynasty in musical Boston, everything possible will be done to help Mr. Koussevitzky feel at home. Accordingly, the tentative list of soloists announced for this season includes Serge Prokofieff, Igor Stravinsky and Serge Rachmaninoff—all appearing in performances of their own works. Other artists already engaged are Margaret Matzenauer, contralto; Albert Spalding, violinist, and Guy Maier and Lee Pattison, the two-piano team. A statement from the management informs us that in deciding upon these soloists and others to be announced, "the conductor is considering not solely their abilities as virtuosi, but also certain scores of orchestral importance for the solo parts of which the genius of each is particularly suited. . . . In this way, the programs will have the additional interest of celebrated musical personalities, while never forfeiting their symphonic integrity." That were indeed a consummation devoutly to be desired, and it is to be hoped that Mr. Koussevitzky will not permit himself to be swerved from this noble purpose.

HONEGGER ON FIRST PROGRAM.

The new conductor's plans for the season that impends have been more or less shaped. They include first performances in America of a number of compositions which he has introduced in Europe and which have occasioned much interest there. Some of the scores have been published by the Russian firm that bears his name. The established symphonic repertory will predominate, however.

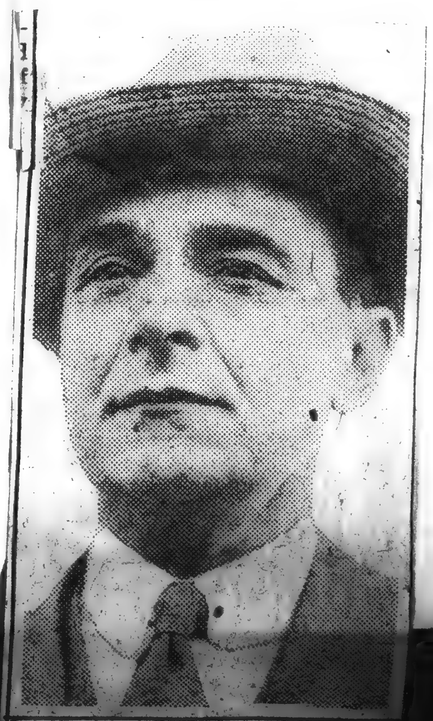
The selection of pieces for the first five symphony concerts has been completed, and it is interesting to note that the opening program, for the concerts of October 10 and 11, lists Honegger's Pacific, 231, the work which was inspired by a locomotive. Another promising score scheduled for early performance is Ravel's orchestral transcription of Moussorgsky's Pictures from an Exhibition, highly imaginative piano pieces, introduced here by Mr. Bauer a few seasons ago.

All in all, this promises to be a very stimulating year at Symphony Hall, and those who have the best interests of the orchestra at heart will give Mr. Koussevitzky the cordial welcome which his reputation merits and the hearty encouragemtnt that he will need if the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to be restored to its early glories.

HAYES TO OPEN SUNDAY CONCERTS.

Roland Hayes, who has returned from numerous successes in Europe, is to undertake this season an extensive tour of America which will culminate in the spring on the Pacific Coast. He will start the tour in Boston with a concert on Sunday afternoon, October 5, in Symphony Hall. This concert will open the season of Sunday afternoon concerts, which will also include an appearance by Mme. Schumann-Heink on Sunday, October 12, and a concert by John McCormack, on October 19.

106-110 SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From
TIMES UNION
Albany, N. Y.
SEP 19 1924



DISTINGUISHED IMPORTATION—Serge Koussevitsky, the only living great orchestra conductor America has not heard, has arrived to conduct the Boston Symphony this season.

114

(Other Romeikes May Disappoint)

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

SEP 1924

Who's Who in the Day's News

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY.

"What I hope to do in America is to show the public that masterpieces of music are being written today as powerful, stirring and beautiful as the greatest of the past," says Serge Koussevitzky, the only great living orchestra conductor for America has not heard. He recently arrived in this country to conduct for a season.

The conductor has had a brilliant career. He was born in Tver, in the northern part of Russia in 1874. His first musical instruction, was given him in his home. His progress was so precocious that at the age of 12 he became conductor, for two years, in the theatre of his native town. He had not only to conduct, but to compose music for the dramas performed in the theater.

At 14 Koussevitsky entered the Moscow conservatory. There he became a pupil on the double-bass of Rambaussec and developed such virtuosity on this clumsy instrument that he succeeded his professor as teacher of it at the Conservatoire and later became the most famous double-bass virtuoso in the world.

Forms Student Orchestra.

All along, however, he had ambitions to become a conductor. In 1907 he formed an orchestra from the pupils of the Hochschule in Berlin, with which he worked two years, studying chiefly the classics and Wagner. Returning to Russia in 1909 he organized the Koussevitsky orchestra, which soon became famous, and also gave performances at his Moscow concerts with a chorus of 250 voices. In the Summer, for many years, he toured the provinces with his orchestra and inaugurated the series of famous tours of the ports of the Volga. For these tours he engaged a special ship with a platform at the back and sailed from port to port, introducing in many places that had never heard an orchestra the work of great masters.

Red Revolt Halts Work.

At the time of the Russian Kerensky revolution of 1917 Koussevitsky was appointed general conductor of the Russian State Orchestra, this orchestra having formerly been the court orchestra of the czar. With the bolshevik uprising he was forced to fly to Paris. Since then he has been very active as a guest conductor in London and English provinces, in Scotland, and in Paris, where in the last five seasons the Kussevitsky concerts at the opera have become more and more the musical "rage."

Koussevitsky has been much discussed in Europe for his interpretation of the classics as well as his virtuoso reading of modern music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

SEP 1924

WHO'S WHO

IN THE DAY'S NEWS

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

"What I hope to do in America is to show the public that masterpieces of music are being written today as powerful, stirring and beautiful as the greatest of the past," says Serge Koussevitzky, the only great living orchestra conductor for America has not heard. He recently arrived in this country to conduct for a season.

The conductor has had a brilliant career He was born in Tver, in the northern part of Russia in 1874. His first musical instruction was given him in his home. His progress was so precocious that at the age of 12 he became conductor, for two years, in the theater of his native town. He had not only to conduct, but to compose music for the dramas performed in the theater.

At 14 Kossevitsky entered the Moscow conservatory. There he became a pupil on the double-bass of Rambaussec and developed such virtuosity on this clumsy instrument that he succeeded his professor as teacher of it at the Conservatoire and later became the most famous double-bass virtuoso in the world.

All along, however, he had ambitions to become a conductor. In 1907 he formed an orchestra from the pupils of the Hochschule in Berlin, with which he worked two years, studying chiefly the classics and Wagner. Returning to Russia in 1909 he organized the Kussevitsky Orchestra, which soon became famous, and also gave performances at his Moscow concerts with a chorus of 250 voices. In the Summer, for many years, he toured the provinces with his orchestra and inaugurated the series of famous tours of the ports of the Volga. For these tours he engaged a special ship with a platform at the back and sailed from port to port, introducing in many places that had never heard an orchestra the work of great masters.

At the time of the Russian Kerensky revolution of 1917 Kussevitsky was appointed general conductor of the Russian State Orchestra, this orchestra having formerly been the court orchestra of the Czar. With the Bolshevik uprising he was forced to fly to Paris. Since then he has been very active as a guest conductor in London and English provinces, in Scotland, and in Paris, where in the last five seasons the Kussevitsky concerts at the opera have become more and more the musical "rage."

Kussevitsky has been much discussed in Europe for his interpretation of the classics as well as his virtuoso ready of modern music.

Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM

STAMFORD, CONN.
SENTINAL

SEP 19 1924

WHO'S WHO

IN THE DAY'S NEWS

SERGE KAUSSEVITZKY.

"What I hope to do in America is to show the public that masterpieces of music are being written today as powerful, stirring and beautiful as the greatest of the past," says Serge Koussevitzky, the only great living orchestra conductor for America has not heard. He recently arrived in this country to conduct for a season.

The conductor has had a brilliant career. He was born in Tver, in the northern part of Russia, in 1874. His first musical instruction was given him in his home. His progress was so precocious that at the age of 12 he became conductor, for two years, in the theater of his native town. He had not only to conduct, but to compose music for the dramas performed in the theater.

At 14 Kaussevitzky entered the Moscow conservatory. There he became a pupil on the double-bass of Rambaussec and developed such virtuosity on this clumsy instrument that he succeeded his professor as teacher of it at the Conservatoire and later became the most famous double-bass virtuoso in the world.

Forms Student Orchestra.

All along, however, he had ambitions to become a conductor. In 1907 he formed an orchestra from the pupils of the Hochschule in Berlin, with which he worked two years, studying chiefly the classics and Wagner. Returning to Russia in 1909 he organized the Kaussevitsky Orchestra, which soon became famous, and also gave performances at his Moscow concerts with a chorus of 250 voices. In the Summer, for many years, he toured the provinces with his orchestra and inaugurated the series of famous tours of the ports of the Volga. For these tours he engaged a special ship with a platform at the back and sailed from port to port, introducing in many places that had never heard an orchestra the work of great masters.

Red Revolt Halts Work.

At the time of the Russian Kerensky revolution of 1917 Kaussevitzky was appointed general conductor of the Russian State Orchestra, this orchestra having formerly been the court orchestra of the Czar. With the Bolshevik uprising he was forced to fly to Paris. Since then he has been very active as a guest conductor in London and English provinces, in Scotland, and in Paris, where in the last five seasons the Kaussevitzky concerts at the opera have become more and more the musical "rage."

Kaussevitzky has been much discussed in Europe for his interpretation of the classics as well as his virtuoso reading of modern music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

Capital
Hotel & Pub.

SEP 15 1924

DISTINGUISHED IMPORTATION—Serge Koussevitsky, the only living great orchestra conductor America has not heard, has arrived to conduct the Boston Symphony this season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

SEP 1924

WHO'S WHO

IN THE DAY'S NEWS

SERGE KUSSEVITZKY

"WHAT I hope to do in America is to show the public that masterpieces of music are being written today as powerful, stirring and beautiful as the greatest of the past," says Serge Koussevitzky, the only great living orchestra conductor for America has not heard. He recently arrived in this country to conduct for a season.

The conductor has had a brilliant career. He was born in Tver, in the northern part of Russia in 1874. His first musical instruction was given him in his home. His progress was so precocious that at the age of 12 he became conductor, for two years, in the theatre of his native town. He had not only to conduct, but to compose music for the dramas performed in the theatre.

At 14 Kussevitzky entered the Moscow conservatory. There he became a pupil on the double-bass of Rambaussec and developed such virtuosity on this clumsy instrument that he succeeded his professor as teacher of it at the Conservatorie aid later became the most famous double-bass virtuoso in the world.

Forms Student Orchestra

All along, however, he had ambition to become a conductor. In 1907 he formed an orchestra from the pupils of the Hochschule in Berlin, with which he worked two years, studying chiefly the classics and Wagner.

CINCINNATTI, OHIO
BILLBOARD

SEP 20 1924

NO TICKETS AVAILABLE

For Friday Afternoon Series of Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts

In Boston no seats are available for the Friday afternoon series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra as the entire series has been resubscribed. This is almost true for concerts given on Saturday evening, as only a very few seats are available for those concerts. Fewer soloists will be presented this season, as, according to announcements, Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor, has very positive opinions about orchestral concerts. The soloists will be chosen with the view of preserving the new conductor's plan and each artist will appear in a solo part for which his talent is considered particularly suited. Several composers, who are also conductors, will be presented in one of their own compositions and among these will be Rachmaninoff, Stravinsky and Prokofieff.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

SEP 23 1924

Koussevitsky Arrives

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY, who is to succeed Pierre Monfeux as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, arrived in New York a few days ago, enroute to the Hub City which will be his music headquarters for the next five years.

Much has been written about this Russian, who achieved fame first as a virtuoso player of the double-bass. Although he began to conduct at the age of 12, it was not until Kerensky appointed him head of the Russian State orchestra in 1917 that Koussevitsky found a real opportunity to develop.

Compelled, with the fall of Kerensky, to flee his country, Koussevitsky went to Paris; and there, as well as in London and other British Isle centers, he attracted attention . . . chiefly for his readings of modern orchestra scores.

There has been much speculation over what Koussevitsky will do in his new post, where his predecessors have been well-schooled classicists. He is of good height and physique, with a strong and expressive face and hair turning to grey. Koussevitsky is 50, and vital. He said he had brought with him a number of modern novelties, and that he is looking forward with keen interest to his stay in this country.

Bostonians will have their first opportunity to judge of their new musician at the first concert of the Boston Symphony on October 10. Koussevitsky's New York debut will take place on Thanksgiving night.

114

(Other Romeikes May Disappoint)

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

SEP 1924

Who's Who in the Day's News

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY.

"What I hope to do in America is to show the public that masterpieces of music are being written today as powerful, stirring and beautiful as the greatest of the past," says Serge Koussevitzky, the only great living orchestra conductor for America has not heard. He recently arrived in this country to conduct for a season.

The conductor has had a brilliant career. He was born in Tver, in the northern part of Russia in 1874. His first musical instruction, was given him in his home. His progress was so precocious that at the age of 12 he became conductor, for two years, in the theatre of his native town. He had not only to conduct, but to compose music for the dramas performed in the theater.

At 14 Koussevitsky entered the Moscow conservatory. There he became a pupil on the double-bass of Rambaussec and developed such virtuosity on this clumsy instrument that he succeeded his professor as teacher of it at the Conservatoire and later became the most famous double-bass virtuoso in the world.

Forms Student Orchestra.

All along, however, he had ambitions to become a conductor. In 1907 he formed an orchestra from the pupils of the Hochschule in Berlin, with which he worked two years, studying chiefly the classics and Wagner. Returning to Russia in 1909 he organized the Koussevitsky orchestra, which soon became famous, and also gave performances at his Moscow concerts with a chorus of 250 voices. In the Summer, for many years, he toured the provinces with his orchestra and inaugurated the series of famous tours of the ports of the Volga. For these tours he engaged a special ship with a platform at the back and sailed from port to port, introducing in many places that had never heard an orchestra the work of great masters.

Red Revolt Halts Work.

At the time of the Russian Kerensky revolution of 1917 Koussevitsky was appointed general conductor of the Russian State Orchestra, this orchestra having formerly been the court orchestra of the czar. With the bolshevik uprising he was forced to fly to Paris. Since then he has been very active as a guest conductor in London and English provinces, in Scotland, and in Paris, where in the last five seasons the Kussevitsky concerts at the opera have become more and more the musical "rage."

Koussevitsky has been much discussed in Europe for his interpretation of the classics as well as his virtuoso reading of modern music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM

STAMFORD, CONN.
SENTINAL

SEP 19 1924

WHO'S WHO

IN THE DAY'S NEWS

SERGE KAUSSEVITZKY.

"What I hope to do in America is to show the public that masterpieces of music are being written today as powerful, stirring and beautiful as the greatest of the past," says Serge Koussevitzky, the only great living orchestra conductor for America has not heard. He recently arrived in this country to conduct for a season.

The conductor has had a brilliant career. He was born in Tver, in the northern part of Russia, in 1874. His first musical instruction was given him in his home. His progress was so precocious that at the age of 12 he became conductor, for two years, in the theater of his native town. He had not only to conduct, but to compose music for the dramas performed in the theater.

At 14 Kaussevitzky entered the Moscow conservatory. There he became a pupil on the double-bass of Rambaussec and developed such virtuosity on this clumsy instrument that he succeeded his professor as teacher of it at the Conservatoire and later became the most famous double-bass virtuoso in the world.

Forms Student Orchestra.

All along, however, he had ambitions to become a conductor. In 1907 he formed an orchestra from the pupils of the Hochschule in Berlin, with which he worked two years, studying chiefly the classics and Wagner. Returning to Russia in 1909 he organized the Kaussevitsky Orchestra, which soon became famous, and also gave performances at his Moscow concerts with a chorus of 250 voices. In the Summer, for many years, he toured the provinces with his orchestra and inaugurated the series of famous tours of the ports of the Volga. For these tours he engaged a special ship with a platform at the back and sailed from port to port, introducing in many places that had never heard an orchestra the work of great masters.

Red Revolt Halts Work.

At the time of the Russian Kerensky revolution of 1917 Kaussevitzky was appointed general conductor of the Russian State Orchestra, this orchestra having formerly been the court orchestra of the Czar. With the Bolshevik uprising he was forced to fly to Paris. Since then he has been very active as a guest conductor in London and English provinces, in Scotland, and in Paris, where in the last five seasons the Kaussevitzky concerts at the opera have become more and more the musical "rage."

Kaussevitzky has been much discussed in Europe for his interpretation of the classics as well as his virtuoso reading of modern music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

Capital

SEP 19 1924

DISTINGUISHED IMPORTATION—Serge Koussevitsky, the only living great orchestra conductor America has not heard, has arrived to conduct the Boston Symphony this season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

SEP 1924

WHO'S WHO

IN THE DAY'S NEWS

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

"What I hope to do in America is to show the public that masterpieces of music are being written today as powerful, stirring and beautiful as the greatest of the past," says Serge Koussevitzky, the only great living orchestra conductor for America has not heard. He recently arrived in this country to conduct for a season.

The conductor has had a brilliant career He was born in Tver, in the northern part of Russia in 1874. His first musical instruction was given him in his home. His progress was so precocious that at the age of 12 he became conductor, for two years, in the theater of his native town. He had not only to conduct, but to compose music for the dramas performed in the theater.

At 14 Kossevitsky entered the Moscow conservatory. There he became a pupil on the double-bass of Rambaussec and developed such virtuosity on this clumsy instrument that he succeeded his professor as teacher of it at the Conservatoire and later became the most famous double-bass virtuoso in the world.

All along, however, he had ambitions to become a conductor. In 1907 he formed an orchestra from the pupils of the Hochschule in Berlin, with which he worked two years, studying chiefly the classics and Wagner. Returning to Russia in 1909 he organized the Kussevitsky Orchestra, which soon became famous, and also gave performances at his Moscow concerts with a chorus of 250 voices. In the Summer, for many years, he toured the provinces with his orchestra and inaugurated the series of famous tours of the ports of the Volga. For these tours he engaged a special ship with a platform at the back and sailed from port to port, introducing in many places that had never heard an orchestra the work of great masters.

At the time of the Russian Kerensky revolution of 1917 Kussevitsky was appointed general conductor of the Russian State Orchestra, this orchestra having formerly been the court orchestra of the Czar. With the Bolshevik uprising he was forced to fly to Paris. Since then he has been very active as a guest conductor in London and English provinces, in Scotland, and in Paris, where in the last five seasons the Kussevitsky concerts at the opera have become more and more the musical "rage."

Kussevitsky has been much discussed in Europe for his interpretation of the classics as well as his virtuoso ready of modern music.

SEP 1924

WHO'S WHO

IN THE DAY'S NEWS

SERGE KUSSEVITZKY

"WHAT I hope to do in America is to show the public that masterpieces of music are being written today as powerful, stirring and beautiful as the greatest of the past," says Serge Koussevitzky, the only great living orchestra conductor for America has not heard. He recently arrived in this country to conduct for a season.

The conductor has had a brilliant career. He was born in Tver, in the northern part of Russia in 1874. His first musical instruction was given him in his home. His progress was so precocious that at the age of 12 he became conductor, for two years, in the theatre of his native town. He had not only to conduct, but to compose music for the dramas performed in the theatre.

At 14 Kussevitszky entered the Moscow conservatory. There he became a pupil on the double-bass of Rambaussec and developed such virtuosity on this clumsy instrument that he succeeded his professor as teacher of it at the Conservatorie aid later became the most famous double-bass virtuoso in the world.

Forms Student Orchestra

All along, however, he had ambition to become a conductor. In 1907 he formed an orchestra from the pupils of the Hochschule in Berlin, with which he worked two years, studying chiefly the classics and Wagner.

CINCINNATTI, OHIO
BILLBOARD

SEP 20 1924

NO TICKETS AVAILABLE

For Friday Afternoon Series of Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts

In Boston no seats are available for the Friday afternoon series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra as the entire series has been resubscribed. This is almost true for concerts given on Saturday evening, as only a very few seats are available for those concerts. Fewer soloists will be presented this season, as, according to announcements, Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor, has very positive opinions about orchestral concerts. The soloists will be chosen with the view of preserving the new conductor's plan and each artist will appear in a solo part for which his talent is considered particularly suited. Several composers, who are also conductors, will be presented in one of their own compositions and among these will be Rachmaninoff, Stravinsky and Prokofieff.

SEP 1924

Koussevitsky Arrives

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY, who is to succeed Pierre Monfeux as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, arrived in New York a few days ago, enroute to the Hub City which will be his music headquarters for the next five years.

Much has been written about this Russian, who achieved fame first as a virtuoso player of the double-bass. Although he began to conduct at the age of 12, it was not until Kerensky appointed him head of the Russian State orchestra in 1917 that Koussevitsky found a real opportunity to develop.

Compelled, with the fall of Kerensky, to flee his country, Koussevitsky went to Paris; and there, as well as in London and other British Isle centers, he attracted attention . . . chiefly for his readings of modern orchestra scores.

There has been much speculation over what Koussevitsky will do in his new post, where his predecessors have been well-schooled classicists. He is of good height and physique, with a strong and expressive face and hair turning to grey. Koussevitsky is 50, and vital. He said he had brought with him a number of modern novelties, and that he is looking forward with keen interest to his stay in this country.

Bostonians will have their first opportunity to judge of their new musician at the first concert of the Boston Symphony on October 10. Koussevitsky's New York debut will take place on Thanksgiving night.

REDUCTION RATIO

13x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

SAN FRANCISCO BOSTON BERLIN

FOUNDED 1900 BY CHARLES F. FRENCH

The MUSICAL LEADER

PUBLISHED EVERY THURSDAY

Sept. 20 CHICAGO.

ION IS CALLED TO THE ATTACHED CLIPPING WHICH AP
OF THE MUSICAL LEADER.

The arrival of Sergei Koussevitzky on the "Aquitania" brought the first of the newcomers to these shores. The Russian conductor was met by Mr. William Brennan, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who whisked him off to the city in which he is to make his future home. This is not the first visit of this artist to America, as he made a tour of this country as contra-bassist many years ago. Although his virtuosity was astonishing, the literature was too limited for one of his musical tastes, as he is not the sort of musician who follows such a career because it is an unusual "stunt," so he turned to conducting which has brought him triumphs in many countries and under many conditions.

M. Koussevitzky was as eager in asking questions as he was thoughtful in answering them, as he is desirous of pleasing, in the matter of repertoire, the audiences which will constitute his following. In Paris he is known as a protagonist of all that is modern from every country, but he does not wish his audiences to take fright from that because he promises to be more conservative until he learns the wishes in this country. He has, however, brought many new scores which he hopes to present in due time. He was eager to learn the status of the American composer and to know what works were available, inasmuch as he believes it his duty to give attention to that phase while a resident of the country. He will probably play works by Stravinsky, Prokofieff, Honegger, Roussel, Florent Schmitt, and perhaps the Moussorgsky "Tableaux d'une Exposition," arranged by Ravel, a delightful work which constituted one of his successes in Paris.

The story of Koussevitzky and his double-bass virtuosity is not without interest. He was born in the northern part of Russia in 1874 and entered the Moscow conservatory at 14, becoming a pupil of the famous Rambausse, a contra-bassist of rare skill. The pupil soon showed signs of following in his master's footsteps. He soon outstripped his teacher and himself became instructor of that instrument at the conservatory, but he was also interested in conducting and composing. The writer was present upon the occasion of his first London appearance when he conducted a program at Queen's Hall with Rachmaninoff as soloist. His progress since has moved by leaps and bounds, interfered with, naturally, by the World War. He was, however, appointed general conductor of the Russian State Orchestra, formerly the court orchestra of the Czar. With the Bolshevist uprising, he was compelled to leave the country, and he located in Paris, dividing his activities between there and London. His first performance in this country as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place at Symphony Hall, Boston, Oct. 10, and his New York debut is set for Thanksgiving night in Carnegie Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM Dispatch.
Town of Union N.J.
SEP 20 1924

who's who IN THE DAYS NEWS

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

"What I hope to do in America is to show the public that masterpieces of music are being written today as powerful, stirring and beautiful as the greatest of the past," says Serge Koussevitzky, the only great living orchestra conductor for America has not heard. He recently arrived in this country to conduct for a season.

S. Koussevitzky

The conductor has had a brilliant career. He was born in Tver, in the northern part of Russia in 1874. His first musical instruction was given him in his home. His progress was so precocious that at the age of 12 he became conductor, for two years, in the theatre of his native town. He had not only to conduct, but to compose music for the dramas performed in the theatre.

At 14 Kossevitzky entered the Moscow conservatory. There he became a pupil on the double-bass of Rambaussee and developed such virtuosity on this clumsy instrument that he succeeded his professor at teacher of it at the Conservatoire and later became the most famous double-bass virtuoso in the world.

Forms Student Orchestra

All along, however, he had ambitions to become a conductor. In 1907 he formed an orchestra from the pupils of the Hochschule in Berlin, with which he worked two years, studying chiefly the classics and Wagner. Returning to Russia in 1909 he organized the Koussevitzky Orchestra, which soon became famous, and also gave performances at his Moscow concerts with a chorus of 250 voices.

In the summer, for many years, he toured the provinces with his orchestra and inaugurated the series of famous tours of the ports of the Volga. For these tours he engaged a special ship with a platform at the back and sailed from port to port, introducing in many places that had never heard an orchestra the work of great masters.

Red Revolt Halts Work

At the time of the Russian Kerensky revolution of 1917 Koussevitzky was appointed general conductor of the Russian State Orchestra, this orchestra having formerly been the court orchestra of the Czar. With the Bolshevik uprising he was forced to fly to Paris. Since then he has been very active as a guest conductor in London and English provinces, in Scotland, and in Paris, where in the last five seasons the Koussevitzky concerts at the opera have become more and more the musical "rage."

Koussevitzky has been much discussed in Europe for his interpretation of the classics as well as his virtuoso reading of modern music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON,
MASS.
HERALD
SEP 21 1924

Weekly Comment

There naturally was, there is, curiosity about Mr. Koussevitzky's programs. Shocking reports of his fell purpose had come across the Atlantic. It was said that he actually had encouraged the ultra-modern composers, the demons of dissonance, by performing their nerve-rasping monstrosities. Conservative Bostonians, those who believe that music ended with Johannes Brahms, shuddered in anticipation of seeing the red flag hoisted on Symphony hall and flapping there defiantly. What has already been said by Mr. Koussevitzky since his arrival reassures the timid in a measure. He speaks favorably of the ancients; there is only one Beethoven—not even in the United States, not even in Boston will another Beethoven arise; and Mr. Koussevitzky is going to lead a symphony or two by our old friend Bruckner—Bruckner, a composer dear to conductors. Did not Messrs. Nikisch, Gericke, Muck in turn show their devotion to him.

Audiences, like Gaul, may be divided into three parts. There are the ultra-conservatives, the reactionaries, who applaud only the composers that in their opinion are "classical." They have no desire to hear any music that is contemporaneous, unless from patriotic or parochial motives. They approve mildly a composition by an American if it is constructed in accordance with the old rules and traditions.

The second group is made up of the irreverent young, who already dub the Debussy's music "old hat"; who insist on hearing only the works of the most "advanced" school; who talk knowingly of the "Six" (now five, and perhaps they are disbanded); who talk volubly about "impressionnisme" and "pointillisme," and speak knowingly of Erik Satie, although they have never heard a note of his music except, possibly, the "Gymnopedies" orchestrated by that old fogy, Achille Claude Debussy.

The members of the third group plume themselves on their catholicity of taste, their eclecticism. They enjoy Bach because he is "quaint." "You can find all possible harmonic devices in his music." They think symphonies by Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven should be played if only for the benefit of the younger generation. They are impressed by the architectonics of Brahms. As for the ultra-moderns, they of course should be heard. "It is necessary to know what is going on in the musical world." So Bach and Honegger are alike to them; they applaud Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" and the overture to "Oberon" with equal fervor, and say boldly, "one must be broad-minded."

Yet M. Andre Gide in a lecture delivered at the Grand Ducal Court at Weimar twenty odd years ago argued that this intelligent eclecticism proved that art is no longer a natural production; that it no longer responds to any precise need of the public. "A decomposed society, without any distinct ideal that may be formulated in any style, accepts rashly, at the risk of hostile meetings, all the ideals of the past and each one that each of the new artists offers."

And it was Gide who said on another occasion: "After a Sabastian Bach, one thinks: This is music. Then come a Mozart and a Beethoven; after them one can still say: This at last is music, unless one, already informed or prejudiced, thinks to himself, 'What is music?' and understands that music is neither Bach nor Mozart nor Beethoven; that each one of them knew how to limit only himself; that music, to continue to be music, ought to be incessantly something else than what it was as expressed by them."

There are some who would say with Gide: "I await always something unknown, new powers of art . . . and though they should come from the planet Mars no one will persuade me that they ought to be injurious to me or remain unknown."

And this is the same Gide, who a month later in a letter to Angele, recognizes the fact that in theatre or concert hall there are torrid zones and cold islets. "How often the fear of being called on for an opinion on leaving has made me shun plays or concerts!

"'How did you like the way . . . conducted the 9th symphony?'
"Don't you prefer X or Z?'"

The London Times regretted recently the noteworthy absence of "novelties" at the Promenade concerts this season. "It may be true that a good many of the new works produced in former years have not much interested the general public, but if the Promenades are to be no longer an open forum where new things can be tried—and new composers, both native and foreign, can make their mark, the loss will be incalculable, not only to the composers and possibly to the public, but ultimately to the concerts themselves as an institution. Once the programs become stereotyped into an annual repetition of accepted works their days are numbered." That may justly be said of Symphony programs in Boston.

There was a time when the audience expected to hear at least five symphonies by Beethoven, three by Mozart—the "great three"—a half dozen familiar symphonies by Haydn, three overtures by Weber, at least three of Brahms's symphonies—to hear them year after year. No one wishes all these works to be dropped for a season. But who wishes to hear them all, even though a conductor should promise to interpret them in a new way? New wine in old bottles—or old wine in new bottles, in whatever way you wish to look at it.

Malipiero was right in saying: "Modern music has always existed. No one has written ancient music."

A glance at some of the programs prepared by Mr. Koussevitzky for his concerts in Paris may be of interest.

1921

April 22—Glinka, Overture to "Russian and Ludmilla"; Moussorgsky, Night on Bald Mountain; Scriabin, Poem of Ecstasy; Prokofiev, Scythian Suite.

May 6—Liadov, Apocalypse; Stravinski, Petrouchka; Scriabin, Prometheus.

Nov. 10—Weber, Overture to "Oberon"; Debussy, two nocturnes; Moussorgsky, Overture to "Khovantchinia"; Ramsky Korsakov, music from the "Legend of the Invisible City," and "Tsar Saltan"; Bach, C minor Symphony.

Dec. 1—Honegger, Victorious Horatius; Brahms, Song of Destiny, Wolf, the Fire Rider; Beethoven, Overture to "Egmont"; Rimsky-Korsakov, Spanish caprice.

Dec. 15—Beethoven, 9th Symphony; Haydn, Symphony No. 3; Borodin, Dances Polovtsiennes.

1922

April 20—Rimsky-Korsakov, Sadko; Borodin, Symphony No. 2; Honegger, Victorious Horatius; Koechlin, Pagan Forest.

April 27—Stravinsky, Petrouchka; Mozart G minor Symphony; Wagner, Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser"; Rimsky-Korsakov, Scheherazade; Liadov, eight Chansons Russes.

In May—Handel, Concerto grosso, Scarlatti—Manuel, three pieces; Ravel, the waltz; Milhaud, Suite No. 2. Also, Moussorgsky's "Fair at Sarotchinsi and Night on Bald Mountain.

1923

May 3—Berlioz, Roman Carnival; Schubert, unfinished Symphony; Riegel, Symphony in D; Honegger, Chant de Joie; Moussorgsky-Ravel, Pictures of an Exposition.

May 10—Bach, Overture in B minor; Stravinsky, The Nightingale's Song; Prokofiev, Classic Symphony.

May 17—Bax, Garden of Pfand; Gansman, Symphonic Scherzo; Recal, Feu Follett; Prokofiev, Scythian Suite.

May 24—Beethoven, Overture to "Egmont"; Stravinsky, Sacre du Printemps; Mozart, Night Music for strings.

In October—Berlioz, Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini"; Roussel, Symphony; Ravel, Alborada del Gracioso, and The Walse; Stravinsky, octet for wind instruments; Prokofiev, Violin concerto; Polaci (18th century) Symphony; Boccherini, Symphony C major; Strauss, Till Eulenspiegel; Debussy, La Mer; Stravinski, Sacre du Printemps; Beethoven's Third Symphony; Mozart, Concerto for two pianos.

In November—Weber, Overture to "Oberon"; Satie, Parade; Delage, Ballet; Borodin, fragments from "Prince Igor"; Boulanger, Buddhist Prayer.

On May 8, Locatelli, Concerto (Symphonie Funebre; Tansman, Legend; Honegger, Pacific 231; Prokofiev, Piano Concerto; De Falla, L'Amour Sorcier; Moussorgsky-Ravel, Pictures of an Exposition.

May 15—Schubert, Symphony No. 5; Manuel, Tempo di Batto; Malpiero, Impressions III; Respighi, Concerto Gregoriano for violin (Mr. Spalding); Scriabin, Poem of Ecstasy; Honegger, Pacific 231.

May 22—A Stravinsky program: Fire Bird, Petrouchka, Sacre du Printemps, Concerto for piano and wind instruments.

May 29, as announced—Corelli, Concerto Grosso; Schmitt, Mirage; Debussy, Nocturnes; Stravinsky, The King of the Stars; Prokofiev, Seven They are Seven (Incantation for tenor, chorus and orchestra); Borodin, Dances from "Prince Igor."

It should be noted that these programs were arranged especially for Paris.

Boston Chronicle
PAGE EIGHT Sat. Sept 20

ROLAND HAYES REMARKABLE SUCCESS IN AMERICA

Roland Hayes, the much discussed tenor who is to sing here in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Oct. 5, 1924 returned to America last season with the very highest regard of Europe to commend him to us. His introductory tour of his own country left no shred of doubt as to his greatnes. Indeed, no singer in years has had such a reception by our public. Wherever he went, North, South or West, there came the same expressions of enthusiasm and of surprise—despite preceding high reports. Roland Hayes immediately placed himself among those enviably few artists who need only announce a recital in order to fill the hall to overflowing.

Standing on the stage, before he begins to sing, he presents the eye no striking or unusual trait. The song engrosses him completely, and strictly in his singing lies his powerful appeal. The numberless eulogies of his voice and of his utter command of it cannot adequately convey the peculiar charm and stirring beauty of Roland Hayes' singing.

His grasp of style and diction, in Old English songs, French songs, and German lieder are perhaps best attested by the praise his singing of them has met in their own countries. The poignancy of the Negro spirituals has surely never had so inspired an interpreter.

The truly great personalities in musical performance, each of them a unique figure, may almost be counted on one hand. Roland Hayes has definitely taken his place among them.

Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MONTREAL, CANADA
Standard
SEP 20 1924

* * *

This winter will mark the fortieth year of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's visits to New York. Forty years of fine music finely played is a proud record.

K SAN FRANCISCO BOSTON BERLIN

FOUNDED 1900 BY CHARLES F. FRENCH

NE

ICAGO THE MUSICAL LEADER

PUBLISHED EVERY THURSDAY

CHICAGO,

ION IS CALLED TO THE ATTACHED CLIPPING WHICH AP
OF THE MUSICAL LEADER.

The arrival of Sergei Koussevitzky on the "Aquitania" brought the first of the newcomers to these shores. The Russian conductor was met by Mr. William Brennan, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who whisked him off to the city in which he is to make his future home. This is not the first visit of this artist to America, as he made a tour of this country as contra-bassist many years ago. Although his virtuosity was astonishing, the literature was too limited for one of his musical tastes, as he is not the sort of musician who follows such a career because it is an unusual "stunt," so he turned to conducting which has brought him triumphs in many countries and under many conditions.

M. Koussevitzky was as eager in asking questions as he was thoughtful in answering them, as he is desirous of pleasing, in the matter of repertoire, the audiences which will constitute his following. In Paris he is known as a protagonist of all that is modern from every country, but he does not wish his audiences to take fright from that because he promises to be more conservative until he learns the wishes in this country. He has, however, brought many new scores which he hopes to present in due time. He was eager to learn the status of the American composer and to know what works were available, inasmuch as he believes it his duty to give attention to that phase while a resident of the country. He will probably play works by Stravinsky, Prokofieff, Honegger, Roussel, Florent Schmitt, and perhaps the Moussorgsky "Tableaux d'une Exposition," arranged by Ravel, a delightful work which constituted one of his successes in Paris.

The story of Koussevitzky and his double-bass virtuosity is not without interest. He was born in the northern part of Russia in 1874 and entered the Moscow conservatory at 14, becoming a pupil of the famous Rambausse, a contra-bassist of rare skill. The pupil soon showed signs of following in his master's footsteps. He soon outstripped his teacher and himself became instructor of that instrument at the conservatory, but he was also interested in conducting and composing. The writer was present upon the occasion of his first London appearance when he conducted a program at Queen's Hall with Rachmaninoff as soloist. His progress since has moved by leaps and bounds, interfered with, naturally, by the World War. He was, however, appointed general conductor of the Russian State Orchestra, formerly the court orchestra of the Czar. With the Bolshevist uprising, he was compelled to leave the country, and he located in Paris, dividing his activities between there and London. His first performance in this country as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place at Symphony Hall, Boston, Oct. 10, and his New York debut is set for Thanksgiving night in Carnegie Hall.

ROLAND HAYES REMARKABLE SUCCESS IN AMERICA

Roland Hayes, the much discussed tenor who is to sing here in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Oct. 5, 1924 returned to America last season with the very highest regard of Europe to commend him to us. His introductory tour of his own country left no shred of doubt as to his greatnes. Indeed, no singer in years has had such a reception by our public. Wherever he went, North, South or West, there came the same expressions of enthusiasm and of surprise--despite preceding high reports. Roland Hayes immediately placed himself among those enviably few artists who need only announce a recital in order to fill the hall to overflowing.

Standing on the stage, before he begins to sing, he presents the eye no striking or unusual trait. The song engrosses him completely, and strictly in his singing lies his powerful appeal. The numberless eulogies of his voice and of his utter command of it cannot adequately convey the peculiar charm and stirring beauty of Roland Hayes' singing.

His grasp of style and diction, in Old English songs, French songs, and German lieder are perhaps best attested by the praise his singing of them has met in their own countries. The poignancy of the Negro spirituals has surely never had so inspired an interpreter.

The truly great personalities in musical performance, each of them a unique figure, may almost be counted on one hand. Roland Hayes has definitely taken his place among them.

* * *

This winter will mark the fortieth year of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's visits to New York. Forty years of fine music finely played is a proud record.

THIS CLIPPING FROM Dispatch.
SEP 1924

Who's Who IN THE DAYS NEWS

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

"What I hope to do in America is to show the public that masterpieces of music are being written today as powerful, stirring and beautiful as the greatest of the past," says Serge Koussevitzky, the only great living orchestra conductor for America has not heard. He recently arrived in this country to conduct for a season.

S. Koussevitzky

The conductor has had a brilliant career. He was born in Tver, in the northern part of Russia in 1874. His first musical instruction was given him in his home. His progress was so precocious that at the age of 12 he became conductor, for two years, in the theatre of his native town. He had not only to conduct, but to compose music for the dramas performed in the theatre.

At 14 Kossevitzky entered the Moscow conservatory. There he became a pupil on the double-bass of Rambaussec and developed such virtuosity on this clumsy instrument that he succeeded his professor at teacher of it at the Conservatoire and later became the most famous double-bass virtuoso in the world.

Forms Student Orchestra

All along, however, he had ambitions to become a conductor. In 1907 he formed an orchestra from the pupils of the Hochschule in Berlin, with which he worked two years, studying chiefly the classics and Wagner. Returning to Russia in 1909 he organized the Koussevitzky Orchestra, which soon became famous, and also gave performances at his Moscow concerts with a chorus of 250 voices.

In the summer, for many years, he toured the provinces with his orchestra and inaugurated the series of famous tours of the ports of the Volga. For these tours he engaged a special ship with a platform at the back and sailed from port to port, introducing in many places that had never heard an orchestra the work of great masters.

Red Revolt Halts Work

At the time of the Russian Kerensky revolution of 1917 Koussevitzky was appointed general conductor of the Russian State Orchestra, this orchestra having formerly been the court orchestra of the Czar. With the Bolshevik uprising he was forced to fly to Paris. Since then he has been very active as a guest conductor in London and English provinces, in Scotland, and in Paris, where in the last five seasons the Koussevitzky concerts at the opera have become more and more the musical "rage."

Koussevitzky has been much discussed in Europe for his interpretation of the classics as well as his virtuoso reading of modern music.

Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MONTREAL, CANADA

SEP 20 1924

115

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

SEP 21 1924

Weekly Comment

There naturally was, there is, curiosity about Mr. Koussevitzky's programs. Shocking reports of his fell purpose had come across the Atlantic. It was said that he actually had encouraged the ultra-modern composers, the demons of dissonance, by performing their nerve-rasping monstrosities. Conservative Bostonians, those who believe that music ended with Johannes Brahms, shuddered in anticipation of seeing the red flag hoisted on Symphony hall and flapping there defiantly. What has already been said by Mr. Koussevitzky since his arrival reassures the timid in a measure. He speaks favorably of the ancients; there is only one Beethoven—not even in the United States, not even in Boston will another Beethoven arise; and Mr. Koussevitzky is going to lead a symphony or two by our old friend Bruckner—Bruckner, a composer dear to conductors. Did not Messrs. Nikisch, Gericke, Muck in turn show their devotion to him.

Audiences, like Gaul, may be divided into three parts. There are the ultra-conservatives, the reactionaries, who applaud only the composers that in their opinion are "classical." They have no desire to hear any music that is contemporaneous, unless from patriotic or parochial motives. They approve mildly a composition by an American if it is constructed in accordance with the old rules and traditions.

The second group is made up of the irreverent young, who already dub the Debussy's music "old hat"; who insist on hearing only the works of the most "advanced" school; who talk knowingly of the "Six" (now five, and perhaps they are disbanded); who talk volubly about "impressionnisme" and "pointillisme," and speak knowingly of Erik Satie, although they have never heard a note of his music except, possibly, the "Gymnopedies" orchestrated by that old fogy, Achille Claude Debussy.

The members of the third group plume themselves on their catholicity of taste, their eclecticism. They enjoy Bach because he is "quaint." "You can find all possible harmonic devices in his music." They think symphonies by Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven should be played if only for the benefit of the younger generation. They are impressed by the architectonics of Brahms. As for the ultra-moderns, they of course should be heard. "It is necessary to know what is going on in the musical world." So Bach and Honegger are alike to them; they applaud Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" and the overture to "Oberon" with equal fervor, and say boldly, "one must be broad-minded."

Yet M. Andre Gide in a lecture delivered at the Grand Ducal Court at Weimar twenty odd years ago argued that this intelligent eclecticism proved that art is no longer a natural production; that it no longer responds to any precise need of the public. "A decomposed society, without any distinct ideal that may be formulated in any style, accepts rashly, at the risk of hostile meetings, all the ideals of the past and each one that each of the new artists offers."

And it was Gide who said on another occasion: "After a Sabastian Bach, one thinks: This is music. Then come a Mozart and a Beethoven; after them one can still say: This at last is music, unless one, already informed or prejudiced, thinks to himself, 'What is music?' and understands that music is neither Bach nor Mozart nor Beethoven; that each one of them knew how to limit only himself; that music, to continue to be music, ought to be incessantly something else than what it was as expressed by them."

There are some who would say with Gide: "I await always something unknown, new powers of art . . . and though they should come from the planet Mars no one will persuade me that they ought to be injurious to me or remain unknown."

And this is the same Gide, who a month later in a letter to Angele, recognizes the fact that in theatre or concert hall there are torrid zones and cold islets. "How often the fear of being called on for an opinion on leaving has made me shun plays or concerts!

"'How did you like the way . . . conducted the 9th symphony?'

"Don't you prefer X or Z?'"

The London Times regretted recently the noteworthy absence of "novelties" at the Promenade concerts this season. "It may be true that a good many of the new works produced in former years have not much interested the general public, but if the Promenades are to be no longer an open forum where new things can be tried—and new composers, both native and foreign, can make their mark, the loss will be incalculable, not only to the composers and possibly to the public, but ultimately to the concerts themselves as an institution. Once the programs become stereotyped into an annual repetition of accepted works their days are numbered." That may justly be said of Symphony programs in Boston.

There was a time when the audience expected to hear at least five symphonies by Beethoven, three by Mozart—the "great three"—a half dozen familiar symphonies by Haydn, three overtures by Weber, at least three of Brahms's symphonies—to hear them year after year. No one wishes all these works to be dropped for a season. But who wishes to hear them all, even though a conductor should promise to interpret them in a new way? New wine in old bottles—or old wine in new bottles, in whatever way you wish to look at it.

Malipiero was right in saying: "Modern music has always existed. No one has written ancient music."

A glance at some of the programs prepared by Mr. Koussevitzky for his concerts in Paris may be of interest.

1921

April 22—Glinka, Overture to "Russian and Ludmilla"; Moussorgsky, Night on Bald Mountain; Scriabin, Poem of Ecstasy; Prokofiev, Scythian Suite.

May 6—Liadov, Apocalypse; Stravinski, Petrouchka; Scriabin, Prometheus.

Nov. 10—Weber, Overture to "Oberon"; Debussy, two nocturnes; Moussorgsky, Overture to "Khovantchinia"; Ramsky Korsakov, music from the "Legend of the Invisible City," and "Tsar Saltan"; Bach, C minor Symphony.

Dec. 1—Honegger, Victorious Horatius; Brahms, Song of Destiny, Wolf, the Fire Rider; Beethoven, Overture to "Egmont"; Rimsky-Korsakov, Spanish caprice.

Dec. 15—Beethoven, 9th Symphony; Haydn, Symphony No. 3; Borodin, Dances Polovtsiennes.

1922

April 20—Rimsky-Korsakov, Sadko; Borodin, Symphony No. 2; Honegger, Victorious Horatius; Koechlin, Pagan Forest.

April 27—Stravinsky, Petrouchka; Mozart G minor Symphony; Wagner, Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser"; Rimsky-Korsakov, Scheherazade; Liadov, eight Chansons Russes.

In May—Handel, Concerto grosso, Scarlatti—Manuel, three pieces; Ravel, the waltz; Milhaud, Suite No. 2. Also, Moussorgsky's "Fair at Sarotchinsi and Night on Bald Mountain.

1923

May 3—Berlioz, Roman Carnival; Schubert, unfinished Symphony; Riegel, Symphony in D; Honegger, Chant de Joie; Moussorgsky-Ravel, Pictures of an Exposition.

May 10—Bach, Overture in B minor; Stravinsky, The Nightingale's Song; Prokofiev, Classic Symphony.

May 17—Bax, Garden of Pfand; Gansman, Symphonic Scherzo; Reeal, Feu Follett; Prokofiev, Scythian Suite.

May 24—Beethoven, Overture to "Egmont"; Stravinsky, Sacre du Printemps; Mozart, Night Music for strings.

In October—Berlioz, Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini"; Roussel, Symphony; Ravel, Alborada del Gracioso, and The Walse; Stravinsky, octet for wind instruments; Prokofiev, Violin concerto; Polaci (18th century) Symphony; Boccherini, Symphony C major; Strauss, Till Eulenspiegel; Debussy, La Mer; Stravinski, Sacre du Printemps; Beethoven's Third Symphony; Mozart, Concerto for two pianos.

In November—Weber, Overture to "Oberon"; Satie, Parade; Delage, Ballet; Borodin, fragments from "Prince Igor"; Boulanger, Buddhist Prayer.

On May 8, Locatelli, Concerto (Symphonie Funebre; Tansman, Legend; Honegger, Pacific 231; Prokofiev, Piano Concerto; De Falla, L'Amour Sorcier; Moussorgsky-Ravel, Pictures of an Exposition.

May 15—Schubert, Symphony No. 5; Manuel, Tempo di Batto; Malpiero, Impressions III; Respighi, Concerto Gregoriano for violin (Mr. Spalding); Scriabin, Poem of Ecstasy; Honegger, Pacific 231.

May 22—A Stravinsky program: Fire Bird, Petrouchka, Sacre du Printemps, Concerto for piano and wind instruments.

May 29, as announced—Corelli, Concerto Grosso; Schmitt, Mirage; Debussy, Nocturnes; Stravinsky, The King of the Stars; Prokofiev, Seven They are Seven (Incantation for tenor, chorus and orchestra); Borodin, Dances from "Prince Igor."

It should be noted that these programs were arranged especially for Paris.

REDUCTION

RATIO

15x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

A3

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

R.16

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
POST

SEP 21 1924

"Wealth Develops Music—But for People's Benefit"—Says Koussevitzky

Meet the real Sergei Koussevitzky!

In an exclusive and revealing interview for readers of the Boston Sunday Post, Boston's new Symphony conductor tells for the first time—

Some new details about his career in Russia.

His philosophy of using wealth of the few to foster music for the many.

How a Hub sightseeing trip filled him with emotion.

Why he accepts the present musical tastes of the American public at large and remains optimistic about our musical progress.

BY R. L. HUMPHREY

Sergei Koussevitzky has been for some time a personage in the printed pages of Russia's musical history, and one would judge as much from his presence, even away from Symphony Hall in his handsome big brick home overlooking Jamaicaway.

But he doesn't "play the celebrity." He gives the suggestion of the exceptional man by countless little, unexaggerated details of manner, voice, mood and mental focus—which are so subtle, change with such utter swiftness, and are so inexhaustible, that they could have no source except in a giant repressing himself.

The Koussevitzky personality presents a surprising union of what would usually be incompatibilities. The man is at the same time the aristocrat and the democrat. He is a lover of high culture and yet has the willingness to see things from the point of view of the uncultured. Also contradictory is his age of 50 with his younger looks.

In Purple Jacket

He welcomed the Sunday Post man as if the latter might have been an expected brother-musician, rather than a reporter.

Yet over the democratic attitude hovered the grace and graciousness of the aristocrat as he waved the interviewer away from the hard piano bench to a cushioned armchair and himself took the bench, in his pleasant glassed-in parlor.

He sat there in purple velvet jacket with the soft collar of a silk shirt of fine green stripe peeping above, and a double-breasted, light-colored vest. His hands were thrust jauntily into the pockets of his dark trousers. His feet, arrayed in purple silk socks and patent leather pumps, were at times in somewhat of a comfortable sprawl.

Mr. Koussevitzky does not trust himself to speak English extensively. (An attitude the general run of Boston reporters have toward Russian). The interview took place in direct conversation with the musician in his adopted French, in preference to the roundabout means of translation from English to Russian and Russian to English. Mr. Zederbaum, genial and diplomatic secretary and interpreter, formed the third point of the conversational triangle, and was a valued potential first-aid man in case of language derailments.

Boston Sight Stirs Him

"Mr. Koussevitsky," began the questioner, "if, instead of an interviewer's subject, you had the chance to choose one of your own, what would you talk about?"

He gave forth a little chuckle in the direction of Mr. Zederbaum, in a fashion that seemed to signify: "Well, at last someone has hit it!"

And—a thing that is characteristic of him in conversation or in conducting an orchestra—his mobile face elaborated on his thought. Amused satisfaction appeared simultaneously in a broad smile, a gleam in the dark eyes, an upward toss of the thick, black brows.

"I want very much to tell you of an experience I had in Boston during this first week of mine here," said Mr. Koussevitsky.

His joviality had passed like a lightning flash. Now he was solemn, tense, emotional.

"This is a thing I am very serious in telling you."

He leapt up from the bench. He took a step toward the reporter, emphasizing the earnestness of his tones and his features with a punctuation of little movements of hands, head and shoulders.

"J'ai ete vraiment, vraiment emu (I was truly, truly stirred)," he said, impressively. His left hand flew to his heart. "You Americans probably will not understand, you will think it such a simple thing, but it was different with me.

"I saw your attractive parks, set aside for the free enjoyment of the people—the people. I caught my first sight of this charming Jamaica Pond, beyond my house. I saw the Charles River Esplanade, so pretty, so refreshing, with public benches all along it, and several playgrounds for children. And all this not reserved for any selected, privileged group of society, but open at all times to the whole of the people.

"I assure you that was to me a very deeply stirring demonstration of democracy at work under my eyes. You do not find such things in Europe. There the pretty places are set aside for persons of wealth and social position."

Combined Democrat and Aristocrat

The Sunday Post man was put in mind of the fact that Koussevitzky had himself done some democratic work, in music—had gone to the pains and expense to put an orchestra on board a Volga River steamer and take great music to the common people in remote regions of Russia.

"Do you think we are less democratic as regards the hearing of great music? Somehow, doesn't wealth take a sort of monopoly over the best music here, as well as in Europe—so that the common people have a sort of feeling that fine music is for the rich?"

The question brought out the dual character of Koussevitzky, democrat, and Koussevitzky, aristocrat.

"One cannot call down the rich in connection with great music," he said vehemently. "Au contraire, they are all-important.

"Music is such a wonderful thing that without it life is not fully experienced—either in the ranks of the rich or of the poor.

"But we do know that if a man is in need of food, he cannot eat music. He cannot use it as a substitute for clothing or shelter. He must satisfy those essential needs, and toil to keep them satisfied, before he can turn to music.

"Therefore, those whose essential wants are permanently satisfied—the rich, in other words—are in a position to stimulate music and the other arts. They feel the desire to occupy their minds and sentiments. Under their patronage, the production and playing of great musical compositions is encouraged. Thanks to the rich, these treasures are stored up in the world, and made available to the general public which has spent nothing on them.

"At that point, wealth often steps in, again by using its resources for the sharing of its musical advantages with the less fortunate. A case in point is your own Colonel Higginson, who shared his riches with the people of Boston for the purpose of establishing and maintaining a Symphny Orchestra.

"I have had experiences of my own in the same field. It happens that I was a rich young man, and to that I owe the fact that I was able to take up the idea of devoting my life to music. My wife brought additional wealth. My father-in-law was enormously wealthy. These three resources were all drawn upon to enable me to secure orchestral training and to build up and maintain an orchestra of my own. Persons of wealth and culture formed the audiences at my symphony concerts, and stimulated the progress of its playing.

"But I didn't forget the common people. On Sundays I gave a series of symphony concerts especially for them. The price was a few copecks."

"About a nickel in American money," supplied Mr. Zederbaum.

"The people loved that music. They crowded to hear it.

"Inspired by this success, I hired a steamboat and took the orchestra along the Volga River so that great music might be heard by as large a number as possible of the common people who had not heard a symphony orchestra before.

"They loved it as much as the people back in the city. I will give you a typical example of the way it affected them. At the town of Tsaritsin I gave a concert free of charge. A great crowd listened that had collected from over a large distance around. They were so enthusiastic that they urged me very strongly to come with the orchestra again. I did, and again they were overjoyed and begged me to return.

The Tribute of the Peasants

"A third time I went back to them. As I stepped through the door of the building used as a concert hall, a band broke out in a march and continued as I made my way down to the conductor's stand.

"I was astonished, as well as honored. Previously these countryfolk had heard neither a band nor the instruments for one. The playing of my organization there had fired them with musical ambitions of their own. And so they had collected money, sent away for instruments, and secured instruction.

"They called their organization the 'Band Koussevitzky.' And I assure you with all my heart that I appreciated that as a most touching tribute to my efforts to spread the love of music. They began their work with a simple march, but they began. Once a start of some kind is made, great things will come by growth."

"Mr. Koussevitzky, would you apply that same remark to the general American public? Unlimited quantities of music are heard everywhere all over the country, and the people are extremely fond of it. But as a rule they prefer music that is of thin quality. Do you mean, according to your statement, that such a condition is a satisfactory start toward something better?"

Liberal Views on Music in U. S.

"Yes—really. For, granted that music of some kind is widespread among the people, and they keep up their interest in it, the poorer music will gradually lose its power to interest them. They will develop selective powers which will lead them step by step to demand music of greater and greater worth. And the present preferences, no matter how faulty, are part of America's musical history, and consequently of a certain interest of their own."

"How about our music students? We have many conservatories, and prosperous conditions result in the sending of huge crowds of students to them, regardless of whether or not they have the talents of real artists. The attractive wages paid to players in jazz orchestras is another incentive. Hence it is said that there is a tendency to put teaching in American music schools on a sort of factory production basis—system above art."

"Even such a condition has its compensations. The more conservatories you have, and the larger the numbers of students going to them, the better. Because every so often a teacher will discover a pupil of ability quite exceptional in the crowd. That pupil will be an inspiration that will call forth the very best efforts on the part of the teacher.

"With large numbers, strict system is necessary, to save the energies of the teacher, and give a fair apportionment of effort to each of the general run of pupils. And in that way the pupil of high talent may expect a little extra share of the teacher's vitality spared for himself or herself.

"I know whereof I speak—for I taught in a conservatory for several years. I will admit to you that I myself found it necessary to stress the question of system. But I assure you it saved my energies for the talented pupils—and I didn't find too few of those.

"All in all, I think the musical development of the American people is going on pretty satisfactorily."

Character Reading Made Harder

Those who undertake to read the character of persons with whom they come in contact can no longer rely on what the eyebrow says to them. The plucking of eyebrows has become so general that they cannot be made to tell anything of the makeup of their owners. Character readers must fall back on the contour of the nose, curves of the mouth and the "crow's feet" about the eyes to form their conclusions, and must remove the eyebrows entirely from their observations.

Koussevitzky enjoying the beauties of one of the musical scores in the five trunks full of compositions he has brought to Boston from Europe. He hears the effect of the full orchestra by reading a score just like a book. (Photo by A. F. Donnell, Sunday Post Staff.)

Tel. Chelsea 0000

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

SEP 21 1924

KOUSSEVITZKY

Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is now preparing for the opening of the symphony season in Symphony hall on Oct. 10. The conductor has brought a large quantity of music from Europe with him, both new and old, and it is assured that there will be much of interest upon the season's programs. He will introduce to America such scores as Honneger's "Pacific 231," Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," Vermeulth and new music of Prokofieff, Bax, Respighi, De Falla. Other composers to be included are Stravinsky, Rimsky-Korsakov, Rachmaninov, Ravel, Debussy, Strauss, Wagner, Berlioz and others. There will be standard symphonies of Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Brahms, Tchaikovsky, Bruckner, Elgar and so forth. Music by American composers will be well represented.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

SEP 21 1924

Koussevitzky in Brooklyn

DATES for the annual five Friday night Brooklyn concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Academy of Music, this season will be Nov. 28, Jan. 2 and 30, March 13 and April 10. The orchestra will have for conductor Serge Koussevitzky, called the most striking figure and dominant personality in the orchestral concerts of London, Paris and Moscow. Koussevitzky, who comes to America for the first time, is described as a leader of rare magnetism and forcefulness, and as an artist of impassioned convictions.

When interviewed in Paris last spring by Olin Downes, music critic of the New York "Times," Koussevitzky said:

"I am neither a modernist nor classicist in my musical preferences. The works of the great classic masters are absolutely indispensable to me as musician and in my life. But music is not a static art, and it is as necessary for us to know what is being done as it is to know and admire what has been done."

Obviously, the Boston orchestra's Brooklyn programmes will be stimulating and interesting in more ways than one under Mr. Koussevitzky's baton.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
TRIBUNE

SEP 21 1924

London's Guest Conductor.

Among the guest conductors who will lead the London Symphony orchestra this season are: Coates, Furtwaengler, Weingartner, Kussevitsky and Bruno Walter; with the exception of Weingartner

ner all of these will be heard in America this season.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

R.16

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
POST

SEP 21 1924

From Sunday issue of Sept 14 or 21 published last week in the United States

"Wealth Develops Music—But for People's Benefit"

Meet the real Sergei Koussevitzky!

In an exclusive and revealing interview for readers of the Boston Sunday Post, Boston's new Symphony conductor tells for the first time—

Some new details about his career in Russia.

His philosophy of using wealth of the few to foster music for the many.

How a Hub sightseeing trip filled him with emotion.

Why he accepts the present musical tastes of the American public at large and remains optimistic about our musical progress.

BY R. L. HUMPHREY

Sergei Koussevitzky has been for some time a personage in the printed pages of Russia's musical history, and one would judge as much from his presence, even away from Symphony Hall in his handsome big brick home overlooking Jamaicaway.

But he doesn't "play the celebrity." He gives the suggestion of the exceptional man by countless little, unexaggerated details of manner, voice, mood and mental focus—which are so subtle, change with such utter swiftness, and are so inexhaustible, that they could have no source except in a giant repressing himself.

The Koussevitzky personality presents a surprising union of what would usually be incompatibilities. The man is at the same time the aristocrat and the democrat. He is a lover of high culture and yet has the willingness to see things from the point of view of the uncultured. Also contradictory is his age of 50 with his younger looks.

In Purple Jacket

He welcomed the Sunday Post man as if the latter might have been an expected brother-musician, rather than a reporter.

Yet over the democratic attitude hovered the grace and graciousness of the aristocrat as he waved the interviewer away from the hard piano bench to a cushioned armchair and himself took the bench, in his pleasant glassed-in parlor.

He sat there in purple velvet jacket with the soft collar of a silk shirt of fine green stripe peeping above, and a double-breasted, light-colored vest. His hands were thrust jauntily into the pockets of his dark trousers. His feet, arrayed in purple silk socks and patent leather pumps, were at times in somewhat of a comfortable sprawl.

Mr. Koussevitsky does not trust himself to speak English extensively. (An attitude the general run of Boston reporters have toward Russian). The interview took place in direct conversation with the musician in his adopted French, in preference to the roundabout means of translation from English to Russian and Russian to English. Mr. Zederbaum, genial and diplomatic secretary and interpreter, formed the third point of the conversational triangle, and was a valued potential first-aid man in case of language derailments.

Boston Sight Stirs Him

"Mr. Koussevitsky," began the questioner, "if, instead of an interviewer's subject, you had the chance to choose one of your own, what would you talk about?"

He gave forth a little chuckle in the direction of Mr. Zederbaum, in a fashion that seemed to signify: "Well, at last someone has hit it!"

And—a thing that is characteristic of him in conversation or in conducting an orchestra—his mobile face elaborated on his thought. Amused satisfaction appeared simultaneously in a broad smile, a gleam in the dark eyes, an upward toss of the thick, black brows.

"I want very much to tell you of an experience I had in Boston during this first week of mine here," said Mr. Koussevitsky.

His joviality had passed like a lightning flash. Now he was solemn, tense, emotional.

"This is a thing I am very serious in telling you."

He leapt up from the bench. He took a step toward the reporter, emphasizing the earnestness of his tones and his features with a punctuation of little movements of hands, head and shoulders.

"J'ai ete vraiment, vraiment emu (I was truly, truly stirred)," he said, impressively. His left hand flew to his heart. "You Americans probably will not understand, you will think it such a simple thing, but it was different with me.

"I saw your attractive parks, set aside for the free enjoyment of the people—the people. I caught my first sight of this charming Jamaica Pond, beyond my house. I saw the Charles River Esplanade, so pretty, so refreshing, with public benches all along it, and several playgrounds for children. And all this not reserved for any selected, privileged group of society, but open at all times to the whole of the people.

"I assure you that was to me a very deeply stirring demonstration of democracy at work under my eyes. You do not find such things in Europe. There the pretty places are set aside for persons of wealth and social position."

Combined Democrat and Aristocrat

The Sunday Post man was put in mind of the fact that Koussevitzky had himself done some democratic work, in music—had gone to the pains and expense to put an orchestra on board a Volga River steamer and take great music to the common people in remote regions of Russia.

"Do you think we are less democratic as regards the hearing of great music? Somehow, doesn't wealth take a sort of monopoly over the best music here, as well as in Europe—so that the common people have a sort of feeling that fine music is for the rich?"

The question brought out the dual character of Koussevitzky, democrat, and Koussevitzky, aristocrat.

"One cannot call down the rich in connection with great music," he said vehemently. "Au contraire, they are all-important.

"Music is such a wonderful thing that without it life is not fully experienced—either in the ranks of the rich or of the poor.

"But we do know that if a man is in need of food, he cannot eat music. He cannot use it as a substitute for clothing or shelter. He must satisfy those essential needs, and toil to keep them satisfied, before he can turn to music.

"Therefore, those whose essential wants are permanently satisfied—the rich, in other words—are in a position to stimulate music and the other arts. They feel the desire to occupy their minds and sentiments. Under their patronage, the production and playing of great musical compositions is encouraged. Thanks to the rich, these treasures are stored up in the world, and made available to the general public which has spent nothing on them.

"At that point, wealth often steps in again by using its resources for the sharing of its musical advantages with the less fortunate. A case in point is your own Colonel Higginson, who shared his riches with the people of Boston for the purpose of establishing and maintaining a Symphny Orchestra.

"I have had experiences of my own in the same field. It happens that I was a rich young man, and to that I owe the fact that I was able to take up the idea of devoting my life to music. My wife brought additional wealth. My father-in-law was enormously wealthy. These three resources were all drawn upon to enable me to secure orchestral training and to build up and maintain an orchestra of my own. Persons of wealth and culture formed the audiences at my symphony concerts, and stimulated the progress of its playing.

"But I didn't forget the common people. On Sundays I gave a series of symphony concerts especially for them. The price was a few copecks."

"About a nickel in American money," supplied Mr. Zederbaum.

"The people loved that music. They crowded to hear it.

"Inspired by this success, I hired a steamboat and took the orchestra along the Volga River so that great music might be heard by as large a number as possible of the common people who had not heard a symphony orchestra before.

"They loved it as much as the people back in the city. I will give you a typical example of the way it affected them. At the town of Tsaritsin I gave a concert free of charge. A great crowd listened that had collected from over a large distance around. They were so enthusiastic that they urged me very strongly to come with the orchestra again. I did, and again they were overjoyed and begged me to return.

The Tribute of the Peasants

"A third time I went back to them. As I stepped through the door of the building used as a concert hall, a band broke out in a march and continued as I made my way down to the conductor's stand.

"I was astonished, as well as honored. Previously those countryfolk had heard neither a band nor the instruments for one. The playing of my organization there had fired them with musical ambitions of their own. And so they had collected money, sent away for instruments, and secured instruction.

"They called their organization the 'Band Koussevitzky.' And I assure you with all my heart that I appreciated that as a most touching tribute to my efforts to spread the love of music. They began their work with a simple march, but they began. Once a start of some kind is made, great things will come by growth."

"Mr. Koussevitzky, would you apply that same remark to the general American public? Unlimited quantities of music are heard everywhere all over the country, and the people are extremely fond of it. But as a rule they prefer music that is of thin quality. Do you mean, according to your statement, that such a condition is a satisfactory start toward something better?"

Liberal Views on Music in U. S.

"Yes—really. For, granted that music of some kind is widespread among the people, and they keep up their interest in it, the poorer music will gradually lose its power to interest them. They will develop selective powers which will lead them step by step to demand music of greater and greater worth. And the present preferences, no matter how faulty, are part of America's musical history, and consequently of a certain interest of their own."

"How about our music students? We have many conservatories, and prosperous conditions result in the sending of huge crowds of students to them, regardless of whether or not they have the talents of real artists. The attractive wages paid to players in jazz orchestras is another incentive. Hence it is said that there is a tendency to put teaching in American music schools on a sort of factory production basis—system above art."

"Even such a condition has its compensations. The more conservatories you have, and the larger the numbers of students going to them, the better. Because every so often a teacher will discover a pupil of ability quite exceptional in the crowd. That pupil will be

Koussevitzky enjoying the beauties of one of the musical scores in the five trunks full of compositions he has brought to Boston from Europe. He hears the effect of the full orchestra by reading a score just like a book. (Photo by A. F. Donnell, Sunday Post Staff.)

Tel. Chelsea 0000

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON,
MASS.
HERALD

SEP 21 1924

KOUSSEVITZKY

Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is now preparing for the opening of the symphony season in Symphony hall on Oct. 10. The conductor has brought a large quantity of music from Europe with him, both new and old, and it is assured that there will be much of interest upon the season's programs. He will introduce to America such scores as Honneger's "Pacific 231," Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," Vermeulth and new music of Prokofieff, Bax, Respighi, De Falla. Other composers to be included are Stravinsky, Rimsky-Korsakov, Rachmaninov, Ravel, Debussy, Strauss, Wagner, Berlioz and others. There will be standard symphonies of Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Brahms, Tchaikovsky, Bruckner, Elgar and so forth. Music by American composers will be well represented.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION

SEP 21 1924

Koussevitzky in Brooklyn

DATES for the annual five Friday night Brooklyn concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Academy of Music, this season will be Nov. 28, Jan. 2 and 30, March 13 and April 10. The orchestra will have for conductor Serge Koussevitzky, called the most striking figure and dominant personality in the orchestral concerts of London, Paris and Moscow. Koussevitzky, who comes to America for the first time, is described as a leader of rare magnetism and forcefulness, and as an artist of impassioned convictions.

When interviewed in Paris last spring by Olin Downes, music critic of the New York "Times," Koussevitzky said:

"I am neither a modernist nor classicist in my musical preferences. The works of the great classic masters are absolutely indispensable to me, as musician and in my life. But music is not a static art, and it is as necessary for su to know what is being done as it is to know and admire what has been done."

Obviously, the Boston orchestra's Brooklyn programmes will be stimulating and interesting in more ways than one under Mr. Koussevitzky's baton.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
TRIBUNE

SEP 21 1924

London's Guest Conductor.

Among the guest conductors who will lead the London Symphony orchestra this season are: Coates, Furtwaengler, Weingartner, Kussevitsky and Bruno Walter; with the exception of Weingartner all of these will be heard in America this season.

Music—But for People's Benefit"—Says Koussevitzky sevitzky enjoying the beauties of one of the musical scores in ve trunks full of compositions he has brought to Boston from pe. He hears the effect of the full orchestra by reading a just like a book. (Photo by A. F. Donnell, Sunday Post Staff.)

was a rich young man, and to that I owe the fact that I was able to take up the idea of devoting my life to music. My wife brought additional wealth. My father-in-law was enormously wealthy. These three resources were all drawn upon to enable me to secure orchestral training and to build up and maintain an orchestra of my own. Persons of wealth and culture formed the audiences at my symphony concerts, and stimulated the progress of its playing.

"But I didn't forget the common people. On Sundays I gave a series of symphony concerts especially for them. The price was a few copecks."

"About a nickel in American money," supplied Mr. Zederbaum.

"The people loved that music. They crowded to hear it.

"Inspired by this success, I hired a steamboat and took the orchestra along the Volga River so that great music might be heard by as large a number as possible of the common people who had not heard a symphony orchestra before.

"They loved it as much as the people back in the city. I will give you a typical example of the way it affected them. At the town of Tsaritsin I gave a concert free of charge. A great crowd listened that had collected from over a large distance around. They were so enthusiastic that they urged me very strongly to come with the orchestra again. I did, and again they were overjoyed and begged me to return.

The Tribute of the Peasants

"A third time I went back to them. s I stepped through the door of the ilding used as a concert hall, a band roke out in a march and continued as made my way down to the conduc-r's stand.

"I was astonished, as well as hon-d. Previously those countryfolk had neither a band nor the instruments for one. The playing of my or-nization there had fired them with usical ambitions of their own. And o they had collected money, sent away for instruments, and secured instruction.

"They called their organization the 'Band Koussevitzky.' And I assure you with all my heart that I appreciated that as a most touching tribute to my efforts to spread the love of music. They began their work with a simple march, but they began. Once a start of some kind is made, great things will come by growth."

"Mr. Koussevitzky, would you apply that same remark to the general American public? Unlimited quantities of music are heard everywhere all over the country, and the people are extremely fond of it. But as a rule they prefer music that is of thin quality. Do you mean, according to your statement, that such a condition is a satisfactory start toward something better?"

Liberal Views on Music in U. S.

"Yes—really. For, granted that music of some kind is widespread among the people, and they keep up their interest in it, the poorer music will gradually lose its power to interest them. They will develop selective powers which will lead them step by step to demand music of greater and greater worth. And the present preferences, no matter how faulty, are part of America's musical history, and consequently of a certain interest of their own."

"How about our music students? We have many conservatories, and prosperous conditions result in the sending of huge crowds of students to them, regardless of whether or not they have the talents of real artists. The attractive wages paid to players in jazz orchestras is another incentive. Hence it is said that there is a tendency to put teaching in American music schools on a sort of factory production basis—system above art."

"Even such a condition has its compensations. The more conservatories you have, and the larger the numbers of students going to them, the better. Because every so often a teacher will discover a pupil of ability quite exceptional in the crowd. That pupil will be an inspiration that will call forth the very best efforts on the part of the teacher.

"With large numbers, strict system is necessary, to save the energies of the teacher, and give a fair apportionment of effort to each of the general run of pupils. And in that way the pupil of high talent may expect a little extra share of the teacher's vitality spared for himself or herself.

"I know whereof I speak—for I taught in a conservatory for several years. I will admit to you that I myself found it necessary to stress the question of system. But I assure you it saved my energies for the talented pupils—and I didn't find too few of those.

"All in all, I think the musical development of the American people is going on pretty satisfactorily."

Character Reading Made Harder

Those who undertake to read the character of persons with whom they come in contact can no longer rely on what the eyebrow says to them. The plucking of eyebrows has become so general that they cannot be made to tell anything of the makeup of their owners. Character readers must fall back on the contour of the nose, curves of the mouth and the "crow's feet" about the eyes to form their conclusions, and must remove the eyebrows entirely from their observations.

ussevitzky, aristocrat.
cannot call down the rich in on with great music," he said ntly. "Au contraire, they are rtant.
is such a wonderful thing
hout it life is not fully experither in the ranks of the rich e poor.
we do know that if a man is in food, he cannot eat music. He use it as a substitute for cloth-shelter. He must satisfy those l needs, and toil to keep them before he can turn to music.
fore, those whose essential are permanently satisfied—the other words—are in a position
ulate music and the other arts.

They feel the desire to occupy their minds and sentiments. Under their patronage, the production and playing of great musical compositions is encouraged. Thanks to the rich, these treasures are stored up in the world, and made available to the general public which has spent nothing on them.

"At that point, wealth often steps in again by using its resources for the sharing of its musical advantages with the less fortunate. A case in point is your own Colonel Higginson, who shared his riches with the people of Boston for the purpose of establishing and maintaining a Symphny Orchestra.

"I have had experiences of my own in the same field. It happens that I

OM
y.
NION

924 evitzky in Brooklyn

five Friday night Brooklyn concerts by the estra, at the Academy of Music, this season nd 30, March 13 and April 10. The orchestra erge Koussevitzky, called the most striking nality in the orchestral concerts of London, vitzky, who comes to America for the first r of rare magnetism and forcefulness, and as nvictions.
Paris last spring by Olin Downes, music critic
Koussevitzky said:
nist nor classicist in my musical preferences.
assic masters are absolutely indispensable to life. But music is not a static art, and it is as hat is being done as it is to know and admire orchestra's Brooklyn programmes will be stimnore ways than one under Mr. Koussevitzky's

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
TRIBUNE

SEP 21 1924

London's Guest Conductor.

Among the guest conductors who will lead the London Symphony orchestra this season are: Coates, Furtwaengler, Weingartner, Kussevitsky and Bruno Walter; with the exception of Weingartner all of these will be heard in America this season.

* * *

REDUCTION

RATIO

14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

A3

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

2.0

2.2

2.5

2.8

3.2

3.6

4.0

4.5

5.0

5.6

6.3

7.1

8.0

9.0

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

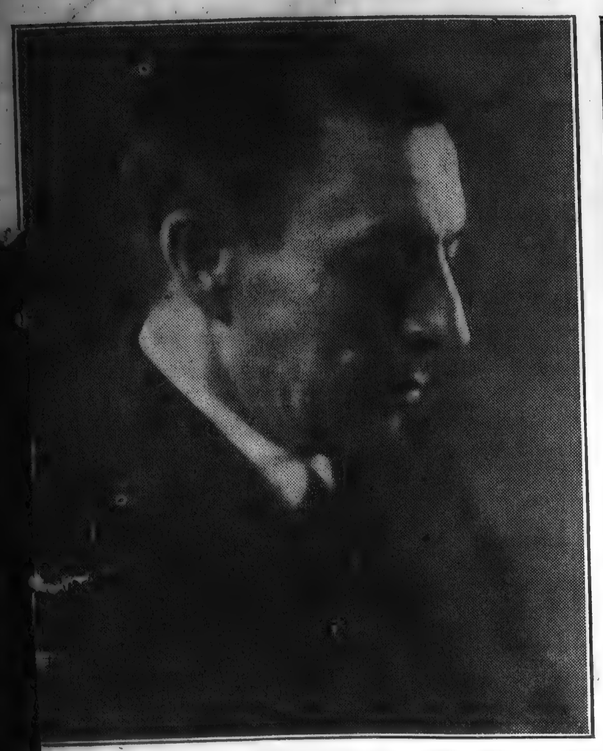
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

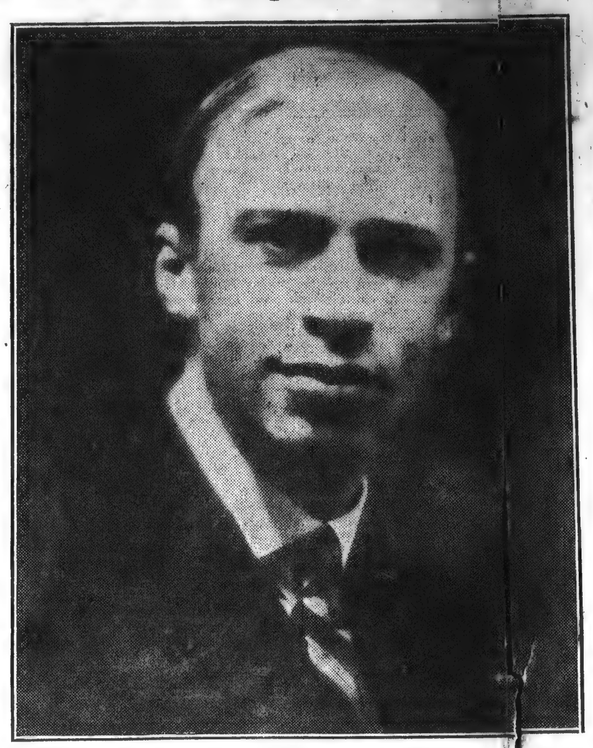
Century A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

Year One of the Russian Reign Over the Symphony Concerts



Rakhmaninov (Kubey-Rembrandt)
Pianist in His Own Music

Stravinsky (Musical America)
Composer and Also Pianist



Prokofiev
Playing His Own Piano-Piecs

Koussevitzky (Lipnitzki)
Conductor and Chooser

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
New Leader of the Symphony Orchestra

The New Conductor at Home

Last week a Globe reporter and photographer went out to Jamaica Plain to see the new conductor at home. Dr Vladimir Zederbaum, who for four years has been Mr Koussevitzky's secretary, led the way into the long, sunny living room where the conductor was sitting.

Of medium height, with broad shoulders and an easy poise of body, Mr Koussevitzky makes an impresive figure. He is 50 years old but looks far younger. His black hair is slightly streaked with gray and his face is dark, clean-cut and sensitive, altering with every mood. His nervous, expressive hands gesture rapidly as he talks and there is a subtle magnetism in voice and manner.

He speaks French and German fluently but knows very little English. Dr Zeberbaum acts as his interpreter when necessary. As Russians are usually gifted with the ability to pick up languages quickly it is probable that Mr Koussevitzky will soon be speaking English.

Mr Koussevitzky is optimistic about the musical situation in general. He declared that the public taste has improved greatly in the last 10 years.

"Never," he said emphatically, "has there been so much general interest in good music as there has been since the war. The ability of the average man and woman to distinguish between good and bad has increased greatly."

The conductor was speaking of course of the European public, as his knowledge of American tastes is as yet only hearsay, but he said that he knew some of the young American composers and expected great things from them. He said that he believed in the future of American music.

Programs to Be "Different"

Asked about his plans for the Symphony he smiled and remarked that these would be announced later but that the construction of the programs will be somewhat different. He hastened to add that this did not mean that the classical and other types of music which have been one of the Symphony programs in the past would be omitted.

"I would like to make it clear," he said, "that I am neither modernist nor classicist in my musical preferences. The works of the great classical masters are absolutely indispensable to me, as a musician and in my life. No one would less willingly be without them than I.

"But music is not a static art. Music is continually being made which is an expression of the period in which it appears. It is as necessary for us to know and admire what is being done as it is to know and admire what has been done. As for the value of new works, the conductor uses his best judgment in producing them. He must leave the rest to the judgment of time."

Mr Koussevitzky said that he hoped to widen the appeal of the Symphony. He felt he said that good music should be introduced into the lives of the gen-

This interest is extremely natural in a man who began his career long before he was in his teens, and who was the leader of an orchestra when he was only 12 years old.

Mr Koussevitzky's father was a violin teacher in the town of Tver, North Russia, where the future Symphony leader was born. From him the boy received his first musical instruction. Asked when the first decided that he wanted to be a musician, Mr Koussevitzky smiled and spread wide his hands in an expressive gesture.

"As long as I can remember I have wanted that," he said. "I never wanted anything else."

One thing which fed the boy's love of music was the playing of small bands of Austrian musicians which frequently stopped in the town. The Russian's eyes twinkled with amusement as he described how he would disappear for the day when they came and follow them about. He was then five years old. Frequently his father punished him for playing truant, but evidently the pleasure was worth the pain.

Orchestra Leader at 12

When he was nine years old he could play several instruments and added to his list with every year. Then came what must have been one of the greatest events of his life. He was made ...tra in the theatre of Tver. The reporter asked how he happened to have that position at that age and the patient Dr Zederbaum translated. Mr Koussevitzky, who during the interview had sat on the bench of the piano which half filled one corner of the room, leaned forward eagerly.

"It was the custom at the theatre to give concerts between the plays," he said. "They were not satisfied with the conductor they had—I do not know why—and they were looking for a new one. Then one of the musicians said, 'There is a boy in the town who knows all the instruments. He can do it.' My father did not approve but finally he consented and I became chef d'orchestre."

"What was the first piece you conducted?" was the next query.

"Wilhelm Tell," responded the leader of the Boston Symphony proudly.

In reply to a question Mr Koussevitzky said that he does not compose now, although he did in the past. At the little Tver theatre he composed whatever music might be required for the plays. In later life he continued to compose for a time, but eventually gave it up.

Must Work Very Hard

Probably few people realize how hard the leader of an orchestra must work if he is to be a success. Ernest Newman, music critic for the London Times, said of him in an article recently published in the Globe:

"He takes an enormous amount out of himself when he conducts and the wonder to me always is how he manages to get through the quantity of work he does and keep his nerves so steady and his head so cool through it all."

As the rehearsals of the Symphony have not yet commenced, Mr Koussevitsky might be said to be having a vacation, but even so he works every morning reading and studying his scores. Often he continues this work in the afternoon and if necessary into the evening. Sometimes he works indoors, at other times in the big sun parlor which opens from the living room.

Among his favorite relaxations is horseback riding. Someone remarked that the Jamaicaway was as good a place for riding as could be found in any European city, and the conductor glanced across toward the pond and said rather wistfully that he would probably have little time for it this

Olin Downes' Impressions

Since the only New Englanders who have seen Mr Koussevitzky conduct are those who were fortunate enough to attend his concerts in Europe the impression made by him on an American recently may be of interest. This is what Olin Downes, music critic of the New York Times, wrote of him after attending one of his concerts in Paris:

"On the conductor's stand he is a figure to watch as well as to hear. Koussevitzky plays obviously, but not the less effectively on his orchestra. He has no mannerisms or particular gestures that a single concert fixes in the mind, but does appear to embody in every movement what he finds in music. With a chorus of some good qualities and others by no means so good and an orchestra which Mr Koussevitzky will not prefer to the Boston Symphony he secured the most expressive and at times volcanic response to his wishes.

"And at such times, the conductor was a figure to remember—erect, imperious, his face working with his own emotions; a hand of what the fingers themselves are eloquent suddenly bringing out an outburst of tone from the chorus; a glance which, sweeping over the orchestra, brings equally sudden and dramatic results.

"Koussevitzky has the stamp of a leader. As a musician he is evidently endowed with a temparament which can on occasion sweep everything before it. There is an authority, a quenchless enthusiasm and a big sweep in all that he does, which if he were less sincere and individual as a musician than he is, would be a compelling force for public success. Nor is he in the habit of allowing an audience or an orchestra to stagnate under him."

formed or prejudiced, thinks to himself, 'What is music?' and understands that music is neither Bach nor Mozart nor Beethoven; that each one of them knew how to limit only himself; that music, to continue to be music, ought to be incessantly something else than what it was as expressed by them."

There are some who would say with Gide: "I await always something unknown, new powers of art . . . and though they should come from the planet Mars no one will persuade me that they ought to be injurious to me or remain unknown."

And this is the same Gide, who a month later in a letter to Angele, recognizes the fact that in theatre or concert hall there are torrid zones and cold islets. "How often the fear of being called on for an opinion on leaving has made me shun plays or concerts!

"'How did you like the way . . . conducted the 9th symphony?'

"Don't you prefer X or Z?'"

The London Times regretted recently the noteworthy absence of "novelties" at the Promenade concerts this season. "It may be true that a good many of the new works produced in former years have not much interested the general public, but if the Promenades are to be no longer an open forum where new things can be tried—and new composers, both native and foreign, can make their mark, the loss will be incalculable, not only to the composers and possibly to the public, but ultimately to the concerts themselves as an institution. Once the programs become stereotyped into an annual repetition of accepted works their days are numbered." That may justly be said of Symphony programs in Boston.

There was a time when the audience expected to hear at least five symphonies by Beethoven, three by Mozart—the "great three"—a half dozen familiar symphonies by Haydn, three overtures by Weber, at least three of Brahms's symphonies—to hear them year after year. No one wishes all these works to be dropped for a season. But who wishes to hear them all, even though a conductor should promise to interpret them in a new way? New wine in old bottles—or old wine in new bottles, in whatever way you wish to look at it.

Malipiero was right in saying: "Modern music has always existed. No one has written ancient music."

A glance at some of the programs prepared by Mr. Koussevitzky for his concerts in Paris may be of interest.

1921

April 22—Glinka, Overture to "Russian and Ludmilla"; Moussorgsky, Night on Bald Mountain; Scriabin, Poem of Ecstasy; Prokofiev, Scythian Suite.

May 6—Liadov, Apocalypse; Stravinski, Petrouchka; Scriabin, Prometheus.

Nov. 10—Weber, Overture to "Oberon"; Debussy, two nocturnes; Moussorgsky, Overture to "Khovantchinia"; Ramsky Korsakov, music from the "Legend of the Invisible City," and "Tsar Saltan"; Bach, C minor Symphony.

Dec. 1—Honegger, Victorious Horatius; Brahms, Song of Destiny, Wolf, the Fire Rider; Beethoven, Overture to "Egmont"; Rimsky-Korsakov, Spanish caprice.

Dec. 15—Beethoven, 9th Symphony; Haydn, Symphony No. 3; Borodin, Dances Polovtsiennes.

1922

April 20—Rimsky-Korsakov, Sadko; Borodin, Symphony No. 2; Honegger, Victorious Horatius; Koechlin, Pagan Forest.

April 27—Stravinsky, Petrouchka; Mozart G minor Symphony; Wagner, Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser"; Rimsky-Korsakov, Scheherazade; Liadov, eight Chansons Russes.

In May—Handel, Concerto grosso, Scarlatti—Manucl, three pieces; Ravel, the waltz; Milhaud, Suite No. 2. Also, Moussorgsky's "Fair at Sarotchinsi and Night on Bald Mountain.

1923

May 3—Berlioz, Roman Carnival; Schubert, unfinished Symphony; Riegel, Symphony in D; Honegger, Chant de Joie; Moussorgsky-Ravel, Pictures of an Exposition.

May 10—Bach, Overture in B minor; Stravinsky, The Nightingale's Song; Prokofiev, Classic Symphony.

May 17—Bax, Garden of Pfand; Gansman, Symphonic Scherzo; Reeal, Feu Follett; Prokofiev, Scythian Suite.

May 24—Beethoven, Overture to "Egmont"; Stravinsky, Sacre du Printemps; Mozart, Night Music for strings.

In October—Berlioz, Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini"; Roussel, Symphony; Ravel, Alborada del Gracioso, and The Walse; Stravinsky, octet for wind instruments; Prokofiev, Violin concerto; Polaci (18th century) Symphony; Boccherini, Symphony C major; Strauss, Till Eulenspiegel; Debussy, La Mer; Stravinski, Sacre du Printemps; Beethoven's Third Symphony; Mozart, Concerto for two pianos.

In November—Weber, Overture to "Oberon"; Satie, Parade; Delage, Ballet; Borodin, fragments from "Prince Igor"; Boulanger, Buddhist Prayer.

On May 8, Locatelli, Concerto (Symphonie Funebre; Tansman, Legend; Honegger, Pacific 231; Prokofiev, Piano Concerto; De Falla, L'Amour Sorcier; Moussorgsky-Ravel, Pictures of an Exposition.

May 15—Schubert, Symphony No. 5; Manuel, Tempo di Batto; Malpiero, Impressions III; Respighi, Concerto Gregoriano for violin (Mr. Spalding); Scriabin, Poem of Ecstasy; Honegger, Pacific 231.

May 22—A Stravinsky program: Fire Bird, Petrouchka, Sacre du Printemps, Concerto for piano and wind instruments.

May 29, as announced—Corelli, Concerto Grosso; Schmitt, Mirage; Debussy, Nocturnes; Stravinsky, The King of the Stars; Prokofiev, Seven They are Seven (Incantation for tenor, chorus and orchestra); Borodin, Dances from "Prince Igor."

It should be noted that these programs were arranged especially for Paris.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
GLOBE

SEP 21 1924

New Symphony Conductor Says His Programs Will Be Different

Serge Koussevitzky Declares Classics Are Indispensable, But It Is Necessary to Know What Is Being Done Today—Hopes to Widen Symphony Orchestra's Appeal

What will Serge Koussevitzky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, give to the musical world of America? That is a question which is of the deepest interest in the minds of music lovers all over the country.

There is always much curiosity regarding a new leader of Boston's famous orchestra, but in this case it is deepened by the fact that he will be the first Russian to lead the Symphony and because he is said to be the only truly great conductor whom America has not heard.

When Mr Koussevitzky landed in New York on Sept 18 it was his first visit to this country. He came direct to Boston and is now comfortably installed for the season at 122 Pond st, close to Jamaica Pond

The New Conductor at Home

Last week a Globe reporter and photographer went out to Jamaica Plain to see the new conductor at home. Dr Vladimir Zederbaum, who for four years has been Mr Koussevitzky's secretary, led the way into the long, sunny living room where the conductor was sitting.

Of medium height, with broad shoulders and an easy poise of body, Mr Koussevitzky makes an impresive figure. He is 50 years old but looks far younger. His black hair is slightly streaked with gray and his face is dark, clean-cut and sensitive, altering with every mood. His nervous, expressive hands gesture rapidly as he talks and there is a subtle magnetism in voice and manner.

He speaks French and German fluently but knows very little English. Dr Zederbaum acts as his interpreter when necessary. As Russians are usually gifted with the ability to pick up languages quickly it is probable that Mr Koussevitzky will soon be speaking English.

Mr Koussevitzky is optimistic about the musical situation in general. He declared that the public taste has improved greatly in the last 10 years.

"Never," he said emphatically, "has there been so much general interest in good music as there has been since the war. The ability of the average man and woman to distinguish between good and bad has increased greatly."

The conductor was speaking of course of the European public, as his knowledge of American tastes is as yet only hearsay, but he said that he knew some of the young American composers and expected great things from them. He said that he believed in the future of American music.

Programs to Be "Different"

Asked about his plans for the Symphony he smiled and remarked that these would be announced later but that the construction of the programs will be somewhat different. He hastened to add that this did not mean that the classical and other types of music which have been one of the Symphony programs in the past would be omitted.

"I would like to make it clear," he said, "that I am neither modernist nor classicist in my musical preferences. The works of the great classical masters are absolutely indispensable to me, as a musician and in my life. No one would less willingly be without them than I.

"But music is not a static art. Music is continually being made which is an expression of the period in which it appears. It is as necessary for us to know and admire what is being done as it is to know and admire what has been done. As for the value of new works, the conductor uses his best judgment in producing them. He must leave the rest to the judgment of time."

Mr Koussevitzky said that he hoped to widen the appeal of the Symphony. He felt he said that good music should be introduced into the lives of the general public, but that it was far too soon for him to say what steps should be taken to accomplish this.

Jazz Influence for Good

Ever since he landed, Mr Koussevitzky has been asked so frequently about jazz that he sees a syncopation lurking under every query about American music. This time he volunteered the statement that he thought jazz had been an influence for good, and declared that it was very interesting from a technical point of view.

Mr Koussevitzky is intensely interested in young musicians. All his life he has helped them whenever he could. In 1909 he and his wife founded the publishing business of "L'Edition Russe de Musique," the object of which was to give an opportunity to talented young Russian composers and to prevent their exploitation by purely commercial publishing houses.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
New Leader of the Symphony Orchestra

This interest is extremely natural in a man who began his career long before he was in his teens, and who was the leader of an orchestra when he was only 12 years old.

Mr Koussevitzky's father was a violin teacher in the town of Tver, North Russia, where the future Symphony leader was born. From him the boy received his first musical instruction. Asked when the first decided that he wanted to be a musician, Mr Koussevitzky smiled and spread wide his hands in an expressive gesture.

"As long as I can remember I have wanted that," he said. "I never wanted anything else."

One thing which fed the boy's love of music was the playing of small bands of Austrian musicians which frequently stopped in the town. The Russian's eyes twinkled with amusement as he described how he would disappear for the day when they came and follow them about. He was then five years old. Frequently his father punished him for playing truant, but evidently the pleasure was worth the pain.

Orchestra Leader at 12

When he was nine years old he could play several instruments and added to his list with every year. Then came what must have been one of the greatest events of his life. He was made first violin in the theatre of Tver.

The reporter asked how he happened to have that position at that age and the patient Dr Zederbaum translated. Mr Koussevitzky, who during the interview had sat on the bench of the piano which half filled one corner of the room, leaned forward eagerly.

"It was the custom at the theatre to give concerts between the plays," he said. "They were not satisfied with the conductor they had—I do not know why—and they were looking for a new one. Then one of the musicians said, 'There is a boy in the town who knows all the instruments. He can do it.' My father did not approve but finally he consented and I became chef d'orchestre."

"What was the first piece you conducted?" was the next query.

"Wilhelm Tell," responded the leader of the Boston Symphony proudly.

In reply to a question Mr Koussevitzky said that he does not compose now, although he did in the past. At the little Tver theatre he composed whatever music might be required for the plays. In later life he continued to compose for a time, but eventually gave it up.

Must Work Very Hard

Probably few people realize how hard the leader of an orchestra must work if he is to be a success. Ernest Newman, music critic for the London Times, said of him in an article recently published in the Globe:

"He takes an enormous amount out of himself when he conducts and the wonder to me always is how he manages to get through the quantity of work he does and keep his nerves so steady and his head so cool through it all."

As the rehearsals of the Symphony have not yet commenced, Mr Koussevitzky might be said to be having a vacation, but even so he works every morning reading and studying his scores. Often he continues this work in the afternoon and if necessary into the evening. Sometimes he works indoors, at other times in the big sun parlor which opens from the living room.

Among his favorite relaxations is horseback riding. Someone remarked that the Jamaicaway was as good a place for riding as could be found in any European city, and the conductor glanced across toward the pond and said rather wistfully that he would probably have little time for it this year. Walking and reading good fiction are other amusements of which he is fond.

Mrs Nataly Koussevitzky—they have been married 19 years, by the way—has accompanied her husband to this country. She is well known abroad as a sculptor and may take up this work again during her stay here. Her specialty is portrait busts and she exhibited in Russia.

His European Career

The World War which destroyed so many well-laid plans made it possible for Boston to obtain his new orchestra leader. In 1909 he had organized the Koussevitzky Orchestra which soon became so famous that it was made up of the best players from other Russian orchestras. After the formal seasons in Petrograd and Moscow he gave Beethoven festivals, Bach festivals Tchaikovsky festivals, etc, in the two capitals. In the Summer he toured the provinces with his orchestra and his annual voyages down the Volga are among the most romantic events in modern musical times.

Then came the war, but although most of his musicians had been called to the colors he continued to give concerts with other orchestras. After the Revolution he was appointed director of the Russian State Orchestras. In 1920 he left Russia to settle in Western Europe. From 1921 to 1924 he gave his now famous Paris concerts, two seasons of four concerts each, annually. He became extremely popular in London and conducted in many other European cities. But he was not entirely happy for he desired again to have an orchestra of his own.

"I did not like to conduct an orchestra after we had had only two or three rehearsals," he said. "I wanted to work with my own orchestra and present new music and give new interpretations to old music.

"I determined that if I ever came to the United States it would not be as a guest conductor but as the conductor of my own orchestra. Now I consider that I am to conduct the finest orchestra in America."

Olin Downes' Impressions

Since the only New Englanders who have seen Mr Koussevitzky conduct are those who were fortunate enough to attend his concerts in Europe the impression made by him on an American recently may be of interest. This is what Olin Downes, music critic of the New York Times, wrote of him after attending one of his concerts in Paris:

"On the conductor's stand he is a figure to watch as well as to hear. Koussevitzky plays obviously, but not the less effectively on his orchestra. He has no mannerisms or particular gestures that a single concert fixes in the mind, but does appear to embody in every movement what he finds in music. With a chorus of some good qualities and others by no means so good and an orchestra which Mr Koussevitzky will not prefer to the Boston Symphony he secured the most expressive and at times volcanic response to his wishes.

"And at such times, the conductor was a figure to remember—erect, imperious, his face working with his own emotions; a hand of what the fingers themselves are eloquent suddenly bringing out an outburst of tone from the chorus; a glance which, sweeping over the orchestra, brings equally sudden and dramatic results.

"Koussevitzky has the stamp of a leader. As a musician he is evidently endowed with a temparament which can on occasion sweep everything before it. There is an authority, a quenchless enthusiasm and a big sweep in all that he does, which if he were less sincere and individual as a musician than he is, would be a compelling force for public success. Nor is he in the habit of allowing an audience or an orchestra to stagnate under him."

Weekly Comment

There naturally was, there is, curiosity about Mr. Koussevitzky's programs. Shocking reports of his fell purpose had come across the Atlantic. It was said that he actually had encouraged the ultra-modern composers, the demons of dissonance, by performing their nerve-rasping monstrosities. Conservative Bostonians, those who believe that music ended with Johannes Brahms, shuddered in anticipation of seeing the red flag hoisted on Symphony hall and flapping there defiantly. What has already been said by Mr. Koussevitzky since his arrival reassures the timid in a measure. He speaks favorably of the ancients; there is only one Beethoven—not even in the United States, not even in Boston will another Beethoven arise; and Mr. Koussevitzky is going to lead a symphony or two by our old friend Bruckner—Bruckner, a composer dear to conductors. Did not Messrs. Nikisch, Gericke, Muck in turn show their devotion to him.

Audiences, like Gaul, may be divided into three parts. There are the ultra-conservatives, the reactionaries, who applaud only the composers that in their opinion are "classical." They have no desire to hear any music that is contemporaneous, unless from patriotic or parochial motives. They approve mildly a composition by an American if it is constructed in accordance with the old rules and traditions.

The second group is made up of the irreverent young, who already dub the Debussy's music "old hat"; who insist on hearing only the works of the most "advanced" school; who talk knowingly of the "Six" (now five, and perhaps they are disbanded); who talk volubly about "impressionnisme" and "pointillisme," and speak knowingly of Erik Satie, although they have never heard a note of his music except, possibly, the "Gymnopedies" orchestrated by that old fogy, Achille Claude Debussy.

The members of the third group plume themselves on their catholicity of taste, their eclecticism. They enjoy Bach because he is "quaint." "You can find all possible harmonic devices in his music." They think symphonies by Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven should be played if only for the benefit of the younger generation. They are impressed by the architectonics of Brahms. As for the ultra-moderns, they of course should be heard. "It is necessary to know what is going on in the musical world." So Bach and Honegger are alike to them; they applaud Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" and the overture to "Oberon" with equal fervor, and say boldly, "one must be broad-minded."

Yet M. Andre Gide in a lecture delivered at the Grand Ducal Court at Weimar twenty odd years ago argued that this intelligent eclecticism proved that art is no longer a natural production; that it no longer responds to any precise need of the public. "A decomposed society, without any distinct ideal that may be formulated in any style, accepts rashly, at the risk of hostile meetings, all the ideals of the past and each one that each of the new artists offers."

And it was Gide who said on another occasion: "After a Sabastian Bach, one thinks: This is music. Then come a Mozart and a Beethoven; after them one can still say: This at last is music, unless already informed or prejudiced, thinks to himself, 'What is music?' and understands that music is neither Bach nor Mozart nor Beethoven; that each one of them knew how to limit only himself; that music, to continue to be music, ought to be incessantly something else than what it was as expressed by them."

There are some who would say with Gide: "I await always something unknown, new powers of art . . . and though they should come from the planet Mars no one will persuade me that they ought to be injurious to me or remain unknown."

And this is the same Gide, who a month later in a letter to Angele, recognizes the fact that in theatre or concert hall there are torrid zones and cold islets. "How often the fear of being called on for an opinion on leaving has made me shun plays or concerts!

"'How did you like the way . . . conducted the 9th symphony?'

"'Don't you prefer X or Z?'"

The London Times regretted recently the noteworthy absence of "novelties" at the Promenade concerts this season. "It may be true that a good many of the new works produced in former years have not much interested the general public, but if the Promenades are to be no longer an open forum where new things can be tried—and new composers, both native and foreign, can make their mark, the loss will be incalculable, not only to the composers and possibly to the public, but ultimately to the concerts themselves as an institution. Once the programs become stereotyped into an annual repetition of accepted works their days are numbered." That may justly be said of Symphony programs in Boston.

There was a time when the audience expected to hear at least five symphonies by Beethoven, three by Mozart—the "great three"—a half dozen familiar symphonies by Haydn, three overtures by Weber, at least three of Brahms's symphonies—to hear them year after year. No one wishes all these works to be dropped for a season. But who wishes to hear them all, even though a conductor should promise to interpret them in a new way? New wine in old bottles—or old wine in new bottles, in whatever way you wish to look at it.

Malipiero was right in saying: "Modern music has always existed. No one has written ancient music."

A glance at some of the programs prepared by Mr. Koussevitzky for his concerts in Paris may be of interest.

1921

April 22—Glinka, Overture to "Russian and Ludmilla"; Moussorgsky, Night on Bald Mountain; Scriabin, Poem of Ecstasy; Prokofiev, Scythian Suite.

May 6—Liadov, Apocalypse; Stravinski, Petrouchka; Scriabin, Prometheus.

Nov. 10—Weber, Overture to "Oberon"; Debussy, two nocturnes; Moussorgsky, Overture to "Khovantchinia"; Ramsky Korsakov, music from the "Legend of the Invisible City," and "Tsar Saltan"; Bach, C minor Symphony.

Dec. 1—Honegger, Victorious Horatius; Brahms, Song of Destiny, Wolf, the Fire Rider; Beethoven, Overture to "Egmont"; Rimsky-Korsakov, Spanish caprice.

Dec. 15—Beethoven, 9th Symphony; Haydn, Symphony No. 3; Borodin, Dances Polovtsiennes.

1922

April 20—Rimsky-Korsakov, Sadko; Borodin, Symphony No. 2; Honegger, Victorious Horatius; Koechlin, Pagan Forest.

April 27—Stravinsky, Petrouchka; Mozart G minor Symphony; Wagner, Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser"; Rimsky-Korsakov, Scheherazade; Liadov, eight Chansons Russes.

In May—Handel, Concerto grosso, Scarlatti—Manuel, three pieces; Ravel, the waltz; Milhaud, Suite No. 2. Also, Moussorgsky's "Fair at Sarotchinsi and Night on Bald Mountain.

1923

May 3—Berlioz, Roman Carnival; Schubert, unfinished Symphony; Riegel, Symphony in D; Honegger, Chant de Joie; Moussorgsky-Ravel, Pictures of an Exposition.

May 10—Bach, Overture in B minor; Stravinsky, The Nightingale's Song; Prokofiev, Classic Symphony.

May 17—Bax, Garden of Pfand; Gansman, Symphonic Scherzo; Reeal, Feu Follett; Prokofiev, Scythian Suite.

May 24—Beethoven, Overture to "Egmont"; Stravinsky, Sacre du Printemps; Mozart, Night Music for strings.

In October—Berlioz, Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini"; Roussel, Symphony; Ravel, Alborada del Graziose, and The Walse; Stravinsky, octet for wind instruments; Prokofiev, Violin concerto; Polaci (18th century) Symphony; Boccherini, Symphony C major; Strauss, Till Eulenspiegel; Debussy, La Mer; Stravinski, Sacre du Printemps; Beethoven's Third Symphony; Mozart, Concerto for two pianos.

In November—Weber, Overture to "Oberon"; Satie, Parade; Delage, Ballet; Borodin, fragments from "Prince Igor"; Boulanger, Buddhist Prayer.

On May 8, Locatelli, Concerto (Symphonie Funebre; Tansman, Legend; Honegger, Pacific 231; Prokofiev, Piano Concerto; De Falla, L'Amour Sorcier: Moussorgsky-Ravel, Pictures of an Exposition.

May 15—Schubert, Symphony No. 5; Manuel, Tempo di Batto; Malipiero, Impressions III; Respighi, Concerto Gregoriano for violin (Mr. Spalding); Scriabin, Poem of Ecstasy; Honegger, Pacific 231.

May 22—A Stravinsky program: Fire Bird, Petrouchka, Sacre du Printemps, Concerto for piano and wind instruments.

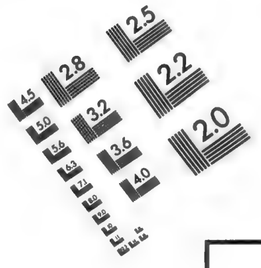
May 29, as announced—Corelli, Concerto Grosso; Schmitt, Mirage; Debussy, Nocturnes; Stravinsky, The King of the Stars; Prokofiev, Seven They are Seven (Incantation for tenor, chorus and orchestra); Borodin, Dances from "Prince Igor."

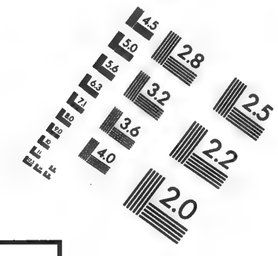
It should be noted that these programs were arranged especially for Paris.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

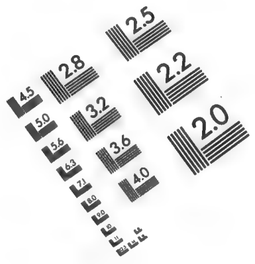


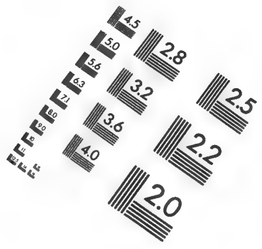


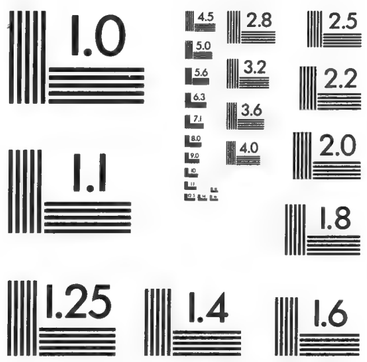
200 mm

150 mm

100 mm







ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

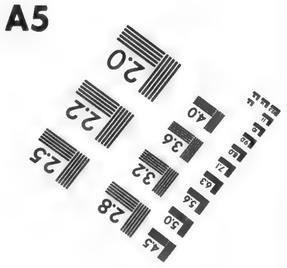
2.0 mm

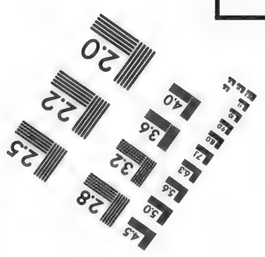
2.5 mm

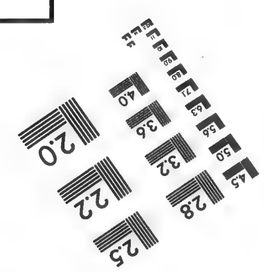
A5

A4

A3







PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

World Famous Composers, Pianists for Symphony, Pictured by P

Four distinguished Symphony soloists-to-be, shown assembled in the same room. But—as you have probably guessed from the piano with the northeast-by-north, northwest-by-north keyboard—this is a composite photograph, for it was not possible to get the men themselves together for a photograph. At the lower left is Serge Prokofieff, Russian pianist, and also, despite his youth, one of the world's foremost modernist composers of today. At his elbow stands Serge Rachmaninoff, Russian composer-pianist, whose works and whose playing are both well-known here already. Beside the other keyboard stand, respectively, Guy Maier and Lee Pattison, famous as players of two-piano compositions, in which they are scheduled to be heard as soloists on a forthcoming Koussevitsky programme.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

SEP 21 1924

Arrives To Conduct Boston Symphony

Serge Koussevitsky, famous Russian musician, who has been engaged to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
AMERICAN

SEP 21 1924

ALSO one might hope, perhaps with more reason, for the appearance of the Metropolitan Opera Company. But on that, as yet, our lips are sealed. Furthermore, one might hope for one performance, as of yore, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Much good report hath come out of Europe all summer concerning the new director, one Serge Koussevitsky, Russion idol of Paris if the reports are to be given credence. One is fired forthwith with a desire to hear this Koussevitsky's conducting. The Philharmonic is assured for one appearance under Mengelberg. Certainly the New York, the Philadelphia and the Baltimore Symphony Orchestras we have always with us. And a very good thing it is; better than we are likely to remember. The Philadelphia never ceases to be exciting so long as Stokowski's unfailing vitality enervates and fires the players. Mr. Stokowski can make a Tschaikowski symphony sound the most important thing in the universe. More could be said of no man. And Mr. Damrosch, with the wisdom of music in his baton, brings us in the New York performances a tradition of good taste and rightness that America is sadly lacking even yet. The Baltimore organization, you all known. As you know, Gustav Strube, who has labored steadily and quietly these several years till the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra is a body of players for the city to be proud of.

* * * *

ST. LOUIS, MO.
GLOBE-DEMOCRAT

SEP 21 1924

Pierre Key's Music Article

By PIERRE V. R. KEY

NEW YORK, September 20.—Time has a way of

Koussevitsky Arrives.

Serge Koussevitsky, who is to succeed Pierre Monteux as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived in New York a few days ago, en route to the Hub City, which will be his music headquarters for the next five years.

Much has been written about this Russian, who achieved fame first as a virtuoso player of the double bass. Although he began to conduct at the age of 12, it was not until Kerensky appointed him head of the Russian State Orchestra in 1917 that Koussevitsky found a real opportunity to develop.

Compelled, with the fall of Kerensky, to flee his country, Koussevitsky went to Paris; and there, as well as in London and other British Isle centers, he attracted attention chiefly for his readings of modern orchestra scores.

There has been much speculation over what Koussevitsky will do in his new post, where his predecessors have been well-schooled classicists. He is of good height and physique, with a strong and expressive face and hair turning to grey. Koussevitsky is 50, and vital. He said he had brought with him a number of modern novelties, and that he is looking forward with keen interest to his stay in this country.

Bostonians will have their first opportunity to judge of their new musician at the first concert of the Boston Symphony on October 10. Koussevitsky's New York debut will take place on Thanksgiving night.

World Famous Composers, Pianists for Symphony, Pictured by P

Four distinguished Symphony soloists-to-be, shown assembled in the same room. But—as you have probably guessed from the piano with the northeast-by-north, northwest-by-north keyboard—this is a composite photograph, for it was not possible to get the men themselves together for a photograph. At the lower left is Serge Prokofieff, Russian pianist, and also, despite his youth, one of the world's foremost modernist composers of today. At his elbow stands Serge Rachmaninoff, Russian composer-pianist, whose works and whose playing are both well-known here already. Beside the other keyboard stand, respectively, Guy Maier and Lee Pattison, famous as players of two-piano compositions, in which they are scheduled to be heard as soloists on a forthcoming Koussevitsky programme.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
TRIBUNE

SEP 21

Arrives To Conduct Boston Symphony

Serge Koussevitsky, famous Russian musician, who has been engaged to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season.

Underwood & Underwood, N. Y.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
AMERICAN

SEP 21 1924

ALSO one might hope, perhaps with more reason, for the appearance of the Metropolitan Opera Company. But on that, as yet, our lips are sealed. Furthermore, one might hope for one performance, as of yore, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Much good report hath come out of Europe all summer concerning the new director, one Serge Koussevitsky, Russion idol of Paris if the reports are to be given credence. One is fired forthwith with a desire to hear this Koussevitsky's conducting. The Philharmonic is assured for one appearance under Mengelberg. Certainly the New York, the Philadelphia and the Baltimore Symphony Orchestras we have always with us. And a very good thing it is; better than we are likely to remember. The Philadelphia never ceases to be exciting so long as Stokowski's unfailing vitality enervates and fires the players. Mr. Stokowski can make a Tschaikowski symphony sound the most important thing in the universe. More could be said of no man. And Mr. Damrosch, with the wisdom of music in his baton, brings us in the New York performances a tradition of good taste and rightness that America is sadly lacking even yet. The Baltimore organization, you all known. As you know, Gustav Strube, who has labored steadily and quietly these several years till the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra is a body of players for the city to be proud of.

* * *

ST. LOUIS,
MO.
GLOBE-DEMOCRAT

SEP 21 1924

Pierre Key's Music Article

By PIERRE V. R. KEY

NEW YORK, September 20.—Time has a way of bringing

Koussevitsky Arrives.

Serge Koussevitsky, who is to succeed Pierre Monteux as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived in New York a few days ago, en route to the Hub City, which will be his music headquarters for the next five years.

Much has been written about the Russian, who achieved fame first as a virtuoso player of the double bass. Although he began to conduct at the age of 12, it was not until Kerensky appointed him head of the Russian State Orchestra in 1917 that Koussevitsky found a real opportunity to develop.

Compelled, with the fall of Kerensky, to flee his country, Koussevitsky went to Paris; and there, as well as in London and other British Isle centers, he attracted attention * * * chiefly for his readings of modern orchestra scores.

There has been much speculation over what Koussevitsky will do in his new post, where his predecessors have been well-schooled classicists. He is of good height and physique, with a strong and expressive face and hair turning to grey. Koussevitsky is 50, and vital. He said he had brought with him a number of modern novelties, and that he is looking forward with keen interest to his stay in this country.

Bostonians will have their first opportunity to judge of their new musician at the first concert of the Boston Symphony on October 10. Koussevitsky's New York debut will take place on Thanksgiving night.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

SEP 21 1924

By WILLA JERDONE

Mr. and Mrs. E. Sohier Welch captured the honor of being of the first to entertain the new Symphony director, M. Koussevitzky, so recently arrived and probably the very most talked of man in Boston just now and certainly the most intriguing to that large and distinguished company making ready to storm Symphony hall on October's second Friday (now entered in engagement dates as a sacrosanct date) when the great virtuoso makes his bow to the music world of Boston. But of the party Mr. and Mrs. Welch gave. It was delightfully informal, down at the summer home

(Photo by Bachrach)
MRS. E. SOHIER WELCH
She Has Carried Off the First Honors in Entertaining M. Koussevitzky, the Newly Arrived Symphony Conductor, a Delightful Dinner Party Given at the Summer Home in West Manchester the Event, and Every One Warm in Their Admiration of the Famous Virtuoso.

in West Manchester, when kindred souls talked of music in general and the particular brand supposed to please the (said to be critical) ear of Boston's very best.

And apropos of music it is great good news to be assured that again this winter we are to nave the opera and prayers are going up from all true lovers of fine music that the success will be so great that Boston, like New York and Chicago, may have opera as a fixture on each winter's calendar. Mr. Goodrich and Mr. Welch are going to Chicago about the middle of November to make selection of the repertoire and the last week in January or the first of February will find the singers arriving here and enthusiasts filling the opera house from footlight stalls to topmost gallery for every performance.

Truly it seems that for this boon in a feast of music much appreciation should go to that small but valiant group of men who have the courage to underwrite the really tremendous undertaking, the famous "eleven" willing to carry the responsibility and who answer to the roll call alphabetically—Messrs. Walter C. Baylies, George W. Brown, Henry B. Day, B. H. Bristow Draper, Edwin Farnham Greene, George C. Lee, John R. Macomber, James J. Phelan, John E. Thayer, Jr., David G. Wing and E. Sohier Welch. The committee making arrangements, besides Mr. Welch and Mr. Goodrich, includes Messrs. Green, Thayer and Ralph Flanders.

Still, if we may continue along this ever fascinating line of music, come echoes of the liveliest applause from the glorious Berkshire hills where the sixth annual festival of chamber music (for which Mrs. Frederick S. Coolidge is the good angel) has been delighting such throngs that filled to overflowing the Music Temple, that simple stately edifice that stands so loftily in its natural wooded park on South mountain, in Pittsfield's beautiful environ. Of course, the festival, which lasted for three long soul-stirring days, was surrounded by a multitude of social events—luncheons and dinners and suppers galore—and Mrs. Coolidge's reception for 500 guests which was really something like a grand climax to the Berkshire season, bringing together as it did notables from everywhere, was a brilliant function quite epoch making even in that region of smart and distinguished entertaining.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION

SEP 21 1924

Pierre Key's Music Article

By PIERRE V. R. KEY.

NEW YORK, Sept. 20—Time has a

Koussevitsky Arrives.

Serge Koussevitsky, who is to succeed Pierre Monteux as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived in New York a few days ago, en route to the Hub City which will be his music headquarters for the next five years.

Much has been written about this Russian, who achieved fame first as a virtuoso player of the double-bass. Although he began to conduct at the age of 12 it was not until Kerensky appointed him head of the Russian State Orchestra in 1917 that Koussevitsky found a real opportunity to develop.

Compelled, with the fall of Kerensky, to flee his country, Koussevitsky went to Paris; and there, as well as in London and other British Isle centers, he attracted attention . . . chiefly for his readings of modern orchestra scores.

There has been much speculation over what Koussevitsky will do in his new post, where his predecessors have been well-schooled classicists. He is of good hight and physique, with a strong and expressive face and hair turning to gray. Koussevitsky is 50, and vital. He said he had brought with him a number of modern novelties, and that he is looking forward with keen interest to his stay in this country.

Bostonians will have their first opportunity to judge of their new musician at the first concert of the Boston Symphony on Oct. 10. Koussevitsky's New York debut will take place on Thanksgiving night.

ters of Italy were put forward as worthy of being heard. The effort

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS

SEP 21 1924

Aida Opens Gotham Fall Opera Season

By Pierre V. R. Key.

KOUSSEVITSKY ARRIVES

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY, who is to succeed Pierre Monteux as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, arrived in New York a few days ago, en route to the Hub city, which will be his music headquarters for the next five years.

Much has been written about this Russian, who achieved fame first as a virtuoso player of the double-bass. Although he began to conduct at the age of twelve it was not until Kerensky appointed him head of the Russian State Orchestra in 1917 that Koussevitsky found a real opportunity to develop.

Compelled with the fall of Kerensky, to flee his country, Koussevitsky went to Paris; and there, as well as in London and other British isle centers, he attracted attention . . . chiefly for his readings of modern orchestra scores.

There has been much speculation over what Koussevitsky will do in his new post, where his predecessors have been well-schooled classicists. He is of good height and physique, with a strong and expressive face and hair turning to gray. Koussevitsky is fifty, and vital. He said he had brought with him a number of modern novelties, and that he is looking forward with keen interest to his stay in this country.

Bostonians will have their first opportunity to judge of their new musician at the first concert of the Boston Symphony on October 10. Koussevitsky's New York debut will take place on Thanksgiving night.

early thirties and comely. She has a penetrating soprano, which is of the ...ot agile enough for ...ally of an ...

THIS CLIPPING FROM

SEP 1924

KOUSSEVITSKY ARRIVES.

Serge Koussevitsky, who is to succeed Pierre Monteux as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, arrived in New York a few days ago, en route to the Hub City, which will be his music headquarters for the next five days.

Much has been written about this Russian, who achieved fame first as a virtuoso player of the double-bass. Although he began to conduct at the age of 12, it was not until Kerensky appointed him head of the Russian State orchestra in 1917 that Koussevitsky found a real opportunity to develop.

Compelled, with the fall of Kerensky, to flee his country, Koussevitsky went to Paris; and there, as well as in London and other British Isle centers, he attracted attention . . . chiefly for his readings of modern orchestra scores.

There has been much speculation over what Koussevitsky will do in his new post, where his predecessors have been well schooled classicists. He is of good height and physique, with a strong and expressive face and hair turning to gray. Koussevitsky is 50, and vital. He said he had brought with him a number of modern novelties, and that he is looking forward with keen interest to his stay in this country.

Bostonians will have their first opportunity to judge of their new musician at the first concert of the Boston Symphony on October 10. Koussevitsky's New York debut will take place on Thanksgiving night.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
TRIBUNE

SEP 21 1924

Kussevitsky Is Loyal.

Whatever may be the judgments passed on the new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Kussevitsky, one must admire his devotion to his countrymen. Five soloists are to appear with the Boston orchestra and three of them are Russians.

Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST

SEP 21 1924

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
CONDUCTOR
BOSTON SYMPHONY

The opening concert in the symphony orchestra series this season will introduce to Pittsburgh Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, the new leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The Pittsburgh Orchestra Association announces that six pairs of concerts will be given this season, instead of five as in previous years. In

THIS CLIPPING FROM HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

SEP 21 1924

tailed notice.

Koussevitsky Arrives

Serge Koussevitsky, who is to succeed Pierre Monteux as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived in New York a few days ago, en route to the Hub City which will be his music headquarters for the next five years.

Much has been written about this Russian, who achieved fame first as a virtuoso player of the double-bass. Although he began to conduct at the age of twelve it was not until Kerensky appointed him head of the Russian State Orchestra in 1917 that Koussevitsky found a real opportunity to develop.

Compelled, with the fall of Kerensky, to flee his country, Koussevitsky went to Paris; and there, as well as in London and other British Isle centers, he attracted attention—chiefly for his readings of modern orchestra scores.

There has been much speculation over what Koussevitsky will do in his new post, where his predecessors have been well-schooled classicists. He is of good height and physique, with a strong and impressive face and hair turning to gray. Koussevitsky is fifty, and vital. He said he had brought with him a number of modern novelties, and that he is looking forward with keen interest to his stay in this country.

Bostonians will have their first opportunity to judge of their new musician at the first concert of the Boston Symphony on October 10. Koussevitsky's New York debut will take place on Thanksgiving night.

Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
GLOBE

SEP 21 1924

The London Symphony Orchestra begins its season Oct 20. The list of conductors is as follows: Albert Coates, Furtwangler, Weingartner, Schneevoight, Kussevitsky and possibly Bruno Walter. Among the soloists are Florence Austral, Casals, Dohnanyi, de Solis and Tudor Davies.

120

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE WORCESTER
MASS.
TELEGRAM

SEP 21 1924

Koussevitsky Arrives

Serge Koussevitsky, who is to succeed Pierre Monteux as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, arrived in New York a few days ago en route to the Hub City which will be his music headquarters for the next five years.

Much has been written about this Russian, who achieved fame first as a virtuoso player of the double-bass. Although he began to conduct at the age of twelve it was not until Kerensky appointed him head of the Russian State orchestra in 1917 that Koussevitsky found a real opportunity to develop.

Compelled, with the fall of Kerensky, to flee his country, Koussevitsky went to Paris; and there, as well as in London and other British Isle centers, he attracted attention..... chiefly for his readings of modern orchestra scores.

There has been much speculation over what Koussevitsky will do in his new post, where his predecessors have been well-schooled classicists. He is of good height and physique, with a strong and expressive face and hair turning to grey. Koussevitsky is 50 and vital. He said he had brought with him a number of modern novelists, and that he is looking forward with keen interest to his stay in this country.

Bostonians will have their first opportunity to judge of their new musician at the first concert of the Boston Symphony on October 10. Koussevitsky's New York debut will take place on Thanksgiving night.

Famous Critic Coming Here

Since progressive daily newspaper editors attach more and more inportance to the superior reviewing of music performances, it is no surprise to learn that the precedent set last season by the New York Times is to be followed this year by the New York Evening Post.

The Times brought from London Mr. Colles. The Post has arranged with Ernest Newman to spend several months as its guest chronicler of music matters, and the distinguished critic for the Manchester Guardian and the London Sunday Times will arrive shortly in New York to begin his work.

Newman is regarded by many musicians as perhaps the most learned and the ablest reviewer in Great Britain. He is rated as one of the first two or three men in his profession; so his residence in New York should exert a genuinely constructive influence, not only upon those of the various music crafts but as well upon those New York commentators who will be, for the time, his colleagues.

Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM

Post
Herald

SEP 21 1924

KOUSSEVITSKY ARRIVES.

Serge Koussevitsky, who is to succeed Pierre Monteux as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, arrived in New York a few days ago, en route to the Hub City, which will be his music headquarters for the next five years.

Much has been written about this Russian, who achieved fame first as a virtuoso player of the double-bass. Although he began to conduct at the age of twelve it was not until Kerensky appointed him head of the Russian State orchestra in 1917 that Koussevitsky found a real opportunity to develop.

Compelled, with the fall of Kerensky, to flee his country, Koussevitsky went to Paris; and there, as well as in London and other British Isle centers, he attracted attention, . . . chiefly for his readings of modern orchestra scores.

There has been much speculation over what Koussevitsky will do in his new post, where his predecessors have been well-schooled classicists. He is of good height and physique, with a strong and expressive face and hair turning to gray. Koussevitsky is fifty, and vital. He said he had brought with him a number of modern novelties, and that he is looking forward with keen interest to his stay in this country.

Bostonians will have their first opportunity to judge of their new musician at the first concert of the Boston Symphony on October 10. Koussevitsky's New York debut will take place on Thanksgiving night.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
GLOBE

SEP 21 1924

Koussevitzky's Choice of Programs

The first question most people ask about Koussevitzky these days seems to be "What are his programs going to be like? All modern works?" At least the writer has been asked it by various acquaintances, with some degree of interest manifested. The only safe answer to give is of course "Nobody except Koussevitzky knows yet. Wait and see." But there is some reasonably safe ground available for speculation on the subject.

The new Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony, as his previous history indicates, is not devoid of common sense and will be quite willing to do what the public of the concerts here wants him to do in so far as his artistic conscience will permit. The standard of the programs has in the past been made and kept severe by the conductors, Maj Higginson, and the musical reviewers (with the last in this instance also by far the least). The audience, or most of it wants the best in music and leaves the selection to the experts whose business it is to know.

The burden on Koussevitzky would be heavy if he were not the sort of man who courts and desires responsibility and leadership. The remarkable independent position of the conductor of the Boston Symphony, interfered with by neither rich patrons nor labor unions is as he has several times told the interviewers what has tempted him to come to America. He has, he says, refused other American offers, and would have accepted no other American position. It is to be remembered that he is independently wealthy, not obliged to conduct for a living.

He Is Not Narrow

If he were the sort of person who thinks music began with Debussy and who will say 30 years hence that it died with Stravinsky, Koussevitzky would no doubt play all modern programs out of a stern sense of duty whether his audience liked it or no.

The only real basis for the widespread impression that he is a narrow modernist seems to be second hand impressions of the programs of a very brief series of concerts he arranged and conducted in Paris, with much modern Russian and French music on the programs. It should be remembered that Koussevitzky and his wife own and manage a music publishing business in Russia out of a desire to aid Russian music rather than from hopes of profit. These Paris programs were in part obviously the legitimate sort of propaganda for the publications of this firm. Pieces successfully produced in Paris are likely to be played all over the world.

No dyed in the wool modernist known to the writer will admit that the music of minor 18th century composers, and of Haydn is worth taking seriously today. But Koussevitzky has revived with success much of this music. His Beethoven is said not to be in the so-called classic tradition of the leading 19th century German conductors. It is too intense, to volcanic, too romantic. Ernest Newman has pointed out, possibly with justice, that Koussevitzky plays Beethoven more as that composer himself performed his own work than do the alleged custodians of the classic tradition. At any rate, he plays Beethoven, and in what has been described as a thrilling fashion.

An enterprising newspaper correspondent secured from Koussevitzky in Paris before he sailed a list of the music he was the first to perform in Paris and which he will bring to America. The whole thing is printed below. It will be noted that many of the works have been given in Boston already, and that there are some 18th century names near the end; viz, Vivaldi, Riegel, Boccherini, Stanmitz, Polaci, Locatelli and Corelli.

Probable Novelties Here

The works already heard here are Honegger's "Horace Victorious," Ravel's "Alborada del Gracioso," Bax's "The Garden of Fand," Malipiero's "Pause del Silenzio," Respighi's old dances; all those by Rachmaninoff; Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" (which is to be on the opening program), and Brahms' "Schicksalslied." The list follows. It obviously won't fill a whole season of concerts.

Debussy—Sarabande, scored by Ravel; Danse, scored by Ravel.
Roland-Manuel—Isabeile et Pantalon, overture; three movements of Scarlatti.
Florent Schmitt—Reves; Mirages; suite for orchestra.
Darius Milnaud—Second suite of Prometheus.
Arthur Honegger — The Victorious Horace; Chant de Jois; "Pacific 231."
Maurice Ravel—Paintings from the Picture Show, by Moussorgsky, scored by Ravel; Alborada del Gracioso.
Alberic Magnard — Fourth Symphony.
Arnold Bax—The Garden of Fand.
W. Reed—The Will o' the Wisp.
Holbrooke—Bronwen Overture.
Fr Malipiero—Pause del Silenzio; Imprezioni dal Vero, third suite.
O. Respighi—Antiche Danze ed Arie; Concerto Gregoriano for violin and orchestra.
A. Tansman—Scherzo Symphonique; Legende.
M Delage—Overture for the ballet, de l'Avenir; Three Poems for voice and orchestra.
A. Roussel—Symphony, op. 23.
A. Gretchaninoff—A liturgy for St John Chrysostom.
Moussorgsky—Two scenes, with soloists and chorus, from the opera "Khovanchina."
Borodin—Two acts from the opera "Prince Igor," with chorus and soloists.
Moussorgsky—The defeat of Sennacherib, cantata for chorus and orchestra.
Kastalsky—Fraternal commemoration.
Liadoff-Kikimora, from "The Apocalypsis."
Rachmaninoff—"The Island of Death," third concerto for piano and orchestra.
Rimsky-Korsakoff—"The Battle of Kejenietz," "The Fight from the Bumblebee," suite from the opera "Tzar Saltan."
Prokofieff—Symphonie Classique; Second Concerto for piano and orchestra; third Concerto for piano and orchestra; First Concerto for violin and Orchestra; Suite Scythe; suite from the opera "Love of Three Oranges; Sept! Ils Sont Sept!"
Scriabin—"Poem de l'Extase," "Poem of Fire" (Prometheus).
Stravinsky—Octuor for wind instruments; "Wind Instruments Symphon" (given in London); concerto for piano and wind instruments; "Chant du Rossignol" (symphonic poem).
Vivaldi—Concerto, scored by A. Siloti.
Riegel—Symphony in C major.
Boccherini—Symphony in O.
Stanmitz—Concerto for strings.
Polaci—Symphony in C minor.
Locatelli—A funeral symphony.
Corelli—Concerto for orchestra, No 3.
Brahms—"Schicksalslied," with chorus.
Hugo Wolf—"Der Feuerreiter," with chorus.
Manuel de Falla—"El Amor Brujo."
Lily Boulanger—Poems 'Bouddhique."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT

SEP 21 1924

Koussevitsky Arrives.

Serge Kouseevitsky, who is to succeed Pierre Monteux as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived in New York a few days ago, en route to the Hub City which will be his music headquarters for the next five years.

Much has been written about this Russian, who achieved fame first as a virtuoso player of the double-bass. Although he began to conduct at the age of twelve it was not until Kerensky appointed him head of the Russian State Orchestra in 1917 that Koussevitsky found a real opportunity to develop.

Compelled, with the fall of Kerensky, to flee his country, Koussevitsky went to Paris; and there, as well as in London and other British Isle centers, he attracted attention . . . chiefly for his readings of modern orchestra scores.

There has been much speculation over what Koussevitsky will do in his new post, where his predecessors have been well-schooled classicists. He is of good height and physique, with a strong and expressive face and hair turning to grey. Koussevitsky is fifty, and vital. He said he had brought with him a number of modern novelties, and that he is looking forward with keen interest to his stay in this country.

Bostonians will have their first opportunity to judge of their new musician at the first concert of the Boston Symphony on October 10th. Koussevitsky's New York debut will take place on Thanksgiving night.

Famous Critic Coming Here

THIS CLIPPING FROM

SEP 1924

Koussevitsky Arrives.

Serge Koussevitsky, who is to succeed Pierre Monteux as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived in New York a few days ago, en route to the Hub City which will be his music headquarters for the next five years.

Much has been written about this Russian, who achieved fame first as a virtuoso player of the double-bass Altho he began to conduct at the age of 12 it was not until Kerensky appointed him head of the Russian State Orchestra in 1917 that Koussevitsky found a real opportunity to develop.

Compelled, with the fall of Kerensky, to flee his country, Koussevitsky went to Paris; and there, as well as in London and other British Isle centers, he attracted attention . . . . chiefly for his readings of modern orchestra scores.

There has been much speculation over what Koussevitsky will do in his new post, where his predecessors have been well-schooled classicists. He is of good height and physique, with a strong and expressive face and hair turning to gray. Koussevitsky is 50, and vital. He said he had brought with him a number of modern novelties, and that he is looking forward with keen interest to his stay in this country.

Bostonians will have their first opportunity to judge of their new musician at the first concert of the Boston Symphony on October 10. Koussevitsky's New York debut will take place on Thanksgiving night afternoon, Oct. 19

Herald Traveler 21

KOUSSEVITZKY

Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is now preparing for the opening of the symphony season in Symphony hall on Oct. 10. The conductor has brought a large quantity of music from Europe with him, both new and old, and it is assured that there will be much of interest upon the season's programs. He will introduce to America such scores as Honneger's "Pacific 231," Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," Vermeulin and new music of Prokofieff, Bax, Respighi, De Falla. Other composers to be included are Stravinsky, Rimsky-Korsakov, Rachmaninov, Ravel, Debussy, Strauss, Wagner, Berlioz and others. There will be standard symphonies of Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Brahms, Tchaikovsky, Bruckner, Elgar and so forth. Music by American composers will be well represented.

IRENE RORDON

THIS CLIPPING FROM ALBANY
NEW YORK
KNICKERBOCKER PRESS

SEP 21 1924

Koussevitsky Arrives.

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY, who is to succeed Pierre Monteux as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived in New York a few days ago, en route to the Hub City which will be his music headquarters for the next five years.

Much has been written about this Russian, who achieved fame first as a virtuoso player of the double-bass. Although he began to conduct at the age of twelve it was not until Kerensky appointed him head of the Russian State Orchestra in 1917 that Koussevitsky found a real opportunity to develop.

Compelled, with the fall of Kerensky, to flee his country, Koussevitsky went to Paris; and there, as well as in London and other British Isle centers, he attracted attention . . . chiefly for his readings of modern orchestra scores.

There has been much speculation over what Koussevitsky will do in his new post, where his predecessors have been well-schooled classicists. He is of good height and physique, with a strong and expressive face and hair turning to grey. Koussevitsky is fifty, and vital. He said he had brought with him a number of modern novelties, and that he is looking forward with keen interest to his stay in this country.

Bostonians will have their first opportunity to judge of their new musician at the first concert of the Boston Symphony on October 10. Koussevitsky's New York debut will take place on Thanksgiving night.

SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED
THE
ADVERTISER
Boston, Mass.

SEP 21 1924

Massenet

KOUSSEVITZKY TO OFFER NEW WORKS

Serge Koussevitzky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has brought a large quantity of music from Europe.

He will introduce such scores as Honneger's "Pacific 231," Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," and new music of Prokofieff, Bax, Respighi, de Falla. Other composers to be included are Stravinsky, Rimsky-Konsakov, Rachmaninov, Ravel, Debussy, Strauss, Wagner and Berlioz. There will be standard symphonies of Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Brahms, Tchaikovsky, Bruckner, and so forth. Music by American composers will be well represented during the season, which opens October 10.

22

New Symphony Conductor

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Who is to preside over the Boston Orchestra this season

NEW SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR AROUSES INTEREST OF MUSIC LOVERS THROUGHOUT THE COUNTRY

Jewish Leader Tues. Sept 23

The famous Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of the famous Russian Conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, has started rehearsals for the opening of the Boston Symphony season in Symphony Hall on October 10th.

Koussevitzky, who is of Jewish birth, was born in Tver in North Russia. He was active in music there and in Moscow even in his childhood. At the Moscow Conservatory it is required to study some special instrument and there he specialized in the double bass. It is characteristic of Koussevitzky never to do things by halves and it was not long before he became the most prominent double bass virtuoso in Europe, touring with his instrument and composing for it.

Needless to say, great things are anticipated of this world celebrity as the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The soloists of the coming season of the 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts will include among others to be announced later, Serge Rachmaninoff, Serge Prokofieff, and Igor Stravinsky, each of these a brilliant pianist as well as a composer will appear in music of his own. There will also be Alfred Cortot, the pianist; Albert Spalding, the violinist; Margaret Matzenauer, the mezzo-soprano; and Guy Maier and Lee Pattison in music for two pianos with orchestra.

The season tickets for these concerts are now on sale. All of the Friday afternoon seats are taken but a few are available for the Saturday evening series. To those who wish the cheaper priced seats for this series immediate application is advised since the number is extremely limited.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Times
Trenton N J
SEP 23 1924

Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor, has [illegible]d to conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra. He will succeed Pierre Monteaux.

Globe Sun Sept 21

AND MUSI

Koussevitzky's Choice of Programs

The first question most people ask about Koussevitzky these days seems to be "What are his programs going to be like? All modern works?" At least the writer has been asked it by various acquaintances, with some degree of interest manifested. The only safe answer to give is of course "Nobody except Koussevitzky knows yet. Wait and see." But there is some reasonably safe ground available for speculation on the subject.

The new Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony, as his previous history indicates, is not devoid of common sense and will be quite willing to do what the public of the concerts here wants him to do in so far as his artistic conscience will permit. The standard of the programs has in the past been made and kept severe by the conductors, Maj Higginson, and the musical reviewers (with the last in this instance also by far the least). The audience, or most of it wants the best in music and leaves the selection to the experts whose business it is to know.

The burden on Koussevitzky would be heavy if he were not the sort of man who courts and desires responsibility and leadership. The remarkable independent position of the conductor of the Boston Symphony, interfered with by neither rich patrons nor labor unions is as he has several times told the interviewers what has tempted him to come to America. He has, he says, refused other American offers, and would have accepted no other American position. It is to be remembered that he is independently wealthy, not obliged to conduct for a living.

He Is Not Narrow

If he were the sort of person who thinks music began with Debussy and who will say 30 years hence that it died with Stravinsky, Koussevitzky would no doubt play all modern programs out of a stern sense of duty whether his audience liked it or no.

The only real basis for the widespread impression that he is a narrow modernist seems to be second hand impressions of the programs of a very brief series of concerts he arranged and conducted in Paris, with much modern Russian and French music on the programs. It should be remembered that Koussevitzky and his wife own and manage a music publishing business in Russia out of a desire to aid Russian music rather than from hopes of profit. These Paris programs were in part obviously the legitimate sort of propaganda for the publications of this firm. Pieces successfully produced in Paris are likely to be played all over the world.

No dyed in the wool modernist known to the writer will admit that the music of minor 18th century composers, and of Haydn is worth taking seriously today. But Koussevitzky has revived with success much of this music. His Beethoven is said not to be in the so-called classic tradition of the leading 19th century German conductors. It is too intense, to volcanic, too romantic. Ernest Newman has pointed out, possibly with justice, that Koussevitzky plays Beethoven more as that composer himself performed his own work than do the alleged custodians of the classic tradition. At any rate, he plays Beethoven, and in what has been described as a thrilling fashion.

An enterprising newspaper correspondent secured from Koussevitzky in Paris before he sailed a list of the music he was the first to perform in Paris and which he will bring to America. The whole thing is printed below. It will be noted that many of the works have been given in Boston already, and that there are some 18th century names near the end; viz, Vivaldi, Riegel, Boccherini, Stanmitz, Polaci, Locatelli and Corelli.

Probable Novelties Here

The works already heard here are Honegger's "Horace Victorious," Ravel's "Alborada del Gracioso," Bax's "The Garden of Fand," Malipiero's "Pause del Silenzio," Respighi's old dances; all those by Rachmaninoff; Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" (which is to be on the opening program), and Brahms' "Schicksalslied." The list follows. It obviously won't fill a whole season of concerts.

Debussy—Sarabande, scored by Ravel; Danse, scored by Ravel.

Roland-Manuel—Isabeile et Pantalon, overture; three movements of Scarlatti.

Florent Schmitt—Reves; Mirages; suite for orchestra.

Darius Milnaud—Second suite of Prometheus.

Arthur Honegger—The Victorious Horace; Chant de Jois; "Pacific 231."

Maurice Ravel—Paintings from the Picture Show, by Moussorgsky, scored by Ravel; Alborada del Gracioso.

Alberic Magnard—Fourth Symphony.

Arnold Bax—The Garden of Fand.

W. Reed—The Will o' the Wisp.

Holbrooke—Bronwen Overture.

Fr Malipiero—Pause del Silenzio; Imprezioni dal Vero, third suite.

O. Respighi—Antiche Danze ed Arie; Concerto Gregoriano for violin and orchestra.

A. Tansman—Scherzo Symphonique; Legende.

M Delage—Overture for the ballet, de l'Avenir; Three Poems for voice and orchestra.

A. Roussel—Symphony, op. 23.

A. Gretchaninoff—A liturgy for St John Chrysostom.

Moussorgsky—Two scenes, with soloists and chorus, from the opera "Khovanchina."

Borodin—Two acts from the opera "Prince Igor," with chorus and soloists.

Moussorgsky—The defeat of Sennacherib, cantata for chorus and orchestra.

Kastalsky—Fraternal commemoration.

Liadoff-Kikimora, from "The Apocalypsis."

Rachmaninoff—"The Island of Death," third concerto for piano and orchestra.

Rimsky-Korsakoff—"The Battle of Kejenietz," "The Fight from the Bumblebee," suite from the opera "Tzar Saltan."

Prokofieff—Symphonie Classique; Second Concerto for piano and orchestra; third Concerto for piano and orchestra; First Concerto for violin and Orchestra; Suite Scythe; suite from the opera "Love of Three Oranges; Sept! Ils Sont Sept!"

Scriabin—"Poem de l'Extase," "Poem of Fire" (Prometheus).

Stravinsky—Octuor for wind instruments; "Wind Instruments Symphon" (given in London); concerto for piano and wind instruments; "Chant du Rossignol" (symphonic poem).

Vivaldi—Concerto, scored by A. Siloti.

Riegel—Symphony in C major.

Boccherini—Symphony in C.

Stammitz—Concerto for strings.

Polaci—Symphony in C minor.

Locatelli—A funeral symphony.

Corelli—Concerto for orchestra, No 8.

Brahms—"Schicksalslied," with chorus.

Hugo Wolf—"Der Feuerreiter," with chorus.

Manuel de Falla—"El Amor Brujo."

Lily Boulanger—Poems Bouddhique."

RELUCTANT TO GO ON

[illegible] the cast, they merit no detailed notice.

♭ ♭

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY, who is to succeed Pierre Monteux as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived in New York a few days ago, en route to the Hub City which will be his music headquarters for the next five years.

Much has been written about this Russian, who achieved fame first as a virtuoso player of the double-bass. Although he began to conduct at the age of twelve it was not until Kerensky appointed him head of the Russian State Orchestra in 1917 that Koussevitsky found a real opportunity to develop.

Compelled, with the fall of Kerensky, to flee his country, Koussevitsky went to Paris; and there, as well as in London and other British Isle centers, he attracted attention . . .

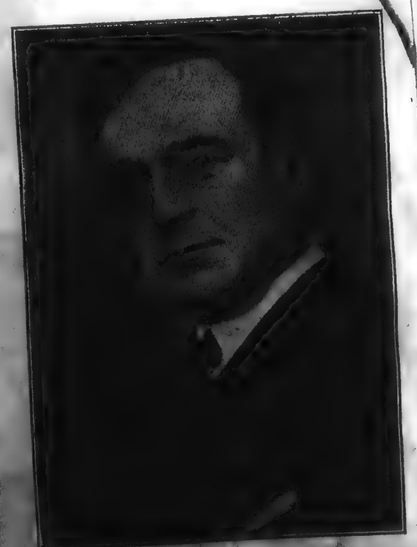
[illegible]SDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1924

chiefly for his readings of modern orchestra scores.

There has been much speculation over what Koussevitsky will do in his new post, where his predecessors have been well-schooled classicists. He is of good height and physique, with a strong and expressive face and hair turning to grey. Koussevitsky is fifty, and vital. He said he had brought with him a number of modern novelties, and that he is looking forward with keen interest to his stay in this country.

Bostonians will have their first opportunity to judge of their new musician at the first concert of the Boston Symphony on October 10. Koussevitsky's New York debut will take place on Thanksgiving night.

Musical Digest
UESDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1924



SERGEI KOUSSEVITSKY
Who Arrived Last Week to Take Up His Duties as New Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
EXPRESS
SEP 2 7 1924

THE PROLOGUE

News and views of music and musicians.

MARY M. HOWARD.

Buffalo is to have the pleasure of hearing the Boston Symphony orchestra under its famous new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, in a concert in Elmwood Music hall on Thursday evening, November 13th, under the local management of Bessie Bellanca. Koussevitzky is at once a conservative and a progressive. In short, he is a musician who culls the best from the treasures of the past and present schools of composition, and his Buffalo programme is quite sure to be of particular interest. Miss Bellanca will also present Roland Hayes, the negro tenor, who has had such triumphs here and abroad, in a recital on January 8th.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CINCINNATTI, OHIO
BILLBOARD
SEP 27 1924

NO TICKETS AVAILABLE

For Friday Afternoon Series of Boston Symphony Orchestra

No tickets can be purchased for the afternoon series of concerts in Boston by the Boston Symphony Orchestra as the entire series has been subscribed. Almost a similar situation exists for the concerts to be given on Saturday evenings, as but a few tickets remain unsold for that series. Sergei Koussevitzky, the new conductor, has arrived in Boston and will shortly announce some of his plans for the programs to be presented during the season, but it is to be expected from the brilliant record he made in Europe that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in much that is new to its audiences, also compositions new to this country. The opening of the season is being awaited with keen interest.

"Best by attest"
Original Romeike
PRESS CLIPPINGS
220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
EVENING SUN
SEP 27 1924

Newman---Guest Music Critic

Successor of Henry T. Finch on 'Evening Post' to Arrive From London.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The Ev[illegible] has engaged Ernest New[illegible] sic critic. The engagement [illegible]ill arrive here to-day on [illegible] three, one Amer[illegible]n and two Dutch.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has had a succession of directors. George Henschel, Wilhelm Gericke, Arthur Nikisch, Max Fiedler, Henri Rabaud and Pierce Monteux are to be followed by Sergei Koussevitsky. Well, Russians are the fashion. They sing differently, act differently, write differently and compose differently. Presently we shall see if one conducts differently. Safonoff did it without a baton and Stokowski does it without a score. Now if the orchestras could only play without conductors—but what a dreadful thought!

NEW SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR AROUSES INTEREST OF MUSIC LOVERS THROUGHOUT THE COUNTRY

Jewish Leader Tues. Sept 23

The famous Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of the famous Russian Conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, has started rehearsals for the opening of the Boston Symphony season in Symphony Hall on October 10th.

Koussevitzky, who is of Jewish birth, was born in Tver in North Russia. He was active in music there and in Moscow even in his childhood. At the Moscow Conservatory it is required to study some special instrument and there he specialized in the double bass. It is characteristic of Koussevitzky never to do things by halves and it was not long before he became the most prominent double bass virtuoso in Europe, touring with his instrument and composing for it.

Needless to say, great things are anticipated of this world celebrity as the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The soloists of the coming season of the 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts will include among others to be announced later, Serge Rachmaninoff, Serge Prokofieff, and Igor Stravinsky, each of these a brilliant pianist as well as a composer will appear in music of his own. There will also be Alfred Cortot, the pianist; Albert Spalding, the violinist; Margaret Matzenauer, the mezzo-soprano; and Guy Maier and Lee Pattison in music for two pianos with orchestra.

The season tickets for these concerts are now on sale. All of the Friday afternoon seats are taken but a few are available for the Saturday evening series. To those who wish the cheaper priced seats for this series immediate application is advised since the number is extremely limited.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

SEP 1924

Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor, has arrived to conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra. He will succeed Pierre Monteaux.

...bers of the cast, they merit no detailed notice.

♭ ♭

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY, who is to succeed Pierre Monteux as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived in New York a few days ago, en route to the Hub City which will be his music headquarters for the next five years.

Much has been written about this Russian, who achieved fame first as a virtuoso player of the double-bass. Although he began to conduct at the age of twelve it was not until Kerensky appointed him head of the Russian State Orchestra in 1917 that Koussevitsky found a real opportunity to develop.

Compelled, with the fall of Kerensky, to flee his country, Koussevitsky went to Paris; and there, as well as in London and other British Isle centers, he attracted attention . . .

...SDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1924

chiefly for his readings of modern orchestra scores.

There has been much speculation over what Koussevitsky will do in his new post, where his predecessors have been well-schooled classicists. He is of good height and physique, with a strong and expressive face and hair turning to grey. Koussevitsky is fifty, and vital. He said he had brought with him a number of modern novelties, and that he is looking forward with keen interest to his stay in this country.

Bostonians will have their first opportunity to judge of their new musician at the first concert of the Boston Symphony on October 10. Koussevitsky's New York debut will take place on Thanksgiving night.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BUFFALO, N. Y.
EXPRESS

SEP 27 1924

THE PROLOGUE

News and views of music and musicians.

MARY M. HOWARD.

Buffalo is to have the pleasure of hearing the Boston Symphony orchestra under its famous new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, in a concert in Elmwood Music hall on Thursday evening, November 13th, under the local management of Bessie Bellanca. Koussevitzky is at once a conservative and a progressive. In short, he is a musician who culls the best from the treasures of the past and present schools of composition, and his Buffalo programme is quite sure to be of particular interest. Miss Bellanca will also present Roland Hayes, the negro tenor, who has had such triumphs here and abroad, in a recital on January 8th.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

CINCINNATTI, OHIO
BILLBOARD

NO TICKETS AVAILABLE

For Friday Afternoon Series of Boston Symphony Orchestra

No tickets can be purchased for the afternoon series of concerts in Boston by the Boston Symphony Orchestra as the entire series has been subscribed. Almost a similar situation exists for the concerts to be given on Saturday evenings, as but a few tickets remain unsold for that series. Sergei Koussevitzky, the new conductor, has arrived in Boston and will shortly announce some of his plans for the programs to be presented during the season, but it is to be expected from the brilliant record he made in Europe that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard in much that is new to its audiences, also compositions new to this country. The opening of the season is being awaited with keen interest.

"Best by attest"

Original Romeike

PRESS CLIPPINGS

220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK

Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK
EVENING SUN

...UESDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1924

SERGEI KOUSSEVITSKY
Who Arrived Last Week to Take Up His Duties as New Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

SEP 27 1924

Newman---Guest Music Critic

Successor of Henry T. Finch on 'Evening Post' to Arrive From London.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The Evening Post has engaged Ernest Newman, the English music critic. The engagement ... will arrive here to-day on ...

three, one American and two Dutch.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has had a succession of directors. George Henschel, Wilhelm Gericke, Arthur Nikisch, Max Fiedler, Henri Rabaud and Pierce Monteux are to be followed by Sergei Koussevitzky. Well, Russians are the fashion. They sing differently, act differently, write differently and compose differently. Presently we shall see if one conducts differently. Safonoff did it without a baton and Stokowski does it without a score. Now if the orchestras could only play without conductors—but what a dreadful thought!

1.21

Globe
Sun
Sept. 21

AND MUSI

Koussevitzky's Choice of Programs

The first question most people ask about Koussevitzky these days seems to be "What are his programs going to be like? All modern works?" At least the writer has been asked it by various acquaintances, with some degree of interest manifested. The only safe answer to give is of course "Nobody except Koussevitzky knows yet. Wait and see." But there is some reasonably safe ground available for speculation on the subject.

The new Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony, as his previous history indicates, is not devoid of common sense and will be quite willing to do what the public of the concerts here wants him to do in so far as his artistic conscience will permit. The standard of the programs has in the past been made and kept severe by the conductors, Maj Higginson, and the musical reviewers (with the last in this instance also by far the least). The audience, or most of it wants the best in music and leaves the selection to the experts whose business it is to know.

The burden on Koussevitzky would be heavy if he were not the sort of man who courts and desires responsibility and leadership. The remarkable independent position of the conductor of the Boston Symphony, interfered with by neither rich patrons nor labor unions is as he has several times told the interviewers what has tempted him to come to America. He has, he says, refused other American offers, and would have accepted no other American position. It is to be remembered that he is independently wealthy, not obliged to conduct for a living.

He Is Not Narrow

If he were the sort of person who thinks music began with Debussy and who will say 30 years hence that it died with Stravinsky, Koussevitzky would no doubt play all modern programs out of a stern sense of duty whether his audience liked it or no.

The only real basis for the widespread impression that he is a narrow modernist seems to be second hand impressions of the programs of a very brief series of concerts he arranged and conducted in Paris, with much modern Russian and French music on the programs. It should be remembered that Koussevitzky and his wife own and manage a music publishing business in Russia out of a desire to aid Russian music rather than from hopes of profit. These Paris programs were in part obviously the legitimate sort of propaganda for the publications of this firm. Pieces successfully produced in Paris are likely to be played all over the world.

No dyed in the wool modernist known to the writer will admit that the music of minor 18th century composers, and of Haydn is worth taking seriously today. But Koussevitzky has revived with success much of this music. His Beethoven is said not to be in the so-called classic tradition of the leading 19th century German conductors. It is too intense, to volcanic, too romantic. Ernest Newman has pointed out, possibly with justice, that Koussevitzky plays Beethoven more as that composer himself performed his own work than do the alleged custodians of the classic tradition. At any rate, he plays Beethoven, and in what has been described as a thrilling fashion.

An enterprising newspaper correspondent secured from Koussevitzky in Paris before he sailed a list of the music he was the first to perform in Paris and which he will bring to America. The whole thing is printed below. It will be noted that many of the works have been given in Boston already, and that there are some 18th century names near the end; viz, Vivaldi, Riegel, Boccherini, Stanmitz, Polaci, Locatelli and Corelli.

Probable Novelties Here

The works already heard here are Honegger's "Horace Victorious," Ravel's "Alborada del Gracioso," Bax's "The Garden of Fand," Malipiero's "Pause del Silenzio," Respighi's old dances; all those by Rachmaninoff; Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" (which is to be on the opening program), and Brahms' "Schicksalslied." The list follows. It obviously won't fill a whole season of concerts.

Debussy—Sarabande, scored by Ravel; Danse, scored by Ravel.
Roland-Manuel—Isabelle et Pantalon, overture; three movements of Scarlatti.
Florent Schmitt—Reves; Mirages; suite for orchestra.
Darius Milnaud—Second suite of Prometheus.
Arthur Honegger—The Victorious Horace; Chant de Jois; "Pacific 231."
Maurice Ravel—Paintings from the Picture Show, by Moussorgsky, scored by Ravel; Alborada del Gracioso.
Alberic Magnard—Fourth Symphony.
Arnold Bax—The Garden of Fand.
W. Reed—The Will o' the Wisp.
Holbrooke—Bronwen Overture.
Fr Malipiero—Pause del Silenzio; Imprezioni dal Vero, third suite.
O. Respighi—Antiche Danze ed Arie; Concerto Gregoriano for violin and orchestra.
A. Tansman—Scherzo Symphonique; Legende.
M Delage—Overture for the ballet, de l'Avenir; Three Poems for voice and orchestra.
A. Roussel—Symphony, op. 23.
A. Gretchaninoff—A liturgy for St John Chrysostom.
Moussorgsky—Two scenes, with soloists and chorus, from the opera "Khovanchina."
Borodin—Two acts from the opera "Prince Igor," with chorus and soloists.
Moussorgsky—The defeat of Sennacherib, cantata for chorus and orchestra.
Kastalsky—Fraternal commemoration.
Liadoff-Kikimora, from "The Apocalypsis."
Rachmaninoff—"The Island of Death," third concerto for piano and orchestra.
Rimsky-Korsakoff—"The Battle of Kejenietz," "The Fight from the Bumblebee," suite from the opera "Tzar Saltan."
Prokofieff—Symphonie Classique; Second Concerto for piano and orchestra; third Concerto for piano and orchestra; First Concerto for violin and Orchestra; Suite Scythe; suite from the opera "Love of Three Oranges; Sept! Ils Sont Sept!"
Scriabin—"Poem de l'Extase," "Poem of Fire" (Prometheus).
Stravinsky—Octuor for wind instruments; "Wind Instruments Symphon" (given in London); concerto for piano and wind instruments; "Chant du Rossignol" (symphonic poem).
Vivaldi—Concerto, scored by A. Siloti.
Riegel—Symphony in C major.
Boccherini—Symphony in O.
Stanmitz—Concerto for strings.
Polaci—Symphony in C minor.
Locatelli—A funeral symphony.
Corelli—Concerto for orchestra, No 8.
Brahms—"Schicksalslied," with chorus.
Hugo Wolf—"Der Feuerreiter," with chorus.
Manuel de Falla—"El Amor Brujo."
Lily Boulanger—Poems Bouddhique."

RELUCTANT TO GO ON

122

די הויפט נייעס פון דער אמער ריקאנער מוזיקוועלט איז איצט קאשעוויצקי.

דער נייער קאפעלמייסטער פון דער באריהמטער באסטאנער סימפאני איז א איד — א געשפרעך מיט איהם.

פון ל. ארקין.

קיין באסטאן איז לעצטע וואך אנגעקומען דער וועלט־באריהמטער רוסישער מוזיקער סערגיי קאשעוויצקי, דער נעוועזענער קאפעלמייסטער פון קייזערליכען ארקעסטער אין מאסקווע. קאשעוויצקי איז פארעכענט פאר אייניגע פון די בעסטע דיריגענטן אין דער וועלט, און נעקומען אהער אין ער צו די דיריגירן דעם באסטאנער סימפאני אר־קעסטער, וועלכער אין פארעכענט פאר אייניגע פון די גרעסטע, אויב ניט דער גרעסטער סימפאני ארקעסטער אין אמעריקא.

דאס איז צום ערשטען מאל, וואס א רוסישער קאנדוקטאר וועט דיריגירן דעם באסטאן סימפאני ארקעסטער.

דורך א צופאל האב איך זיך דערוואוסט, אז קאשעוויצקי שטאמט פון אידישע עלטערן, און מיר איז געווארן אינטערעסאנט זיך צו באגעגענען מיט איהם אויסצופינען, אויב די קלאנגען זיינען ריכטיגע, און גלאט האבען א געשפרעך מיט איהם פאר'ן „פארווערטס".

איך האב זיך מיט איהם געטראפען אין דעם פאלאץ, וואס די באסטאן סימפאני אסאסיאיישאן האט פאר איהם געדונגען, אין דעם שהנסטען און רייכסטען געגענד פון שטאדט.

זיין סעקרעטער דר. צעדערבאום האט מיך באגעגנט ביים אריינגאנג. איך האב גערארפט ווארטען עטליכע מינוט בין א שלאנקער, מיטעל־וואוקסיגער מאן, מיט א רונד־ווייסען פנים און רויטליכע באקען, האט זיך באוויזען. דאס איז געווען סערגיי קאשעוויצקי אליין.

מען האט מיך פאר איהם פארגעשטעלט און איך האב אנגעפאנגען רעדען רוסיש צו איהם. אויף זיין פנים האט זיך א פרייד באוויזען און ער האט א זאג געטאן: — „סוואי טישער לאוויעק" (אן אייגענער מענש). מען גלייך געקענט זהען, ווי שטארק צופריעדען ער איז צו רעדען מיט איינעם אין דער שפראך וואס ער קען, און ניט דורך א דאלמעטשער, ווי ער איז גע־צוואונגען צו רעדען צו רעפארטערס פון אנדערע צייטונגען.

איך האב איהם געזאגט צוליב וואס איך בין געקומען, און אז איך פארטרעט דעם „פארווערטס" און וועז ער האט דאס דערהערט, האט ער א זאג געטאן:

„אה, דער „פארווערטס"?, איך האב פון דער צייטונג געהערט נאך אין פאריז". און זיין סעקרעטער דר. צעדערבאום האט נאך צוגעגעבען:

„איז דאס די צייטונג פון וועלכער אייבראהאם קאהאן איז דער רעדאקטאר?"

— יא, יא, דאס איז זי. — האב איך געענטפערט.

מיר האבען זיך אוועקגעזעצט און אנגעפאנגען רעדען. און דערבי האט דער גרויסער מוזיקער געמאכט אזא באמערקונג:

„מוזיק איז די בעסטע שפראך! אין וועלכען לאנד מען זאל זיך ניט פעפינען, זיינען די מוזיקאלישע קלאנגען דיזעלבע; אנדערש איז דאס אבער מיט א געוועהנליכער שפראך. אט בין איך אין אמעריקא, און אז צייטונגס רעפארטערס קומען צו מיר, מוז איך צו זיי רעדען דורך א דאלמעטשער, כאטש איך באזיץ די רוסישע, פראנצויזישע און דייטשע שפראכען".

קאשעוויצקי באזיצט א ספעציעלען מאנעטישען חן. ער איז ניט אזוי נער־וועז, ווי פיעלע אנדערע גרויסע ארטיס־טען, און עס איז אנגענעהם מיט איהם צו רעדען. ער רעדט געלאסען, רוהיג, באטראכט פריהער וואס ער האט צו זאגען און איז אפט גאנץ וויציג אויך.

נעבאראען געווארען איז קאשעוויצקי מיט 50 יאהר צוריק אין טווער. זיינע פעהיגקייטען אלס מוזיקער האט ער נאך ארויסגעוויזען וועז ער איז געווען א קינד. וועז ער האט אנגעפאנגען לערנען מוזיק אין דער מאסקווער קאנ־סערוואטאריע, האט ער אויסגעקליבען צו שפילען אויף א „דאבעל בעס", אדער ווי מען רופט דאס אויף אידיש, א „באנדורע".

דערבי, האט באשעוויצקי'ס סעק־

סערגיי קאשעוויצקי

טער גענאכט די פאלגענדע באמער־קונג:

„די וואס זיינען אויפגעוואהנט צו זהען אידישע קלעזמער און הערען די קלאנגען פון דער באנדורע, דענקען אז אויף דעם אינסטרומענט קענען קיינע סאלאמ ניט געשפיעלט ווערען. דאס איז אבער ניט אזוי. דער פאקט מיט קאשעוויצקי. קאשעוויצקי האט דוקא לויבט צו שפיעלען סאלאמ אויף דער „באנדורע", און איז איצט אנערקענט איבער דער וועלט, ניט נאר אלס גרוי־סער קאנדאקטאר, נאר אויך אלס גרוי־סער סאלאיסט אויף דער באנדורא".

דא האט דער סעקרעטער ארויסגע־נומען א בוך מיט ארטיקלען, געשרי־בען פון די גרעסטע אייראפעאישע קרי־טיקער, וועלכע לויבען קאשעוויצקי'ן זהער שטארק און זאגען, אז צו הערען איהם שפיעלען אויף דער „באנדורא" איז פיעל געשמאקער, ווי צו הערען דעם בעסטען טשעליסט.

צו צוועלף יאהר איז ער שוין געווען דער קאנדאקטאר פון א פראווינציעלען טעאטער־ארקעסטער. ער האט אויך פארפאסט אייגענע קאמפאזיציעס, און אזוי איז ער אלץ געשטיגען העכער און העכער און אין דעם יאהר 1909 האט ער ארגאניזירט זיין אייגענעם סימפאני ארקעסטער אין מאסקווע און געשפילט אין קייזערליכען הויף די גאנצע צייט, בין די רעוואלוציע איז אויסגעברא־כען.

נאך דער באלשעוויסטישער רעוא־לוציע איז קאשעוויצקי אוועקגעפאהרען קיין פאריז. איידער ער איז אוועקגע־פאהרען האט לונאטשארסקי, דער בילי־דונגס־מיניסטער, נאך איהם געשיקט און איהם געבעטען, ער זאל דיריגירען אן ארקעסטער אין מאסקווע.

קאשעוויצקי האט אבער אין רוס־לאנד מעהר ניט געקאנט בלייבען; ער האט בעסער געוואלט זיין אין א לאנד, וואו ער וועט פריי און אונגעשטערט קע־נען שאפען און ער איז דעריבער אוועק־געפאהרען קיין פאריז.

דער גרויסער מוזיקער האט מיר אויך דערצעהלט, וואס עס איז איהם אויסגעקומען אריבערצוטראגען אין רוס־לאנד אין דער צייט פון דער רעוואלו־ציע; ווי ער האט דאן אלעס פארלא־רען; איין זאך איז איהם געבליבען — א הויז. און איצט האט מען פון דעם הויז געמאכט א ביבליאטהעק.

רעדענדיג וועגען זיינע מוזיקאלישע פלענער, האט ער גענאגט, אז ער וועט נעקסטען סיזאן שפיעלען מיט זיין אר־קעסטער א סך אלטע מוזיק, וועלכע איז נאך ביז יעצט ניט געשפיעלט געווא־רען אין אמעריקא און אויך נייע מוזיק, פון יונגע קאמפאזיטארס, וועלכע די וועלט האט נאך ביז איצט ניט אנער־קענט, אבער ער גלויבט, אז זיי זיינען גרויסע טאלאנטען און ער וועט מיט דער באסטאן־סימפאני שפיעלען זייערע ווערק. און די ערשטע נייע זאך, וואס ער וועט שפיעלען, וועט זיין ערנעסט לעווי'ס „דיטע סימפאני".

ער האט זיך נעהענטען צוגעדרוקט

ESTABLISHED 1881
From Traveler Boston, Mass.
SEP 27 192

FIRST PROGRAM OF SYMPHONY SEASON

Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, now announces the programs with which he will make his first appearances in this country, both at the opening of the symphony season on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 10-11, and at the second pair of concerts on Oct. 17-18. Mr. Koussevitzky will first assemble the orchestra for rehearsal next Thursday morning.

The first program will consist of a concerto of Vivaldi, arranged for orchestra by Siloti; Weber's overture to "Oberon"; two Wagnerian excerpts—the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" and the Funeral March from the "Dusk of the Gods"; Honegger's "Pacific 231" (describing a three-ton American locomotive in action), and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy."

The second program will include Handel's concerto grosso in D minor, a dance of Debussy, arranged by Ravel; DeFalla's "Love Magic" (first performance in America), and Beethoven's fifth symphony in C minor.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1891
SEP 27 1924
From Traveler Boston, Mass.

Madame Serge Koussevitzky, Wife of the new Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.
(Keystone View)

Serge Koussevitzky, the Dynamic New Leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in a Real How-Do-You-Do-Photographic Greeting.
(Keystone View Co.)

122

די הויפט נייעם פון דער אמעריקאַנער מוזיק־וועלט איז איצט קאַשעוויצקי.

דער נייער קאַפעלמייסטער פון דער באריהמטער באָסטאָנער סימפאָני איז אַ איד. — א געשפּרעך מיט איהם.

פון ל. ארקין.

קיין באָסטאָן איז לעצטע וואָך אנגעקומען דער וועלט־באריהמטער רוסישער מוזיקער סערגיי קאשעוויצקי, דער נעוועזענער קאפעלמייסטער פון קייזערליכען ארקעסטער אין מאסקווע. קאשעוויצקי איז פארעכענט פאר אייניגע פון די בעסטע דיריגענטן אין דער וועלט, און נעקומען אהער אין ער צו דירעגירען דעם באסטאנער סימפאני אר־קעסטער, וועלכער איז פארעכענט פאר אייניגע פון די גרעסטע, אויב ניט דער גרעסטער סימפאני ארקעסטער אין אמעריקא.

דאָס איז צום ערשטען מאל, וואס א רוסיישער קאָנדוקטאָר וועט דירעגירען דעם באָסטאָן סימפאני ארקעסטער.

דורך א צופאל האָב איך זיך דערוואוסט, אז קאשעוויצקי שטאמט פון אידישע עלטערן, און מיר איז געווארן רען אינטערעסאנט זיך צו באגעגענען מיט איהם אויסצוגעפינען אויב די קלאנגען זיינען ריכטיגע, און גלאט האר בען א געשפּרעך מיט איהם פאר'ן „פארווערטס".

איך האָב זיך מיט איהם געטראפען אין דעם פאלאץ, וואס די באָסטאָן סימפאני אסאסיאיישאן האט פאר איהם געדונגען, אין דעם שהנסטען און רייכסטען געגענד פון שטאדט.

זיין סעקרעטער דר. צעדערבאום האט מיך באגעגענט בים אריינגאנג. איך האָב געדארפט ווארטן עטליכע מינוט ביז א שלאנקער, מיטעלוואוקסינער מאן, מיט א רונד־וויסען פנים און רויטליכע באקען, האט זיך באווייזען. דאָס איז געווען סערגיי קאשעוויצקי אליין.

מען האט מיך פאר איהם פארגעשטעלט און איך האָב אנגעפאנגען רעדען רוסיש צו איהם. אויף זיין פנים האט זיך א פרייד באווייזען. און ער האט א זאג געטאן: — „סוואי טשעלאוויעק" (אן אייגענער מענש). מען האט גלייך געקענט זעהן, ווי שטארק צופריעדען ער איז צו רעידען מיט איינעם אין דער שפראך וואס ער קען, און ניט הורך א דאלמעטשער, ווי ער איז גע־ציואונגען צו רעידען צו דעפארטערס פון אנדערע צייטונגען.

איך האָב איהם געזאגט צוריק וואס איך בין געקומען, און אז איך פאר־טרעט דעם „פארווערטס" און וועל ער האט דאס דערהערט, האט ער א זאג גע־טאן:

„אה, דער „פארווערטס"?, איר האָב פון דער צייטונג געהערט נאך אין פאריז". און זיין סעקרעטער דר. צע־דערבאום האט נאך צוגעגעבען:

„איז דאס די צייטונג פון וועלכער אייבראהאם קאהאן איז דער רעדאק־טאר?"

— יא, יא, דאס איז זי. — האָב איך געענטפערט.

מיר האָבען זיך אוועקגעזעצט און אנגעפאנגען ריידען. און דערבי האט דער גרויסער מוזיקער געמאכט אזא באמערקונג:

„מוזיק איז די בעסטע שפראך! אין וועלכען לאנד מען זאל זיך ניט נעפינען, זיינען די מוזיקאלישע קלאנגען דיזעל־בע; אנדערש איז דאס אבער מיט א געוועהנליכער שפראך. אט בין איך אין אמעריקא, און אז צייטונגס רעפאר־טערס קומען צו מיר, מוז איך צו זיי ריידען דורך א דאלמעטשער, כאטש איך באזיץ די רוסישע, פראנצויזישע און דייטשע שפראכען".

קאשעוויצקי באזיצט א ספעציעלען מאגנעטישען חן. ער איז ניט אזוי נער־וועז, ווי פיעלע אנדערע גרויסע ארטיס־טען, און עס איז אנגענעהם מיט איהם צו רעדען. ער רעדט געלאסען, רוהיג, באטראכט פריהער וואס ער האט צו זא־גען און איז אפט גאנץ ווייניג אויך.

געבאָרען געווארען איז קאשעוויצקי מיט 50 יאהר צוריק אין טווער. זיינע פעהיגקייטען אלס מוזיקער האט ער נאך ארויסגעווייזען וען ער איז געווען א קינד. וען ער האט אנגעפאנגען לערנען מוזיק אין דער מאסקווער קאנ־סערוואטאריע, האט ער אויסגעקליבען צו שפילען אויף א „דאבעל בעס", אדער וויי מען רופט דאס אויף אידיש, א „באנדורע".

דערבי, האט באשעוויצקי'ס סעק־

סערגיי קאשעוויצקי

טער קאנדאקטאר, נאר אויך אלס גרויס־כער באליבסט אויף דער באנדורא".

דא האט דער סעקרעטער ארויסגע־נומען א בוך מיט ארטיקלען, געשרי־בען פון די גרעסטע אייראפעאישע קרי־טיקער, וועלכע לויבען קאשעוויצקי'ן זעהר שטארק און זאגען, אז צו הערען איהם שפיעלען אויף דער „באנדורא" איז פיער געשמאקער, ווי צו הערען דעם בעסטען טשעליסט.

צו צוועלף יאהר איז ער שוין געווען דער קאנדאקטאר פון א פראווינציעלען טעאטער־ארקעסטער. ער האט אויך פארפאסט אייגענע קאמפאזיציעס, און אזוי איז ער אלץ געשטיגען העכער און העכער, אן דעם 1909 האט ער ארגאניזירט זיין אייגענעם סימפאני ארקעסטער איז מאסקווע און געשפילט אין קייזערליכען הויף די גאנצע צייט, ביז די רעוואלוציע איז אויסגעברא־כען.

נאך דער באלשעוויסטישער רעוואָ־לוציע איז קאשעוויצקי אוועקגעפאהרען קיין פאריז. אויידער ער איז אוועקגע־פאהרען האט לונאטשארסקי, דער בילי־דונגס־מיניסטער, נאך איהם געשיקט און איהם געבעטען, ער זאל דיריגירען אן ארקעסטער אין מאסקווע.

קאשעוויצקי האט אבער אין רוס־לאנד מעהר ניט געקאנט בלייבען; ער האט בעסער געוואלט זיין אין א לאנד, וואו ער וועט פרייי און אונגעשטערט קע־נען שאפען און ער איז דעריבער אוועק־גענאפהרען קיין פאריז.

דער גרויסער מוזיקער האט מיר אויך דערצעהלט, וואס עס איז איהם אויסגעקומען אריבערצוטראגען אין רוס־לאנד אין דער צייט פון דער רעוואלו־ציע; ווי ער האט דאן אלעס פארלא־רען; אייז זאך איז איהם געבליבען — א הויז. און איצט האט מען פון דעם הויז געמאכט א ביבליאטהעק.

רעדענדיג וועגען זיינע מוזיקאלישע פלענער, האט ער געזאגט, אז ער וועט נעקסטען סיזאן שפיעלען מיט זיין אר־קעסטער א סך אלטע מוזיק, וועלכע איז נאך ביז יעצט ניט געשפיעלט געווא־רען אין אמעריקא און אויך נייע מוזיק, פון יונגע קאמפאזיטארס, וועלכע די וועלט האט נאך בין איצט ניט אנער־קענט, אבער ער גלויבט, אז זיי זיינען גרויסע טאלאנטען און ער וועט מיט דער באסטאן־סימפאני שפיעלען זייערע ווערק. און די ערשטע נייע זאך, וואס ער וועט שפיעלען, וועט זיין ערנעסט לעווי'ס „דריטע סימפאני".

ער האט זיך נעהענטען צוגערופן

ESTABLISHED 1881
From 'Traveler Boston, Mass.
SEP 27 192

FIRST PROGRAM OF SYMPHONY SEASON

Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, now announces the programs with which he will make his first appearances in this country, both at the opening of the symphony season on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 10-11, and at the second pair of concerts on Oct. 17-18. Mr. Koussevitzky will first assemble the orchestra for rehearsal next Thursday morning.

The first program will consist of a concerto of Vivaldi, arranged for orchestra by Siloti; Weber's overture to "Oberon"; two Wagnerian excerpts—the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" and the Funeral March from the "Dusk of the Gods"; Honegger's "Pacific 231" (describing a three-ton American locomotive in action), and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy."

The second program will include Handel's concerto grosso in D minor, a dance of Debussy, arranged by Ravel; DeFalla's "Love Magic" (first performance in America), and Beethoven's fifth symphony in C minor.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From 'Traveler Boston, Mass.
SEP 27 1924

Madame Serge Koussevitzky, Wife of the new Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.
(Keystone View)

Serge Koussevitzky, the Dynamic New Leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in a Real How-Do-You-Do-Photographic Greeting.
(Keystone View Co.)

220 WEST 19TH ST., N. Y.
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER

SEP 28 19

A FEW WORDS MORE ON MODERN MUSIC

Remarkable Programmes Given in Paris by Boston's New Conductor; Notes of Coming Events

Announcements of musical events intended for publication in the Sunday issue of The Inquirer must be sent to the music editor no later than noon of the preceding Thursday.

Objection has been taken to the casual remarks in this column last Sunday with regard to orchestral programmes. The point is raised—it was sure to be—whether many of the new works are worth hearing. Why should we trouble to hear the compositions of "the Six" and other innovators when we have the rich classical repertory to delight us? The obvious answer to this is that lovers of music ought to know what is going on in the development—forward or backward, just as you please—of musical art. "If it be of God," as that learned doctor, Gamaliel, once said, "ye cannot overthrow it." If the new music be good music, it will live. And we ought to have intellectual curiosity enough to wish to discover whether it be good or bad.

As a matter of fact, too many have little intellectual curiosity, or perhaps historic sense. The thing that has been heard must be heard over and over again. They are as hostile to the revival of the forgotten as to the exploitation of the unknown. Some of the greatest composers of church music were ignored by generations of organists and choirmasters and are only now coming into their own, largely through the efforts of the choral societies. Even among professional musicians there is an appalling ignorance of and indifference to the history of their art.

Our orchestras have not, on the whole, fallen into so deep a rut as our opera companies; even so, few conductors are conspicuous for catholicity of taste. One of the few is Mr. Koussevitzky, the new Russian leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Since 1921 he has given some exceedingly novel programmes at his concerts in Paris. Subscribers have been wondering fearfully what he might do in Boston.

On this subject Mr. Philip Hale, with his usual humor, descanted in the Boston Herald last Sunday:

"There naturally was, there is, curiosity about Mr. Koussevitzky's programmes. Shocking reports of his fell purpose had come across the Atlantic. It was said that he actually had encouraged the ultra-modern composers, the demons of dissonance, by performing their nerve-rasping monstrosities. Conservative Bostonians, those who believe that music ended with Johannes Brahms, shuddered in anticipation of seeing the red flag hoisted on Symphony hall and flapping there defiantly. What has already been said by Mr. Koussevitzky since his arrival reassures the timid in a measure. He speaks favorably of the ancients; there is only one Beethoven—not even in the United States, not even in Boston will another Beethoven arise; and Mr. Koussevitzky is going to lead a symphony or two by our old friend Bruckner—Bruckner, a composer dear to conductors. Did not Messrs. Nikisch, Gericke, Muck in turn show their devotion to him?"

Mr. Hale divides the listeners at orchestra concerts into three groups. First come the conservatives, the reactionaries, who desire to hear nothing modern. Next come the irreverent young, "who already dub Debussy's music 'old hat;' who insist on hearing only the works of the most 'advanced' school; who talk knowingly of the 'Six' (now five, and perhaps they are disbanded); who talk volubly about 'impressionnisme' and 'pointillisme,' and speak knowingly of Erik Satie, although they have never heard a note of his music except, possibly, the 'Gymnopedies' orchestrated by that old fogy, Achille Claude Debussy. As for the members of the third group, they plume themselves on their catholicity of taste, their eclecticism. They enjoy Bach because he is 'quaint.' 'You can find all possible harmonic devices in his music.' They think symphonies by Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven should be played if only for the benefit of the younger generation. They are impressed by the architectonics of Brahms. As for the ultra-moderns, they, of course, should be heard. 'It is necessary to know what is going on in the musical world.' So Bach and Honegger are alike to them; they applaud Stravinsky's 'Sacre du Printemps' and the overture to 'Oberon' with equal fervor, and say boldly, 'one must be broad-minded.'

Well, if one must belong to a group, this last seems to have an advantage over the others. It is well to know what is going on, even if superficially. The instructed lovers of music should not judge too harshly the uninstructed, who may learn something in time. At least they have not shut their minds to learning.

It may be argued plausibly enough that a good many of the innovators in music do not really know what they want to do. A great deal of their work seems like fumbling after effects they are not sure of. Art of any kind must have beauty before all else. Their task is to bring others to see beauty with their eyes; for beauty lies in the eye of the beholder—or listener. What they are trying to say is often known only to themselves; and the suspicion arises that they have nothing to say. But they are entitled to try. It must never be forgotten that much which we now accept as beautiful was hideous to those who first heard it. How many years is it since even Brahms was anathema, was regarded as dry and dull, a terror to conventional programmes?

"They didn't know everything down in Judee," as John P. Robinson long ago reminded us, and the greatest musical genius that ever lived—most musicians call him Schubert, but Mozart also has his champions—did not achieve the whole gamut of musical expression.

If Mr. Koussevitzky is as catholic in Boston as we was in Paris, and is bold enough to give a whole programme to Liadov, Stravinski and Scriabin, to dally with Prokofiev, Satie, Malipiero, Riegel and the rest, many will think his audiences fortunate. Yet those who used to walk out of the hall before a Brahms symphony was played may avert the deadly menace by staying away altogether.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

SEP 28 1924

SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR.

THE newly appointed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is Sergei Koussevitsky, who succeeds Pierre Monteux, for some years the conductor of the organization. The orchestra, which was formerly one of Baltimore's regular visitors, but which in late years has made only one annual call, is to appear under its new conductor January 28.

The soloist for the occasion has not yet been announced, but speaking of soloists who are to appear this year with the Boston organization, it is interesting to learn that one of them is Igor Stravinsky, who, it appears, is a pianist as well as the composer of many of those ultra-modern effusions, which are called modern compositions.

Ruth St. Denis, Ted Shawn and the Denishawn dancers are expected to give a presentation in dance form February 19.

It is by no means an assured fact that Paderewski will engage in a concert tour this season, but should he do so our city will be one of those to have the pleasure of hearing him.

123

Post Sunday Sept. 28

Musicians Are Made in Youth

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

One of the first queries propounded by Mr. Koussevitzky upon his arrival on our shores was in substance: Are the ranks in American symphony orchestras recruited chiefly from American schools and conservatories?

For it is the expressed opinion of the new conductor of the Boston Symphony that a true national musical culture is impossible where such conditions do not prevail.

Needless to say, it was not possible to assure Mr. Koussevitzky that most of the players in our own, or in any other of the major symphony orchestras of the United States, are American trained. But we have been making some strides in that direction and another decade should see something approaching Mr. Koussevitzky's ideal. At least half a dozen graduates of the New England Conservatory have been or are at present members of the Boston Symphony, while the citizens of San Francisco, outstripping us, can point with pride to the presence in their orchestra of eight or 10 musicians who received their training in the orchestra of the San Francisco High School.

Of the benefits and the possibilities of school bands and orchestras we of Boston as yet know all too little. It is indeed in the reputedly uncultured West rather than in the effete East that the biggest advances in school music have been made. But the blame for our own lack of significant accomplishment may by no means be laid at the door of John A. O'Shea, director of music in the Boston schools.

Seen at his office at 15 Beacon street, the other day Mr. O'Shea declared with considerable warmth that when he first assumed his present post he hoped to revolutionize conditions over-night, but he soon found that he must make a long, uphill fight against prejudice and conservatism.

That his ambitions are now not so far from realization is, however, forcibly proven by the city's recent appropriation of $10,000 for the purchase of orchestral instruments and music stands, and of $300 for orchestral music.

And indeed, although not much has been heard from it in the way of public concerts, the Boston Public School Symphony Orchestra is already an accomplished fact; it would no doubt surprise many to learn that among the 60 odd members of this organization there was last season at least one oboeist, that players of the flute, clarinet, bassoon, trumpet, French horn and trombone were present in two and threes, and that the string section lacked neither violas nor double basses.

"The disconcerting feature of a school orchestra," said Mr. O'Shea, "is the inevitable fluctuation of its personnel. Two years ago," he went on, "we lost through graduation two French horns and four double basses, and skilled performers on those instruments are not to be made over-night."

Here, of course, is suggested the prime factor in the making of a school orchestra—the training of players, particularly players of the more unusual instruments. And it is to this end that Mr. O'Shea is now bending all his energies. The instruments themselves are ready, and more will be procured as they are needed. They may be purchased by the pupils at cost, or rented for the modest sum of $2 per year. All that is needed, then, is the teacher, and last—or perhaps first of all—the willing pupil.

The engaging of competent teachers is, of course, directly within Mr. O'Shea's province, and it is his declared intention to have the best who can be procured. Several members of the Symphony Orchestra have signified their willingness to be associated with the project, and one former member of that organization, Mr. Sordillo, trombonist and specialist in brass instrument mouthpieces, has already been engaged. The pupils will be taught in classes, during or after school hours, as may seem advisable, and a nominal charge of 25 cents a lesson will be made—a wise proviso, since nothing that is absolutely free seems ever to be fully appreciated.

Once in discussing musical conditions in America, Dr. Muck remarked, with characteristic terseness, "There is no use trying to educate the middle-aged." And while that may not be wholly and unconditionally true, it can scarcely be said too often that if we are to become a nation of music-lovers we must inculcate an understanding of music, or at least a familiarity with it, in the child and the adolescent.

It is not to be expected, or even greatly to be desired, that every boy or girl who plays an instrument in a school band or orchestra will become a professional musician. Rather the opportunity now offered the pupils of the Boston public schools is one of cultural advancement, although incidentally we may some time gain from it players in symphony orchestras. But think of the insight into music, and the love of it, that will be gained by every boy or girl who has played an instrument, whether string, wood, brass or percussion, in a classical symphony. And think, too, of the mental alertness and the sensitiveness that such an experience both requires and fosters.

For what he has already accomplished Mr. O'Shea is indeed to be congratulated, and the good that will come of his efforts is bound to be far-reaching. If it so wills Boston, the home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, need no longer take second place in that field of school music where by every right it should be pre-eminent.

ENESCO IN CAMBRIDGE

Next Tuesday evening in Paine Hall of the Harvard Music Building, George Enesco, the Rumanian composer and violinist who has twice been a soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be heard in a recital that, through the generosity of Mrs. F. S. Coolidge, will be open to the public free of charge.

SYMPHONY PROGRAMS

The programs are now announced for the opening, and likewise the second pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony hall. Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor, will first assemble the orchestra for rehearsal next Thursday morning. He will be heard for the first time in America in the following programs:

First program, Oct. 10-11:

Concerto for orchestra (arr. by A. Siloti)..Vivaldi
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner
Funeral March of Siegfried, from "Gotterdammerung".....Honegger
"Pacific 231".....Honegger
(First performance in America)
Poem of Ecstasy.....Scriabin

Second program, Oct. 17-18:

Concerto Grosso in D minor (for strings)..Handel
"Danse".....Debussy-Ravel
"El Amor Brujo" ("Love Magic").....De Falla
(First performance in America)
Symphony in C minor No. 5.....Beethoven

ROLAND HAYES

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

SEP 28 1924

"I would like to make it clear," says Serge Koussevitzky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony, to an interviewer from the Boston Globe, "that I am neither modernist nor classicist in my musical preferences. The works of the great classical masters are absolutely indispensable to me as a musician and in my life. No one would be less willing to be without them than I.

"But music is not a static art. Music is continually being made which is an expression of the period in which it appears. It is as necessary for us to know and admire what is being done as it is to know and admire what has been done. As for the value of new works, the conductor uses his best judgment in producing them. He must leave the rest to the judgment of time."

no details have yet been vouchsafed by anybody concerned.

Koussevitzky's First Programs to Prove Versatility

The announcement of the first programs which Koussevitzky has chosen for the Boston Symphony concerts has been awaited with interest.

Oct 10 and 11, the opening concerts, the orchestra will play in the order following a concerto for orchestra by Vivaldi, a contemporary of Bach, arranged by Siloti for modern orchestra, and new to Boston; Weber's "Oberon" overture; the Bacchanale from Wagner's "Tannhauser"; the Siegfried Funeral Music from Wagner's "Goetterdammerung," music which to many musicians represents the culmination of Wagner's genius; Honegger's much discussed "Pacific 231," a brief ultra-modern piece describing what it feels like to be a locomotive hurtling through space, and Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy," played here under both Muck and Monteux, but still a relative novelty.

This is an unconventional program and should certainly test the dramatic power and the versatility of Koussevitzky.

The program for Oct 17 and 18, the second concerts, begins with Handel's Concerto Grosso in D minor for strings; includes a Danse by Debussy orchestrated by Ravel; the first American performance of the Spaniard de Falla's "El Amor Brujo" (Love Magic) and for great classic symphony Beethoven's Fifth, in C minor.

It will be observed that as promised there is one new modern work per program, as the Honegger will be a "first time in America." This is a reasonable arrangement. It will also be observed that standard orchestral music gets its due on both programs, as is right and proper.

The first concert Friday, Oct 10, will be the most interesting occasion of the kind since Karl Muck made his debut in 1907. Koussevitzky and Muck have been the only conductors who came to Boston with great European reputations as orchestral conductors. Rabaud has and had one as a composer. The late Nikisch acquired one after he left Boston, as a conductor.

Dr Muck laid down his baton for part of a movement of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony at his first concert here, to prove his faith in the orchestra's success in assimilating Gericke's discipline. Perhaps the new leader may do something of the sort. At any rate he is almost certain to prove a sensation. People may dislike him as much as other people are sure to admire him, but nobody will accuse him of mediocrity or treat him as a nonentity, if his previous career is any test.

Tel. Chelsea 8860

220 WEST 19TH ST., N. Y.
Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER

SEP 28 19

A FEW WORDS MORE ON MODERN MUSIC

Remarkable Programmes Given in Paris by Boston's New Conductor; Notes of Coming Events

Announcements of musical events intended for publication in the Sunday issue of The Inquirer must be sent to the music editor no later than noon of the preceding Thursday.

Objection has been taken to the casual remarks in this column last Sunday with regard to orchestral programmes. The point is raised—it was sure to be—whether many of the new works are worth hearing. Why should we trouble to hear the compositions of "the Six" and other innovators when we have the rich classical repertory to delight us? The obvious answer to this is that lovers of music ought to know what is going on in the development—forward or backward, just as you please—of musical art. "If it be of God," as that learned doctor, Gamaliel, once said, "ye cannot overthrow it." If the new music be good music, it will live. And we ought to have intellectual curiosity enough to wish to discover whether it be good or bad.

As a matter of fact, too many have little intellectual curiosity, or perhaps historic sense. The thing that has been heard must be heard over and over again. They are as hostile to the revival of the forgotten as to the exploitation of the unknown. Some of the greatest composers of church music were ignored by generations of organists and choirmasters and are only now coming into their own, largely through the efforts of the choral societies. Even among professional musicians there is an appalling ignorance of and indifference to the history of their art.

Our orchestras have not, on the whole, fallen into so deep a rut as our opera companies; even so, few conductors are conspicuous for catholicity of taste. One of the few is Mr. Koussevitzky, the new Russian leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Since 1921 he has given some exceedingly novel programmes at his concerts in Paris. Subscribers have been wondering fearfully what he might do in Boston.

On this subject Mr. Philip Hale, with his usual humor, descanted in the Boston Herald last Sunday:

"There naturally was, there is, curiosity about Mr. Koussevitzky's programmes. Shocking reports of his fell purpose had come across the Atlantic. It was said that he actually had encouraged the ultra-modern composers, the demons of dissonance, by performing their nerve-rasping monstrosities. Conservative Bostonians, those who believe that music ended with Johannes Brahms, shuddered in anticipation of seeing the red flag hoisted on Symphony hall and flapping there defiantly. What has already been said by Mr. Koussevitzky since his arrival reassures the timid in a measure. He speaks favorably of the ancients; there is only one Beethoven—not even in the United States, not even in Boston will another Beethoven arise; and Mr. Koussevitzky is going to lead a symphony or two by our old friend Bruckner—Bruckner, a composer dear to conductors. Did not Messrs. Nikisch, Gericke, Muck in turn show their devotion to him?"

Mr. Hale divides the listeners at orchestra concerts into three groups. First come the conservatives, the reactionaries, who desire to hear nothing modern. Next come the irreverent young, "who already dub / Debussy's music 'old hat;' who insist on hearing only the works of the most 'advanced' school; who talk knowingly of the 'Six' (now five, and perhaps they are disbanded); who talk volubly about 'impressionisme' and 'pointillisme,' and speak knowingly of Erik Satie, although they have never heard a note of his music except, possibly, the 'Gymnopedies' orchestrated by that old fogy, Achille Claude Debussy. As for the members of the third group, they plume themselves on their catholicity of taste, their eclecticism. They enjoy Bach because he is "quaint." "You can find all possible harmonic devices in his music." They think symphonies by Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven should be played if only for the benefit of the younger generation. They are impressed by the architectonics of Brahms. As for the ultra-moderns, they, of course, should be heard. "It is necessary to know what is going on in the musical world." So Bach and Honegger are alike to them; they applaud Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" and the overture to "Oberon" with equal fervor, and say boldly, "one must be broad-minded."

Well, if one must belong to a group, this last seems to have an advantage over the others. It is well to know what is going on, even if superficially. The instructed lovers of music should not judge too harshly the uninstructed, who may learn something in time. At least they have not shut their minds to learning.

It may be argued plausibly enough that a good many of the innovators in music do not really know what they want to do. A great deal of their work seems like fumbling after effects they are not sure of. Art of any kind must have beauty before all else. Their task is to bring others to see beauty with their eyes; for beauty lies in the eye of the beholder—or listener. What they are trying to say is often known only to themselves; and the suspicion arises that they have nothing to say. But they are entitled to try. It must never be forgotten that much which we now accept as beautiful was hideous to those who first heard it. How many years is it since even Brahms was anathema, was regarded as dry and dull, a terror to conventional programmes?

"They didn't know everything down in Judee," as John P. Robinson long ago reminded us, and the greatest musical genius that ever lived—most musicians call him Schubert, but Mozart also has his champions—did not achieve the whole gamut of musical expression.

If Mr. Koussevitzky is as catholic in Boston as we was in Paris, and is bold enough to give a whole programme to Liadov, Stravinski and Scriabin, to dally with Prokofiev, Satie, Malipiero, Riegel and the rest, many will think his audiences fortunate. Yet those who used to walk out of the hall before a Brahms symphony was played may avert the deadly menace by staying away altogether.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BALTIMORE, MD.
SUN

SEP 2 81924

SYMPHONY CONDUCTOR.

THE newly appointed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is Sergei Koussevitsky, who succeeds Pierre Monteux, for some years the conductor of the organization. The orchestra, which was formerly one of Baltimore's regular visitors, but which in late years has made only one annual call, is to appear under its new conductor January 28.

The soloist for the occasion has not yet been announced, but speaking of soloists who are to appear this year with the Boston organization, it is interesting to learn that one of them is Igor Stravinsky, who, it appears, is a pianist as well as the composer of many of those ultra-modern effusions, which are called modern compositions.

Ruth St. Denis, Ted Shawn and the Denishawn dancers are expected to give a presentation in dance form February 19.

It is by no means an assured fact that Paderewski will engage in a concert tour this season, but should he do so our city will be one of those to have the pleasure of hearing him.

123

Post Sunday Sept. 28

Musicians Are Made in Youth

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

One of the first queries propounded by Mr. Koussevitzky upon his arrival on our shores was in substance: Are the ranks in American symphony orchestras recruited chiefly from American schools and conservatories?

For it is the expressed opinion of the new conductor of the Boston Symphony that a true national musical culture is impossible where such conditions do not prevail.

Needless to say, it was not possible to assure Mr. Koussevitzky that most of the players in our own, or in any other of the major symphony orchestras of the United States, are American trained. But we have been making some strides in that direction and another decade should see something approaching Mr. Koussevitzky's ideal. At least half a dozen graduates of the New England Conservatory have been or are at present members of the Boston Symphony, while the citizens of San Francisco, outstripping us, can point with pride to the presence in their orchestra of eight or 10 musicians who received their training in the orchestra of the San Francisco High School.

Of the benefits and the possibilities of school bands and orchestras we of Boston as yet know all too little. It is indeed in the reputedly uncultured West rather than in the effete East that the biggest advances in school music have been made. But the blame for our own lack of significant accomplishment may by no means be laid at the door of John A. O'Shea, director of music in the Boston schools.

Seen at his office at 15 Beacon street, the other day Mr. O'Shea declared with considerable warmth that when he first assumed his present post he hoped to revolutionize conditions over-night, but he soon found that he must make a long, uphill fight against prejudice and conservatism.

That his ambitions are now not so far from realization is, however, forcibly proven by the city's recent appropriation of $10,000 for the purchase of orchestral instruments and music stands, and of $300 for orchestral music.

And indeed, although not much has been heard from it in the way of public concerts, the Boston Public School Symphony Orchestra is already an accomplished fact; it would no doubt surprise many to learn that among the 60 odd members of this organization there was last season at least one oboeist, that players of the flute, clarinet, bassoon, trumpet, French horn and trombone were present in two and threes, and that the string section lacked neither violas nor double basses.

"The disconcerting feature of a school orchestra," said Mr. O'Shea, "is the inevitable fluctuation of its personnel. Two years ago," he went on, "we lost through graduation two French horns and four double basses, and skilled performers on those instruments are not to be made over-night."

Here, of course, is suggested the prime factor in the making of a school orchestra—the training of players, particularly players of the more unusual instruments. And it is to this end that Mr. O'Shea is now bending all his energies. The instruments themselves are ready, and more will be procured as they are needed. They may be purchased by the pupils at cost, or rented for the modest sum of $2 per year. All that is needed, then, is the teacher, and last—or perhaps first of all—the willing pupil.

The engaging of competent teachers is, of course, directly within Mr. O'Shea's province, and it is his declared intention to have the best who can be procured. Several members of the Symphony Orchestra have signified their willingness to be associated with the project, and one former member of that organization, Mr. Sordillo, trombonist and specialist in brass instrument mouthpieces, has already been engaged. The pupils will be taught in classes, during or after school hours, as may seem advisable, and a nominal charge of 25 cents a lesson will be made—a wise proviso, since nothing that is absolutely free seems ever to be fully appreciated.

Once in discussing musical conditions in America, Dr. Muck remarked, with characteristic terseness, "There is no use trying to educate the middle-aged." And while that may not be wholly and unconditionally true, it can scarcely be said too often that if we are to become a nation of music-lovers we must inculcate an understanding of music, or at least a familiarity with it, in the child and the adolescent.

It is not to be expected, or even greatly to be desired, that every boy or girl who plays an instrument in a school band or orchestra will become a professional musician. Rather the opportunity now offered the pupils of the Boston public schools is one of the Boston public schools is one of cultural advancement, although incidentally we may some time gain from it players in symphony orchestras. But think of the insight into music, and the love of it, that will be gained by every boy or girl who has played an instrument, whether string, wood, brass or percussion, in a classical symphony. And think, too, of the mental alertness and the sensitiveness that such an experience both requires and fosters.

For what he has already accomplished Mr. O'Shea is indeed to be congratulated, and the good that will come of his efforts is bound to be far-reaching. If it so wills Boston, the home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, need no longer take second place in that field of school music where by every right it should be pre-eminent.

ENESCO IN CAMBRIDGE

Next Tuesday evening in Paine Hall of the Harvard Music Building, George Enesco, the Rumanian composer and violinist who has twice been a soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be heard in a recital that, through the generosity of Mrs. F. S. Coolidge, will be open to the public free of charge.

SYMPHONY PROGRAMS

The programs are now announced for the opening, and likewise the second pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony hall. Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor, will first assemble the orchestra for rehearsal next Thursday morning. He will be heard for the first time in America in the following programs:

First program, Oct. 10-11:

Concerto for orchestra (arr. by A. Siloti)..Vivaldi
Overture to "Oberon"..Weber
Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser"..Wagner
Funeral March of Siegfried, from "Gotterdammerung"..Wagner
"Pacific 231"..Honegger
(First performance in America)
Poem of Ecstasy..Scriabin

Second program, Oct. 17-18:

Concerto Grosso in D minor (for strings)..Handel
"Danse"..Debussy-Ravel
"El Amor Brujo" ("Love Magic")..De Falla
(First performance in America)
Symphony in C minor No. 5..Beethoven

ROLAND HAYES

Roland Hayes

no details have yet been vouchsafed by anybody concerned.

Koussevitzky's First Programs to Prove Versatility

The announcement of the first programs which Koussevitzky has chosen for the Boston Symphony concerts has been awaited with interest.

Oct 10 and 11, the opening concerts, the orchestra will play in the order following a concerto for orchestra by Vivaldi, a contemporary of Bach, arranged by Siloti for modern orchestra, and new to Boston; Weber's "Oberon" overture; the Bacchanale from Wagner's "Tannhauser"; the Siegfried Funeral Music from Wagner's "Goetterdammerung," music which to many musicians represents the culmination of Wagner's genius; Honegger's much discussed "Pacific 231," a brief ultra-modern piece describing what it feels like to be a locomotive hurtling through space, and Skrlabin's "Poem of Ecstasy," played here under both Muck and Monteux, but still a relative novelty.

This is an unconventional program and should certainly test the dramatic power and the versatility of Koussevitzky.

The program for Oct 17 and 18, the second concerts, begins with Handel's Concerto Grosso in D minor for strings; includes a Danse by Debussy orchestrated by Ravel; the first American performance of the Spaniard de Falla's "El Amor Brujo" (Love Magic) and for great classic symphony Beethoven's Fifth, in C minor.

It will be observed that as promised there is one new modern work per program, as the Honegger will be a "first time in America." This is a reasonable arrangement. It will also be observed that standard orchestral music gets its due on both programs, as is right and proper.

The first concert Friday, Oct 10, will be the most interesting occasion of the kind since Karl Muck made his debut in 1907. Koussevitzky and Muck have been the only conductors who came to Boston with great European reputations as orchestral conductors. Rabaud has and had one as a composer. The late Nikisch acquired one after he left Boston, as a conductor.

Dr Muck laid down his baton for part of a movement of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony at his first concert here, to prove his faith in the orchestra's success in assimilating Gericke's discipline. Perhaps the new leader may do something of the sort. At any rate he is almost certain to prove a sensation. People may dislike him as much as other people are sure to admire him, but nobody will accuse him of mediocrity or treat him as a nonentity, if his previous career is any test.

Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

SEP 28 1924

"I would like to make it clear," says Serge Koussevitzky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony, to an interviewer from the Boston Globe, "that I am neither modernist nor classicist in my musical preferences. The works of the great classical masters are absolutely indispensable to me as a musician and in my life. No one would be less willing to be without them than I.

"But music is not a static art. Music is continually being made which is an expression of the period in which it appears. It is as necessary for us to know and admire what is being done as it is to know and admire what has been done. As for the value of new works, the conductor uses his best judgment in producing them. He must leave the rest to the judgment of time."

Serge Koussevitzky

REDUCTION

RATIO

18x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

124

Tel. Chelsea 8800

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW ORLEANS, LA.
TIMES-PICAYUNE

SEP 28 1924

"Greatest of Conductors" Says Jazz Music Is Good

New Boston Symphony Head Will Seek American Beethoven.

(C, 1924, in United States and Canada by North American Newspaper Alliance.
All Rights Reserved.)

The astonishing arrival in America of Serge Koussevitzky, composer, conductor, dreamer and mystic, on the eve of his first visit to what he sees as a wider field for music, prompts us to find in America, Koussevitzky thinks, the greatest audience. He will search here for talent, furthermore, with no bias against jazz he may be the first to find an American Beethoven through it. Koussevitzky, although thoroughly enthusiastic over musically created only by opera stars, The Boston Symphony, in the time of Dr. Karl Muck, was perhaps America's most famous musical organization.

BY ALLIN RAYMOND

(Paris Correspondent of The Times-Picayune and the North American Newspaper Alliance.)

Paris, Sept. 27.—What I hope to do in America is to show the public that masterpieces of music are being written today as powerful, stirring, and beautiful as the greatest of the past," says Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor who will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra this coming season.

In the twilight shadow of his Paris home, looking down through the trees upon the peaceful Seine, he outlined for readers of The Times-Picayune his plans and hopes for his approaching career across the Atlantic.

"I will present in Boston music never heard before," he said, "music which now exists only in manuscripts which I have in my keeping, music written by men now living who will rank as high a century from now as Mozart and Beethoven. I have given some of their music in Paris. You have seen how it has been received. Some of it shall be America's first."

I have seen how Koussevitzky's music has been received in Paris. Music lovers in the French capital have gone mad over the Russian leader, literally frenzied in their idolatry.

But it is not alone for his introduction of new composers that they storm the doors of the Theatre Nationale de l'Opera for all his concerts.

America may be sure that Koussevitzky will present its musical public with auditions of the older classics, without a trace of modernity in his reading of them, their historic beauties reproduced painstakingly and enthusiastically, quite as the modern Russian believes the classics of his own school should be rendered.

America also may be sure that this man will be engaged during his entire stay in America on a passionate hunt for musical genius resident or native in the new world.

"I will do in the new world what I have done in the old," was his reply to a request for an outline of his plans.

In the old world he has become known as a hunter for musical talent, and a patron of young composers. He believes there is genius in America, and he hopes to ferret it out. The breadth of territory which his search will cover may be indicated by an incident he told the interviewer.

"Jazz music—it is a sincere and a query). "I like all good music. And several Americans have written jazz which is truly good. Besides writing it, your nation seems to have a talent for playing it.

Finds Jazz Band Splendid.

"I was in London recently, and dropped in late at night for something to eat at a supper club where dancing was going on. There was an orchestra of American boys there. The music could not have been more than thirty. I had a table near them where I could hear them and watch them individually. Some of those boys were improvising as they went along, and they were great players. I let my supper get cold listening to them. I stayed until a shockingly late hour. Those boys were fine musicians, but I learned that they were not particularly notable among America's jazz musicians—just a group of college students from one of your Western states."

Mr. Koussevitzky is a man of one passion, music. He is a man of no hobbies. Over and above his talents, his outstanding quality is enthusiasm. He is as enthusiastic over the subject as he expounds from his conductor's platform as is Billy Sunday over his. (Their methods of exposition differ.)

Music has been practically his entire life since the age when most boys are playing marbles. At the age of twelve he conducted a provincial theater orchestra in Russia, and was a composer. Today he is 52 years old.

Mr. Koussevitzky is married. His wife is musical. Mrs. Koussevitzky is the sort of person to whom the young Russian composers dedicate their most ambitious works. A species of goddess, for Scriabin, Stravinsky, and their fellows. She has great sympathy for them, is a tireless listener, an able and appreciative critic. She is more than well-to-do; she has published the music of more than one unknown genius, and has supplied food to many others.

In appearance, manner, and dress, Mr. Koussevitzky might be a successful middle-aged business man—a forceful figure of no eccentricities, of middle height, stocky, unathletic. Only his eyes inform you he is not; few business men have eyes glowing with such dark strange fires as his, when enthusiasm is flaming in them. They are the eyes of a young reformer, an evangelist.

The fact is, Mr. Koussevitzky is an evangelist, and a showman. He would appreciate both Billy Sunday and P. T. Barnum.

This is what he told his interviewer of a trip he used to take in pre-war Russia with an orchestra of 100 players, in a steamboat on the Volga.

Carried Music to Millions.

"I carried music through a vast section of Russia," he said. "Once every two years before the war I used to charter a big steamer and make a journey of 2500 miles. We stopped at every big city and many small towns. We sent men ahead to advertise that we were coming. The peasants would flock to the river from villages for miles back into country which few Europeans have ever seen. And I took them the best that exists in music, new and old. Debussy, Ravel, Florent Schmitt, P. Dukas, Roger Ducasse, Elgar, Richard Strauss. I made them known in villages where there isn't any modern life as Europe and America know it.

"I took them into the back country and gave them to hundreds of thousands of Russian [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

SEP 28 1924

SYMPHONY PROGRAMS

The programs are now announced for the opening, and likewise the second pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony Hall. Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor, will first ensemble the orchestra for rehearsal next Thursday morning. He will be heard for the first time in America in the following programs:

First program, Oct. 10-11:

Concerto for orchestra (arr. by A. Slo[illegible]) ..... Vivaldi
Overture to "Oberon" ..... Weber
Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner
Funeral March of Siegfried, from "Gotterdammerung" ..... Wagner
Symphony in C ..... Honegger
First performance in America.
Poem of Ecstasy ..... Scriabin

Second program, Oct. 17-18:

Concerto Grosso in D minor (for strings) ..... Handel
"Danse" ..... Debussy-Ravel
"El Amor Brujo" ("Love Magic") ..... De Falla
First performance in America.
Symphony in C minor, No. 5 ..... Beethoven

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
POST

Musicians Are Made in Youth

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

One of the first queries propounded by Mr. Koussevitzky upon his arrival on our shores was in substance: Are the ranks in American symphony orchestras recruited chiefly from American schools and conservatories?

For it is the expressed opinion of the new conductor of the Boston Symphony that a true national musical culture is impossible where such conditions do not prevail.

Needless to say, it was not possible to assure Mr. Koussevitzky that most of the players in our own, or in any other of the major symphony orchestras of the United States, are American trained. But we have been making some strides in that direction and another decade should see something approaching Mr. Koussevitzky's ideal. At least half a dozen graduates of the New England Conservatory have been or are at present members of the Boston Symphony, while the ensemble of San Francisco, comprising 86, can point with pride to the presence in their orchestra of eight players who received their training in the orchestra of the San Francisco High School.

Of the benefits and the possibilities of school bands and orchestras we of Boston as yet know all too little. It is indeed in the reputedly uncultured West rather than in the effete East that the biggest advances in school music have been made. But the blame for our own lack of significant accomplishment may by no means be laid at the door of John A. Otshea, director of music in the Boston schools.

Seen at his office at 15 Beacon street, the other day Mr. O'Shea declared with considerable warmth that when he first assumed his present post he found to a revolutionize conditions overnight, but he soon found that he must make a long, uphill fight against prejudice and conservatism.

That his ambitions are now not so far from realization is, however, forcibly proven by the city's recent appropriation of $10,000 for the purchase of orchestral instruments and music stands, and of $200 for orchestral music.

And indeed, although not much has been heard from it in the way of public concerts, the Boston Public School Symphony Orchestra is already an accomplished fact; it would no doubt surprise many to learn that among the 60 odd members of this organization there was last season at least one oboist, that players of the flute, clarinet, bassoon, trumpet, French horn and trombone were present in two and threes, and that the string section lacked neither violas nor double basses.

"The disconcerting feature of a school orchestra," said Mr. O'Shea, "is the inevitable fluctuation of its personnel. Five years ago," he went on, "we lost through graduation two French horns and four double basses, and skilled performers on those instruments are not to be made over-night."

Here, of course, is suggested the prime factor in the making of a school orchestra—the training of players, particularly players of the more unusual instruments. And it is to this end that Mr. O'Shea is now bending all his energies, and upon which he is now [illegible] rapidly, and upon which [illegible] needed. They have [illegible] pupils at cost, or rent [illegible] sum of $2 per year. All that is necessary, then, is the teacher, and last—but perhaps first of all—the willing pupil.

The engaging of competent teachers, of course, directly within Mr. O'Shea's province, and it is his declared intention to have the best who can be procured. Several members of the Symphony Orchestra have signified their willingness to be associated with the project, and one form or another of that organization, at present [illegible] and specialized in brass instrument [illegible] has already been engaged. The pupils will be taught in classes, during or after school hours, as may be found advisable, and a nominal charge of 25 cents a lesson will be made, a provision, since nothing that is absolutely free seems ever to be fully appreciated.

Since in discussing musical conditions in America, Dr. Muck remarked, with charge-like terseness, "There is no use trying to educate the middle-aged." And while that may not be wholly and unconditionally true, it can scarcely be said too often that if we are to become a nation of music-lovers we must inculcate an understanding of music, or at least a familiarity with it, in the child and the adolescent.

It is not to be expected, or even greatly to be desired, that every boy or girl who plays an instrument in a school band or orchestra will become a professional musician. Rather the opportunity now offered the pupils of the Boston public schools is one of [illegible] cultural advancement, although incidentally we may some time gain from it players in symphony orchestras. But think of the musical time wasted, and the love of it, that will be ruined for every boy or girl who has played on a trumpet, whether string, wood, or percussion, by a classed existence during or after school hours, as may [illegible] And think, too, of the mental [illegible] and the sensitiveness that [illegible] both requires and [illegible]

For which [illegible] community [illegible] gratulated, and the [illegible] of his efforts is heard [illegible] reaching. If it so will it stand the home of the Boston Symphony [illegible] need no longer take second place in that field of school music where [illegible] every right it should so preeminently.

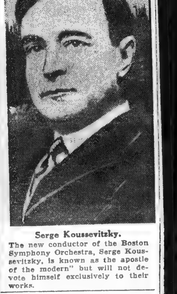
ENESCO IN CAMBRIDGE

Next Tuesday evening in Paine Hall of the Harvard Music Building, George Enesco, the Rumanian composer and violinist who has twice been a soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be heard in a recital that, apparently now offered the people of Cambridge [illegible] the public [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT

A FAMOUS MUSICIAN.
Serge Koussevitzky recently arrived to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season. He is one of the prominent musical figures abroad, but this is his first visit here.

Heir to Dr. Muck's Baton Is 'Apostle of Moderns'



Serge Koussevitzky.
The new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, is known as the apostle of the modern" but will not devote himself exclusively to their works.

tered over an area of 500,000 square miles. You should have seen them come to see and hear us! And on these trips I found musicians who now are playing in the great capitals.

"They were marvelous, those journeys. They are not possible any more."

There is a pardonable pride that glows through the musician's story of his pre-war missionary tours. There is no doubt that Koussevitzky, like other artists is an egoist, but his is not a blatant egoism. It is the self-confidence and pride of a man who has demonstrated his abilities and who is enthusiastic over the place of music in the general scheme of things.

Music is the most important thing in the world to him. Therefore it must count for a great deal with society at large.

As a small boy, he says, the orchestras he heard in Tver, the north Russian community where he was born, exerted an [illegible] fascination over him. His family were merchantile, middle class folk who were fond of music. It was early the center of his existence, and though he experimented with various instruments when a boy he always intended to direct an orchestra as his life work.

When he was fourteen, he entered the conservatoire of the Moscow Philharmonic Society as a student of composition and orchestral conducting. In order to qualify for a scholarship he studied the double bass and became such a master of that resounding instrument that upon the termination of his study he obtained the post of double bass at the Moscow Imperial Opera. For several years thereafter he appeared in the principal cities of Russia as a double bass virtuoso.

Established Own Orchestra.

He never lost sight of his real aim, to conduct a great orchestra. In 1909, after an intensive study of the interpretation of classics and moderns in an orchestra formed by him in Berlin from students of the Berlin High school of Music, he returned to Russia and established his own symphony orchestra in Moscow. This body of musicians quickly became famous all over Russia so that its appearance in Petrograd was always one of the great events of the court season. It was with his group of players with which Koussevitzky toured the Volga.

Then came the war. The first revolution, that of 1917, did not disturb him. He was appointed general conductor of the Russian State Orchestras by the provisional government established by Kerensky. This orchestra formerly was the court orchestra.

Then came the Bolshevik uprising.

"I am not a politician," says the composer and conductor, speaking of it. "I am not an economist."

Then he pauses. He does not launch into the diatribes against the new regime which explode from most of the

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
ADVERTISER

Koussevitzky's Symphony Program

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has selected the following program for his American debut at the Symphony concerts on October 10 and 11:

Vivaldi, concerto for orchestra arranged by A. Slonimsky; Weber, overture to "Oberon"; Wagner, bacchanale from "Tannhauser" and funeral march from "Gotterdammerung"; Honegger, "Pacific 231," first performance in America; Scriabin, "Poem of Ecstasy."

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

124

Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
TIMES-PICAYUNE

SEP 2 81924

"Greatest of Conductors" Says Jazz Music Is Good

New Boston Symphony Head Will Seek American Beethoven.

(©, 1924, in United States and Canada by North American Newspaper Alliance. All Rights Reserved)

The approaching arrival in America of Serge Koussevitzky to become conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, turns attention not only to the man himself but to what he, as a seeker after new genius, hopes to find in America. Exponent of both the classic and the modern, he will search here for talent—or better—and with no bias against jazz he may be the first to find an American Beethoven. Mr. Koussevitzky's following in Europe is of the enthusiastic sort usually created only by opera stars. The Boston Symphony, in the time of Dr. Karl Muck, was perhaps America's most famous musical organization.

BY ALLEN RAYMOND

(Paris Correspondent of The Times-Picayune and the North American Newspaper Alliance)

Paris, Sept. 27.—"What I hope to do in America is to show the public that masterpieces of music are being written today as powerful, stirring, and beautiful as the greatest of the past," says Serge Koussevitzky, the Russian conductor who will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra this coming season.

In the twilight shadow of his Paris home, looking down through the trees upon the peaceful Seine, he outlined for readers of The Times-Picayune his plans and hopes for his approaching career across the Atlantic.

"I will present in Boston music never heard before," he said, "music which now exists only in manuscripts which I have in my keeping, music written by men now living who will rank as high a century from now as Mozart and Beethoven. I have given some of their music to Paris. You have seen how it has been received. Some of it shall be America's first."

I have seen how Koussevitzky's music has been received in Paris. Music lovers in the French capital have gone mad over the Russian leader, literally frenzied in their idolatry.

But it is not alone for his introduction of new composers that they storm the doors of the Theatre Nationale de l'Opera for all his concerts.

America may be sure that Koussevitzky will present its musical public with auditions of the older classics, without a trace of modernity in his reading of them, their historic beauties reproduced painstakingly and enthusiastically, exactly as the modern Russian believes the older masters wished them rendered.

America also may be sure that this man will be engaged during his entire stay in America on a passionate hunt for musical genius resident or native in the new world.

"I will do in the new world what I have done in the old," was his reply to a request for an outline of his plans.

In the old world he has become known as a hunter for musical talent, and a patron of young composers. He believes there is genius in America, and he hopes to ferret it out. The breadth of territory which his search will cover may be indicated by an incident he told the interviewer.

"Jazz music?" (He was answering a query.) "I like all good music. And several Americans have written jazz which is truly good. Besides writing it, your nation seems to have a talent for playing it.

Finds Jazz Band Splendid.

"I was in London recently, and dropped in late at night for something to eat at a supper club where dancing was going on. There was an orchestra of American boys there. The oldest could not have been more than thirty. I had a table near them where I could hear them and watch them individually. Some of those boys were improvising as they went along, and they were great players. I let my supper get cold listening to them. I stayed until a shockingly late hour. Those boys were fine musicians, but I learned that they were not particularly notable among America's jazz musicians—just a group of college students from one of your Western states."

Mr. Koussevitzky is a man of one passion, music. He is a man of no hobbies. Over and above his talents, his outstanding quality is enthusiasm. He is as enthusiastic over the subject he expounds from his conductor's platform as is Billy Sunday over his. (Their methods of exposition differ.)

Music has been practically his entire life since the age when most boys are playing marbles. At the age of twelve he conducted a provincial theater orchestra in Russia, and was a composer. Today he is 52 years old.

Mr. Koussevitzky is married. His wife is musical. Mrs. Koussevitzky is the sort of person to whom the young Russian composers dedicate their most ambitious works. A species of goddess, for Scriabin, Stravinsky, and their fellows. She has great sympathy for them, is a tireless listener, an able and appreciative critic. She is more than well-to-do. She has published the music of more than one hungry genius, and has supplied food to many others.

In appearance, manner, and dress, Mr. Koussevitzky might be a successful middle-aged business man—a forceful figure of no eccentricities, of middle height, stocky, unathletic. Only his eyes inform you he is not; few business men have eyes glowing with such dark strange fires as his, when enthusiasm is flaming in them. They are the eyes of a young reformer, an evangelist.

The fact is, Mr. Koussevitzky is an evangelist, and a showman. He would appreciate both Billy Sunday and P. T. Barnum.

This is what he told his interviewer of a trip he used to take in pre-war Russia with an orchestra of 100 players, in a steamboat on the Volga.

Carried Music to Millions.

"I carried music through a vast section of Russia," he said. "Once every two years before the war I used to charter a big steamer and make a journey of 2500 miles. We stopped at every big city and many small towns. We sent men ahead to advertise that we were coming. The peasants would flock to the river from villages for miles back into country which few Europeans have ever seen. And I took them the best that exists in music, new and old. Debussy, Ravel, Florent Schmitt, P. Dukas, Roger Ducasse, Elgar, Richard Strauss. I made them known in villages where there isn't any modern life as Europe and America know it.

"I took them into the back country and gave [illegible] hundreds of thousands of Russian [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BOSTON,
MASS.
HERALD

SEP 2 81924

SYMPHONY PROGRAMS

The programs are now announced for the opening, and likewise the second pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony hall. Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor, will first assemble the orchestra for rehearsal next Thursday morning. He will be heard for the first time in America in the following programs:

First program, Oct. 10-11:

Concerto for orchestra (arr. by A. Siloti)..Vivaldi
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner
Funeral March of Siegfried, from "Gotterdammerung".....Wagner
"Pacific 231".....Honegger
(First performance in America)
Poem of Ecstasy.....Scriabin

Second program, Oct. 17-18:

Concerto Grosso in D minor (for strings)...Handel
"Danse".....Debussy-Ravel
"El Amor Brujo" ("Love Magic").....De Falla
(First performance in America)
Symphony in C minor No. 5.....Beethoven

Heir to Dr. Muck's Baton Is 'Apostle of Moderns'

Serge Koussevitzky.
The new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Kous-

Musicians Are Made in Youth

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

One of the first queries propounded by Mr. Koussevitzky upon his arrival on our shores was in substance: Are the ranks in American symphony orchestras recruited chiefly from American schools and conservatories?

For it is the expressed opinion of the new conductor of the Boston Symphony that a true national musical culture is impossible where such conditions do not prevail.

Needless to say, it was not possible to assure Mr. Koussevitzky that most of the players in our own, or in any other of the major symphony orchestras of the United States, are American trained. But we have been making some strides in that direction and another decade should see something approaching Mr. Koussevitzky's ideal. At least half a dozen graduates of the New England Conservatory have been or are at present members of the Boston Symphony, while the citizens of San Francisco, outstripping us, can point with pride to the presence in their orchestra of eight or 10 musicians who received their training in the orchestra of the San Francisco High School.

Of the benefits and the possibilities of school bands and orchestras we of Boston as yet know all too little. It is indeed in the reputedly uncultured West rather than in the effete East that the biggest advances in school music have been made. But the blame for our own lack of significant accomplishment may by no means be laid at the door of John A. O'Shea, director of music in the Boston schools.

Seen at his office at 15 Beacon street, the other day Mr. O'Shea declared with considerable warmth that when he first assumed his present post he hoped to revolutionize conditions over-night, but he soon found that he must make a long, uphill fight against prejudice and conservatism.

That his ambitions are now not so far from realization is, however, forcibly proven by the city's recent appropriation of $10,000 for the purchase of orchestral instruments and music stands, and of $300 for orchestral music.

And indeed, although not much has been heard from it in the way of public concerts, the Boston Public School Symphony Orchestra is already an accomplished fact; it would no doubt surprise many to learn that among the 60 odd members of this organization there was last season at least one oboeist, that players of the flute, clarinet, bassoon, trumpet, French horn and trombone were present in two and threes, and that the string section lacked neither violas nor double basses.

"The disconcerting feature of a school orchestra," said Mr. O'Shea, "is the inevitable fluctuation of its personnel. Two years ago," he went on, "we lost through graduation two French horns and four double basses, and skilled performers on those instruments are not to be made over-night."

Here, of course, is suggested the prime factor in the making of a school orchestra—the training of players, particularly players of the more unusual instruments. And it is to this end that Mr. O'Shea is now bending all his energies. The instruments themselves are ready, and more will be procured as they are needed. They may be purchased by the pupils at cost, or rented for the modest sum of $2 per year. All that is needed, then, is the teacher, and last—or perhaps first of all—the willing pupil.

The engaging of competent teachers is, of course, directly within Mr. O'Shea's province, and it is his declared intention to have the best who can be procured. Several members of the Symphony Orchestra have signified their willingness to be associated with the project, and one former member of that organization, Mr. Sordillo, trombonist and specialist in brass instrument mouthpieces, has already been engaged. The pupils will be taught in classes, during or after school hours, as may seem advisable, and a nominal charge of 25 cents a lesson will be made—a wise proviso, since nothing that is absolutely free seems ever to be fully appreciated.

Once in discussing musical conditions in America, Dr. Muck remarked, with characteristic terseness, "There is no use trying to educate the middle-aged." And while that may not be wholly and unconditionally true, it can scarcely be said too often that if we are to become a nation of music-lovers we must inculcate an understanding of music, or at least a familiarity with it, in the child and the adolescent.

It is not to be expected, or even greatly to be desired, that every boy or girl who plays an instrument in a school band or orchestra will become a professional musician. Rather the opportunity now offered the pupils of the Boston public schools is one of cultural advancement, although incidentally we may some time gain from it players in symphony orchestras. But think of the insight into music, and the love of it, that will be gained by every boy or girl who has played an instrument, whether string, wood, brass or percussion, in a classical symphony. And think, too, of the mental alertness and the sensitiveness that such an experience both requires and fosters.

For what he has already accomplished Mr. O'Shea is indeed to be congratulated, and the good that will come of his efforts is bound to be far-reaching. If it so wills Boston, the home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, need no longer take second place in that field of school music where by every right it should be pre-eminent.

ENESCO IN CAMBRIDGE

Next Tuesday evening in Paine Hall of the Harvard Music Building, George Enesco, the Rumanian composer and violinist who has twice been a soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be heard in a recital that, through the generosity of Mrs. F. S. Coolidge, will be open to the public free of charge.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT

SEP 2 81924

A FAMOUS MUSICIAN.
Serge Koussevitzky recently arrived to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season. He is one of the prominent musical figures abroad, but this is his first visit here.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BOSTON, MASS.
ADVERTISER

SEP 2 81924

Koussevitzky's Symphony Program

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has selected the following program for his American debut at the Symphony concerts on October 10 and 11:

Vivaldi, concerto for orchestra, arranged by A. Siloti; Weber, overture to "Oberon;" Wagner, bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser" and funeral march from "Goetterdammerung;" Honegger, "Pacific 231," first performance in America; Scriabin, "Poem of Ecstasy."

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BOSTON,
MASS.
HERALD

SEP 2 81924

SYMPHONY PROGRAMS

The programs are now announced for the opening, and likewise the second pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony hall. Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor, will first assemble the orchestra for rehearsal next Thursday morning. He will be heard for the first time in America in the following programs:

First program, Oct. 10-11:

Concerto for orchestra (arr. by A. Siloti)..Vivaldi
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner
Funeral March of Siegfried, from "Gotterdammerung".....Wagner
"Pacific 231".....Honegger
(First performance in America)
Poem of Ecstasy.....Scriabin

Second program, Oct. 17-18:

Concerto Grosso in D minor (for strings)..Handel
"Danse".....Debussy-Ravel
"El Amor Brujo" ("Love Magic").....De Falla
(First performance in America)
Symphony in C minor No. 5.....Beethoven

his. (Their methods of exposition differ.)

Music has been practically his entire life since the age when most boys are playing marbles. At the age of twelve he conducted a provincial theater orchestra in Russia, and was a composer. Today he is 52 years old.

Mr. Koussevitzky is married. His wife is musical. Mrs. Koussevitzky is the sort of person to whom the young Russian composers dedicate their most ambitious works. A species of goddess, for Scriabin, Stravinsky, and their fellows. She has great sympathy for them, is a tireless listener, an able and appreciative critic. She is more than well-to-do. She has published the music of more than one hungry genius, and has supplied food to many others.

In appearance, manner, and dress, Mr. Koussevitzky might be a successful middle-aged business man—a forceful figure of no eccentricities, of middle height, stocky, unathletic. Only his eyes inform you he is not; few business men have eyes glowing with such dark strange fires as his, when enthusiasm is flaming in them. They are the eyes of a young reformer, an evangelist.

The fact is, Mr. Koussevitzky is an evangelist, and a showman. He would appreciate both Billy Sunday and P. T. Barnum.

This is what he told his interviewer of a trip he used to take in pre-war Russia with an orchestra of 100 players, in a steamboat on the Volga.

Carried Music to Millions.

"I carried music through a vast section of Russia," he said. "Once every two years before the war I used to charter a big steamer and make a journey of 2500 miles. We stopped at every big city and many small towns. We sent men ahead to advertise that we were coming. The peasants would flock to the river from villages for miles back into country which few Europeans have ever seen. And I took them the best that exists in music, new and old. Debussy, Ravel, Florent Schmitt, P. Dukas, Roger Ducasse, Elgar, Richard Strauss. I made them known in villages where there isn't any modern life as Europe and America know it.

"I took them into the back country and gave them to hundreds of thousands of Russian [illegible]

Heir to Dr. Muck's Baton Is 'Apostle of Moderns'

Serge Koussevitzky.
The new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, is known as the apostle of the modern" but will not devote himself exclusively to their works.

tered over an area of 500,000 square miles. You should have seen them come to see and hear us! And on these trips I found musicians who now are playing in the great capitals.

"They were marvelous, those journeys. They are not possible any more."

There is a pardonable pride that glows through the musician's story of his pre-war missionary tours. There is no doubt that Koussevitzky, like other artists is an egotist, but his is not a blatant egotism. It is the self-confidence and pride of a man who has demonstrated his abilities and who is enthusiastic over the place of music in the general scheme of things.

Music is the most important thing in the world to him. Therefore it must count for a great deal with society at large.

As a small boy, he says, the orchestras he heard in Tver, the north Russian community where he was born, exerted an impelling fascination over him. His family were mercantile, middle class folk who were fond of music. It was early the center of his existence, and though he experimented with various instruments when a boy he always intended to direct an orchestra as his life work.

When he was fourteen, he entered the conservatoire of the Moscow Philharmonic Society as a student of composition and orchestral conducting. In order to qualify for a scholarship he studied the double bass and became such a master of that resounding instrument that upon the termination of his study he obtained the post of double bass at the Moscow Imperial Opera. For several years thereafter he appeared in the principal cities of Russia as a double bass virtuoso.

Established Own Orchestra.

He never lost sight of his real aim, to conduct a great orchestra. In 1909, after an intensive study of the interpretation of classics and moderns in an orchestra formed by him in Berlin from students of the Berlin High School of Music, he returned to Russia and established his own symphony orchestra in Moscow. This body of musicians quickly became famous all over Russia so that its appearance in Petrograd was always one of the great events of the court season. It was with his group of players with which Koussevitzky toured the Volga.

Then came the war. The first revolution, that of 1917, did not disturb him. He was appointed general conductor of the Russian State Orchestra by the provisional government established by Kerensky. This orchestra formerly was the court orchestra.

Then came the Bolshevik uprising.

"I am not a politician," says the composer and conductor, speaking of it. "I am not an economist."

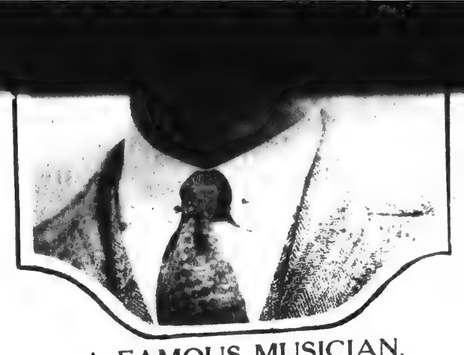
Then he pauses. He does not launch into the diatribes against the new regime which explode from most of the

Symphony Orchestra is already an accomplished fact; it would no doubt surprise many to learn that among the 60 odd members of this organization there was last season at least one oboeist, that players of the flute, clarinet, bassoon, trumpet, French horn and trombone were present in two and threes, and that the string section lacked neither violas nor double basses.

"The disconcerting feature of a school orchestra," said Mr. O'Shea, "is the inevitable fluctuation of its personnel. Two years ago," he went on, "we lost through graduation two French horns and four double basses, and skilled performers on those instruments are not to be made over-night."

Here, of course, is suggested the prime factor in the making of a school orchestra—the training of players, particularly players of the more unusual instruments. And it is to this end that Mr. O'Shea is now bending all his energies. The instruments themselves are ready, and more will be procured as they are needed. They may be purchased by the pupils at cost, or rented for the modest sum of $2 per year. All that is needed, then, is the teacher, and last—or perhaps first of all—the willing pupil.

The engaging of competent teachers is, of course, directly within Mr. O'Shea's province, and it is his declared intention to have the best who can be procured. Several members of the Sym-



A FAMOUS MUSICIAN.
Serge Koussevitzky recently arrived to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season. He is one of the prominent musical figures abroad, but this is his first visit here.

Symphony Orchestra, has selected the following program for his American debut at the Symphony concerts on October 10 and 11:

Vivaldi, concerto for orchestra, arranged by A. Siloti; Weber, overture to "Oberon;" Wagner, bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser" and funeral march from "Goetterdammerung;" Honegger, "Pacific 231," first performance in America; Scriabin, "Poem of Ecstasy."

124

Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BOSTON, MASS.
POST

SEP 2 81924

Musicians Are Made in Youth

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

One of the first queries propounded by Mr. Koussevitzky upon his arrival on our shores was in substance: Are the ranks in American symphony orchestras recruited chiefly from American schools and conservatories?

For it is the expressed opinion of the new conductor of the Boston Symphony that a true national musical culture is impossible where such conditions do not prevail.

Needless to say, it was not possible to assure Mr. Koussevitzky that most of the players in our own, or in any other of the major symphony orchestras of the United States, are American trained. But we have been making some strides in that direction and another decade should see something approaching Mr. Koussevitzky's ideal. At least half a dozen graduates of the New England Conservatory have been or are at present members of the Boston Symphony, while the citizens of San Francisco, outstripping us, can point with pride to the presence in their orchestra of eight or 10 musicians who received their training in the orchestra of the San Francisco High School.

Of the benefits and the possibilities of school bands and orchestras we of Boston as yet know all too little. It is indeed in the reputedly uncultured West rather than in the effete East that the biggest advances in school music have been made. But the blame for our own lack of significant accomplishment may by no means be laid at the door of John A. O'Shea, director of music in the Boston schools.

Seen at his office at 15 Beacon street, the other day Mr. O'Shea declared with considerable warmth that when he first assumed his present post he hoped to revolutionize conditions over-night, but he soon found that he must make a long, uphill fight against prejudice and conservatism.

That his ambitions are now not so far from realization is, however, forcibly proven by the city's recent appropriation of $10,000 for the purchase of orchestral instruments and music stands, and of $300 for orchestral music.

And indeed, although not much has been heard from it in the way of public concerts, the Boston Public School Symphony Orchestra is already an accomplished fact; it would no doubt surprise many to learn that among the 60 odd members of this organization there was last season at least one oboeist, that players of the flute, clarinet, bassoon, trumpet, French horn and trombone were present in two and threes, and that the string section lacked neither violas nor double basses.

"The disconcerting feature of a school orchestra," said Mr. O'Shea, "is the inevitable fluctuation of its personnel. Two years ago," he went on, "we lost through graduation two French horns and four double basses, and skilled performers on those instruments are not to be made over-night."

Here, of course, is suggested the prime factor in the making of a school orchestra—the training of players, particularly players of the more unusual instruments. And it is to this end that Mr. O'Shea is now bending all his energies. The instruments themselves are ready, and more will be procured as they are needed. They may be purchased by the pupils at cost, or rented for the modest sum of $2 per year. All that is needed, then, is the teacher, and last--or perhaps first of all—the willing pupil.

The engaging of competent teachers is, of course, directly within Mr. O'Shea's province, and it is his declared intention to have the best who can be procured. Several members of the Symphony Orchestra have signified their willingness to be associated with the project, and one former member of that organization, Mr. Sordillo, trombonist and specialist in brass instrument mouthpieces, has already been engaged. The pupils will be taught in classes, during or after school hours, as may seem advisable, and a nominal charge of 25 cents a lesson will be made—a wise proviso, since nothing that is absolutely free seems ever to be fully appreciated.

Once in discussing musical conditions in America, Dr. Muck remarked, with characteristic terseness, "There is no use trying to educate the middle-aged." And while that may not be wholly and unconditionally true, it can scarcely be said too often that if we are to become a nation of music-lovers we must inculcate an understanding of music, or at least a familiarity with it, in the child and the adolescent.

It is not to be expected, or even greatly to be desired, that every boy or girl who plays an instrument in a school band or orchestra will become a professional musician. Rather the opportunity now offered the pupils of the Boston public schools is one of cultural advancement, although incidentally we may some time gain from it players in symphony orchestras. But think of the insight into music, and the love of it, that will be gained by every boy or girl who has played an instrument, whether string, wood, brass or percussion, in a classical symphony. And think, too, of the mental alertness and the sensitiveness that such an experience both requires and fosters.

For what he has already accomplished Mr. O'Shea is indeed to be congratulated, and the good that will come of his efforts is bound to be far-reaching. If it so wills Boston, the home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, need no longer take second place in that field of school music where by every right it should be pre-eminent.

ENESCO IN CAMBRIDGE

Next Tuesday evening in Paine Hall of the Harvard Music Building, George Enesco, the Rumanian composer and violinist who has twice been a soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be heard in a recital that, through the generosity of Mrs. F. S. Coolidge, will be open to the public free of charge.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT

SEP 2 81924

A FAMOUS MUSICIAN.
Serge Koussevitzky recently arrived to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season. He is one of the prominent musical figures abroad, but this is his first visit here.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BOSTON, MASS.
ADVERTISER

SEP 2 81924

Koussevitzky's Symphony Program

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has selected the following program for his American debut at the Symphony concerts on October 10 and 11:

Vivaldi, concerto for orchestra, arranged by A. Siloti; Weber, overture to "Oberon;" Wagner, bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser" and funeral march from "Goetterdammerung;" Honegger, "Pacific 231," first performance in America; Scriabin, "Poem of Ecstasy."

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BOSTON,
MASS.
HERALD

SEP 2 8192

SYMPHONY PROGRAMS

The programs are now announced the opening, and likewise the sec pair of Boston Symphony concerts Symphony hall. Serge Koussevitzl the new conductor, will first assem the orchestra for rehearsal next Thu day morning. He will be heard for first time in America in the follow
programs:

First program, Oct. 10-11:

Concerto for orchestra (arr. by A. Siloti)..... Viva
Overture to "Oberon"..... Web
Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser"..... Wagn
Funeral March of Siegfried, from "Gotter-dammerung"..... Wagn
"Pacific 231"..... Honegg
(First performance in America)
Poem of Ecstasy..... Scriabi

Second program, Oct. 17-18:

Concerto Grosso in D minor (for strings)..... Hand
"Danse"..... Debussy-Rav
"El Amor Brujo" ("Love Magic").....De Fall
(First performance in America)
Symphony in C minor No. 5..... Beethove

INFORMATION OBSCURED

[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

SEP 29 1924

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

Bruckner and Elgar to Return to the Symphony Concerts by Grace of Mr. Koussevitzky—Prokofiev Goes, Borovsky Comes—The Cambridge Series—Mr. Loeffler's New Piece for Chicago

THE Symphony Concerts have long overlooked the music of Bruckner and Elgar. For both, as the season advances, Mr. Koussevitzky purposes to find room. Not a Symphony by Bruckner has been heard in Boston since Dr. Muck's day, though Mr. Monteux considered—and reconsidered—a revival from them. Admittedly, Bruckner is amorphous and prolix. He stumbles and sprawls when he should go forward compactly and vigorously. He puts concision behind him, as though it were Satan to composers. He fondles his mannerisms—with a gentle smile of deprecation. Upon non-German audiences, the beginnings and the ends of his Symphonies usually and quickly pall. Between, however, stand Scherzi fresh, homely, clumping as peasants' merry-making, and slow movements saturated with ecstatic beauty. A peasant's mind and heart lingered in Bruckner; he knew Beethoven's hearty, smacking Scherzi; accordingly he wrote his own. Bruckner was also mystic. Now and again celestial visions opened before him to suffuse his music. Rapturously, longingly he then wrote, like a Saint John of revelation is tones. On these pages his music is like no other; by them it endures; for them Mr. Koussevitzky will revive one of the nine Symphonies; possibly the Eighth, for a transcendent Adagio.

Even more meager has been Elgar's portion at Symphony Hall. Since Mr. Fiedler's time neither of his Symphonies has been played in Boston. His Overtures and Concertos have fared no better. From the touring Toscanini came the only performance within memory of his "Enigma Variations." There is even a "tradition"—holy word!—that Bostonian ears cannot endure Elgar's music. Nobody knows, so long is it since they have heard any. Sir Edward's Symphonies have obvious faults and idiosyncrasies; they have been overpraised and over-gospelled; but an individual mind and spirit inform them; while they compare favorably with other work in kind of his generation. Freer from reproach are such Overtures as "Cockaigne" and "In Italy," or the Variations that are now almost classic piece. From Williams to Bliss we know the young Englishmen. Rightly Mr. Koussevitzky intends to remind us of the old. And the notion that Britons cannot compose belongs with the notion that none but Germans "really understand" Beethoven.

From Symphony Hall

Mr. Prokofiev, the Russian composer and pianist, is unable, for various reasons, to visit the United States next winter. Consequently he will not be "assisting artist" at the Symphony Concerts. For compensation, Mr. Borovsky, pianist from Russia by way of Paris and New York, is added to the announced "soloists." He courts brilliance and he strikes fire.

The Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Koussevitzky will be heard at Sanders Theater in Cambridge on Thursday evenings, Oct. 16, Nov. 6, Dec. 4, Jan. 8, Feb. 2 and 26, March 19, April 2 and 30. Tickets for the series of nine concerts will cost $12. Through next Saturday, Oct. 4, present subscribers may repurchase their seats of Mr. W. F. Carmichael at the University Book Store. On Saturday morning, Oct. 11, unclaimed seats will be put on sale at the same place.

On Thursday next, Mr. Koussevitzky will begin work with the reassembled Symphony Orchestra, to a man unchanged from the band of last year. In Europe he has made shift with two rehearsals for each of his concerts. Here in Boston he may have as many as he chooses.

Continued on Following Page

Amusements

COLONIAL

Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM

[illegible]

SEP [illegible] 1924

The Boston Symphony orchestra has had a succession of directors. George Henschel, Wilhelm Gericke, Arthur Nikisch, Max Fiedler, Henri Rabaud and Pierce Monteux are to be followed by Sergei Koussevitzky. Well, Russians are the fashion. They sing differently, act differently, write differently, and compose differently. Presently we shall see if one conducts differently. Safonoff did it without a baton and Stokowski does it without a score. Now if the orchestras could only play without conductors—but what a dreadful thought! writes W. J. Henderson.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From OCT 1 1924
Traveler
Boston, Mass.

WELLESLEY PLANS CONCERT SERIES

The music department of Wellesley College is sponsoring a series of concerts in Alumnae hall to run from October until March. These will include seven numbers. The first will be the Boston Symphony orchestra, under its new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky. Mme. Eva Gauthier, an exponent of modernism in music, will give a vocal recital. Harold Bauer, pianist, Bronislaw Huberman, violinist; Lionel Tertis, violist, and Felix Salmond, violoncellist, form a distinguished quartet for the performance of chamber music. In February the Harvard Glee Club will give a concert. Others in the series include Helen Stanley, soprano; John Powell, pianist; Myra Hess, pianist, and Cecelia Hansen, violinist.

Boston Post

SYMPHONY BY RADIO

To the Editor of the Post:

Sir—In the papers I see that a course in the appreciation of orchestral music is to be given at the Boston Public Library, presumably to increase interest in the Symphony Concerts. But why bother to do this if only a favored few can attend the concerts? Friday afternoon I waited outside Symphony Hall half an hour and then, like many others, was disappointed. Only those who had parked on the steps for about two hours could get in.

All the tickets had been sold days before, so those of us who could not attend the Saturday evening performances had to take a chance on the rush seats. If the idea of the founder and supporters of the orchestra is to bring the best music within the reach of all (and surely Colonel Higginson did not intend his concerts to be the property of a select few), one could hardly say they had been successful.

Certainly the two million people of Greater Boston are not so dull intellectually as to force a band of talented musicians led by one of the ablest conductors in the world to restrict itself to two performances a week in a small hall because of lack of patronage! There are more than enough patrons for two performances, and a little newspaper and radio propaganda ought to fill the seats at a third one.

The ordinary individual, like you and I, needs only to be taught that he can hear the best music in the world just as easily as he can see a show. This third performance might be given only every other week perhaps, on Wednesday afternoons, say. Then those who cannot go Friday or who feel unable to spend the time and money required for the 24 Friday performances might be able to attend the Wednesday ones, which might possibly be so arranged as to reduce the annual deficit.

Radio might be used to make more performances of the concerts feasible. I do not quarrel with those who really enjoy modern popular music, but I do object to their monopolizing the ether with it. There is only one radio orchestra playing regularly each week, but on Saturday evening all three stations have their blare factories under full steam. Now why could not one of them broadcast the Symphony concerts? The guarantors of the orchestra would lose nothing for those who go now would go anyway.

At best, radio transmission is somewhat unsatisfactory and there is great fascination in watching the musicians. The guarantors might even gain, if radio filled the seats at a third performance so arranged as to reduce the deficit. At the very least, broadcasting would realize the purpose of both the founder, Colonel Higginson, and the conductor, Mr. Koussevitsky, of putting the very best music where the ordinary individual who is interested enough to put forth some exertion can get at it.

DISAPPOINTED.

Traveler [illegible]

NEW CONDUCTOR LEADS SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony orchestra today assembled for the first time under Serge Koussevitzky and began the season's rehearsals. E. Sohier Welch of the board of trustees introduced the new conductor to the players.

The conductor acknowledged the applause of the musicians and expressed his delight in coming to an orchestra whose fame had spread over all Europe.

The orchestral season will open Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 10 and 11, in Symphony Hall. Koussevitzky will make his American debut with the following program: Vivaldi's Concerto in D minor; Berlioz's Overture, "The Roman Carnival"; Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Haydn; Honegger's "Pacific 231" and Scriabin's "Le Poeme de l'Extase."

THIS CLIPPING FROM

Gazette
Schenectady Ny

OCT 2 192[illegible]

Germany is high.

BOSTON SYMPHONY COMES WITH A NEW DIRECTOR

Schenectady is to have special favor this season in being the first city of the territory to welcome Serge Koussevitzky as the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 105 artists, and with an eminent soloist, in concert at the State armory, Monday evening, November 10, under the management of Ben Franklin. Not only will event introduce Koussevitzky in Schenectady before he has appeared in Albany, Troy, or Utica, but it will be one of the first cities in the United States to greet the great director.

The Boston Symphony is considered the greatest orchestral body not only in this country, but in Europe as well. It has held this fame for years. Seats for the event may be ordered now, and all letters should be sent to Mr. Franklin, in care of Cluett and Sons.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

OCT 2 - 1924

Lotta's Interest In Animals

The rather striking will of Lotta—the one name by which she was universally known—did not overlook one set of friends in which she was always interested—dumb animals. She had strong beliefs in the sanctity of life, and was an early and enthusiastic member of the Millennial league, whose members vow neither to wear the skins of animals nor eat their flesh. During her years in Boston she never forced her views on others, but she was never afraid to express them, even though she might realize that her hearers did not agree with her. To most of those who met her socially, she seemed shy, but always sincere, and now she has made it possible for her conviction to bear fruit, though many will regret her financial aid to the antivivisection movement.

A week from the coming Friday the first public rehearsal of the 44th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given with Serge Koussevitsky, the new Russian conductor, making his bow to Boston. Already he is pleasantly settled in a charming house in Jamaica Plain. He has disarmed would-be critics by making no sensational announcements. Indeed, his list of soloists is alluring. Among these are Margaret Matzenauer, Alfred Cortot, Serge Prokofieff, Albert Spalding, Igor Stravinski, Serge Rachmaninoff, Guy Mai[illegible] [illegible]sk motor vehicles [illegible]

ments.

[illegible]

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA BEGINS REHEARSALS

Serge Koussevitzky Takes Charge

At 10 o'clock this morning, in Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra assembled for the first time under Serge Koussevitzky, and began the season's rehearsals. Mr E. S. Welch of the orchestra's board of trustees led Mr Koussevitzky to the conductor's platform and introduced him to the orchestra.

The new Russian conductor acknowledged the applause from the musicians and made a brief answering speech. Depreciating "banalities," he expressed his delight in coming to an orchestra whose fame had spread all over Europe. He said that an orchestra with art as its first and sole aim was a rare phenamenon, hard to find on the other side of the Atlantic. It was this quality in the Boston Symphony Orchestra which brought him to America.

The orchestral season will open Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week, in Symphony Hall. Mr Koussevitzky will make his American debut with the following program: Vivaldi's concerto in D minor; Berlioz' overture, "The Roman Carnival"; Brahm's variations on a theme by Haydn; Honegger's " Pacific 231," and Scriabin's "Le Poem de l'Extase."

126

106-110 SEVENTH AVE.
NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From OCT 2 1924
Telegram
New York City

Koussevitzky; "Pacific 23."

All eyes are on Sergei Koussevitzky. Wilhelm Furtwaengler, who "guests" here with the Philharmonic in December, may be Koussevitzky's superior as a conductor, and may not be. That we are to see for ourselves. The German from Leipzig and Berlin is notoriously a classicist. The Russian from Paris and London might prove anything short of a blue flamingo. He is an "arch-histrion," his baton a "wand of wizardry." He "hypnotizes his audience and sometimes his orchestra." A classicist? Down Boston way they are trumpeting to all the winds of heaven that he is!

At any rate, Koussevitzky has the limelight. And will till his compatriot, Stravinsky, disembarks here. But Stravinsky is only a composer who is persuaded to conduct. What is Koussevitzky not? A virtuoso of the bull fiddle, he boldly perched above that vulcan of the viols and strove to turn it cupid to the demure psyche of the eighteenth century muse. He took an orchestra aboard a steamboat and led it up and down the Volga River. (Shall we here compare the Staten Island ferryboats?) When Bolshevism seized on Russia he preferred Paris as a habitat to Moscow. Soon he had Paris, and London, too, quite by the ears (as, indeed, he ought!) with his conducting of opera and of concerts.

There was division of opinion abroad. But what of that? He did new music, lots of it. Folk went to Koussevitzky's concerts for the programs, whether or not they stayed for the program-maker. A sensationalist, yes; but need that be a term of reproach? Wasn't Nikisch himself the prince of sensationalists? And how about Richard Wagner and Richard Strauss? The best advertised conductor of our day, save possibly Arturo Toscanini, such is Sergei Koussevitzky, and he has been at it for less time than most of them.

Boston has not, since the departure of the young Arthur Nikisch a generation ago, had a sensational conductor, musically, at the head of its famed orchestra until now. True, not one of them, not even such reputed classicists at Gericke and Muck, have been niggardly about treating Boston to new music. But one and all they felt as a first duty the zealous guarding of the classical tradition of the great band over which they have been called to preside. Strauss, Debussy, Scriabine, Stravinsky, each in turn has been dutifully, and more than dutifully, performed. But never has there existed the suspicion of a slight toward Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Brahms, and seemingly the more a leader went in for the newest men of France and Russia the more loving and appreciative was his cherishing of Bach, of Handel, of Haydn, of Mozart.

Well, it is now Koussevitzky's chance, and we shall hear what we shall hear. His first American program for the opening pair of concerts in Boston, Friday and Saturday of next week, is an unprecedented affair—for America at least—in selection, in arrangement. Will he venture on more such? Here is the first:—

Vivaldi-Siloti, concerto; Weber, overture to "Oberon"; Wagner, Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser" and Siegfried's death music from "Goetterdaemmerung"; Honegger, "Pacific 23"; Scriabin, "Poem of Ecstasy."

Probably Siloti's arrangement of the Vivaldi concerto has never yet been played in America. But the seeming blindfold raid on the Weber-Wagner barrel is almost impudent in its chestnut-grabbing. Mr. Koussevitzky led the "premiere" of "Pacific 23" in Paris last spring. The "Poem of Ecstasy," placed with a frankly prima donna gesture at the end of the program, is one of those Scriabin steeds of battle that Mr. Koussevitzky rides in a mazeppa frenzy to the trampled devastation of his grateful audiences. Well, Boston will see soon, and so before long shall we!

In "Pacific 23" Arthur Honegger, by all odds the most considerable talent of that carefully advertised Parisian Group of Six, pays his tribute to the giant modern locomotive. What one of us all but had his day of steamboat or of locomotive worship? It has taken Honegger, though, to turn his to ultimate account in a piece of music for orchestra. And let us be properly grateful to Mr. Koussevitzky for bringing this singular music forward here so promptly. For Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps" we of America waited a long ten years!

PITTS SANBORN.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

THIS CLIPPING FROM
Evening
Schenectady N.Y.
OCT 2 1924

Boston Symphony Orchestra Coming

Ben Franklin announces an appearance of the world's greatest orchestra, the Boston Symphony of 105 instrumentalists at the State Armory, Monday evening, November 10, and this announcement is certain to arouse the finest sort of enthusiasm and interest. This undoubtedly will also be accentuated from the fact that at this concert Schenectady will have one of the first opportunities to welcome Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the orchestra, who is heralded as the finest leader in this country or Europe. And in addition to this an eminent artist will be heard as soloist of the occasion. While it is a known fact that the Boston orchestra is supreme among orchestral bodies, and that its concerts are only to be considered as most important functions, not so much is known in this country as yet of Mr. Kousevitzky, except among those who keep in touch with musical affairs in Europe, but it is known that this conductor is called the most striking figure and dominating personality in the orchestral concerts of London and Paris, and that he is the most conspicuous conductor of all Russia.

Seats for this concert may be ordered now, sending such orders to Mr. Franklin, in care of Cluett and Sons, Schenectady.

...usiness."

LEADER KOUSSEVITZKY TAKES OVER SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday assembled for the first time under Serge Koussevitzky and began the season's rehearsals. E. Sohier Welch of the board of trustees introduced the new conductor to the players.

OCT 1924

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Appear at State Armory in November

NEW SYMPHONY LEADER HAILED

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was introduced to its new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, yesterday, when it met for the first rehearsal. E. Sohier Welch, representing the trustees, did the introducing, and the orchestra gave a rousing welcome.

Serge Koussevitsky.

Mr. Koussevitzky made a brief speech.

The famous Russian said in part that an orchestra with art as its sole aim was a rare phenomenon. It was this quality in the Boston Symphony which brought him to America.

BOSTON POST, FRI

SYMPHONY MEETS NEW CONDUCTOR

Koussevitzky Makes Brief Speech at Rehearsal

At 10 o'clock yesterday morning the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra assembled at Symphony Hall for the first rehearsal of the season and were then and there introduced to the orchestra's new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

Led to the platform by E. Sohier Welch of the orchestra's board of trustees, Mr. Koussevitzky was by him formally presented to the band, and after much applause made a brief speech of greeting.

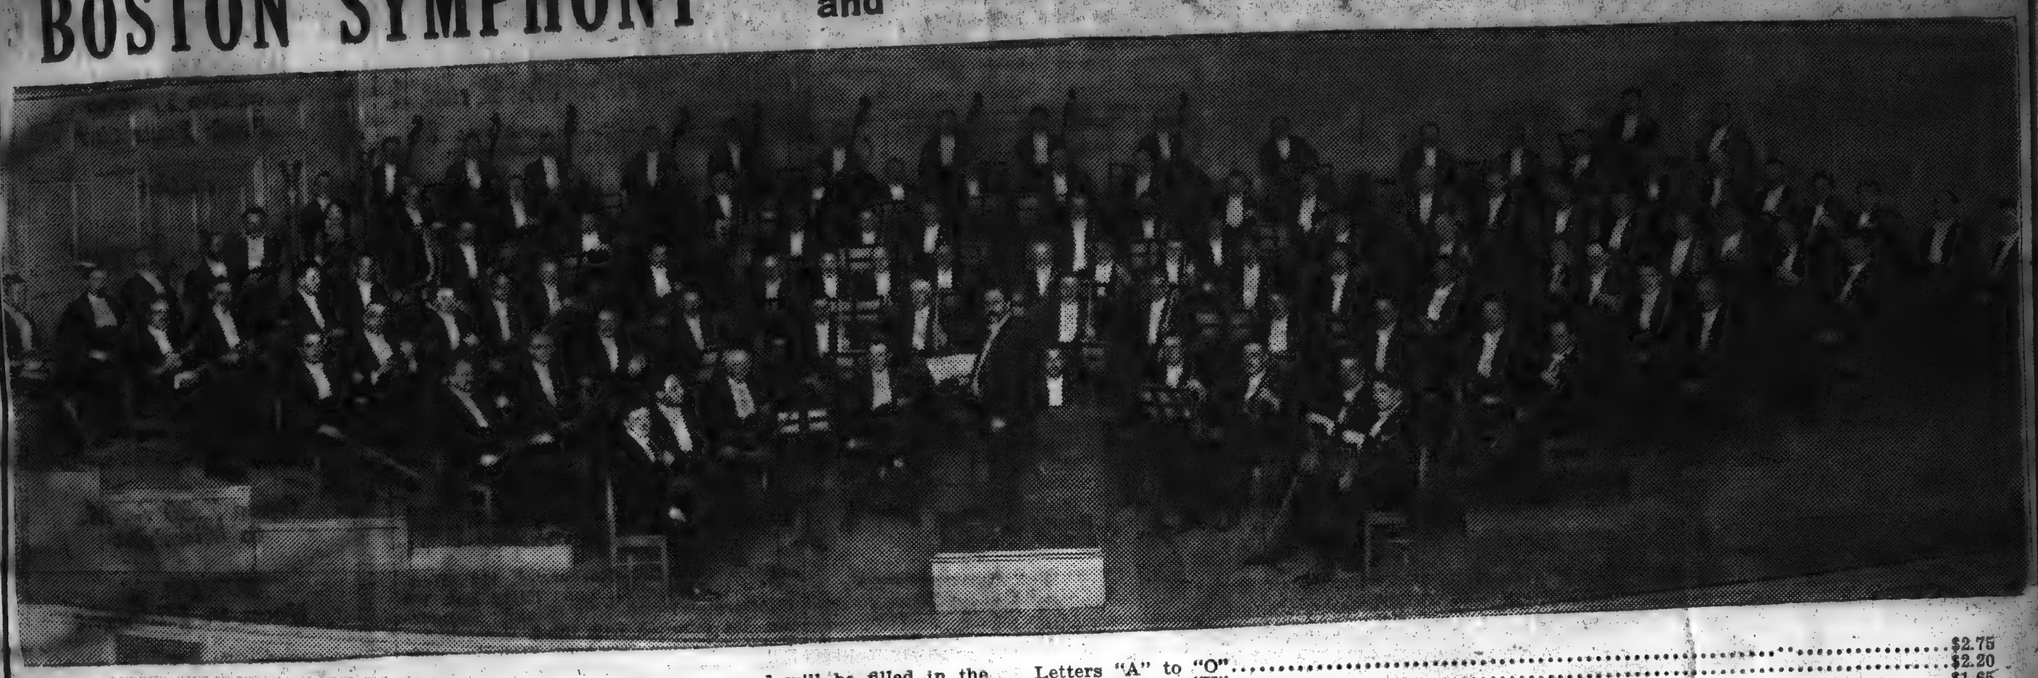
GLAD OF OPPORTUNITY

The fame of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said Mr. Koussevitzky in substance, had spread all over Europe, and it gave him great pleasure to be called to lead an organization of such repute.

Furthermore, he said that an orchestra which existed solely for art was now practically unknown on the other side of the Atlantic, and above any other consideration it was this quality in the Boston Symphony Orchestra which drew him to our shores.

THE SUPREME EVENT OF THE YEAR—STATE ARMORY, SCHENECTADY, MONDAY, NOV. 10—BEN FRANKLIN PRESENTS

BOSTON SYMPHONY 105 Artists and SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY Conductor



Orders for tickets for this concert will be accepted at once, and will be filled in the sequence of receipt. If order is accompanied with remittance, tickets will be mailed, otherwise the tickets will be just as carefully selected and held at the box office until called for. Send all orders to Ben Franklin, in care Cluett & Sons, Schenectady.

Letters "A" to "O"	$2.75
Letters "P" to "Y"	$2.20
Letters "Z" to "II"	$1.65
Entire Balcony	$2.20
General Admission	$1.10

Mus

Nagara Friday Oct 3

THE NEW, THE OLD, AS MUSIC PAUSES UPON ITS COURSE

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY'S WAY WITH AUDIENCES

Late-Comers, Interruptions and Programs —The People's Orchestra and Guest Conductors—Malcolm Lang Takes Over the Cecilia—Mr. Samuel and Bach—A "Concert-Course," in New York—Incidents and Opinions

LIKE most conductors Mr. Koussevitzky dislikes applause between the divisions of a Concerto or a Symphony. Taking his courage in his hands, he has persuaded even miscellaneous Parisian audiences to forego these interruptions. Gently but persistently he intends to bring the more docile Bostonians of Symphony Hall to a like state of mind and habit. For the change Mr. Monteux was already paving the way. Toward the end of last season, one or another piece did pass unbroken and undisturbed by too eager plaudits. The more observant, the quicker-witted, had begun to understand and respect the restraining gesture. One obstacle, however, held firm. Mr. Monteux preferred to begin a concert with a Symphony. Willing or unwilling, he must pause after the first movement for the tardy. While he waited for them, they who would clap seized the opportunity, and once more the lesson of silence was unlearned.

Mr. Koussevitzky takes a different course. He prefers to set a Symphony at the end or in the middle of his program. For beginning he usually chooses an ancient piece that, however divided, passes succinctly and swiftly. He keeps the pauses too brief for any sort of interruption. Only at the end may the belated enter. The middle hour of the concert will also protect his Symphonies and Concertos. All comers have then arrived. None is quite ready to depart. Yet the final piece, unless it is as close-knit and continuous as Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" next week, will open pitfalls. As there are those who have never heard the first act of any opera in the repertory of the Metropolitan, so there are those who have next to never heard the last number on a Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall. Unless Mr. Koussevitzky casts a spell upon them, his pause, however short, will be their signal for departure. Wait he must or have the rustle of skirts and the impact of closing doors added to his tuneful choir. There are observers on the side-lines who look forward to a duel that will be as pretty as it is polite.

[illegible] to regard both.

Programs in Prospect

From the chosen pieces for the first pair of Symphony Concerts next week, Mr. Koussevitzky has dropped Weber's Overture to "Oberon"; the Bacchanal from Wagner's "Tannhäuser" and the music that mourns Siegfried in "Götterdämmerung." Instead, conductor and orchestra will be heard in Berlioz's Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," a romantical showpiece, and Brahms's sedate Variations on a Theme [illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
ARGONAUT
OCT 4 1924

[illegible] the sympathy of the audience.

* * *

Americans who have been wondering just what to expect from Serge Koussevitzky, who has come over to steer the Boston Symphony's ship, are told by Ernest Newman in the American Mercury that Koussevitzky has a volcanic temperament under marvelous control. To make this point clear, Newman quotes Richard Strauss as saying, apropos "Tristan," that the "brain that could pour out that passionate music must have been cold as ice."

Newman goes on: "What seems like paradox in this, however, is no more than sober truth. The more an artist is on fire, the cooler have to be the head and hand that direct the fire. Koussevitzky has this central ice in an extraordinary degree. I believe it would hardly be possible to raise certain works to a higher pitch of nervous incandescence than he does; but the nervousness never gets out of hand.

Koussevitzky was born, we are told, in Tver, in the northern part of Russia, in 1874. He was leading a theater orchestra in his home town at the age of twelve, keeping at the post for two years. Part of his duties was to compose whatever music might be needed. When he was fourteen Koussevitzky went to Moscow to continue his studies. He practised upon the double-bass, soon acquiring such extraordinary facility that he was appointed soloist in the Imperial Opera orchestra and succeeded his teacher, the celebrated Rambaussev, as professor of the Conservatoire. Then, for ten years, Koussevitzky toured Europe as a virtuoso. He composed a number of works for his instrument, including a concerto, that have been much played. Yet all this time he yearned to become a conductor again.

"In 1907 he formed," Newman says, "out of the pupils of the BerlinwHochschule for Music, an orchestra with which he worked for two years, studying chiefly the classics and Wagner. He returned to Russia in 1909 and organized the Koussevitzky orchestra that soon became famous. The men were engaged by the year and were barred from giving their services to any other organization. For the performance of the choral works given at his Moscow concerts he formed a mixed choir of two hundred and fifty voices: in Petrograd he used for this purpose the celebrated Archangelsky Choir.

Formal Moscow and Petrograd seasons ending at Easter, Koussevitzky in the spring gave Beethoven festivals, Bach festivals, Tschaikovsky festivals, and Rimsky-Korsakoff festivals in the two capital towns. In the summer, for many years, he toured the provinces with his orchestra, taking it and various distinguished soloists into villages that had not only never heard an orchestra before, but had not even seen certain of the instruments; his annual voyages down the Volga with this company of musicians were among the most romantic events of the musical life of our time. In this way he introduced a number of classical and modern works to thousands who would otherwise never have heard a bar of them. Appointed director of Russian state orchestras after the Revolution of 1917, Koussevitsky remained at home until 1920. His famous Paris concerts were begun the next year and have been continued up till now.

* * *

So much for a biographical outline of the man's career. What of the inner career, the developing processes that have have gone on in his brain? One of Koussevitzky's main objects in life, according to Newman, has been to "break away from routine." He was the first conductor, we hear, to make a popular success of Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy," and gave the Russian people a vast amount of new music—works by Florent Schmidt. Dukas, Debussy, Bruckner, Mahler, Scriabin, Stravinsky, Ducasse, Prokafieff and others. He carried on the same policy when visiting England, where he is exceedingly well liked. In Spain, too, Koussevitzky conducted Russian operas by Rimsgy-Korsakoff, Tchaikovsky, Moussorgsky and Borodin. But this is not all that Koussevitzky has done. With his wife, he established the publishing house of "L'Edition Russe de Musique" with the aim of helping young Russian composers.

It all sounds promising, and one thing Koussevitzky can bank on in coming to America is a cordial reception. And since he has done so much for young composers in Europe, he may also find it in his way to do something for composers in America. If he does, what a power he will become! Here's hoping.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
EVE. LEDGER
OCT 4 1924

THE CRITIC T[illegible]

By SAMUEL L. LACIAR
Music Editor Evening Public Ledger

In the visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the general public will not have an opportunity to hear the organization, as it is being brought here by the Philadelphia Forum. If Mr. Koussevitski lives up to his reputation as an enthusiastic sponsor of the moderns, the audience will doubtless hear a most unique concert. He is starting his Boston season with Honegger's "Pacific 231," a glorification of the modern locomotive, a tone poem lasting about six minutes. However, one can cover a lot of ground in six minutes, either with an orchestra or a locomotive.

series Damro with Orches[illegible] Philh[illegible] has [illegible] It h[illegible] tend t[illegible] Philad[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW YORK REVIEW
OCT 4 - 1924

SPALDING WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Violinist Will Play Five Times with That Band This Season

Albert Spalding has just been re-engaged for five more appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the coming season. The first two of these will be at Symphony Hall, Boston, on January 9 and 10, when he will play the new Respighi Gregorian Concerto with Koussevitzky, which created such a sensation in Paris last spring. Then he will follow with two appearances at Carnegie Hall, New York, on March 12 and 14, and at the Academy of Music, Brooklyn on March 13.

Tel. Chelsea 8869

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
ENQUIRER
OCT 4 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY COMING NEXT MONTH

Serge Koussevitzky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who will appear in Buffalo with the Boston Symphony November 13 under local management of Bessie Bellanca, has just arrived in America. The celebrated Russian has been jestingly called the "lightning conductor," not because of his volatile, magnetic personality, but because his engagements are so many and in such widespread area. The last half year has been extremely busy for Koussevitsky. He spent March and April in London as guest conductor of the London Symphony orchestra, leaving there for Barcelona to conduct the Wagnerian orchestra there. In May he returned to Paris to complete his series of famous "Koussevitsky Concerts," and conduct performances of "Boris Godunov" at the Grand Opera, returning to London to conduct a short opera season before taking his summer vacation.

He founded a Russian musical edition and gave many Russian composers encouragement by publishing their works. It was in 1920 that circumstances took him westward, and immediately he became the central figure of orchestra concerts in Paris and London.

Tickets for the Boston Symphony concert may be obtained from Miss Bellanca at the Colonial Flower Shop, No. 230 Delaware avenue.

THE SUPREME EVENT OF THE YEAR—STATE ARMORY, SCHENECTADY, MONDAY, NOV. 10—BEN FRANKLIN PRESENTS

BOSTON SYMPHONY 105 Artists and SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY Conductor

Orders for tickets for this concert will be accepted at once, and will be filled in the sequence of receipt. If order is accompanied with remittance, tickets will be mailed, otherwise the tickets will be just as carefully selected and held at the box office until called for. Send all orders to Ben Franklin, in care Cluett & Sons, Schenectady.

Letters "A" to "O" $2.75
Letters "P" to "Y" $2.20
Letters "Z" to "II" $1.65
Entire Balcony $2.20
General Admission $1.10

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
ARGONAUT
OCT 4 1924

THE NEW, THE OLD, AS MUSIC PAUSES UPON ITS COURSE

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY'S WAY WITH AUDIENCES

Late-Comers, Interruptions and Programs—The People's Orchestra and Guest Conductors—Malcolm Lang Takes Over the Cecilia—Mr. Samuel and Bach—A "Concert-Course," in New York—Incidents and Opinions

LIKE most conductors Mr. Koussevitzky dislikes applause between the divisions of a Concerto or a Symphony. Taking his courage in his hands, he has persuaded even miscellaneous Parisian audiences to forego these interruptions. Gently but persistently he intends to bring the more docile Bostonians of Symphony Hall to a like state of mind and habit. For the change Mr. Monteux was already paving the way. Toward the end of last season, one or another piece did pass unbroken and undisturbed by too eager plaudits. The more observant, the quicker-witted, had begun to understand and respect the restraining gesture. One obstacle, however, held firm. Mr. Monteux preferred to begin a concert with a Symphony. Willing or unwilling, he must pause after the first movement for the tardy. While he waited for them, they who would clap seized the opportunity, and once more the lesson of silence was unlearned.

Mr. Koussevitzky takes a different course. He prefers to set a Symphony at the end or in the middle of his program. For beginning he usually chooses an ancient piece that, however divided, passes succinctly and swiftly. He keeps the pauses too brief for any sort of interruption. Only at the end may the belated enter. The middle hour of the concert will also protect his Symphonies and Concertos. All comers have then arrived. None is quite ready to depart. Yet the final piece, unless it is as close-knit and continuous as Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" next week, will open pitfalls. As there are those who have never heard the first act of any opera in the repertory of the Metropolitan, so there are those who have next to never heard the last number on a Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall. Unless Mr. Koussevitzky casts a spell upon them, his pause, however short, will be their signal for departure. Wait he must or have the rustle of skirts and the impact of closing doors added to his tuneful choir. There are observers on the side-lines who look forward to a duel that will be as pretty as it is polite.

[illegible] to no small prestige. It is not impossible to regain both.

Programs in Prospect

From the chosen pieces for the first pair of Symphony Concerts next week, Mr. Koussevitzky has dropped Weber's Overture to "Oberon"; the Bacchanal from Wagner's "Tannhäuser" and the music that mourns Siegfried in "Götterdämmerung." Instead, conductor and orchestra will be heard in Berlioz's Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," a romantical showpiece, and Brahms's sedate Variations on a Theme [illegible] winning the sympathy of the audience.

* * *

Americans who have been wondering just what to expect from Serge Koussevitzky, who has come over to steer the Boston Symphony's ship, are told by Ernest Newman in the American Mercury that Koussevitzky has a volcanic temperament under marvelous control. To make this point clear, Newman quotes Richard Strauss as saying, apropos "Tristan," that the "brain that could pour out that passionate music must have been cold as ice."

Newman goes on: "What seems like paradox in this, however, is no more than sober truth. The more an artist is on fire, the cooler have to be the head and hand that direct the fire. Koussevitzky has this central ice in an extraordinary degree. I believe it would hardly be possible to raise certain works to a higher pitch of nervous incandescence than he does; but the nervousness never gets out of hand.

Koussevitzky was born, we are told, in Tver, in the northern part of Russia, in 1874. He was leading a theater orchestra in his home town at the age of twelve, keeping at the post for two years. Part of his duties was to compose whatever music might be needed. When he was fourteen Koussevitzky went to Moscow to continue his studies. He practised upon the double-bass, soon acquiring such extraordinary facility that he was appointed soloist in the Imperial Opera orchestra and succeeded his teacher, the celebrated Rambaussev, as professor of the Conservatoire. Then, for ten years, Koussevitzky toured Europe as a virtuoso. He composed a number of works for his instrument, including a concerto, that have been much played. Yet all this time he yearned to become a conductor again.

"In 1907 he formed," Newman says, "out of the pupils of the BerlinwHochschule for Music, an orchestra with which he worked for two years, studying chiefly the classics and Wagner. He returned to Russia in 1909 and organized the Koussevitzky orchestra that soon became famous. The men were engaged by the year and were barred from giving their services to any other organization. For the performance of the choral works given at his Moscow concerts he formed a mixed choir of two hundred and fifty voices: in Petrograd he used for this purpose the celebrated Archangelsky Choir.

Formal Moscow and Petrograd seasons ending at Easter, Koussevitzky in the spring gave Beethoven festivals, Bach festivals, Tschaikovsky festivals, and Rimsky-Korsakoff festivals in the two capital towns. In the summer, for many years, he toured the provinces with his orchestra, taking it and various distinguished soloists into villages that

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
EVE. LEDGER
OCT 4 1924

THE CRITIC T[illegible]

By SAMUEL L. LACIAR
Music Editor Evening Public Ledger

In the visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the general public will not have an opportunity to hear the organization, as it is being brought here by the Philadelphia Forum. If Mr. Koussevitski lives up to his reputation as an enthusiastic sponsor of the moderns, the audience will doubtless hear a most unique concert. He is starting his Boston season with Honegger's "Pacific 231," a glorification of the modern locomotive, a tone poem lasting about six minutes. However, one can cover a lot of ground in six minutes, either with an orchestra or a locomotive.

had not only never heard an orchestra before, but had not even seen certain of the instruments; his annual voyages down the Volga with this company of musicians were among the most romantic events of the musical life of our time. In this way he introduced a number of classical and modern works to thousands who would otherwise never have heard a bar of them. Appointed director of Russian state orchestras after the Revolution of 1917, Koussevitsky remained at home until 1920. His famous Paris concerts were begun the next year and have been continued up till now.

* * *

So much for a biographical outline of the man's career. What of the inner career, the developing processes that have have gone on in his brain? One of Koussevitzky's main objects in life, according to Newman, has been to "break away from routine." He was the first conductor, we hear, to make a popular success of Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy," and gave the Russian people a vast amount of new music—works by Florent Schmidt. Dukas, Debussy, Bruckner, Mahler, Scriabin, Stravinsky, Ducasse, Prokafieff and others. He carried on the same policy when visiting England, where he is exceedingly well liked. In Spain, too, Koussevitzky conducted Russian operas by Rimsgy-Korsakoff, Tchaikovsky, Moussorgsky and Borodin. But this is not all that Koussevitzky has done. With his wife, he established the publishing house of "L'Edition Russe de Musique" with the aim of helping young Russian composers.

It all sounds promising, and one thing Koussevitzky can bank on in coming to America is a cordial reception. And since he has done so much for young composers in Europe, he may also find it in his way to do something for composers in America. If he does, what a power he will become! Here's hoping.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE
NEW YORK REVIEW
OCT 4 - 1924

SPALDING WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Violinist Will Play Five Times with That Band This Season

Albert Spalding has just been reengaged for five more appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the coming season. The first two of these will be at Symphony Hall, Boston, on January 9 and 10, when he will play the new Respighi Gregorian Concerto with Koussevitzky, which created such a sensation in Paris last spring. Then he will follow with two appearances at Carnegie Hall, New York, on March 12 and 14, and at the Academy of Music, Brooklyn on March 13.

Tel. Chelsea 8000

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
ENQUIRER
OCT 4 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY COMING NEXT MONTH

Serge Koussevitzky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who will appear in Buffalo with the Boston Symphony November 13 under local management of Bessie Bellanca, has just arrived in America. The celebrated Russian has been jestingly called the "lightning conductor," not because of his volatile, magnetic personality, but because his engagements are so many and in such widespread area.. The last half year has been extremely busy for Koussevitsky. He spent March and April in London as guest conductor of the London Symphony orchestra, leaving there for Barcelona to conduct the Wagnerian orchestra there. In May he returned to Paris to complete his series of famous "Koussevitzky Concerts," and conduct performances of "Boris Godunov" at the Grand Opera, returning to London to conduct a short opera season before taking his summer vacation.

He founded a Russian musical edition and gave many Russian composers encouragement by publishing their works. It was in 1920 that circumstances took him westward, and immediately he became the central figure of orchestra concerts in Paris and London.

Tickets for the Boston Symphony concert may be obtained from Miss Bellanca at the Colonial Flower Shop, No. 230 Delaware avenue.

THE SUPREME EVENT OF THE YEAR—STATE ARMORY, SCHENECTADY, MONDAY, NOV. 10—BEN FRANKLIN PRESENTS

BOSTON SYMPHONY 105 Artists and SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY Conductor

Orders for tickets for this concert will be accepted at once, and will be filled in the sequence of receipt. If order is accompanied with remittance, tickets will be mailed, otherwise the tickets will be just as carefully selected and held at the box office until called for.

Send all orders to Ben Franklin, in care Cluett & Sons, Schenectady.

Letters "A" to "O"	$2.75
Letters "P" to "Y"	$2.20
Letters "Z" to "JJ"	$1.65
Entire Balcony	$2.20
General Admission	$1.10

Mus

THE NEW, THE OLD, AS MUSIC PAUSES UPON ITS COURSE

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY'S WAY WITH AUDIENCES

Late-Comers, Interruptions and Programs—The People's Orchestra and Guest Conductors—Malcolm Lang Takes Over the Cecilia—Mr. Samuel and Bach—A "Concert-Course," in New York—Incidents and Opinions

LIKE most conductors Mr. Koussevitzky dislikes applause between the divisions of a Concerto or a Symphony. Taking his courage in his hands, he has persuaded even miscellaneous Parisian audiences to forego these interruptions. Gently but persistently he intends to bring the more docile Bostonians of Symphony Hall to a like state of mind and habit. For the change Mr. Monteux was already paving the way. Toward the end of last season, one or another piece did pass unbroken and undisturbed by too eager plaudits. The more observant, the quicker-witted, had begun to understand and respect the restraining gesture. One obstacle, however, held firm. Mr. Monteux preferred to begin a concert with a Symphony. Willing or unwilling, he must pause after the first movement for the tardy. While he waited for them, they who would clap seized the opportunity, and [illegible] were the lesson of silence was unlearned.

Mr. Koussevitzky takes a different course. He prefers to set a Symphony at the end or in the middle of his program. For beginning he usually chooses an ancient piece that, however divided, passes succinctly and swiftly. He keeps the pauses too brief for any sort of interruption. Only at the end may the belated enter. The middle hour of the concert will also protect his Symphonies and Concertos. All comers have then arrived. None is quite ready to depart. Yet the final piece, unless it is as close-knit and continuous as Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" next week, will open pitfalls. As there are those who have never heard the first act of any opera in the repertory of the Metropolitan, so there are those who have next to never heard the last number on a Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall. Unless Mr. Koussevitzky casts a spell upon them, his pause, however short, will be their signal for departure. Wait he must or have the rustle of skirts and the impact of closing doors added to his tuneful choir. There are observers on the side-lines who look forward to a duel that will be as pretty as it is polite.

[illegible] to regain both.

Programs in Prospect

From the chosen pieces for the first pair of Symphony Concerts next week, Mr. Koussevitzky has dropped Weber's Overture to "Oberon"; the Bacchanal from Wagner's "Tannhäuser" and the music that mourns Siegfried in "Götterdämmerung." Instead, conductor and orchestra will be heard in Berlioz's Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," a romantical showpiece, and Brahms's sedate Variations on a Theme of Haydn.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

ARGONAUT

[illegible] 1924

winning the sympathy of the audience.

* * *

Americans who have been wondering just what to expect from Serge Koussevitzky, who has come over to steer the Boston Symphony's ship, are told by Ernest Newman in the American Mercury that Koussevitzky has a volcanic temperament under marvelous control. To make this point clear, Newman quotes Richard Strauss as saying, apropos "Tristan," that the "brain that could pour out that passionate music must have been cold as ice."

Newman goes on: "What seems like paradox in this, however, is no more than sober truth. The more an artist is on fire, the cooler have to be the head and hand that direct the fire. Koussevitzky has this central ice in an extraordinary degree. I believe it would hardly be possible to raise certain works to a higher pitch of nervous incandescence than he does; but the nervousness never gets out of hand.

Koussevitzky was born, we are told, in Tver, in the northern part of Russia, in 1874. He was leading a theater orchestra in his home town at the age of twelve, keeping at the post for two years. Part of his duties was to compose whatever music might be needed. When he was fourteen Koussevitzky went to Moscow to continue his studies. He practised upon the double-bass, soon acquiring such extraordinary facility that he was appointed soloist in the Imperial Opera orchestra and succeeded his teacher, the celebrated Rambaussev, as professor of the Conservatoire. Then, for ten years, Koussevitzky toured Europe as a virtuoso. He composed a number of works for his instrument, including a concerto, that have been much played. Yet all this time he yearned to become a conductor again.

"In 1907 he formed," Newman says, "out of the pupils of the BerlinwHochschule for Music, an orchestra with which he worked for two years, studying chiefly the classics and Wagner. He returned to Russia in 1909 and organized the Koussevitzky orchestra that soon became famous. The men were engaged by the year and were barred from giving their services to any other organization. For the performance of the choral works given at his Moscow concerts he formed a mixed choir of two hundred and fifty voices: in Petrograd he used for this purpose the celebrated Archangelsky Choir.

Formal Moscow and Petrograd seasons ending at Easter, Koussevitzky in the spring gave Beethoven festivals, Bach festivals, Tschaikovsky festivals, and Rimsky-Korsakoff festivals in the two capital towns. In the summer, for many years, he toured the provinces with his orchestra, taking it and various distinguished soloists into villages that had not only never heard an orchestra before, but had not even seen certain of the instruments; his annual voyages down the Volga with this company of musicians were among the most romantic events of the musical life of our time. In this way he introduced a number of classical and modern works to thousands who would otherwise never have heard a bar of them. Appointed director of Russian state orchestras after the Revolution of 1917, Koussevitsky remained at home until 1920. His famous Paris concerts were begun the next year and have been continued up till now.

* * *

So much for a biographical outline of the man's career. What of the inner career, the developing processes that have have gone on in his brain? One of Koussevitzky's main objects in life, according to Newman, has been to "break away from routine." He was the first conductor, we hear, to make a popular success of Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy," and gave the Russian people a vast amount of new music—works by Florent Schmidt, Dukas, Debussy, Bruckner, Mahler, Scriabin, Stravinsky, Ducasse, Prokafieff and others. He carried on the same policy when visiting England, where he is exceedingly well liked. In Spain, too, Koussevitzky conducted Russian operas by Rimsgy-Korsakoff, Tchaikovsky, Moussorgsky and Borodin. But this is not all that Koussevitzky has done. With his wife, he established the publishing house of "L'Edition Russe de Musique" with the aim of helping young Russian composers.

It all sounds promising, and one thing Koussevitzky can bank on in coming to America is a cordial reception. And since he has done so much for young composers in Europe, he may also find it in his way to do something for composers in America. If he does, what a power he will become! Here's hoping.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

EVE. LEDGER

[illegible] 1924

THE CRITIC T[illegible]

By SAMUEL L. LACIAR

Music Editor Evening Public Ledger

In the visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the general public will not have an opportunity to hear the organization, as it is being brought here by the Philadelphia Forum. If Mr. Koussevitski lives up to his reputation as an enthusiastic sponsor of the moderns, the audience will doubtless hear a most unique concert. He is starting his Boston season with Honegger's "Pacific 231," a glorification of the modern locomotive, a tone poem lasting about six minutes. However, one can cover a lot of ground in six minutes, either with an orchestra or a locomotive.

series Damro with Orches ance Philla has most It h tend Philad

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

NEW YORK REVIEW

[illegible] 1924

SPALDING WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Violinist Will Play Five Times with That Band This Season

Albert Spalding has just been reengaged for five more appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the coming season. The first two of these will be at Symphony Hall, Boston, on January 9 and 10, when he will play the new Respighi Gregorian Concerto with Koussevitzky, which created such a sensation in Paris last spring. Then he will follow with two appearances at Carnegie Hall, New York, on March 12 and 14, and at the Academy of Music, Brooklyn on March 13.

Tel. Chelsea 8000

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BUFFALO, N. Y.

ENQUIRER

[illegible] 14 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY COMING NEXT MONTH

Serge Koussevitzky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who will appear in Buffalo with the Boston Symphony November 13 under local management of Bessie Bellanca, has just arrived in America. The celebrated Russian has been jestingly called the "lightning conductor," not because of his volatile, magnetic personality, but because his engagements are so many and in such widespread area. The last half year has been extremely busy for Koussevitsky. He spent March and April in London as guest conductor of the London Symphony orchestra, leaving there for Barcelona to conduct the Wagnerian orchestra there. In May he returned to Paris to complete his series of famous "Koussevitzky Concerts," and conduct performances of "Boris Godunov" at the Grand Opera, returning to London to conduct a short opera season before taking his summer vacation.

He founded a Russian musical edition and gave many Russian composers encouragement by publishing their works. It was in 1920 that circumstances took him westward, and immediately he became the central figure of orchestra concerts in Paris and London.

Tickets for the Boston Symphony concert may be obtained from Miss Bellanca at the Colonial Flower Shop, No. 230 Delaware avenue.

REDUCTION

RATIO

14x

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

2.0

2.2

2.5

2.8

3.2

3.6

4.0

4.5

5.0

5.6

6.3

7.1

8.0

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

128

Serving the Muse on the Volga-Banks

Drifting Down to Astrakhan with Koussevitzky and His Orchestra —A Barnstorming Jaunt de Luxe

DURING the spring of 1914 it was my good fortune to be the guest of Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on his last memorable concert tour of the Volga. These famous tours, of which he made only three all told, were among the most unique, the most interesting and the most dramatic musical events of our time. My wife and I were the only Americans ever invited by Koussevitzky to make the tour with him, and I was the only journalist among the half dozen invited guests who went down the Volga with him in 1914. I was not invited as a journalist, however, but as a personal friend of Koussevitzky.

Koussevitzky, whom I have known intimately for more than twenty years, is an idealist with very lofty aims, and he visited those remote towns on the Volga in the role of a great musical missionary, preaching the gospel of the beautiful to the inhabitants of all the larger towns on the banks of that majestic river. Possessed as he is of great wealth, the financial outcome of the tour was a matter of indifference to Koussevitzky. Indeed, the commercial idea did not enter into his calculations at all and the trips were undertaken, as a matter of fact, at great pecuniary loss, because of the enormous expenses involved. And this notwithstanding the fact that regular theater prices of admission were charged and eagerly paid by the enthusiastic audiences that crowded the theaters along the route.

Koussevitzky spent fully $100,000 a year out of his own pocket, over and above the income derived from his concerts, in maintaining his orchestra of one hundred men. He paid them high salaries which assured them a good living and they were pledged to give their services to him only. Thus he was enabled to rehearse to his heart's content and to fully impress his own will upon his musicians—an ideal often longed for but seldom attained by other conductors.

Koussevitzky is the only professional musician of our times wealthy enough to maintain a private orchestra of this character. He founded this orchestra in 1909 at Moscow, recruiting it from the best performers obtainable. Its personnel was made up almost exclusively of Russian players. In fact the only foreigner that I recall was the leader of the double-basses, who was a Dane. The concert master, a very able violinist, was from Tiflis. The first flute was brother of Josef Lhevinne, the famous Russian pianist. When I made the tour with Koussevitzky he had been drilling this orchestra for five years and he had already brought it up to a high pitch of proficiency.

Koussevitzky's first experiences as a symphonic conductor had been gained some years before with the Philharmonic Orchestra of Berlin where he resided from 1903 to 1909 and where he gave annually a series of concerts at which he introduced many new Russian works. As a preliminary to the Berlin concerts he had practised for a year with his own private orchestra which he had founded in Berlin, recruited largely from advanced students of the Royal High School.

A special steamer had been chartered by Koussevitzky for the trip which covered 2500 miles, or the entire navigable portion of the Volga. With the one hundred players and their wives, the numerous personnel of the management and the invited guests we numbered about 200 souls on board besides the crew. There were only twelve of us in the first cabin, however, and a merry life we led during the four weeks required to make the trip from Tver to Astrakhan.

When my wife and I arrived in Moscow the middle of April, 1914, Koussevitzky was still busy with his rehearsals putting on the finishing touches for the Volga programmes. We spent two delightful weeks as his guest in his beautiful home on the Smolensky Boulevard. It required thirteen servants to run Koussevitzky's establishment, from which fact an idea may be gained of the sumptuous style in which the Koussevitzkys lived.

Koussevitzky did not cater to the primitive musical understanding of his Volga audiences; on the contrary he served them with rather heavy musical fare. The programs varied and included Beethoven's Eroica and Seventh Symphonies, his E-Flat and G Major piano concertos with Edouard Risler of Paris as soloist; Liszt's Symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," Rachmaninov's Second Symphony, Rimsky-Korsikov's "Easter Festival" Overture, Weber's Invitation to the Dance, Skryabin's Second Symphony, Chaikovsky's Fifth and numerous smaller work.

I was deeply interested in observing the effect that such music, magnificently played, made on those audiences. Although musically uncultured they were very intelligent and highly receptive. They displayed an instinctive feeling for the lofty and the beautiful and reacted to Koussevitzky's spirited readings as a high strung horse does to a master hand at the bridle. The enthusiasm was genuine and spontaneous and the auditors listened with rapt attention. It was like watching the face of an unspoiled child while listening to a beautiful fairy tale and, indeed, to those Russians on the remote Volga this was a veritable fairyland of beauty that Koussevitzky revealed to them. Before his advent they had never heard a symphony orchestra and had never even seen many of the instruments. At Saratow a deputation of the citizens called on Koussevitzky at his hotel and requested that he place the harps at the front of the stage at the concert in order that the people could see and admire those beautiful golden instruments.

...roslav, Kostroma, Nizhni Novgorod, ..., Samara, Saratov and Astrakhan ...concerts each were given. Thus we ...a three-days' stay at all of the more ...rtant cities, which afforded us plenty ...me for sightseeing. The life along that ...tic stream was very picturesque and ...rl. Jaroslav, with its many beautiful ...a and cathedrals with their multi... domes and strange architecture, ...e a scene from the Arabian Nights. ...roma, a town of 45,000 inhabitants, ...e first Romanoff was crowned more ...ree hundred years ago, we saw a ...o Glinka, the father of modern ...music. During our stay in Moscow ...ded the opera nightly with the ...skis and one of the many Rus... we heard was Glinka's romantic ..."Life for the Czar." Nishni Nov... ...brated for its great annual fairs, ...o be a very quaint and interest...

...he ancient city of the Tartars, ...many Oriental touches. We ...ld tower built by the Tartars ... thousand years ago. Samara ... of the great Siberian Rail... much more modern town than ...th great avenues and parks. ...bridge across the Volga at ...emarkable structure. From ...e Volga averages two miles ...metimes it broadens out to ...ratov, with 150,000 inhabi... ...st of all the Volga cities. ... it is a modern town and ...gs to the Middle Ages. ... the Volga empties into ... has a population of 125,000, and is the center of the great fish and caviar trade of the Volga and the Caspian Sea. We found a very mixed population there, including many Persians.

There were no concert halls anywhere along the route, the theaters being the only available auditoriums. But I was astonished at the size and elegance of some of these theaters, which seated from two thousand to three thousand people and were well appointed in every respect.

A few hundred miles north of Astrakhan we visited a tribe of Kalmucks, a wild nomadic people living in tents something after the manner of our Indians. Strange to say these half-savage people were worshippers of Buddha and carried a Buddhist Temple about with them on their wanderings over the trackless steppes. When the tribe saw the big steamer approaching their shore they thought that the Czar had come to make them a visit and they turned out in full force to welcome us. The men proved to be very friendly and I took some interesting snapshots of them, but the women were very shy and would not be photographed, believing that the camera was an instrument of the devil.

Koussevitzky, aside from possessing great natural gifts as a musician, has enjoyed the unique advantage of having been able to develop along original lines, following his own ideals only, without being hampered by the necessity of catering to anyone. His conducting is very original, always interesting, and extremely fascinating.

He has never followed beaten paths but has been inclined rather to break away from tradition. Arthur Nikisch was his ideal and he profited greatly from Nikisch's example during the years he resided in Berlin. Koussevitzky cannot be called a "second Nikisch" however. He is not "second" to anyone. He is a "first." He has blazed out a trail of his own and his reading of the classics as well as of the moderns is highly original in conception and delivery. His technical command is complete and he possesses a volcanic temperament but it is always kept within bounds. Although his interpretations are highly subject they are always under objective control. He feels the composer's message with great intensity and he has a wonderful capacity for presenting his listeners with a vivid picture, perfect in every detail, of his own illumined inner image of the score.

Koussevitzsky has a wonderful feeling for dynamics, for light and shade, for strong contrasts. His ideas of tempi in reading the classics are often at variance with the traditional ideas, but his unerring musical instincts always keep him within reasonable artistic limits. With all of his originality Koussevitzsky is never bizarre or freakish. His strong magnetic personality immediately establishes a contact with the orchestra and with his audience. Added to all of these remarkable attributes is his stage presence of great charm.

Koussevitzsky first became famous not as a conductor but as a virtuoso on the contra-bass. The story of how he came to be a devotee of this unwieldy instrument has never yet been told in America. When he applied for admission to the Moscow Conservatory at the age of fourteen he asked for a scholarship as he was too poor to pay tuition. The only scholarship available at that time was for the double-bass, so he took up the study of this instrument not from choice but from necessity in order to get into the conservatory.

Under the instruction of the celebrated Rambassec his interest was thoroughly aroused and he soon saw the possibilities of exploiting the bass as a solo instrument, such as had not been attempted since the days of Dragonetti, more than a century ago. For Koussevitzsky plays the regulation four-string bass, tuned to fourths, whereas Botessini, who attained world-wide fame as a soloist during the middle of the last century, played a small size three-string bass which he tuned to fifths like the 'cello. Koussevitzsky became so proficient on this instrument that he was appointed leader of the double-basses in the orchestra of the Moscow Imperial Opera, a magnificent body of musicians.

While he was playing in the Moscow Orchestra a romantic love affair and marriage suddenly lifted him into a position of great affluence. Among the regular box holders at the Opera was the multi-millionaire M. Ouschkoff, one of the richest men in Russia. His charming young daughter Natalia, an ardent music lover, was a frequent occupant of her father's box and she fell in love with the handsome double-bass player in the orchestra. She contrived to meet him and the love affair which followed finally culminated in marriage and Koussevitzky became the wealthiest professional musician in the world, for Madame Koussevitzky recognized her husband's genius and she placed the great wealth which her father had settled upon her at Koussevitzky's disposal for the furtherance of his artistic aims.

For some years after his marriage Koussevitzky toured Europe as a virtuoso. It was in this capacity that I first heard him and met him in Berlin more than twenty years ago. Koussevitzky, who is now fifty years old, was then in his late twenties. I heard him many times as a soloist on the bass and I shall never forget the impression of his brilliant, fiery playing. He drew a tone of remarkable sweetness and purity from his ponderous instrument and he possessed an astonishing technical facility, running up and down the huge fingerboard with the ease, accuracy and elegance that Casals displays on the 'cello.

At that period Koussevitzky wrote numerous compositions for the bass, among them being a concerto which I heard him play at one of his Berlin concerts. Those concerts were very much in vogue twenty years ago. The distinguished Russian frequently had the assistance of Henri Cassadessu, the famous viola d'amour of Paris, and the charming old 17th and 18th Century duets for viola d'amour and double-bass which they played together created a veritable furore. Koussevitzky's appearances, whom he frequently joined, attracted capacity audiences.

I once traveled from Berlin to Leipzig to hear him as soloist with the world famous Gewandhaus Orchestra under Arthur Nikisch. On that occasion he played two of his own transcriptions for double-bass, Mozart's Concerto for Bassoon and Max Bruch's Kol Nidrei. Koussevitzky played magnificiently and the staid and conservative audience gave him royal welcome.

No other professional musician of our times has done so much to foster promising young musical talents as Koussevitzky. During the six years he lived in Berlin, from 1903 to 1909, I was intimately associated with him and to my personal knowledge he was then supporting and financing a large number of young composers and music students, mostly his own country people. Koussevitzky also gave half a million rubles ($250,000) for the establishment of a publishing house in Moscow which became internationally known as the "L'Edition Musse de Musique," which was founded for the purpose of publishing the works of and furthering the interests of talented young Russian composers. Though he has been less than a month in Boston, he is already seeking out the younger Americans.

ARTHUR M. ABELL

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Trans. Sat. Oct. 4

Koussevitzky

IN the usual place, Symphony Hall; at the usual hours, 2.30 and 8.15; under the usual circumstances, except one, the Symphony Concerts begin anew next Friday and Saturday. There is scarcely a change in the personnel of the orchestra; while the two audiences remain their familiar selves. To all three, however, a new conductor comes, Serge Koussevitzky, the acclaimed Russian of eastern and western Europe, hitherto known only by report in America. His presence glamours him. He is spur to his orchestra. Upon whatever music he chooses, he sets his individual stamp. Few are the listeners that have heard him unstirred. With reason, on the stage and in the auditorium, the pulse of these first concerts will beat high. Mr. Koussevitzky seeks out the ancients, animates the classic composers; warns anew the romantics; gives ear and voice to the moderns and the ultra-moderns. His program for next week is witness to this range.

Concerto for Orchestra.....Vivaldi
Overture to the Opera, "Benvenuto Cellini".....Berlioz
Variations on a Theme by Haydn (Choral St. Antoni).....Brahms
Symphonic Movement, "Pacific 231"..Honegger
(First times in America)
Poem of Ecstasy.....Skriabin

SERVING THE MUSE

Continued from Page Six

220 WEST 19TH ST., NEW YORK
Tel. Chelsea 8860
THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Post
OCT 4 1924

New York Symphony Opens Worcester Festival Monday

The New York Symphony Orchestra makes its bow this season on Monday at the Worcester Music Festival, when Rene Pollain will direct Franck's symphony in D minor, Dvorak's symphony "From the New World," Bizerne's Suite No. 1 from the ballet "Cydalise," Rabaud's "La Procession Nocturne," Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries," Bizet's overture "Patrie," Liadow's "Danse of the Mosquito," Ropartz's "Serenade" for strings, Massenet's "Under the Trees," and Dubois' "Xavier, Rigandou." Henry Hadley will conduct his own tone poem "Ocean," a new work, "Resurga," and the Brahms's "Requiem."

Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, Boston, Serge Koussevitzky, the new Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be heard for the first time in America at the opening of the symphony season there.

OF THE NEW SEASON

Roland Hayes Sings in Symphony Hall Tomorrow

Tomorrow afternoon, in Symphony Hall, at 3:30, Roland Hayes, the great negro tenor, will give a recital. This program will include: Mozart's "Concert Aria," Schubert's "To the Lyre," Schumann's "The Spirit's Presence," Hugo Wolf's "Reflections," Griffes's "In a Myrtle Shade," Whelpley's "I Know a Hill," Storey-Smith's "A Caravan from China Comes," and the following negro spirituals, "I've Got a Home in That Rock," "Poor Sinner's Found a Home at Last," "Ride On, Jesus."

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The season of the Symphony orchestra will open in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening (Oct. 10 and 11) when Serge Koussevitzky, the new Russian conductor of the orchestra, will be first heard in America. Mr. Koussevitzky's opening program consists of: Vivaldi's Concerto in D minor; Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival," Brahm's Variations on a Theme by Haydn; Honegger's "Pacific 231" (a description of an American locomotive), which is to be heard for the first time in America; and Scriabin's "Le Poeme de l'extase.

The program for the second pair of concerts, the following week, will include: Handel's Concerto Grosso in D minor; Debussy's "Danse" (orch. by M. Ravel); de Falla's "El Amor Brujo"

BUFFALO, N. Y. COMMERCIAL
OCT 4 1924

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY COMES SOON WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Serge Koussevitzky, now conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who will appear in Buffalo with the Boston Symphony November 13 under local management of Bessie Bellanca, has just arrived in America.

The celebrated Russian has been jestingly called the "lightning conductor," not because of his volatile, magnetic personality but because his engagements are so many and in such widespread area. The last half year has been extremely busy for Koussevitzky. He spent March and April in London as guest conductor of the London Symphony orchestra, leaving there for Barcelona to conduct the Wagnerian Orchestra in that city. In May he returned to Paris to complete his series of famous Koussevizky Concerts and conduct performances of Boris Godunov at the Grand Opera, returning to London to conduct a short opera season before taking his summer vacation.

Sketch of Career

Koussevitzky was born at Tver in northern Russia in 1874. At 12 he conducted the orchestra of the town theatre. He graduated from Moscow Conservatory and for a considerable period was known as a double bass virtuoso and said to be the finest performer on that instrument in Europe. Koussevitzky's most prominent achievement in Russia was the organization of his orchestra which he evolved, subsidized and conducted in Moscow. With this splendid organization he gave concerts in Moscow and and Petrograd travelled all over Russia. He founded a Russian musical edition and gave many Russian composers encouragement by publishing their works. It was in 1920 that circumstance took him westward, and immediately he became the central figure of orchestral concerts in Paris and London.

Koussevitzky, while refusing to be labeled a modernist in any exclusive sense, nevertheless has a keen interest in the new music.

"I understand that America is very fond of modern music," he said recently, "and I am going to introduce to the American public some Russian compositions which I consider interesting. German music is 'in decadence' now. I don't believe we will get much worth while from Germany in the next few years. The new music will come from Spain, from Russia and from France. In Russia there has been a lot of music written quite unknown to the rest of the world till 1916 when the bolshevik regime spoiled every intellectual production."

The bolsheviki wanted to make Koussevitzny musical commissary in 1916 but he refused, realizing that the duties of the position which involved full control of all things musical in Russia, would interfere too much with his work as conductor of the Moscow orchestra. Chaliapin, famous operatic bass, later accepted the post.

Tickets for the Boston Symphony concert may be obtained from Miss Bellanca at the Colonial Flower shop, 230 Delaware avenue.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A5

A4

A3

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

2.5

2.2

2.0

3.2

3.6

4.0

4.5

5.0

5.6

6.3

7.1

8.0

9.0

10.0

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

OCTOBER 5, 19

DAWES

Symphony Head — (Upper right) Serge Koussevitzky, new Russian leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as he looks as a new-fledged Bostonian, in front of his Jamaica Plain home. (Insert) The catching Koussevitzky smile. (Both photos by A. F. Donnell, Sunday Post staff.)

סערגעי
קוסעוויצקי,
א רוסישער מוזיקער,
איז אנגעשטעלט געוואָרען צו דיריגירען
דעם באריהמטען באסטאָן סימפאני אר-
קעסטער דיעזען סיזאָן.

SERGI KOUSEVITZKY,
noted Russian musician,
has been engaged to conduct the Boston
Symphony Orchestra this season.
(Underwood)

Post
Sun.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD
OCT 5 1924

Koussevitzky's Debut In Boston This Week.

Serge Koussevitzky, the new Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be heard for the first time in America this week when he opens the symphony season in Boston on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. His opening program will be as follows:

Concerto for Orchestra with Organ in D Minor.....Vivaldi
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Bacchanale from "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Funeral music of Siegfried from "Gotterdammerung".....Wagner
"Pacific 231".....Honegger
"Le Poeme de l'Extase".....Scriabin

The following program is announced for the second pair of Boston concerts:

Concerto Grosso in D Minor, Op. 6...Handel
"Danse" (Orch. by M. Ravel).....Debussy
"El Amor Brujo" ("Love Magic") De Falla
Symphony No. 5 in C Minor.....Beethoven

The Boston Symphony season in New York will open on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 27 and 29, in Carnegie Hall.

NEW YORK
WORLD
OCT 5 1924

Albert Spalding has just been re-engaged for five more appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the coming season. The first two of these will be at Symphony Hall, Boston, on Jan. 9 and 10, when he will play the new Respighi Gregorian Concerto with Koussevitzky which created such a sensation in Paris last spring. Then he will follow with two appearances at Carnegie Hall, New York, on March 12 and 14, and at the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, on March 13.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
EXAMINER
OCT 5 1924

The concert is under ... of Alice Seckels.

American Music

Serge Koussevitzky, who will conduct the Boston Symphony this coming season, hopes to "ferrett out" new music by unknown American composers, according to Allen Raymond, Paris correspondent of the North American Newspaper Alliance. "In the Old World," says Mr. Raymond, "Koussevitzky is known as a hunter for musical talent and a patron of young composers. He believes there is genius in America." Mr. Raymond quotes Koussevitzky as saying: "What I hope to do in America is to show the public that masterpieces of music are being written today as powerful, stirring and beautiful as the greatest of the past. I will present in Boston music never heard before, music which now exists only in manuscripts which I have in my keeping, music written by men now living who will rank as high a century from now as Mozart or Beethoven. I have given some of their music to Paris. Some of it shall be America's first. I like all good music and several musicians have written jazz which is truly good."

5, 1924

MUSIC

Music Notes and Comment

Koussevitzky obviously from his choice of program means to prove to his first Boston audiences that he is a dramatic, a dynamic conductor. Instead of beginning with Beethoven he offers the C minor Symphony only at the second pair of concerts, and offers at the first concert a vivid assortment. Neither reviewers nor public should make up their minds about Koussevitzky on the basis of the first few concerts. He may not do himself justice under the stress of the most important debut of his career. It should not be overlooked that the conductorship of the Boston Symphony is the most important position he has yet essayed to fill. Or he may surpass himself at the first few concerts and dazzle the audience, only to slump later. One ought to keep an open mind, listen to his conducting for one's self, whether or not one intends to talk or write about it afterward, and then form an independent opinion. Snap judgments and casual chatter, whether favorable or unfavorable to Koussevitzky, will be unfair to the importance of the orchestra in the musical life of this community. The best thing yet come to hand about his conducting is that Ernest Newman admires it. The opinions of this critic are deservedly widely respected.

Honegger's "Pacific 231," the new piece at this week's Symphony concert, was first performed in Paris last season, where it made a sensation. The title refers not to the ocean but to a locomotive of the Pacific type imagined as making a run on a French Railway. The composer is by origin a Swiss. He was a member of the much discussed "Group of Six" as five young Parisian musicians dubbed themselves some years ago. His "Horace Victorious," played here two years ago, is one of the very few works actually hissed by the Friday Symphony audience. That is, a few people hissed, a rather greater number applauded loudly, and the vast majority sat in what looked a rather pained silence at the close of the first American performance. His music is harshly dissonant, but by no means formless.

NEW YORK
TIMES
OCT 5 1924

First Orchestra Pr...

the composer.

Mr. Kussevitzky is beginning his term with the Boston Symphony in its home ...art town this week, playing music of ...ext Vivaldi, Weber and Wagner, Honegger's ...er S "Pacific 231" and Scriabin's "Poem of ...nden Ecstasy."

Sunday night classical concerts at the ...Fift ...idat...

From OCT 5-1924
STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn, N. Y.

Serge Koussevitzky, who will make his debut as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the opening of the season in Boston next Friday. (Garo.)

HERALD
OCT 5 1924

Koussevitzky Opens His Boston Season This Week

Serge Koussevitzky, the new Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make his American debut this week when he opens the orchestra's Boston season at Symphony Hall, on Friday afternoon and Saturday night, with Vivaldi's D minor concerto for orchestra with organ, edited by S. Siloti; Weber's "Oberon" overture, the "Tannhäuser" Bacchanale and "Götterdämmerung" funeral music, Honegger's "Pacific 231" and Scriabin's "Poème de l'extase.

For the second pair of Boston concerts Mr. Koussevitzky will give Handel's concerto Grosso in D minor, Op. 6; Debussy's "Danse," orchestrated by Ravel; De Falla's "El Amor Brujo" and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

OCTOBER 5, 192

DAWES

Symphony Head — (Upper right) Serge Koussevitzky, new Russian leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as he looks as a newfledged Bostonian, in front of his Jamaica Plain home. (Insert) The catching Koussevitzky smile. (Both photos by A. F. Donnell, Sunday Post staff.)

SERGI KOUSEVITZKY, noted Russian musician, has been engaged to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season. (Underwood)

סערגעי קוסעוויצקי, א רוסישער מוזיקער, איז אנגעשטעלט געוואָרען צו דיריגירען דעם באריהמטען באסטאָן סימפאָני אָרקעסטער דיעזען סיזאָן.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
WORLD
OCT 5 1924

Koussevitzky's Debut In Boston This Week.

Serge Koussevitzky, the new Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be heard for the first time in America this week when he opens the symphony season in Boston on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. His opening program will be as follows:

Concerto for Orchestra with Organ in D Minor.....Vivaldi
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Bacchanale from "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Funeral music of Siegfried from "Gotterdammerung".....Wagner
"Pacific 231".....Honegger
"Le Poeme de l'Extase".....Scriabin

The following program is announced for the second pair of Boston concerts:

Concerto Grosso in D Minor, Op. 6...Handel
"Danse" (Orch. by M. Ravel).....Debussy
"El Amor Brujo" ("Love Magic") De Falla
Symphony No. 5 in C Minor.....Beethoven

The Boston Symphony season in New York will open on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, Nov. 27 and 29, in Carnegie Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
EXAMINER
OCT 5 1924

The concert is under ... of Alice Seckels.

American Music

Serge Koussevitzky, who will conduct the Boston Symphony this coming season, hopes to "ferrett out" new music by unknown American composers, according to Allen Raymond, Paris correspondent of the North American Newspaper Alliance. "In the Old World," says Mr. Raymond, "Koussevitzky is known as a hunter for musical talent and a patron of young composers. He believes there is genius in America." Mr. Raymond quotes Koussevitzky as saying: "What I hope to do in America is to show the public that masterpieces of music are being written today as powerful, stirring and beautiful as the greatest of the past. I will present in Boston music never heard before, music which now exists only in manuscripts which I have in my keeping, music written by men now living who will rank as high a century from now as Mozart or Beethoven. I have given some of their music to Paris. Some of it shall be America's first. I like all good music and several musicians have written jazz which is truly good."

NEW YORK
WORLD
OCT 5 1924

Albert Spalding has just been reengaged for five more appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the coming season. The first two of these will be at Symphony Hall, Boston, on Jan. 9 and 10, when he will play the new Respighi Gregorian Concerto with Koussevitzky which created such a sensation in Paris last spring. Then he will follow with two appearances at Carnegie Hall, New York, on March 12 and 14, and at the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, on March 13.

5. 1924

MUSIC

Music Notes and Comment

Koussevitzky obviously from his choice of program means to prove to his first Boston audiences that he is a dramatic, a dynamic conductor. Instead of beginning with Beethoven he offers the C minor Symphony only at the second pair of concerts, and offers at the first concert a vivid assortment. Neither reviewers nor public should make up their minds about Koussevitzky on the basis of the first few concerts. He may not do himself justice at the stress of the most important debut of his career. It should not be overlooked that the conductorship of the Boston Symphony is the most important position he has yet essayed to fill. Or he may surpass himself at the first few concerts and dazzle the audience, only to slump later. One ought to keep an open mind, listen to his conducting for one's self, whether or not one intends to talk or write about it afterward, and then form an independent opinion. Snap judgments and casual chatter, whether favorable or unfavorable to Koussevitzky, will be unfair to the importance of the orchestra in the musical life of this community. The best thing yet come to hand about his conducting is that Ernest Newman admires it. The opinions of this critic are deservedly widely respected.

Honegger's "Pacific 231," the new piece at this week's Symphony concert, was first performed in Paris last season, where it made a sensation. The title refers not to the ocean but to a locomotive of the Pacific type imagined as making a run on a French Railway. The composer is by origin a Swiss. He was a member of the much discussed "Group of Six" as five young Parisian musicians dubbed themselves some years ago. His "Horace Victorieux," played here two years ago, is one of the very few works actually heard by the Friday Symphony audience. That is, a few in the audience heard it, a rather greater number applauded loudly, and the vast majority sat in what looked a rather pained silence at the close of the first American performance. His music is harshly dissonant, but by no means tuneless.

NEW YORK
TIMES
OCT 5 1924

First Orchestra Pr

the composer.

Mr. Koussevitzky is beginning his term with the Boston Symphony in its home town this week, playing music of Vivaldi, Weber and Wagner, Honegger's "Pacific 231" and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy."

Sunday night classical concerts at the ... Fift ...idat...

From
STANDARD UNION
Brooklyn N. Y.

Serge Koussevitzky, who will make his debut as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the opening of the season in Boston next Friday. (Garo.)

HERALD
OCT 5 1924

Koussevitzky Opens His Boston Season This Week

Serge Koussevitzky, the new Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will make his American debut this week when he opens the orchestra's Boston season at Symphony Hall, on Friday afternoon and Saturday night, with Vivaldi's D minor concerto for orchestra with organ, edited by S. Siloti; Weber's "Oberon" overture, the "Tannhäuser" Bacchanale and "Götterdämmerung" funeral music, Honegger's "Pacific 231" and Scriabin's "Poème de l'extase.

For the second pair of Boston concerts Mr. Koussevitzky will give Handel's concerto Grosso in D minor, Op. 6; Debussy's "Danse," orchestrated by Ravel; De Falla's "El Amor Brujo" and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

130

MPHONY TO OPEN SEASON

rty-Fourth Year for Orchestra Begins Friday

Oct

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 10 and 11, the Boston Symphony orchestra will open its 44th season in Symphony hall. This pair of concerts will constitute the first appearance in America of Serge Koussevitzky, the new Russian conductor of the orchestra. The program, as changed, will include: Vivaldi, Concerto for orchestra with organ in D minor (edited by S. Siloti); Berlioz, Overture, "The Roman Carnival"; Brahms, Variations on a Theme by Haydn; Honegger, "Pacific 231"; Scriabin, "Le Poem de l'extase." The piece by the daring Parisian composer characterizes a three-ton locomotive in action.

The program for the second pair of concerts, next week, will include: Handel, Concerto Grosso in D minor; Debussy, "Danse" (orchestration by M. Ravel); De Falla, "El Amor Brujo" ("Love Magic"); Beethoven, Symphony No. 5 in C minor.

and "Aida." The Pavley Oukrainsky Ballet will assist.

SYMPHONY SEASON OPENS THIS WEEK

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday night come the first Symphony concerts of the season. Serge Koussevitsky will make his American debut with the following program: Vivaldi's concerto in D minor; Berlioz' "Roman Carnival," overture; Brahms' "Variations on a Theme by Haydn;" Honegger's "Pacafic 231" and Scriabin's "Le Poeme de l'Extase."

HAYES PROGRAM

This afternoon, in Symphony Hall, Roland Hayes, the foremost negro tenor, will sing the following program:

Mozart ....."Per pieta, non ricercate"
Schubert .....To the Lyre
Schumann .....The Spirit's Presence
Hugo Wolf .....Reflections
Griffes .....In a Myrtle Shade
Whelpley ....."I Know a Hill"
Storey-Smith—
"A Caravan from China Comes"
Negro Spiritual—
"I've Got a Home in That Rock"
Negro Spiritual—
"Poor Sinner's Found a Home at Last"
Negro Spiritual....."Ride on Jesus"

McCORMACK CONCERTS

The concert to be given by John McCormack, in Symphony Hall on Sunday, Oct. 19, is sold out, and an additional concert is announced with a different program, for Tuesday evening, Oct. 21.

SCHUMANN-HEINK

Ernestine Schumann-Heink, contralto, will give a recital in Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon.

In her operatic career she was unequalled as a Wagnerian contralto. On the concert stage she is one of the most popular singers.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
~~TEL~~
OCT 7 1924

WHO'S WHO In the Day's News

BY SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY.

"What I hope to do in America is to show the public that masterpieces of music are being written today as powerful, stirring and beautiful as the greatest of the past," says Serge Koussevitzky, the only great living orchestra conductor America has not heard. He recently arrived in this country to conduct for a season.

The conductor has had a brilliant career. He was born in Tver, in the northern part of Russia, in 1874. His first musical instruction was given him in his home. His progress was so precocious that at the age of 12 he became conductor, for two years, in the theater of his native town. He had not only to conduct, but to compose music for the dramas performed in the theater.

At 14 Koussevitzky entered the Moscow conservatory. There he became a pupil on the double bass of Rambaussec and developed such virtuosity on this clumsy instrument that he succeeded his professor as teacher of it at the conservatoire and later became the most famous double bass virtuoso in the world.

All along, however, he had ambitions to become a conductor. In 1907 he formed an orchestra from the pupils of the Hochschule in Berlin, with which he worked two years, studying chiefly the classics and Wagner. Returning to Russia in 1909, he organized the Kossevitzky orchestra, which soon became famous, and also gave performances at his Moscow concerts with a chorus of 250 voices. In the summer for many years he toured the provinces with his orchestra and inaugurated the series of famous tours of the ports of the Volga. For these tours he engaged a special ship with a platfom at the back and sailed from port to port, introducing in many places that never had heard an orchestra the work of great masters.

At the time of the Russian Kerensky revolution of 1917 Koussevitzky was appointed general conductor of the Russian State orchestra, this orchestra having been formerly the court orchestra of the czar. With the Bolshevist uprising, he was forced to fly to Paris. Since then he has been very active as a great conductor in London and English provinces, in Scotland and in Paris, where in the last five seasons the Koussevitzky concerts at the opera have become more and more the musical "rage."

Koussevitzky has been much discussed in Europe for his interpretation of the classics, as well as his virtuoso reading of modern music.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST
OCT 8 1924

MUSIC

Koussevitzky to Begin Directing Boston Symphony Orchestra This Week

I UNDERSTAND that Koussevitzky gives his first concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a day or two. It will be interesting to see how the Bostonians and later the New Yorkers take to him. He will have, I suppose, his fanatical admirers and his irreconcilable detractors; but I am sure that with the main body of sensible American music lovers he will quickly make good.

One little misunderstanding with regard to him had better be got rid of at once. In a recent very able article on conductors in an American magazine I read something to this effect (I cannot remember the exact phrasing of the earlier part of the sentence)—that in getting Koussevitzky to succeed Monteux Boston had exchanged a serious artist for a prima donna conductor. I do not think that sentence could have been written by any one who ever heard of Koussevitzky.

We all know what the prima donna in general is. She is a lady with one or two striking qualities that blind the uncritical mass to her many obvious defects. She has many faults, but even her worst enemies have never accused her of being particularly intelligent or particularly musical; her knowledge of the art is limited, her repertory consists of a few stale works and her apparatus of a few old stunts. Here and there a prima donna escapes this classification; but this, roughly, is what the world of music means when it uses "prima donna" as a term of reproach.

In no sense whatever does the term apply to Koussevitzky. He is a musician of the first order. He is interested in every period and every phase of music. The prima donna would go on to doomsday with her "Caro nome" and "Una voce," and "Ah, fors e lui": Koussevitzky's repertory is a large one, and he is always adding to it not only from the present but from neglected works of the past. And the comparison finally breaks down on the most important point of all. The prima donna is not in the least interested in music, but only in herself and the effect she can make on the audience. Koussevitzky, for all his individuality, has never once given me the impression of doing anything for effect. We may differ from this or that reading of his of a familiar work; but on reflection we have to admit that nothing has been imposed upon the music from the outside, but that Koussevitzky has simply passed it through his own intellect and his own temperament as an actor does with his part.

In trying to remove what seems to be a slight initial prejudice against Koussevitzky I must guard myself against seeming to attempt to arouse an initial prepossession in his favor. He will be in New York soon, and music lovers here will be able to judge him for themselves. And though I personally would rank him among the three or four greatest living conductors, I have no desire to force my opinion in advance upon a public that has not yet heard him. There will be opportunity enough to discuss his readings in detail after his New York concerts, when musicians can judge the critic as well as the conductor.

ERNEST NEWMAN.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN
OCT 5 1924

Boston Symphony Plans Usual Brooklyn Concerts

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will give the usual series of five Friday evening concerts at the Academy of Music on the following dates: Nov. 28, Jan. 2, Jan. 30, March 13 and April 10. This will be the forty-fourth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

With the personnel exactly the same as that of last year, the interest in the present season of the orchestra centers in the new Russian conductor. Koussevitsky will make his American debut when he opens the season in Symphony Hall, Boston, next Friday afternoon, Oct. 10. His program for this occasion will include: Concerto for orchestra, with organ, in D minor (Ed. by S. Siloti), (Vivalda; overture to "Oberon" (Weber); Bacchanale from "Tannhauser" (Wagner); funeral music of Siegfried, from "Gotterdammerung" (Wagner); "Pacific 231" (Honegger), and "Le Peome de l'extase" (Scriabin).

Mr. Koussevitzky's programs for the Brooklyn season will include several new scores.

NEW YORK
N. Y.
JOURNAL
ISSUE OF
OCT 6 1924

DAMROSCH TO INTRODUCE NOVELTY

Will Play Debussy's "L'isle joyeuse"—Koussevitzky's First Programmes

The sort of programmes that may be expected from Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Carnegie Hall this season, are inferable from those he has planned for the opening concerts in Boston this week.

The first of these consists of Vivaldi's concerto for orchestra in D minor, Weber's overture to "Oberon," the bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser" and the funeral music from "Goetterdaemerung." Arthur Honegger's "Pacific 231," and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy." The second programme lists the concerto grosso of Handel in D minor, Debussy's "Danse," "Love Magic" by de Falla, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

Four composers are to appear as

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION
OCT 9 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The interest aroused over the announcement that the famous Boston Symphony of 105 instrumentalists, under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, is to appear at the State Armory, Schenectady, Monday evening, November 10, is shown by the demand for seats. A concert of the great Boston organization can be considered of greatest importance at any time, and when that event introduces a new conductor, whose fame in Europe is pronounced, the interest is greatly accentuated, and an event of special pleasure, enjoyment and interest can be anticipated. The demand for seats for the coming occasion shows that Schenectady musical enthusiasts are fully alive to the importance of the event, one recognized as the supreme musical treat of the season. In the appearance of Mr. Koussevitzky a conductor full of interest in his work, of great ability and with a fine personality, will be seen. He will give a program full of interest, and interpreted perfectly. The demand for seats has begun with a rush, and all orders by mail or phone should be sent to Ben Franklin in care of Cluett and Sons, Schenectady, where he will give them his personal attention.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 9, 1

NOTES and LINES

By PHILIP HALE

Mr. Koussevitzky will make his first appearance in the United States as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra tomorrow afternoon. The revised program is better balanced than the one that was first announced. The concerto by Vivaldi, the Venetian, will be played as arranged by Alexander Siloti. This will be the first performance, we believe, in this country. Vivaldi is known here by his violin concertos. Mr. Ysaye played one at a Symphony concert a dozen years ago. The "St. Anthony" Variations of Brahms are familiar; the reactionaries in the audience will be pleased, and so they may have the patience, or courage, to listen to the music by Honegger and Scriabin that comes later. It is a pleasure to see the name of Berlioz ("Roman Carnival") on the first program.

Honegger's "Pacific 231" is a musical glorification of a locomotive engine, a giant rejoicing in its strength. "231" refers to its classification and number of wheels. Mr. Koussevitzky produced the piece in Paris last May. There was a second performance in his series, and one later at the Prague festival.

Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy," which belongs to his theosophic period, is more or less familiar.

THE YOUNG LOTTA

SCHENECTADY
N. Y.
GAZETTE
OCT 9 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of 105 instrumentalists will appear in the state armory Monday night, November 10, at 8:30 o'clock, under the management of Ben Franklin. It will be the first opportunity to welcome the new conductor of the organization, Serge Koussevitzky, who begins his engagement this season. Much has been said of his ability and much is known of his standing among the conductors of Europe. The Boston Symphony stands high among the orchestral bodies of the world. Mail and telephone orders for seats sent to Mr. Franklin, in care of Cluett and Sons, will be filled in the order of receipt.

N.Y. Evening Post, Oct. 8
POST, WEDNESDAY,

In the Worl

MUSIC

Koussevitzky to Begin Directing Boston Symphony Orchestra This Week

I UNDERSTAND that Koussevitzky gives his first concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a day or two. It will be interesting to see how the Bostonians and later the New Yorkers take to him. He will have, I suppose, his fanatical admirers and his irreconcilable detractors; but I am sure that with the main body of sensible American music lovers he will quickly make good.

One little misunderstanding with regard to him had better be got rid of at once. In a recent very able article on conductors in an American magazine I read something to this effect (I cannot remember the exact phrasing of the earlier part of the sentence)—that in getting Koussevitzky to succeed Monteux Boston had exchanged a serious artist for a prima donna conductor. I do not think that sentence could have been written by any one who ever heard of Koussevitzky.

We all know what the prima donna in general is. She is a lady with one or two striking qualities that blind the uncritical mass to her many obvious defects. She has many faults, but even her worst enemies have never accused her of being particularly intelligent or particularly musical; her knowledge of the art is limited, her repertory consists of a few stale works and her apparatus of a few old stunts. Here and there a prima donna escapes this classification; but this, roughly, is what the world of music means when it uses "prima donna" as a term of reproach.

In no sense whatever does the term apply to Koussevitzky. He is a musician of the first order. He is interested in every period and every phase of music. The prima donna would go on to doomsday with her "Caro nome" and "Una voce," and "Ah, fors e lui": Koussevitzky's repertory is a large one, and he is always adding to it not only from the present but from neglected works of the past. And the comparison finally breaks down on the most important point of all. The prima donna is not in the least interested in music, but only in herself and the effect she can make on the audience. Koussevitzky, for all his individuality, has never once given me the impression of doing anything for effect. We may differ from this or that reading of his of a familiar work; but on reflection we have to admit that nothing has been imposed upon the music from the outside, but that Koussevitzky has simply passed it through his own intellect and his own temperament as an actor does with his part.

In trying to remove what seems to be a slight initial prejudice against Koussevitzky I must guard myself against seeming to attempt to arouse an initial prepossession in his favor. He will be in New York soon, and music lovers here will be able to judge him for themselves. And though I personally would rank him among the three or four greatest living conductors, I have no desire to force my opinion in advance upon a public that has not yet heard him. There will be opportunity enough to discuss his readings in detail after his New York concerts, when musicians can judge the critic as well as the conductor.

ERNEST NEWMAN.

ESTABLISHED 1881
From OCT 2 1924
TRAVELER
Boston, Mass.

NEW CONDUCTOR LEADS SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony orchestra today assembled for the first time under Serge Koussevitzky and began the season's rehearsals. E. Sohier Welch of the board of trustees introduced the new conductor to the players.

The conductor acknowledged the applause of the musicians and expressed his delight in coming to an orchestra whose fame had spread over all Europe.

The orchestral season will open Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 10 and 11, in Symphony Hall. Koussevitzky will make his American debut with the following program: Vivaldi's Concerto in D minor; Berlioz's Overture, "The Roman Carnival"; Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Haydn; Honegger's "Pacific 231" and Scriabin's "Le Poeme de l'Extase."

BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
OCT 9 1924

ENTER HONEGGER, MAKING A MUSIC OF LOCOMOTIVES

"PACIFIC, 231" AT SYMPHONY HALL

Mr. Koussevitzky's First New Piece—Visual Images and Sensations Translated Into Music—A Word from the Composer and a Word About Him—A Little Known Concerto from the Ancients—Programs in Prospect

IN each pair of Symphony Concerts Mr. Koussevitsky purposes to set at least one piece of novel music written by a composer of our immediate day. For tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening his choice is "Pacific, 231," sub-titled "symphonic movement," signed Arthur Honegger, originally played at the conductor's concerts in Paris last spring. Seven minutes sufficed for the terse composer. By credible report the duration of the applause equalled the duration of the music. To soothe such excitement "Pacific, 231," was repeated forthwith, and thereafter included in another "Concert Koussevitzky." Now, come overseas to Symphony Hall, the conductor again makes speed to play the piece. He lays it before audiences that recall Honegger, if they recall him at all, only by "Horace Victorieux," his mimodrama or "mimed symphony," set forth two years ago by Mr. Monteux. To put the consequences mildly, it was variously received.

Almost needless to say "Pacific, 231" is translation into music of the visual images and sensations evoked in Honegger by locomotives of the largest, heaviest, speediest type, in common use upon both European and American railways. Such psychological processes are not uncommon. There is even a scientific name for them: "Iconographic Hearing." In fact, Dr. Vladimir Zederbaum, the learned secretary to Mr. Koussevitzky, came upon an essay about them in an Italian review. "It stated," he writes, "that certain people associate musical melodies or phrases with determined visual images of architectural character, as others associate sounds or tonalities with certain colors—associations which have been developed to a very high degree by Skriabin and Rimsky-Korsakov. The 'Pacific' of Honegger represents an inverse phenomenon. Visual impressions of a mechanical character give birth to musical constructions closely associated with them. If we examine carefully the scheme of 'Horace Victorieux' as it has been set down by Honegger himself, we may notice that even there the program is conceived in a series of concise visual images which the composer expresses by the music."

Honegger, it also appears, has long been enamored of locomotives. His friend, the publisher of the Swiss journal of music, "Dissonance," once descried him at Zurich standing rapt before a poster of a huge "Pacific." The composer explained that from childhood locomotives had fascinated him. He admired them and loved them. In fact, to his rooms he took his friend and there exhibited a whole collection of drawings, designs and the like that he had accumulated—all about locomotives. They stirred in him lively sensations. Sooner or later, he hinted, he would translate them into music.

Dr. Zederbaum tells the story, and supplements it with Honegger's own explanatory note to the finished piece. "I have always loved locomotives," writes Honegger, "and passioned myself for them. To me, they are alive, have a being of their own. I cherish them as other men cherish women or horses. What I have sought to accomplish in 'Pacific' is not to imitate the noises of a locomotive. I have tried to imbue a musical framework with a visual impression and a feeling of physical joy. The music begins with an objective contemplation—the quiet breathing of the machine at rest. Then follow the straining start, the gathering speed, the progress from mood to mood, as a three-hundred-ton train hurtles through the dark night, racing one hundred-and-twenty miles an hour. As an example, I have chosen a locomotive of the Pacific, 231, type, for heavy trains at high speed."

No doubt the applauding Parisians were impressed by the novel subject-matter of Honegger's piece. Still more, however, did the musical content sway them—amazingly sonorous, in solidly massed structure. A perusal of the score—writes C. S. S.—reveals careful and masterly workmanship. The composer employs no unusually large number of instruments, nor does he draw on any that are rarely heard. The use of the tam-tam can no longer be called novel, since every contemporary seems to exploit its weird overtones. Honegger strikes it for the first time less than a score of measures from the end. The drums, quiet at the outset, mark with increasingly rapid rhythms, the course of the design. The horns and trumpets bandy rhythms and counterpoint with string choir. Often the sonorous brass reënforces. Occasionally it opposes an antagonistic rhythm to that maintained by wood and strings.

Yet these details of percussion and wind present no explanation of the unusual sonority obtained. The secret lies in the remarkable treatment of the strings. At the outset, violoncellos and double basses divide themselves so that Honegger has a choir of eight groups. Quickly he reduces the number to six, and then to five, concentrating and strengthening the musical substance. The resounding basses and bassoons announce a descending chromatic scale, which recurs constantly. While varying rhythms contrast and lend vigor, Honegger develops from a few fragments the theme announced about midway by the English horn and clarinet. Immediately afterward begins an almost fugal section. All the instruments share. There is a brief interlude of development and then a recurrence of the theme in the woodwinds against intricate passages for strings. The intricacy spreads to other instruments; the percussion grow frenzied; the tam-tam sounds; dissonances mass themselves; heavier and still heavier sonorities emerge—all is fortissimo, rhythmical, overwhelming. Then, quickly, the end.

Out of personal recollections, Dr. Zederbaum describes the Honegger of 1924—"a young man turning thirty, shy and almost awkward in his motions, with a quiet, timid voice and a charming youthful countenance, lighted by deep and welcoming dark eyes. There is power in them and unusual attraction." In Honegger's face, Dr. Zederbaum finds something Beethoven-like in the slightly sensual lips, in the mold of a fine forehead framed in dark, curling, careless hair. This surface-shyness does not conceal a musician who knows his way clearly and definitely. Yet in him there is not a trace of that presuming arrogance and exaggerated self-confidence which many successful young artists wear as an enveloping cloak."

Yet—continues C. S. S.—Honegger may well put confidence in his abilities. Member of the sometimes maligned, yet oftener over-rated group, The Six, he has plainly outstripped his fellows. He is the symphonist among them and has written, besides orchestral pieces, some chamber music, a modern oratorio or religious drama "King David," and an equally successful ballet (he calls it a "mimed symphony") "Horace Victorieux." Honegger's name came quickly before the public. A spontaneous sincerity and a lyric warmth informs his music with qualities ever appreciated by audiences. He possesses faith and courage. He does not over-emphasize the sensational. Although a member of "The Six," who cultivate all the polytonalities and a-tonalities, and incidentally a supreme scorn of Debussy and Ravel, he does not proceed to the extremities of innovation after the manner of his comrades. He makes use of polytonality, but always effectively and for a definite purpose. A fine sense of dramatic values allows him to approach and upbuild climaxes. A supple interweaving of glistening threads of melody, a thoroughly vitalized counterpoint, show the influence of Bach. Yet from the linear Schönberg, Honegger also takes a hint. Not so profusely does he scatter his melodic lines, but very effectively. Often he introduces three planes, and obtains thereby a third dimensional aspect in his music. To make mention of his solid and careful construction, of the balance, reflection, concision and concentration, for which he is noted, would seem to lay more stress on technical abilities than on the spirit within. Yet the recurring harshness of his speech in tones, is but the outlet to fervor of musical feeling and a creative emotion, vigorous and deep.

A Concerto Lost and Found

It is Mr. Koussevitzky's frequent custom to beg'n his concerts with an ancient piece—a Suite or a Concerto such as eighteenth-century composers wrote abundantly. Sometimes, it is familiar, like the Concerto Grosso of Handel—No. 10 in D minor—to be played in Cambridge and Boston next week. Again it is less known, like the Concerto in D minor by Vivaldi to be heard at Symphony Hall tomorrow and Saturday. Mr. Siloti, the Russian pianist and composer, edited the music for performance nowadays, and the conductor's own press published it. From his secretary, Dr. Zederbaum, come interesting particulars concerning it. The manuscript of the Concerto reposes in the Royal Library at Berlin—number eleven in a set of twelve such pieces originally published, as "L'Estro Harmonico" at Amsterdam in 1714-16. A few years earlier, about 1708, Bach had chanced upon a copy of the piece and arranged it for organ with two manuals. The manuscript of this transcription also passed to the Royal Library, where it lay unnoticed until, in 1844, the music was published not as a Concerto of Vivaldi, transformed into organ-piece by the elder and the greater Bach; but as the original handiwork of William Friedemann Bach, Johann Sebastian's not too scrupulous son. In fact he had labelled the manuscript as his own, but "copied by his father's hand." For a while the deceit went unquestioned; and in yet another arrangement the Concerto flourished as a piano-piece. Then Siloti caught the trail, followed it back to Vivaldi; separated the elder and the younger Bach; prepared the music for orchestral performance even as the composer had intended.

Incidents and Prospects

On Thursday evening of next week, Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct for the first time in Cambridge at the beginning of a new series of concerts by the Symphony Orchestra. Four movements of Handel's Concerto Grosso in D minor; Berlioz's Overture, "Roman Carnival"; a Suite drawn from de Falla's opera-ballet, "Love the Sorcerer"; Beethoven's Fifth Symphony fill his program. The music of de Falla will be played for the first time in America.

At the Symphony Concerts of next week in both Cambridge and Boston, Mr. Jesus Sanroma, youthful pianist schooled at the Conservatory and practising his calling in Boston, will play the considerable piano-part in the Suite from de Falla's opera-ballet, "Love the Sorcerer." Modestly, he has earned the compliment.

For his concert in Jordan Hall on Tuesday evening, Oct. 21, Mr. Félix Fox, the pianist, has set a program avoiding the ruts in both choice and arrangement of pieces. It stands: :

Prelude—Sarabande—Toccata	Debussy
French Suite in G major	Bach
The Afternoon of a Faun—The Hills of Anacapri	Debussy
The Fountains of the Villa d'Este	Liszt
Scherzo	Griffes
Birthday Waltzes	Mason
Romance in F major—Intermezzo in E-flat minor	Brahms
Islamey	Balakirev

131
BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD
OCT 9 1924

NOTES and LINES

By PHILIP HALE

Mr. Koussevitzky will make his first appearance in the United States as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestr tomorrow afternoon. The revised program is better balanced than the one that was first announced. The concerto by Vivaldi, the Venetian, will be played as arranged by Alexander Siloti. This will be the first performance, we believe, in this country. Vivaldi is known here by his violin concertos. Mr. Ysaye played one at a Symphony concert a dozen years ago. The "St. Anthony" Variations of Brahms are familiar; the reactionaries in the audience will be pleased, and so they may have the patience, or courage, to listen to the music by Honegger and Scriabin that comes later. It is a pleasure to see the name of Berlioz ("Roman Carnival") on the first program.

Honegger's "Pacific 231" is a musical glorification of a locomotive engine, a giant rejoicing in its strength. "231" refers to its classification and number of wheels. Mr. Koussevitzky produced the piece in Paris last May. There was a second performance in his series, and one later at the Prague festival.

Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy," which belongs to his theosophic period, is more or less familiar.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE BOSTON
MASS.
EVENING GLOBE
OCT 2 1924

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA BEGINS REHEARSALS

Serge Koussevitzky Takes Charge

At 10 o'clock this morning, in Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra assembled for the first time under Serge Koussevitzky, and began the season's rehearsals. Mr E. S. Welch of the orchestra's board of trustees led Mr Koussevitzky to the conductor's platform and introduced him to the orchestra.

The new Russian conductor acknowledged the applause from the musicians and made a brief answering speech. Depreciating "banalities," he expressed his delight in coming to an orchestra whose fame had spread all over Europe. He said that an orchestra with art as its first and sole aim was a rare phenamenon, hard to find on the other side of the Atlantic. It was this quality in the Boston Symphony Orchestra which brought him to America.

The orchestral season will open Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week, in Symphony Hall. Mr Koussevitzky will make his American debut with the following program: Vivaldi's concerto in D minor; Berlioz' overture, "The Roman Carnival"; Brahm's variations on a theme by Haydn; Honegger's "Pacific 231," and Scriabin's "Le Poem de l'Extase."

ENTER HONEGGER, MAKING A MUSIC OF LOCOMOTIVES

"PACIFIC, 231" AT SYMPHONY HALL

Mr. Koussevitzky's First New Piece—Visual Images and Sensations Translated Into Music—A Word from the Composer and a Word About Him—A Little Known Concerto from the Ancients—Programs in Prospect

IN each pair of Symphony Concerts Mr. Koussevitzky purposes to set at least one piece of novel music written by a composer of our immediate day. For tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening his choice is "Pacific, 231," sub-titled "symphonic movement," signed Arthur Honegger, originally played at the conductor's concerts in Paris last spring. Seven minutes sufficed for the terse composer. By credible report the duration of the applause equalled the duration of the music. To soothe such excitement "Pacific, 231," was repeated forthwith, and thereafter included in another "Concert Koussevitzky." Now, come overseas to Symphony Hall, the conductor again makes speed to play the piece. He lays it before audiences that recall Honegger, if they recall him at all, only by "Horace Victorieux," his mimodrama or "mimed symphony," set forth two years ago by Mr. Monteux. To put the consequences mildly, it was variously received.

Almost needless to say, "Pacific, 231" is translation into music of the visual images and sensations evoked in Honegger by locomotives of the largest, heaviest, speediest type, in common use upon both European and American railways. Such psychological processes are not uncommon. There is even a scientific name for them: "Iconographic Hearing." In fact, Dr. Vladimir Zederbaum, the learned secretary to Mr. Koussevitzky, came upon an essay about them in an Italian review. "It stated," he writes, "that certain people associate musical melodies or phrases with determined visual images of architectural character, as others associate sounds or tonalities with certain colors—associations which have been developed to a very high degree by Skriabin and Rimsky-Korsakov. The 'Pacific' of Honegger represents an inverse phenomenon. Visual impressions of a mechanical character give birth to musical constructions closely associated with them. If we examine carefully the scheme of 'Horace Victorieux' as it has been set down by Honegger himself, we may notice that even there the program is conceived in a series of concise visual images which the composer expresses by the music."

Honegger, it also appears, has long been enamored of locomotives. His friend, the publisher of the Swiss journal of music, "Dissonance," once descried him at Zurich standing rapt before a poster of a huge "Pacific." The composer explained that from childhood locomotives had fascinated him. He admired them and loved them. In fact, to his rooms he took his friend and there exhibited a whole collection of drawings, designs and the like that he had accumulated—all about locomotives. They stirred in him lively sensations. Sooner or later, he hinted, he would translate them into music.

Dr. Zederbaum tells the story, and supplements it with Honegger's own explanatory note to the finished piece. "I have always loved locomotives," writes Honegger, "and passioned myself for them. To me, they are alive, have a being of their own. I cherish them as other men cherish women or horses. What I have sought to accomplish in 'Pacific' is not to imitate the noises of a locomotive. I have tried to imbue a musical framework with a visual impression and a feeling of physical joy. The music begins with an objective contemplation—the quiet breathing of the machine at rest. Then follow the straining start, the gathering speed, the progress from mood to mood, as a three-hundred-ton train hurtles through the dark night, racing one hundred-and-twenty miles an hour. As an example, I have chosen a locomotive of the Pacific, 231, type, for heavy trains at high speed."

No doubt the applauding Parisians were impressed by the novel subject-matter of Honegger's piece. Still more, however, did the musical content sway them—amazingly sonorous, in solidly massed structure. A perusal of the score—writes C. S. S.—reveals careful and masterly workmanship. The composer employs no unusually large number of instruments, nor does he draw on any that are rarely heard. The use of the tam-tam can no longer be called novel, since every contemporary seems to exploit its weird overtones. Honegger strikes it for the first time less than a score of measures from the end. The drums, quiet at the outset, mark with increasingly rapid rhythms, the course of the design. The horns and trumpets bandy rhythms and counterpoint with string choir. Often the sonorous brass reënforces. Occasionally it opposes an antagonistic rhythm to that maintained by wood and strings.

Yet these details of percussion and wind present no explanation of the unusual sonority obtained. The secret lies in the remarkable treatment of the strings. At the outset, violoncellos and double basses divide themselves so that Honegger has a choir of eight groups. Quickly he reduces the number to six, and then to five, concentrating and strengthening the musical substance. The resounding basses and bassoons announce a descending chromatic scale, which recurs constantly. While varying rhythms contrast and lend vigor, Honegger develops from a few fragments the theme announced about midway by the English horn and clarinet. Immediately afterward begins an almost fugal section. All the instruments share. There is a brief interlude of development and then a recurrence of the theme in the woodwinds against intricate passages for strings. The intricacy spreads to other instruments; the percussion grow frenzied; the tam-tam sounds; dissonances mass themselves; heavier and still heavier sonorities emerge—all is fortissimo, rhythmical, overwhelming. Then, quickly, the end.

Out of personal recollections, Dr. Zederbaum describes the Honegger of 1924—"a young man turning thirty, shy and almost awkward in his motions, with a quiet, timid voice and a charming youthful countenance, lighted by deep and welcoming dark eyes. There is power in them and unusual attraction." In Honegger's face, Dr. Zederbaum finds something Beethoven-like in the slightly sensual lips, in the mold of a fine forehead framed in dark, curling, careless hair. This surface-shyness does not conceal a musician who knows his way clearly and definitely. Yet in him there is not a trace of that presuming arrogance and exaggerated self-confidence which many successful young artists wear as an enveloping cloak."

Yet—continues C. S. S.—Honegger may well put confidence in his abilities. Member of the sometimes maligned, yet oftener over-rated group, The Six, he has plainly outstripped his fellows. He is the symphonist among them and has written, besides orchestral pieces, some chamber music, a modern oratorio or religious drama "King David," and an equally successful ballet (he calls it a "mimed symphony") "Horace Victorieux." Honegger's name came quickly before the public. A spontaneous sincerity and a lyric warmth informs his music with qualities ever appreciated by audiences. He possesses faith and courage. He does not over-emphasize the sensational. Although a member of "The Six," who cultivate all the polytonalities and a-tonalities, and incidentally a supreme scorn of Debussy and Ravel, he does not proceed to the extremities of innovation after the manner of his comrades. He makes use of polytonality, but always effectively and for a definite purpose. A fine sense of dramatic values allows him to approach and upbuild climaxes. A supple interweaving of glistening threads of melody, a thoroughly vitalized counterpoint, show the influence of Bach. Yet from the linear Schönberg, Honegger also takes a hint. Not so profusely does he scatter his melodic lines, but very effectively. Often he introduces three planes, and obtains thereby a third dimensional aspect in his music. To make mention of his solid and careful construction, of the balance, reflection, concision and concentration, for which he is noted, would seem to lay more stress on technical abilities than on the spirit within. Yet the recurring harshness of his speech in tones, is but the outlet to fervor of musical feeling and a creative emotion, vigorous and deep.

A Concerto Lost and Found

It is Mr. Koussevitzky's frequent custom to beg'n his concerts with an ancient piece—a Suite or a Concerto such as eighteenth-century composers wrote abundantly. Sometimes, it is familiar, like the Concerto Grosso of Handel—No. 10 in D minor—to be played in Cambridge and Boston next week. Again it is less known, like the Concerto in D minor by Vivaldi to be heard at Symphony Hall tomorrow and Saturday. Mr. Siloti, the Russian pianist and composer, edited the music for performance nowadays, and the conductor's own press published it. From his secretary, Dr. Zederbaum, come interesting particulars concerning it. The manuscript of the Concerto reposes in the Royal Library at Berlin—number eleven in a set of twelve such pieces originally published, as "L'Estro Harmonico" at Amsterdam in 1714-16. A few years earlier, about 1708, Bach had chanced upon a copy of the piece and arranged it for organ with two manuals. The manuscript of this transcription also passed to the Royal Library, where it lay unnoticed until, in 1[illegible], the music was published not as a Concerto of Vivaldi, transformed into organ-piece by the elder and the greater Bach; but as the original handiwork of William Friedemann Bach, Johann Sebastian's not too scrupulous son. In fact he labelled the manuscript as his own, "copied by his father's hand." For a while the deceit went unquestioned; and yet another arrangement the Concerto flourished as a piano-piece. Then Siloti caught the trail, followed it back to Vivaldi; separated the elder and the younger Bach; prepared the music for orchestral performance even as the composer had intended.

Incidents and Prospects

On Thursday evening of next week, Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct for the first time in Cambridge at the beginning of a new series of concerts by the Symphony Orchestra. Four movements of Handel's Concerto Grosso in D minor; Berlioz' Overture, "Roman Carnival"; a Suite drawn from de Falla's opera-ballet, "Love the Sorcerer"; Beethoven's Fifth Symphony fill his program. The music of de Falla will be played for the first time in America.

At the Symphony Concerts of next week in both Cambridge and Boston, Mr. Jesus Sanroma, youthful pianist schooled at the Conservatory and practising his calling in Boston, will play the considerable piano part in the Suite from de Falla's opera-ballet, "Love the Sorcerer." Modestly he has [illegible] engagement.

[illegible] concert in [illegible] Tues-

"Something Beethoven-Like Is Stamped Upon His Fac

Arthur Honegger

Parisian Modernist: Composer of "Horace Victorieux," "Le Roi David" and "Pacific, 231"

From a Print in the Collection of Dr. Vladimir Zederbaum

BALTIMORE, MD.
EVE. SUN
OCT 10 1924

MUSIC

By F. W. S.

ENOUGH has already been made known of the program for the next musical season to indicate that it will be an unusually interesting one, with rather more than the usual number of major events and with many other attractions doubtless yet to be arranged and announced. Music lovers of this city will not only have opportunity to hear the usual number of concerts by the Philadelphia Orchestra under the direction of Leopold Stokowsky; the New York Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Walter Damrosch, and the New York Philharmonic, with Willem Mengelberg, who created such a stir here last season, conducting, but the Boston Symphony, rejuvenated and revivified, it is to be hoped, under Serge Koussevitzky, whose fame, won in Europe, has preceded him, is also to appear for at least one concert.

To this array of out-of-town orchestral material of the highest order will, of course, be added the usual Baltimore Symphony Orchestra series of

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION
OCT 10 1924

Symphony to Play Modernist Music

Great Boston Orchestra to Interpret Mechanics of Locomotive.

BOSTON, Oct. 9—Modernism in music will play a part in the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, former leader of the Russian State Orchestra. The first piece of novel music will be played tomorrow in the form of a symphonic interpretation of the mechanics of a locomotive. "Pacific, 231" the piece is called, and in it Arthur Honegger, its author, expresses by percussion and wind instruments, with occasional emphasis of tam-tam, drum, horns and trumpets against the counterpoint of a string choir, the big locomotive at rest and in action.

In the words of Honegger, the piece was first played at Koussevitzky's concerts in Paris last spring. "the music begins with the quiet breathing of the machine at rest. Then follow the straining start, the gathering speed, the progress from mood to mood, as a 300,000 pound train hurls through the dark night, racing 120 miles an hour."

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY
OCT 10 1924

HONEGGER MAKING MUSIC OF LOCOMOTIVE

Boson, Oct. 9. — Modernism in music will play a part in the programme of the Boston symphony orchestra this season under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, former leader of the Russian state orchestra, and the first piece of novel music will be played tomosrow in the form of a symphonic interpretation of the Mechanics of a locomotive. "Pacific, 231," the piece is called and in it Arthur Honegger, its author, expresses by percussion and wind instruments with occasional emphasis of tam-tam drum, horns and trumpets against the counterpoint of a string choir, the big locomotive at rest and in action. In the words of Honegger, whose piece was first played at Koussevitsky's concerts in Paris last spring:

"In the first part the music begins with the quiet breathing of the machine at rest. Then follow the straining start, the gathering speed the progress from mood to mood, as a 30 ton train hurtles through the dark night racing 120 miles an hour."

BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

PORTLAND, ME.

NEW BEDFORD,

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

THE NEW CONDUCTOR OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

(Applications for each series of Boston Symphony concerts for the season of 1924–1925 are now being received in the subscription office).

(OVER)

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

THE NEW CONDUCTOR OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

(Applications for each series of Boston Symphony concerts for the season of 1924–1925 are now being received in the subscription office).

(OVER)

IN SYMPHONY

New Conductor's Opening Concert This Afternoon

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Not for many years has Boston been the scene of a musical event that in widespread anticipation matches the interest in today's Symphony concert.

This afternoon at Symphony Hall Serge Koussevitzky will for the first time publicly conduct an orchestra in the United States.

Famed in every European capital as a leader of rare magnetism and of remarkably individual interpretations Mr. Koussevitzky comes to us in this, his 51st year, as one of the outstanding figures in contemporary music. It has been said of him that he is the only great European conductor whom America has not yet heard. That perhaps is a slight exaggeration, but among the European orchestral leaders still unknown in this country Koussevitzky is beyond all dispute the greatest. And in the course of a few hours he will no longer be unknown to us.

By now the main events in Mr. Koussevitzky's life have been made familiar to American readers. It is necessary only to recall his sensational mastery of that unwieldy instrument the double-bass, the romantic marriage that brought him affluence and, most picturesque event in a picturesque career, the chartering of an orchestra to take symphonic music to the remotest corners of Russia.

An ardent apostle of modern and ultra-modern composers, Mr. Koussevitzky plans to include in each programme that he gives in Boston, one contemporary piece. At the concerts of today and tomorrow evening that piece will be Arthur Honegger's musical ode to a great locomotive, "Pacific 231."

In that piece this week's audiences are promised a sensation and by all reports they will receive yet another in Mr. Koussevitzky's "reading" of Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy."

For the rest this initial programme includes a Concerto by Vivaldi, Berlioz's Overture "The Roamn Carnival," and Brahms' Variations on a Theme of Haydn: in all a widely ranging list that should at once make known almost the full scope of Mr. Koussevitzky's powers.

OCT 10 1924

"Pacific, 231," Music Record Of Train Run

Boston Symphony Orchestra To Feature Modernism In Programs

BOSTON, Oct. 10—Modernism in music will play a part in the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, former leader of the Russian State Orchestra. The first piece of novel music was played today in the form of a symphonic interpretation of the mechanics of a locomotive.

"Pacific, 231," the piece is called, and in it Arthur Honegger, its author, expresses by percussion and wind instruments, with occasional emphasis of tam-tam, drum, horns and trumpets against the counterpoint of a string choir, the big locomotive at rest and in action.

In the words of Honegger, whose piece was first played at Koussevitzky's concerts in Paris last spring, "the music begins with the quiet breathing of the machine at rest. Then follow the straining start, the gathering speed, the progress from mood to mood, as a 300-ton train hurtles through the dark night, racing 120 miles an hour."

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL PLAY PIECE OF NOVEL MUSIC

Boston, Oct. 9.—Modernism in music will play a part in the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, former leader of the Russian State Orchestra, and the first piece of novel music will be played to-morrow in the form of a symphonic interpretation of the mechanics of a locomotive. "Pacific, 231," the piece is called, and in it Arthur Honegger, its author, expresses by percussion and wind instruments, with occasional emphasis of tam-tam, drum, horns and trumpets against the counterpoint of a string choir, the big locomotive at rest and in action. In the words of Honegger, whose piece was first played at Koussevitsky's concerts in Paris last spring, "The music begins with the quiet breathing of the machine at rest. Then follow the straining start, the gathering speed, the progress from mood to mood, as a 300-ton train hurtles through the dark night, racing 120 miles an hour."

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION

OCT 10 1924

Modernism in music will play a part in programs this year of Boston Symphony Orchestra under direction of Koussevitsky.

against seeming to attempt to arouse an initial prepossession in his favor. He will be in New York soon, and music lovers here will be able to judge him for themselves. And though I personally would rank him among the three or four greatest living conductors, I have no desire to force my opinion in advance upon a public that has not yet heard him. There will be opportunity enough to discuss his readings in detail after his New York concerts, when musicians can judge the critic as well as the conductor.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
PUBLIC LEDGER

OCT 10 1924

THIS TRAIN WILL BEAT TIME

Boston Symphony to Play Piece Interpreting a Locomotive

Boston, Oct. 9.—Modernism in music will play a part in the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, former leader of the Russian State Orchestra. The first piece of novel music will be played tomorrow in the form of a symphonic interpretation of the mechanics of a locomotive.

"Pacific 231," the piece is called, and in it Arthur Honegger, its author, expresses by percussion and wind instruments, with occasional emphasis of tom-tom, drum, horns and trumpets against the counterpoint of a string choir, a locomotive at rest and in action.

BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

THE NEW CONDUCTOR OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

(Applications for each series of Boston Symphony concerts for the season of 1924–1925 are now being received in the subscription office).

(OVER)

PORTLAND,
ME.
PRESS HERALD

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

THE NEW CONDUCTOR OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

(Applications for each series of Boston Symphony concerts for the season of 1924–1925 are now being received in the subscription office).

(OVER)

NEW BEDFORD,

IN SYMPHONY

New Conductor's Opening Concert This Afternoon

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Not for many years has Boston been the scene of a musical event that in widespread anticipation matches the interest in today's Symphony concert.

This afternoon at Symphony Hall Serge Koussevitzky will for the first time publicly conduct an orchestra in the United States.

Famed in every European capital as a leader of rare magnetism and of remarkably individual interpretations Mr. Koussevitzky comes to us in this, his 51st year, as one of the outstanding figures in contemporary music. It has been said of him that he is the only great European conductor whom America has not yet heard. That perhaps is a slight exaggeration, but among the European orchestral leaders still unknown in this country Koussevitzky is beyond all dispute the greatest. And in the course of a few hours he will no longer be unknown to us.

By now the main events in Mr. Koussevitzky's life have been made familiar to American readers. It is necessary only to recall his sensational mastery of that unwieldy instrument the double-bass, the romantic marriage that brought him affluence and, most picturesque event in a picturesque career, the chartering of an orchestra to take symphonic music to the remotest corners of Russia.

An ardent apostle of modern and ultra-modern composers, Mr. Koussevitzky plans to include in each programme that he gives in Boston, one contemporary piece. At the concerts of today and tomorrow evening that piece will be Arthur Honegger's musical ode to a great locomotive, "Pacific 231."

In that piece this week's audiences are promised a sensation and by all reports they will receive yet another in Mr. Koussevitzky's "reading" of Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy."

For the rest this initial programme includes a Concerto by Vivaldi, Berlioz's Overture "The Roamn Carnival," and Brahms' Variations on a Theme of Haydn: in all a widely ranging list that should at once make known almost the full scope of Mr. Koussevitzky's powers.

OCT 10 1924

"Pacific, 231," Music Record Of Train Run

Boston Symphony Orchestra To Feature Modernism In Programs

BOSTON, Oct. 10—Modernism in music will play a part in the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, former leader of the Russian State Orchestra. The first piece of novel music was played today in the form of a symphonic interpretation of the mechanics of a locomotive.

"Pacific, 231," the piece is called, and in it Arthur Honegger, its author, expresses by percussion and wind instruments, with occasional emphasis of tam-tam, drum, horns and trumpets against the counterpoint of a string choir, the big locomotive at rest and in action.

In the words of Honegger, whose piece was first played at Koussevitzky's concerts in Paris last spring, "the music begins with the quiet breathing of the machine at rest. Then follow the straining start, the gathering speed, the progress from mood to mood, as a 300-ton train hurtles through the dark night, racing 120 miles an hour."

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL PLAY PIECE OF NOVEL MUSIC

Boston, Oct. 9.—Modernism in music will play a part in the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, former leader of the Russian State Orchestra, and the first piece of novel music will be played to-morrow in the form of a symphonic interpretation of the mechanics of a locomotive. "Pacific, 231," the piece is called, and in it Arthur Honegger, its author, expresses by percussion and wind instruments, with occasional emphasis of tam-tam, drum, horns and trumpets against the counterpoint of a string choir, the big locomotive at rest and in action. In the words of Honegger, whose piece was first played at Koussevitsky's concerts in Paris last spring, "The music begins with the quiet breathing of the machine at rest. Then follow the straining start, the gathering speed, the progress from mood to mood, as a 300-ton train hurtles through the dark night, racing 120 miles an hour."

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION

OCT 10 1924

Modernism in music will play a part in programs this year of Boston Symphony Orchestra under direction of Koussevitsky.

against seeming to attempt to arouse an initial prepossession in his favor. He will be in New York soon, and music lovers here will be able to judge him for themselves. And though I personally would rank him among the three or four greatest living conductors, I have no desire to force my opinion in advance upon a public that has not yet heard him. There will be opportunity enough to discuss his readings in detail after his New York concerts, when musicians can judge the critic as well as the conductor.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
PUBLIC LEDGER

OCT 10 1924

THIS TRAIN WILL BEAT TIME

Boston Symphony to Play Piece Interpreting a Locomotive

Boston, Oct. 9.—Modernism in music will play a part in the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, former leader of the Russian State Orchestra. The first piece of novel music will be played tomorrow in the form of a symphonic interpretation of the mechanics of a locomotive.

"Pacific 231," the piece is called, and in it Arthur Honegger, its author, expresses by percussion and wind instruments, with occasional emphasis of tom-tom, drum, horns and trumpets against the counterpoint of a string choir, a locomotive at rest and in action.

PORTLAND, ME.

"Koussevitzky as a Magnetic Personality."

(By Olin Downes in the New York Times, June 15, 1924.)

In a four column article in the New York Times, Olin Downes, the music critic, reviews the last of the Concerts Koussevitzky at the Paris Opéra on May 29, and records the opinions of Mr. Koussevitzky as expressed to him after the performance. Mr. Downes characterizes the new leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as the conductor of the hour in Paris, whose concerts are now packed to the doors.

The writer thus states his impressions of the great Russian in the act of conducting:

"On the conductor's stand he is a figure to watch as well as to hear. Tall, with dark hair which is graying, with nervous hands and face which sensitively reflects his mood, and with a degree of bodily command that pertains to few conductors, Koussevitzky plays, obviously but not the less effectively, on his orchestra. He has no mannerism or particular gestures that a single concert fixes in the mind, but does appear to embody in every movement what he finds in the music. With a chorus of some good qualities and others by no means so good, and an orchestra which Mr. Koussevitzky will not prefer to the Boston Symphony, he secured the most expressive and, at times, volcanic response to his wishes. And at such times the conductor was a figure to remember—erect, imperious, his face working with his own emotions; a hand of which the fingers themselves are eloquent suddenly bringing out an outburst of tone from the chorus; a glance which, sweeping over the orchestra, brings equally sudden and dramatic results. Koussevitzky has the stamp of a leader. As a musician he is evidently endowed with a temperament that can on occasion sweep everything before it. There is an authority, a quenchless enthusiasm and a big sweep in all that he does, which, if he were less sincere and individual as a musician than he is, would be a compelling force for public success. Nor is he in the habit of allowing an audience or an orchestra to stagnate under him.

* * *

Koussevitzky's Interpretations

"Words of M. Koussevitzky, outlining his attitude on the subject of orchestral programs, modern and classical music, will be of interest to those who attend his concerts next winter. 'I would like to make it clear,' said the conductor, 'that I am neither modernist nor classicist in my musical preferences. The works of the great classic masters are absolutely indispensable to me, as musician and in my life. No one would less willingly be without them than I. But music is not a static art. Music is continually being made which is an expression of the period in which it appears. It is as necessary for us to know what is being done as it is to know and admire what has been done. As for the value of new works, the conductor uses his best judgment in producing them. He must leave the rest to the judgment of time.'"

(OVER)

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.

"Koussevitzky as a Magnetic Personality."

(By Olin Downes in the New York Times, June 15, 1924.)

In a four column article in the New York Times, Olin Downes, the music critic, reviews the last of the Concerts Koussevitzky at the Paris Opéra on May 29, and records the opinions of Mr. Koussevitzky as expressed to him after the performance. Mr. Downes characterizes the new leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as the conductor of the hour in Paris, whose concerts are now packed to the doors.

The writer thus states his impressions of the great Russian in the act of conducting:

"On the conductor's stand he is a figure to watch as well as to hear. Tall, with dark hair which is graying, with nervous hands and face which sensitively reflects his mood, and with a degree of bodily command that pertains to few conductors, Koussevitzky plays, obviously but not the less effectively, on his orchestra. He has no mannerism or particular gestures that a single concert fixes in the mind, but does appear to embody in every movement what he finds in the music. With a chorus of some good qualities and others by no means so good, and an orchestra which Mr. Koussevitzky will not prefer to the Boston Symphony, he secured the most expressive and, at times, volcanic response to his wishes. And at such times the conductor was a figure to remember—erect, imperious, his face working with his own emotions; a hand of which the fingers themselves are eloquent suddenly bringing out an outburst of tone from the chorus; a glance which, sweeping over the orchestra, brings equally sudden and dramatic results. Koussevitzky has the stamp of a leader. As a musician he is evidently endowed with a temperament that can on occasion sweep everything before it. There is an authority, a quenchless enthusiasm and a big sweep in all that he does, which, if he were less sincere and individual as a musician than he is, would be a compelling force for public success. Nor is he in the habit of allowing an audience or an orchestra to stagnate under him.

* * *

Koussevitzky's Interpretations

"Words of M. Koussevitzky, outlining his attitude on the subject of orchestral programs, modern and classical music, will be of interest to those who attend his concerts next winter. 'I would like to make it clear,' said the conductor, 'that I am neither modernist nor classicist in my musical preferences. The works of the great classic masters are absolutely indispensable to me, as musician and in my life. No one would less willingly be without them than I. But music is not a static art. Music is continually being made which is an expression of the period in which it appears. It is as necessary for us to know what is being done as it is to know and admire what has been done. As for the value of new works, the conductor uses his best judgment in producing them. He must leave the rest to the judgment of time.'"

(OVER)

IN SYMPHONY

New Conductor's Opening Concert This Afternoon

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Not for many years has Boston been the scene of a musical event that in widespread anticipation matches the interest in today's Symphony concert.

This afternoon at Symphony Hall Serge Koussevitzky will for the first time publicly conduct an orchestra in the United States.

Famed in every European capital as a leader of rare magnetism and of remarkably individual interpretations Mr. Koussevitzky comes to us in this, his 51st year, as one of the outstanding figures in contemporary music. It has been said of him that he is the only great European conductor whom America has not yet heard. That perhaps is a slight exaggeration, but among the European orchestral leaders still unknown in this country Koussevitzky is beyond all dispute the greatest. And in the course of a few hours he will no longer be unknown to us.

By now the main events in Mr. Koussevitzky's life have been made familiar to American readers. It is necessary only to recall his sensational mastery of that unwieldy instrument the double-bass, the romantic marriage that brought him affluence and, most picturesque event in a picturesque career, the chartering of an orchestra to take symphonic music to the remotest corners of Russia.

An ardent apostle of modern and ultra-modern composers, Mr. Koussevitzky plans to include in each programme that he gives in Boston, one contemporary piece. At the concerts of today and tomorrow evening that piece will be Arthur Honegger's musical ode to a great locomotive, "Pacific 231."

In that piece this week's audiences are promised a sensation and by all reports they will receive yet another in Mr. Koussevitzky's "reading" of Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy."

For the rest this initial programme includes a Concerto by Vivaldi, Berlioz's Overture "The Roamn Carnival," and Brahms' Variations on a Theme of Haydn; in all a widely ranging list that should at once make known almost the full scope of Mr. Koussevitzky's

OCT 10 1924

"Pacific, 231," Music Record Of Train Run

Boston Symphony Orchestra To Feature Modernism In Programs

BOSTON, Oct. 10—Modernism in music will play a part in the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, former leader of the Russian State Orchestra. The first piece of novel music was played today in the form of a symphonic interpretation of the mechanics of a locomotive.

"Pacific, 231," the piece is called, and in it Arthur Honegger, its author, expresses by percussion and wind instruments, with occasional emphasis of tam-tam, drum, horns and trumpets against the counterpoint of a string choir, the big locomotive at rest and in action.

In the words of Honegger, whose piece was first played at Koussevitzky's concerts in Paris last spring, "the music begins with the quiet breathing of the machine at rest. Then follow the straining start, the gathering speed, the progress from mood to mood, as a 300-ton train hurtles through the dark night, racing 120 miles an hour."

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL PLAY PIECE OF NOVEL MUSIC

Boston, Oct. 9.—Modernism in music will play a part in the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, former leader of the Russian State Orchestra, and the first piece of novel music will be played to-morrow in the form of a symphonic interpretation of the mechanics of a locomotive. "Pacific, 231," the piece is called, and in it Arthur Honegger, its author, expresses by percussion and wind instruments, with occasional emphasis of tam-tam, drum, horns and trumpets against the counterpoint of a string choir, the big locomotive at rest and in action. In the words of Honegger, whose piece was first played at Koussevitsky's concerts in Paris last spring, "The music begins with the quiet breathing of the machine at rest. Then follow the straining start, the gathering speed, the progress from mood to mood, as a 300-ton train hurtles through the dark night, racing 120 miles an hour."

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION

OCT 10 1924

Modernism in music will play a part in programs this year of Boston Symphony Orchestra under direction of Koussevitsky.

He will be in New York soon, and music lovers here will be able to judge him for themselves. And though I personally would rank him among the three or four greatest living conductors, I have no desire to force my opinion in advance upon a public that has not yet heard him. There will be opportunity enough to discuss his readings in detail after his New York concerts, when musicians can judge the critic as well as the conductor.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
PUBLIC LEDGER

OCT 10 1924

THIS TRAIN WILL BEAT TIME

Boston Symphony to Play Piece Interpreting a Locomotive

Boston, Oct. 9.—Modernism in music will play a part in the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, former leader of the Russian State Orchestra. The first piece of novel music will be played tomorrow in the form of a symphonic interpretation of the mechanics of a locomotive.

"Pacific 231," the piece is called, and in it Arthur Honegger, its author, expresses by percussion and wind instruments, with occasional emphasis of tom-tom, drum, horns and trumpets against the counterpoint of a string choir, a locomotive at rest and in action.

BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
OCT 10 1924

WILL ANALYZE THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS

SERIES OF TWENTY LECTURES ANNOUNCED BY DIVISION OF UNIVERSITY EXTENSION, CO-OPERATING WITH PUBLIC LIBRARY

A course of twenty lectures, "to aid in appreciation of the Boston Symphony concerts," is announced today as a special feature of this year's program of the Massachusetts Division of University Extension, acting jointly with the Boston Public Library. The series will begin on Monday, Oct. 20, at 4.45 P. M., in the lecture hall of the Public Library, Boylston street entrance, and will continue on successive Mondays at the same time and place throughout the autumn and winter. Richard G. Appel, head of the library's music department, will be the instructor in charge of the course. Coöperating with him will be such men as Professor W. R. Spalding of Harvard University, Professor John P. Marshall of Boston University and Malcolm Lang, director of the Cecilia Society, who will serve as special lecturers.

Week by week the Monday lectures will consider, with musical illustration, the program of the concerts to be given on the following Friday and Saturday in Symphony Hall. In this connection, James A. Moyer, director of the Division of University Extension, explains that "the course is designed for all who wish to gain a keener enjoyment in the appreciation of orchestral music as well as for teachers and students. Although based on the current repertory, it will be essentially a study of orchestral composition from the point of view of the listener. The principles of music relating to form and design, the principles of interpretation and the characteristics of the different musical instruments will all be studied, together with practice in score reading." Each lecture will be limited to one hour.

The first meeting, to be held on Monday, Oct. 20, will be open to the public. The complete course will be given in two parts, of ten lessons each. There will be a slight enrollment fee for each part.

BOSTON, MASS.
POST
OCT 10 1924

KEEN INTEREST IN SYMPHONY

New Conductor's Opening Concert This Afternoon

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Not for many years has Boston been the scene of a musical event that in widespread anticipation matches the interest in today's Symphony concert.

This afternoon at Symphony Hall Serge Koussevitzky will for the first time publicly conduct an orchestra in the United States.

Famed in every European capital as a leader of rare magnetism and of remarkably individual interpretations Mr. Koussevitzky comes to us in this, his 51st year, as one of the outstanding figures in contemporary music. It has been said of him that he is the only great European conductor whom America has not yet heard. That perhaps is a slight exaggeration, but among the European orchestral leaders still unknown in this country Koussevitzky is beyond all dispute the greatest. And in the course of a few hours he will no longer be unknown to us.

By now the main events in Mr. Koussevitzky's life have been made familiar to American readers. It is necessary only to recall his sensational mastery of that unwieldy instrument the double-bass, the romantic marriage that brought him affluence and, most picturesque event in a picturesque career, the chartering of an orchestra to take symphonic music to the remotest corners of Russia.

An ardent apostle of modern and ultra-modern composers, Mr. Koussevitzky plans to include in each programme that he gives in Boston, one contemporary piece. At the concerts of today and tomorrow evening that piece will be Arthur Honegger's musical ode to a great locomotive, "Pacific 231."

In that piece this week's audiences are promised a sensation and by all reports they will receive yet another in Mr. Koussevitzky's "reading" of Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy."

For the rest this initial programme includes a Concerto by Vivaldi, Berlioz's Overture "The Roamn Carnival," and Brahms' Variations on a Theme of Haydn: in all a widely ranging list that should at once make known almost the full scope of Mr. Koussevitzky's powers.

PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS-HERALD
OCT 10 1924

30 Ton Train At 120 Miles An Hour Reproduced By Boston Symphony

Boston, Oct. 9.—Modernism in music will play a part in the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, former leader of the Russian state orchestra, and the first piece of novel music will be played tomorrow in the form of a symphonic interpretation of the Mechanics of a Locomotive. "Pacific, 231," the piece is called; and in it Arthur Honegger, its author, expresses by percussion and wind instruments, with occasional emphasis of tam-tam, drum, horns and trumpets against the counterpoint of a string choir, the big locomotive at rest and in action. In the words of Honegger, whose piece was first played at Koussevitzky's concerts in Paris last spring, "The music begins with the quiet breathing of the machine at rest. Then follow the straining start, the gathering speed, the progress from mood to mood, as a 30-ton train hurtles through the dark night racing 120 miles an hour."

BURLINGTON, VT.
FREE PRESS
OCT 10 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO IMITATE LOCOMOTIVE

BOSTON, Oct. 9.—Modernism in music will play a part in the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, former leader of the Russian state orchestra and the first piece of novel music will be played tomorrow in the form of a symphonic interpretation of the mechanics of a locomotive. "Pacific, 231," the piece is called and in it Arthur Honegger, its author, expresses by percussion and wind instruments, with occasional emphasis of tam-tam, drum, horns and trumpets against the counterpoint of a string choir the big locomotive at rest and in action. In the words of Honegger whose piece was first played at Koussevitzky's concerts in Paris last spring "the music begins with the quiet breathing of the machine at rest. Then follow the straining start, the gathering speed, the progress from mood to mood as a 30-ton train hurtles through the dark night racing 120 miles an hour."

WORCESTER MASS.
POST
OCT 10 1924

"Pacific, 231," Music Record Of Train Run

Boston Symphony Orchestra To Feature Modernism In Programs

BOSTON, Oct. 10—Modernism in music will play a part in the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, former leader of the Russian State Orchestra. The first piece of novel music was played today in the form of a symphonic interpretation of the mechanics of a locomotive.

"Pacific, 231," the piece is called, and in it Arthur Honegger, its author, expresses by percussion and wind instruments, with occasional emphasis of tam-tam, drum, horns and trumpets against the counterpoint of a string choir, the big locomotive at rest and in action.

In the words of Honegger, whose piece was first played at Koussevitzky's concerts in Paris last spring, "the music begins with the quiet breathing of the machine at rest. Then follow the straining start, the gathering speed, the progress from mood to mood, as a 300-ton train hurtles through the dark night, racing 120 miles an hour."

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TIMES
OCT 10 1924

"LOCOMOTIVE MUSIC" BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Boston, October 10.—Modernism in music will play a part in the programs of the Boston symphony orchestra this season under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, former leader of the Russian state orchestra, and the first piece of novel music to be played to-day, will be in the form of a symphonic interpretation of the mechanics of a locomotive. "Pacific, 231," the piece is called, and in it Hur Honegger, its author, expresses by percussion and wind instruments, with occasional emphasis of tam-tam, drum, horns and trumpets against the counterpoint of a string choir, the big locomotive at rest and in action. In the words of Honegger, whose piece was first played at Koussevitzky's concerts in Paris last spring, "the music begins with the quite breathing of the machine at rest. Then follow the straining start, the gathering speed, the progress from mood to mood, as a 300-ton train hurtles through the dark night, racing 120 miles an hour."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
OCT 10 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL PLAY PIECE OF NOVEL MUSIC

Boston, Oct. 9.—Modernism in music will play a part in the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, former leader of the Russian State Orchestra, and the first piece of novel music will be played to-morrow in the form of a symphonic interpretation of the mechanics of a locomotive. "Pacific, 231," the piece is called, and in it Arthur Honegger, its author, expresses by percussion and wind instruments, with occasional emphasis of tam-tam, drum, horns and trumpets against the counterpoint of a string choir, the big locomotive at rest and in action. In the words of Honegger, whose piece was first played at Koussevitsky's concerts in Paris last spring, "The music begins with the quiet breathing of the machine at rest. Then follow the straining start, the gathering speed, the progress from mood to mood, as a 300-ton train hurtles through the dark night, racing 120 miles an hour."

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION
OCT 10 1924

Modernism in music will play a part in programs this year of Boston Symphony Orchestra under direction of Koussevitsky.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY
OCT 10 1924

I understand that Koussevitzky gives his first concert with the Boston Symphony orchestra in a day or two, writes Ernest Newman in the New York Evening Post. It will be interesting to see how the Bostonians and later the New Yorkers take to him. He will have, I surpose, his fanatical admirers and his irreconcilable detractors; but I am sure that with the main body of sensible American music lovers he will quickly make good.

One little misunderstanding with regard to him had better be got rid of at once. In a recent very able article on conductors in an American magazine I read something to this effect (I cannot remember the exact phrasing of the earlier part of the sentence)—that in getting Koussevitzky to succeed Monteux Boston had exchanged a serious artist for a prima donna conductor. I do not think that sentence could have been written by any one who ever heard of Koussevitzky.

We all know what the prima donna in general is. She is a lady with one or two striking qualities that blind the uncritical mass to her many obvious defects. She has many faults, but even her worst enemies have never accused her of being particularly musical; her knowledge of the art is limited, her repertory consists of a few stale works and her apparatus of a few old stunts. Here and there a prima donna escapes this classification; but this, roughly, is what the world of music means when it uses "prima donna" as a term of reproach.

In no sense whatever does the term apply to Koussevitzky. He is a musician of the first order. He is interested in every period and every phase of music. The prima donna would go on to doomsday with her "Caro nome" and "Una voce," and "Ah, fors e lui"; Koussevitzky's repertory is a large one, and he is always adding to it not only from the present but from neglected works of the past. And the comparison finally breaks down on the most important point of all. The prima donna is not in the least interested in music, but only in herself and the effect she can make on the audience, Koussevitzky, for all his individuality, has never once given me the impression of doing anything for effect. We may differ from this or that reading of his of a familiar work; but on reflection we have to admit that nothing has been imposed upon the music from the outside, but that Koussevitzky has simply passed it through his own intellect and his own temperament as an actor does with his part.

In trying to remove what seems to be a slight initial prejudice against Koussevitzky I must guard myself against seeming to attempt to arouse an initial prepossession in his favor. He will be in New York soon, and music lovers here will be able to judge him for themselves. And though I personally would rank him among the three or four greatest living conductors, I have no desire to force my opinion in advance upon a public that has not yet heard him. There will be opportunity enough to discuss his readings in detail after his New York concerts, when musicians can judge the critic as well as the conductor.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
PUBLIC LEDGER
OCT 10 1924

THIS TRAIN WILL BEAT TIME

Boston Symphony to Play Piece Interpreting a Locomotive

Boston, Oct. 9.—Modernism in music will play a part in the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, former leader of the Russian State Orchestra. The first piece of novel music will be played tomorrow in the form of a symphonic interpretation of the mechanics of a locomotive.

"Pacific 231," the piece is called, and in it Arthur Honegger, its author, expresses by percussion and wind instruments, with occasional emphasis of tom-tom, drum, horns and trumpets against the counterpoint of a string choir, a locomotive at rest and in action.

REDUCTION RATIO 14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

RUTLAND, VT.
HERALD

OCT 10 1924

Locomotive Action Is Set to Music

Interpretation of Its Mechanics Will Be Made by Boston Symphony Orchestra.

(Associated Press Dispatch.)

Boston, Oct. 9.—Modernism in music will play a part in the program of the Boston Symphony orchestra this season under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, former leader of the Russian state orchestra, and the first piece of novel music will be played tomorrow in the form of a symphonic interpretation of the mechanics of a locomotive. "Pacific, 231," the piece is called, and in it Arthur Honegger, its author, expresses by percussion and wind instruments, with occasional emphasis of tam-tam, drum, horns and trumpets against the counter-point of a string choir, the big locomotive at rest and in action.

In the words of Honegger, whose piece was first played at Koussevitzky's concerts in Paris last spring. "The music begins with the quiet breathing of the machine at rest. Then follow the straining start, the gathering speed, the progress from mood to mood, as a 30-ton train hurtles through the dark night racing 120 miles an hour."

NEW BEDFORD,
MASS.
STANDARD

OCT 10 1924

Boston Symphony to Interpret Music of Giant Locomotive

Boston, Oct. 10.—Modernism in music will play a part in the programs of the Boston symphony orchestra this season under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, former leader of the Russian state orchestra, and the first piece of novel music will be played tomorrow in the form of a symphonic interpretation of the Mechanics of a locomotive. "Pacific, 231," the piece is called and in it Arthur Honegger, its author, expresses by percussion and wind instruments with occasional emphasis of tam-tam, drum, horns and trumpets against the counterpoint of a string choir, the big locomotive at rest and in action. In the words of Honegger, whose piece was first played at Koussevitsky's concerts in Paris last spring.

"In the first part the music begins with the quiet breathing of the machine at rest. Then follow the straining start, the gathering speed the progress from mood to mood, as a 30 ton train hurtles through the dark night racing 120 miles an hour."

NEW HAVEN,
CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER

OCT 10 1924

Boston Symphony To Interpret Engine

Boston, Oct. 9.—Modernism in music will play a part in the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, former leader of the Russian State Orchestra, and the first piece of novel music will be played tomorow in the form of a symphonic interpretation of the mechanics of a locomotive. "Pacific, 231" the piece is called, and in it Arthur Honegger, its author, expresses by percussion and wind instruments, with occasional emphasis of tam-tam, drum, horns and trumpets against the counterpoint of a string choir, the big locomotive at rest and in action. In the words of Honegger, whose piece was first played at Koussevitzky's concerts in Paris last spring, "the music begins with the quiet breathing of the machine at rest. Then follow the straining start, the gathering speed, the progress from mood to mood, as a 300 ton train hurties through the dark night, racing 120 miles an hour."

NORWICH
CONN.
BULLETIN

OCT 10 1924

MODERNISM IN MUSIC BY BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Boston, Oct. 9.—Modernism in music will play a part in the programs of the Boston Symphony orchestra this season under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, former leader of the Russian state orchestra, and the first piece of novel music will be played tomorrow in the form of a symphonic interpretation of the mechanics of a locomotive. "Pacific, 231," the piece is called, and in it Arthur Honegger, its author, expresses by percussion and wind instruments, with occasional emphasis of tam-tam, drum, horns and trumpets against the counterpoint of a string choir, the big locomotive at rest and, in action. In the words of Honegger, whose piece was first played at Koussevitzky's concerts in Paris, "the music begins with the quiet breathing of the machine at rest. Then follow the straining start, the gathering speed, the progress from mood to mood, as a 300-ton hurtles through the dark night, racing 120 miles an hour."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 10 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL PLAY PIECE OF NOVEL MUSIC

Modernism in Music Will Be Part of Programmes.

Boston, Oct. 9.—Modernism in music will play a part in the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, former leader of the Russian State Orchestra, and the first piece of novel music will be played to-morrow in the form of a symphonic interpretation of the mechanics of a locomotive. "Pacific, 231," the piece is called, and in it Arthur Honegger, its author, expresses by percussion and wind instruments, with occasional emphasis of tam-tam, drum, horns and trumpets against the counterpoint of a string choir, the big locomotive at rest and in action. In the words of Honegger, whose piece was first played at Koussevitzky's concerts in Paris last spring, "The music begins with the quiet breathing of the machine at rest. Then follow the straining start, the gathering speed, the progress from mood to mood, as a 300-ton train hurtles through the dark night, racing 120 miles an hour."

ESTABLISHED 1881
From
TELEGRAM
New York City

OCT 11 1924

"Pacific 231."

Under the direction of Sorge Koussevitsky the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon introduced the Hum to Arthur Honegger's "Pacific 231," a symphonic interpretation of the American locomotive which took the composer across the country some time ago.

The work, which interested and surprised Paris last spring, is described as follows by the author:—

The music begins with the quiet breathing of the engine at rest. Then follow the straining start, the gathering speed, the progress from mood to mood, as a 300-ton train hurtles through the dark night, racing 120 miles an hour.

To bracket the less with the more important, the late George Grossmith, of "Mikado" fame, used to give on the concert stage, with the assistance of only a piano, a vivid description of a railroad journey, while Richard Strauss in his Sinfonia Domestica set forth such striking details as the bath and spanking of that angel of the house the baby.

Metzinger, Picabia and other modernist painters have used static machinery in their still life pictures. It is natural enough that a modernist maker of music should try to show machinery when it is dynamic.

The arts are getting on all along the line.

Oct. 11, 1924

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY,

Koussevitzky Begins--

FOUR-FOLD COMES A NEW CONDUCTOR TO BOSTON STAGE

THE QUALITY AND THE RANK OF MR. KOUSSEVITZKY

Master of Line, Color, Tone and Characterization in Music—From Vivaldi and Brahms to Berlioz and Skriabin—Impressions Along the Way—The Interlude of Honegger's "Pacific"—Audience and Orchestra

CONDUCTOR, orchestra and audi- every regarded every tradition; fulfilled every rite. On the tick of two-thirty yesterday afternoon Mr. Koussevitzky emerged upon the stage of Symphony Hall; while the shade of Henry Higginson, no doubt watching from the celestial hills, blessed him for such punctuality. As the new conductor crossed to his stand the whole house rose to salute and applaud him. Making the distinction of a musician who cherishes his instrument, he acknowledged first the greeting of the band—with a collective handsake bestowed individually upon Mr. Burgin. Next Mr. Koussevitzky turned to his audience, then to the score of his first piece, an eighteenth-century Concerto by Vivaldi. At the end of the first division many clapped anew, and the conductor courteously suffered the interruption. At the close of the second, with upraised stick he pressed forward over a few insistent hisses.

A more familiar and a showier piece, Berlioz's Overture, "Roman Carnival," drew warmer response. As pleased was the audience with Mr. Koussevitzky's version of Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Haydn; while no modernist music, except Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring," has been so heartily applauded at these concerts as was Honegger's "Pacific, 231." It was as though the audience had discovered of a sudden the French temper which the word "amusant" connotes. Once, twice and three times in the course of these plaudits the conductor transferred them to the standing orchestra, with climax at the end of the concert and of Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy." After all, clapping is an ordinary fervor. Much more significant was the demeanor of this audience of the Fridays. Scarcely anyone was tardy. Hardly anyone departed before the close of the concert. In cursory view, no one seemed to be memorizing the program-book. The cough catarrhal rose not in the land. Clearly Mr. Koussevitzky had stirred Bostonian curiosity; was laying hold upon Bostonian imagination.

No eminent conductor would be worthy of the name and of a new post, did he not, upon arrival, alter the arrangement of the orchestra. Accordingly, the double-basses in Symphony Hall now fringe the left end of the stage with the harps ensconced among the adjacent strings. Back from the wood-wind choir, in the centre of the platform, stretch horns, trumpets and trombones; while to right strings and instruments of percussion again expand. The clear purpose, readily gained, is a concentrating and a deepening of the wind-tone, both brass and reed. Only here and there did a new face rise from the orchestra; but the connoisseurs of method observed that while the bowing of the violins changed with the course of the music, at any given moment it was exactly uniform, evidently under prescription from Mr. Koussevitsky for precise phrasing. To his program, moreover, none might reasonably demur. It ranged many times, temperaments and manners. It arrayed an ancient Italian, a romantic Frenchman, a classic German, a Russian modern, a Parisian modernist. It contained two numbers—one dated 1924—that were heard for the first time in Boston. It was not over-long; cultivated diversity; singled out no piece for virtuoso-display. True, no symphony was included. Long since Mr. Monteux shattered that superfluous precedent. The course of his programs seems also the course of Mr. Koussevitzky's.

In outer semblance, the new conductor somewhat belied report, oral, textual, pictorial. He is in the flower of middle years; but no lingering aura of youth seems to gild them; while to one pair of eyes he was less romantic presence than twentieth-century musician in the unglamored practise of his profession. As he approaches or leaves the stand, his step is quick; his carriage erect; his manner serene; his tailor admirable. Gravely and simply he receives applause; likes not to tarry between numbers. About to begin a piece, Mr. Koussevitzky enforces a moment of suspensive silence upon orchestra and audience as though he would have the music pulse upon the waiting air. Always his beat is clarity itself. Usually it has a graphic precision as of both muscular and spiritual tensity.

Otherwise Mr. Koussevitzky's gesture takes character from the music in hand. In an ancient Concerto, it curves the line and evens the accents. In a romantic overture, like Berlioz's "Roman Carnival," it is sedulous for the dramatizing and poetizing play of the voices, the distribution and shading of the tonal colors. In the Variations of Brahms, it is linear again, light also and adroit. With Monsieur Honegger's locomotive, it whips rhythm, up-piles tonal masses, outflings climax. In Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy," it is like the lean of the conductor's to the composer's intensities and fires. Then does Mr. Koussevitzky ply that characteristic gesture of ingathering arm for outpouring orchestra. Then does he visibly mould great crescendos. Then does his figure rise and draw tense until the whole force of his being has launched the tonal thunderbolt. Koussevitzky superbus, as the old Romans might have written; but Koussevitzky passioning for the music—not for himself.

The fundamental trait, the basic merit, of this conducting is regard for musical line, progress, structure. It expresses itself in a marvellous clarity, precision, onflow. Wagner himself did not more passionately pursue that germ whence music unfolds, expands, runs course, in animating and characterising curve. The clarity is never dry, brittle, hard. The precision is also plastic. The current parts and reparts, gathers, floods, ever unbroken. Under Mr. Koussevitzky's hand Vivaldi's Maestoso upswelled and deepened like a firmament outspread in tones. The Largo was arch-like span of instrumental song. No arabesque might fret or lide the grace of the Finale. The conductor articulated the skeleton—and skeleton it is—of Berlioz's Overture, laid upon it the warm flesh of the orchestral voices; sent the blood of dramatic and pictorial illusion racing through it; while with color every surface glowed or darkened. The austere will say that Mr. Koussevitsky was too limpid, too sensitive, too fanciful with Brahms—they who would gnaw their Johannes in Teutonic chunks. Yet when since Mr. Toscanini played the Variations have they seemed so bright and changeful a pattern in seeming improvisation? There, as clear as the day, was the manifold invention; there, the warming color; there, the teeming fancy.

Honegger's music gathers speed, mass, impetus until it is a race and a thunder of sound, on an instant checked. It might have seemed mere arbitrary process, blocks of tone pushing each other in fiercer and fiercer impact. Mr. Koussevitzky bound it together as force generating motion. The frenzies of Skriabin fill his "Poem of Ecstasy"—tides of longing, surges of exaltation, sighs deep and voluptuous, flames lambent and piercing. It is possible to hear the music as neurotic, erotic, pseudo-Wagnerian maunderings through a full orchestra. Mr. Koussevitzky expanded it as a vision become tones upon the ear, creating its own form, course, substance; fused by its own fires. The ardors and intoxications, the voluptés—as the untranslatable French word has it—of a singular and Slavic temperament became of a sudden universal.

For in Mr. Koussevitzky by the proofs of yesterday dwell those four-fold powers which define and consummate a conductor of the first order. The ability to discover, unfold, curve and modulate the intrinsic and essential line of the music; to weave it into pattern; by pace and rhythm to give it motion; by accent to impart it character. The ability to distribute over the surface of this pattern the harmonic and instrumental colors which are light and shade, heat and cold upon it. The ability to give to each piece and each composer in it his particular voice, quality, life—Vivaldi winding into his staid patterns golden threads of sumptuous, sensuous melody; Berlioz lining and coloring his fresco of a dancing, singing, rioting yet stately Rome, Cellini's city; Brahms twining wreaths of fancy round the grave brows of meditation; Honegger passioning in tones for a machine, writing the music of mass, drive, impact; Skriabin from the depths of longing, loosing his voluptuous sea, till it scales a heaven of plangent ecstasy.

Last, the ability to draw from the orchestra the tone that shall bear these powers and beauties in a manifold eloquence; the accent that shapes and marks; the color that is glamour and relief. Great arcs of tone the Symphony Orchestra achieved yesterday for Skriabin; thudding masses for Honegger; silken threads intertwined for Vivaldi; glows and tumults for Berlioz; ripples and gentle floods for Brahms. Mr. Koussevitzky caresses his slow song with lingering fingers. Yet not once did his orchestra let it sag. Mr. Koussevitzky loves measures cameo-cut. His orchestra was master of such phrasing. With Berlioz, with Skriabin, Mr. Koussevitzky courts the pause, the suspension, the isolated or contrasted timbres that are spur upon the listening nerves. His orchestra is a band of virtuosi in such rhetoric. In all Europe he has not been so well served.

Between Vivaldi eighteenth-century stamped, familiar Brahms and Berlioz, Skriabin not unremembered, stood Monsieur Honegger and his renowned piece to the greater glory of locomotives, "Pacific, 231." He wished to express—the learned "programist" quotes him—"the physical sensation of an engine, not the noise of it." Whoever has made the feint of sleep in a hotel beside a railway yard, will bear witness to the fullness of Monsieur Honegger's achievement at the beginning. There indeed were tones all compact with the "physical sensation" of a locomotive making steam, preparing for the start, getting under way. And these tones were as imitative a music as Strauss ever perpetrated when the sheep bleat or the windmills whir in "Don Quixote"—a feat, a freak, if the listener will, curious, "amusant" but otherwise unimpressive. At the end again, the brakes grip and groan; the train and piece alike stop. "Physical sensation expressed in music," if the composer's note will have it so, but also tones imitating sound.

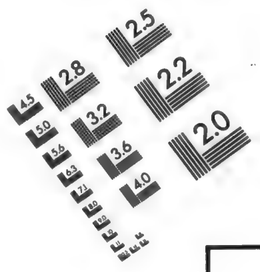
Yet something more, since in this sudden arresting, Monsieur Honegger shows no small mastery in the wielding of tonal masses, the control of rhythmic impacts Once his "Pacific" is gathering speed, once it is hurtling across the night, he writes no imitative music. Veritably he transhistes into a new medium visual image, bodily and spiritual thrill. The pounding rhythms, the mounting speed, the tonal masses at every instant forging new might and impetus—here is music achieving and expressing an imagery that it has never known before. Monsieur Honegger has ceased to be imitative and "amusant" to the pleasure of audiences Parisian or Bostonian. He has added a new energy to tones. He has wrought them into new shapes; trenched them with a new motion. He has found the music not for great rods and cylinders and driving wheels, but for the sensations that this steel wrought into power and mass and motion wakes in the human spirit. To evoke its sensations under new experiences has been the perdurable function of music from the days of Bach, be it in church cantata or suite of dances to the days of Stravinsky crashing through a barbaric "Rite of Spring." Fortunate Monsieur Honegger finding and capturing such sensation from the enginry of our time, and in music, as clearly ours, summoning and releasing it. Power springs in him, imagination also and the courage of both. Only incidentally is he "amusant."

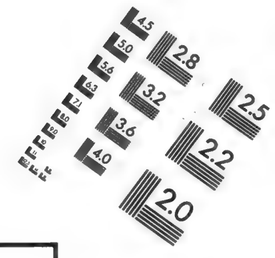
H. T. P.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

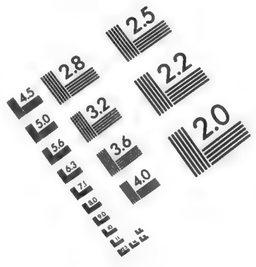


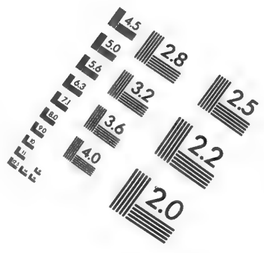


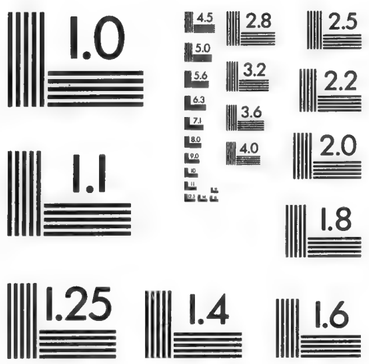
200 mm

150 mm

100 mm







ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

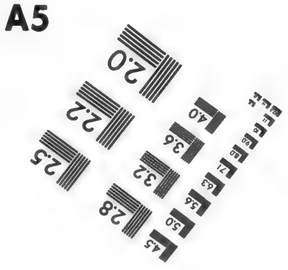
1.0 mm

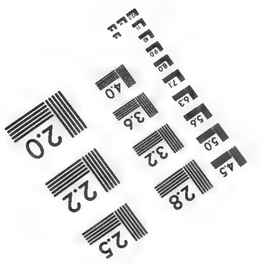
1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

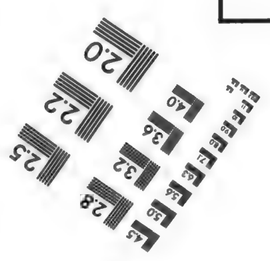
A5

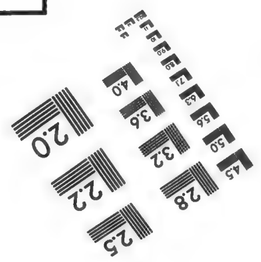




A4

A3





PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

Christian Science Monitor - Sat Musi

Serge Koussevitzky Conducts For the First Time in America

By STUART MASON Oct. 11

THE first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Boston. The program:

Vivaldi.....Concerto in D minor for orchestra and organ (edited by Siloti)
Berlioz..Overture "The Roman Carnival"
Brahms.Variations on a theme by Haydn
Honegger......"Pacific 231"
Scriabin......"The Poem of Ecstasy"

This was the first appearance in America of the new conductor of the orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky. He was enthusiastically applauded by the audience, not only at the beginning and end of the concert, but at each interval of the program.

This program was a novel one, particularly so for the first one of the season. It has been the custom for conductors at the beginning of the season to pay tribute to the classics and to arrange a program of a more conservative character. Yet that of yesterday afternoon contained after all but one absolute novelty, Honegger's "Pacific 231," which was played for the first time in America. The novel effect resulted rather from the arrangement and character of the music itself, and also to some extent from the manner of the performance.

It was quite evident from the first moment that new fashions are to prevail at the Symphony Concerts. The members of the orchestra did not enter one by one or in small groups, as heretofore. Neither did they tune or prelude, as has been their custom from time immemorial, but remained quietly in their places. The seating of the various orchestral groups has been changed, and this decidedly for the better. The double basses are now placed at the back of the stage at the conductor's left, while the brasses form a group immediately behind the woodwind and facing him. The horns, too, no longer form a long line at the back of the stage but sit in two groups of four, one behind the other. Better still, the entire orchestra remains on the stage for the entire concert, so that the seats are occupied at all times and the distracting exits and entrances of the musicians between numbers are eliminated.

Music of Great Variety

Mr. Koussevitzky chose to display his talents in music of great variety, ranging from Vivaldi of the late seventeenth century to Honegger of our own time, it may be somewhat in advance of it. In this varied music Mr. Koussevitzky made a striking impression, not by trickery or sensationalism, as one might have been led to expect from certain remarks and criticisms which have been circulated, but by an artistry which is immediately apparent. There can be no doubt, even after a single concert, of his mastery of his art or of his musical understanding, of his sincerity or of his emotional power. Yesterday there was no attempt to force his personality into the music, no apparent desire to astonish his hearers by effects or "readings." His sole desire seemed to be to play the music in hand for its own worth and even in Honegger's "Pacific 231," a piece in which many a conductor would have grievously sinned by overemphasis, he exercised a restraint and displayed a sense of proportion and balance which were above criticism.

Whatever Mr. Koussevitzky's conceptions may be of the music which he is to play during the coming season and no matter how different they may be from the preconceived views of many of his hearers, it is safe to say that he will never fail to give performances characterized by good taste and real musical feeling. Mr. Koussevitzky found on his arrival here an orchestra carefully and skillfully trained by Mr. Monteux, a superb instrument ready at hand. It will be no small task to keep the orchestra to this high standard of technical perfection. Of Mr. Koussevitzky's powers as a disciplinarian we have yet to learn.

Honegger's "Pacific 231"

The afternoon's novelty was Honegger's "Pacific 231," which, as is usual with music of radical tendency, is bound to provoke discussion. Lovers of formalism in music are bound to detest it, but those who are willing and ready to recognize the fact that the fundamentals of musical æsthetics change from generation to generation are bound to find much to admire in it. The average concertgoer appreciates the difference between the modes of musical thought of Beethoven and Schumann, for instance, and seems able to summon the mood necessary for the proper enjoyment and understanding of their music; yet strangely enough he finds it often impossible to realize that the music of a Honegger or a Stravinsky depends just as much on a proper attitude on the part of the hearer. Granted that certain musical conventions consecrated by years of usage may be done away with, this piece by Honegger contains nothing which may not properly be called musical. In fact, once it is recognized that the means of expression adopted are not intended to be those in common use among composers, it is seen that there are many pages of real beauty and expressiveness and that underlying the whole composition is a wealth of poetry and imaginative thought. And in hearing this piece it is well to remember that in due course of time these new harmonies and orchestral colors will become themselves conventionalized and accepted as common musical parlance. New musical idioms must be studied and an effort made to comprehend them before they are condemned, for art is not altogether a matter of facile enjoyment.

Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" contains many eloquent passages. Much of it now sounds old-fashioned and long drawn out, its climaxes often theatrical; yet Mr. Koussevitzky played it with such Slavic fervor that it almost sounded like great music. Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" sounded as fresh and sparkling as on the day on which it was written, and Brahms' Variations as dull and clumsy as ever. Even Mr. Koussevitzky could not make them interesting, although the orchestra played them with the greatest virtuosity.

If yesterday's concert, both in its program and in the playing of it, may be taken as a sign of what is to come during the present season, the patrons of the Symphony Concerts may look forward to a winter of unalloyed delight.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK,
N. Y.
EVENING POST

OCT 11 1924

Serge Koussevitzky, New Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, Directs First Concert

Personnel of the Band the Same as Last Year—Five Pairs of Concerts to Be Given in Carnegie Hall

Under its new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the usual double series of five Thursday evening, and five Saturday afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall, on the following dates: November 27 and 29, January 1 and 3, January 29 and 31, March 12 and 14, and April 9 and 11. The present season is the forty-fourth of this orchestra, and will be the thirty-ninth in New York.

With the personnel exactly the same as that of last year, the interest in the present season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra centers in the new conductor. Serge Koussevitzky made his American debut yesterday at the opening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season, in Symphony Hall, Boston. The program of the occasion included: Vivaldi's "Concerto in D minor," Berlioz's overture "The Roman Carnival," Brahms's "Variations on a Theme by Haydn," Honegger's "Pacific 231," and Scriabin's "Le Poeme de l'extase."

The Russian conductor will put on his New York programs several new scores which he has introduced in Europe with much success, but which are still unheard in this country. The classical repertory will form the bulk of each series.

In deciding upon the soloists for the Boston, New York, and other concerts, Mr. Koussevitzky has always considered particular scores of orchestral importance with solo parts suited to the particular genius of the artists. Thus we will preserve the symphonic integrity of his programs. The soloists for the New York concerts will include: Roland Hayes in the Thursday evening series, Serge Rachmaninoff in the Saturday afternoon series, and Albert Spalding in each series.

Mr. Koussevitzky comes to America from an active season in Western Europe, where he has been giving his annual series as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra, and his series of "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris; he has likewise been conducting operas at the Paris Grand Opera, and in Barcelona.

In that part of the world, for the last four seasons, Koussevitzky has been a striking figure and a dominant personality in the concert halls. He is named as the only great conductor whom America has yet to hear. He will be the first Russian to conduct this orchestra.

Before 1920, Koussevitzky's career was largely confined to his own country. He was born in Tver, in Northern Russia, in 1874. At the age of twelve, he conducted the town theatre orchestra. At the Moscow conservatory, he was required to study either a brass instrument or the double bass. He chose the latter, became a remarkable virtuoso, toured Europe with his double bass, and composed for it.

So narrow a field could not hold him and in 1909 he organized and subsidized the "Koussevitzky Orchestra," which soon became famous throughout Russia. Besides regular series in Moscow and Petrograd, he gave each spring, Bach, Beethoven, Tchaikovsky and Rimsky-Korsakoff festivals, etc. Each summer he took his forces the length and breadth of his country, even chartering a Volga steamer. He gave free concerts in countless provincial towns where symphonic music had been unknown.

BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

OCT 11 1924

Symphony Orchestra

AT the second pair of Symphony Concerts in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next, Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct for the first times hereabouts in a Symphony of Beethoven—the Fifth, in C minor. It fills the second part of his program. He divides the first between Handel's Concerto Grosso in D minor for Strings; a Dance of Debussy transformed by Ravel from piano into orchestral piece; and a long Suite from de Falla's opera-ballet "El Amor Brujo" or "Love the Sorcerer." By sub-titles, it seems to contain for the most part, dances and exercises in magic.

On Thursday evening in Sanders Theater at Harvard University the Symphony Orchestra will begin its annual series of concerts in Cambridge. As in Boston, Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct in Beethoven's Fifth Symphony; Handel's Concerto Grosso in D minor for Strings; the Suite from de Falla's opera-ballet, "El Amor Brujo" or "Love the Sorcerer." To these three pieces, he will add Berlioz's Overture, "Roman Carnival."

BOSTON, MASS.
HERALD

OCT 11 1924

WELCOMES NEW SYMPHONY HEAD

Crowded Hall Greets Koussevitsky as 44th Season Opens

FIRST PROGRAM IS INTERESTING

By PHILIP HALE

The 44th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted for the first time in the United States. The hall was completely filled with an audience that was enthusiastic from the time the conductor stepped on the stage to the final chord of "The Poem of Ecstasy" and after The program was as follows: Vivaldi-Siloti, concerto, D minor, for orchestra and organ (first time in America); Berlioz, "The Roman Carnival"; Brahms, Variations on a Theme by Haydn; Honegger, "Pacific 231," first time in America); Scriabin, "The Poem of Ecstasy."

When Mr. Nikisch succeeded Mr. Gericke he said after the first rehearsal, delighted by the technical proficiency and euphony of the Boston orchestra: "All I have to do now is to poeticize."

Mr. Monteux left a superb instrument, the work of his own creation, for Mr. Koussevitzky to play upon.

No conductor, however expert, and no orchestra, however elastic and responsive, can in a week or 10 days become so intimate in relationship that the players are the unfailing interpreters of the conductor's eloquence and passion. Further acquaintance will undoubtedly be to the advantage of these players and their conductor. His talent, his genius will shine the more brilliantly; his limitations, if he has them, will the more clearly appeal.

Yet this in all justice may now be said. Mr. Koussevitzky has a commanding figure and that indefinable quality known as magnetism which works its spell on orchestra and audience. When he faces his public he is neither arrogant nor obsequious. He at once inspires confidence, expectation, curiosity. These are all valuable qualities for a conductor to possess in these nervous, restless, questioning years.

It is evidence that Mr. Koussevitzky is imaginative; that while he can be sensuous in gaining effects of color, this sensuousness is controlled by a cool head. He probably approves the famous paradox of Diderot. He surely sympathizes with the dictum of Mozart: "Music should sound." There is no fear in his breast of pedantic saws and cold or stuffed traditions; he thinks for himself; he feels the music in his own way; he hears its appeal without caring how it appealed or appeals to others.

He knows that melodic figures should be sung, yet he is not given to sentimentalism. He realizes the value of tonal proportion. When he delights in strong contrasts, it is not merely to win the applause of the unthinking. He is dramatic, but yesterday he was not theatrical.

These are hastly impressions made by his leadership at one concert. It is always rash to prophesy, but, after all, is it rash to predict that the season of 1924-25 will be a brilliant one?

How Mr. Koussevitzy will please as a maker of programs remains to be seen. Yesterday's was interesting, one designed to please the reactionaries, for if they shuddered, seeing the names of Honegger and Scriabin, those sons of Belial, the program was so arranged that they could leave in peace after hearing music by their beloved Johannes Brahms.

The concerto by Vivaldi had been played here in its original form, at a concert of the 18th Century Symphony orchestra, led by Mr. Martino on Feb. 24 of this year. Mr. Siloti's transcription, with its wood-wind instruments and organ, was played in this country for the first time. The engrossing portion of the work is the beautiful Largo, which was played in a spirit of rival beauty. There was a dazzling performance of "The Roman Carnival," in which Mr. Speyer distinguished himself by his solo for the English horn. Our old friend Johannes Brahms was treated with due respect: there was no attempt to "modernize" his moods, nor was Mr. Koussevitzky's rending painfully academic.

Honegger attempted in his "Pacific 231" to express in tones not the noise of a locomotive engine, "but the visual impression and the physical sensation of it." He wished to depict the "quiet respiration" of the engine "in a state of immobility"; then its panting to be off; then the constant gain in speed. The piece is amusing, it even gives the hearer what Athenaeus said was one of music's missions: "a gentlemanlike joy." No doubt, this music of Honegger's is "clever," but cleverness in music quickly palls. Louis Antoine Jullien years ago in this country excited wild enthusiasm by his "Firemen's Quadrille," in which a conflagration, the bells, the rush of the firemen, the squirting and the shout of the foreman, "Wash her Thirteen!" were graphically portrayed.

Scriabin's hysterical "Poem of Ecstacy," with its theosophically Wagnerian pages, its fits and starts, its boisterous swellings and its dying falls, was performed con amore and loudly applauded. Perhaps some day we shall appreciate Scriabin's music and join with Dr. Hull and some others in hailing him "Moster." Some day, some day!

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Handel, Concerto Grosso, D minor, op. 6, No. 10; Debussy-Ravel, Danse; De Falla, "El Amor Brujo" (with Mr. Sanroma, pianist); Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

136

BOSTON, MASS.
CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

OCT 11 1924

Serge Koussevitzky Conducts For the First Time in America

By STUART MASON

THE first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Boston. The program:

Vivaldi.....Concerto in D minor for orchestra and organ (edited by Siloti)
Berlioz..Overture "The Roman Carnival"
Brahms.Variations on a theme by Haydn
Honegger......"Pacific 231"
Scriabin....."The Poem of Ecstasy"

This was the first appearance in America of the new conductor of the orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky. He was enthusiastically applauded by the audience, not only at the beginning and end of the concert, but at each interval of the program.

This program was a novel one, particularly so for the first one of the season. It has been the custom for conductors at the beginning of the season to pay tribute to the classics and to arrange a program of a more conservative character. Yet that of yesterday afternoon contained after all but one absolute novelty, Honegger's "Pacific 231," which was played for the first time in America. The novel effect resulted rather from the arrangement and character of the music itself, and also to some extent from the manner of the performance.

It was quite evident from the first moment that new fashions are to prevail at the Symphony Concerts. The members of the orchestra did not enter one by one or in small groups, as heretofore. Neither did they tune or prelude, as has been their custom from time immemorial, but remained quietly in their places. The seating of the various orchestral groups has been changed, and this decidedly for the better. The double basses are now placed at the back of the stage at the conductor's left, while the brasses form a group immediately behind the woodwind and facing him. The horns, too, no longer form a long line at the back of the stage but sit in two groups of four, one behind the other. Better still, the entire orchestra remains on the stage for the entire concert, so that the seats are occupied at all times and the distracting exits and entrances of the musicians between numbers are eliminated.

Music of Great Variety

Mr. Koussevitzky chose to display his talents in music of great variety, ranging from Vivaldi of the late seventeenth century to Honegger of our own time, it may be somewhat in advance of it. In this varied music Mr. Koussevitzky made a striking impression, not by trickery or sensationalism, as one might have been led to expect from certain remarks and criticisms which have been circulated, but by an artistry which is immediately apparent. There can be no doubt, even after a single concert, of his mastery of his art or of his musical understanding, of his sincerity or of his emotional power. Yesterday there was no attempt to force his personality into the music, no apparent desire to astonish his hearers by effects or "readings." His sole desire seemed to be to play the music in hand for its own worth and even in Honegger's "Pacific 231," a piece in which many a conductor would have grievously sinned by overemphasis, he exercised a restraint and displayed a sense of proportion and balance which were above criticism.

Whatever Mr. Koussevitzky's conceptions may be of the music which he is to play during the coming season and no matter how different they may be from the preconceived views of many of his hearers, it is safe to say that he will never fail to give performances characterized by good taste and real musical feeling. Mr. Koussevitzky found on his arrival here an orchestra carefully and skillfully trained by Mr. Monteux, a superb instrument ready at hand. It will be no small task to keep the orchestra to this high standard of technical perfection. Of Mr. Koussevitzky's powers as a disciplinarian we have yet to learn.

Honegger's "Pacific 231"

The afternoon's novelty was Honegger's "Pacific 231," which, as is usual with music of radical tendency, is bound to provoke discussion. Lovers of formalism in music are bound to detest it, but those who are willing and ready to recognize the fact that the fundamentals of musical æsthetics change from generation to generation are bound to find much to admire in it. The average concertgoer appreciates the difference between the modes of musical thought of Beethoven and Schumann, for instance, and seems able to summon the mood necessary for the proper enjoyment and understanding of their music; yet strangely enough he finds it often impossible to realize that the music of a Honegger or a Stravinsky depends just as much on a proper attitude on the part of the hearer. Granted that certain musical conventions consecrated by years of usage may be done away with, this piece by Honegger contains nothing which may not properly be called musical. In fact, once it is recognized that the means of expression adopted are not intended to be those in common use among composers, it is seen that there are many pages of real beauty and expressiveness and that underlying the whole composition is a wealth of poetry and imaginative thought. And in hearing this piece it is well to remember that in due course of time these new harmonies and orchestral colors will become themselves conventionalized and accepted as common musical parlance. New musical idioms must be studied and an effort made to comprehend them before they are condemned, for art is not altogether a matter of facile enjoyment.

Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" contains many eloquent passages. Much of it now sounds old-fashioned and long drawn out, its climaxes often theatrical; yet Mr. Koussevitzky played it with such Slavic fervor that it almost sounded like great music. Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" sounded as fresh and sparkling as on the day on which it was written, and Brahms' Variations as dull and clumsy as ever. Even Mr. Koussevitzky could not make them interesting, although the orchestra played them with the greatest virtuosity.

If yesterday's concert, both in its program and in the playing of it, may be taken as a sign of what is to come during the present season, the patrons of the Symphony Concerts may look forward to a winter of unalloyed delight.

Serge Koussevitzky, New Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, Directs First Concert

Personnel of the Band the Same as Last Year—Five Pairs of Concerts to Be Given in Carnegie Hall

Under its new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the usual double series of five Thursday evening, and five Saturday afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall, on the following dates: November 27 and 29, January 1 and 3, January 29 and 31, March 12 and 14, and April 9 and 11. The present season is the forty-fourth of this orchestra, and will be the thirty-ninth in New York.

With the personnel exactly the same as that of last year, the interest in the present season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra centers in the new conductor. Serge Koussevitzky made his American debut yesterday at the opening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season, in Symphony Hall, Boston. The program of the occasion included: Vivaldi's "Concerto in D minor," Berlioz's overture "The Roman Carnival," Brahms's "Variations on a Theme by Haydn," Honegger's "Pacific 231," and Scriabin's "Le Poeme de l'extase."

The Russian conductor will put on his New York programs several new scores which he has introduced in Europe with much success, but which are still unheard in this country. The classical repertory will form the bulk of each series.

In deciding upon the soloists for the Boston, New York, and other concerts, Mr. Koussevitzky has always considered particular scores of orchestral importance with solo parts suited to the particular genius of the artists. Thus we will preserve the symphonic integrity of his programs. The soloists for the New York concerts will include: Roland Hayes in the Thursday evening series, Serge Rachmaninoff in the Saturday afternoon series, and Albert Spalding in each series.

Mr. Koussevitzky comes to America from an active season in Western Europe, where he has been giving his annual series as guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra, and his series of "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris; he has likewise been conducting operas at the Paris Grand Opera, and in Barcelona.

In that part of the world, for the last four seasons, Koussevitzky has been a striking figure and a dominant personality in the concert halls. He is named as the only great conductor whom America has yet to hear. He will be the first Russian to conduct this orchestra.

Before 1920, Koussevitzky's career was largely confined to his own country. He was born in Tver, in Northern Russia, in 1874. At the age of twelve, he conducted the town theatre orchestra. At the Moscow conservatory, he was required to study either a brass instrument or the double bass. He chose the latter, became a remarkable virtuoso, toured Europe with his double bass, and composed for it.

So narrow a field could not hold him and in 1909 he organized and subsidized the "Koussevitzky Orchestra," which soon became famous throughout Russia. Besides regular series in Moscow and Petrograd, he gave each spring, Bach, Beethoven, Tchaikovsky and Rimsky-Korsakoff festivals, etc. Each summer he took his forces the length and breadth of his country, even chartering a Volga steamer. He gave free concerts in countless provincial towns where symphonic music had been unknown.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

OCT 11 1924

Boston Symphony.

Local music lovers who look forward to hearing Serge Koussevitzki conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra here November 13, under the local management of Bessie Bellanca, will be interested in the new conductor's statement of his attitude on the subject of orchestral programs. "I would like to make it clear," the celebrated Russian said, "that I am neither modernist nor classicist in my musical preferences. The works of the great classic masters are absolutely indispensable to me, as musician and in my life. No one would less willingly be without them than I. But music is not a static art. Music is continually being made which is an expression of the period in which it appears. It is necessary for us to know what is being done, as it is to know and admire what has been done. As for the value of the new works, the conductor uses his best judgment in producing them. He must leave the rest to the judgment of time."

The fiery intensity of Koussevitzki's personality and his rugged force have shocked many critics who have accused him of over-vehemence. W. H. Haddon Squire, London music critic, replying to those who have brought this charge, pointed out that to such critics the "right" interpretation is the one they like, and the "wrong," the one they don't. Koussevitzki holds that there is no such thing as a single immutably "right" reading for every work. He agrees with Arthur Symons that beauty is infinitely various, and he is full of contempt for conductors who approach and interpret the music of Bach and Beethoven, for example, as if it were written by marble busts.

Adv. Sat. Oct 11.

PAGE SIXTEEN

KOUSSEVITZKY'S BOSTON DEBUT RARE TRIUMPH

By E. F. HARKINS.

Serge Koussevitzky's American debut as new leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was made yesterday with a brilliance that might fairly be described as an epochal event in the musical history of the United States. The famous Boston orchestra's first Russian conductor gave an engrossing and thrilling exhibition of the virtuosity that won so much sincere admiration for him in Europe, from London to Petrograd. And it should be added that the orchestra itself, though it remains virtually unchanged as regards personnel, met his every demand with a virtuoso style matching his own.

Serge Koussevitzky

SERIES OF OVATIONS.

This first concert of the 44th season was a series of ovations. Seldom has a concert audience shown such enthusiasm; and in the crowd at Symphony Hall, by the way, were many noted musicians from other cities, especially New York. They, too, took part in the outbursts of applause showered upon conductor and orchestra. The acclaim was spontaneous, unanimous, from the moment the audience stood up to greet Koussevitzky until the end, after the electrical finale of Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy."

Repeatedly the new leader waved his appreciation of the splendidly artistic work of the orchestra. He shook hands with Concertmaster Burgin and finally complimented the soloist of every nearby section. He was enthusiastic on his own part, and had good reason to be. It was a memorable debut, excelling anything of the kind in Symphony annals.

TWO NOVELTIES

The first program, which will be played tonight, comprises the Vivaldi concerto for orchestra and organ, arranged by Siloti; Berlioz' "Roman Carnival" overture; Brahms' "Variations on a Theme by Haydn"; Honegger's impressionistic tone picture, "Pacific 231," a musical tribute to the locomotive, and the Scriabin tone poem. The Vivaldi and Honegger works were performed for the first time in this country.

MUSICAL GIANT

Koussevitzky is a musical giant, a man of remarkable breadth of feeling, ranging from the serene and almost celestial beauty he made the orchestra extract from the Vivaldi concerto, to the intensely dramatic climaxes that marked his reading of the Berlioz and Scriabin numbers. His range of power has been equalled only in Toscanini performances. His magnetism, his fund of inspiration, would work wonders with any orchestra. Working as it did yesterday upon one of the best orchestras in the world, the effect from first to last was superlatively impressive.

The Boston Symphony has again a conductor worthy of its mettle.

18 N.Y. Tim[illegible] Oct

KOUSSEVITZKY GETS OVATION IN BOSTON

Oct 11

Conductor Is Warmly Received by Audience in His Symphony Hall Debut.

GIVES "POEM OF ECSTASY"

The Music of Vivaldi and Honegger Heard for the First Time in America.

By OLIN DOWNES.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Mass., Oct. 10.—Serge Koussevitzky made his American début this afternoon in Symphony Hall as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is a conservative statement to say that he made an excellent impression upon the audience, which rose to greet him when he appeared on the platform, and remained at the end of the concert to applaud him long after the last score of Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstacy" had sounded.

Koussevitsky is not the prima donna type of conductor that some have called him, but he is a striking figure on the stage. His authority is so complete that it is sensed before it is demonstrated, and when there is an occasion for a dramatic gesture he can make one. His gestures, however, are not excessive. There were moments when he allowed the orchestra to play itself, giving the players their heads, with no animating effort on his part save the extremely mobile play of feature and communicating eye. At other moments he was the imperious leader, a hand and forefinger outstretched in command, a picture of dynamic, compelling energy. In a word, Mr. Koussevitsky has the qualities and the "magnetism" especially valuable for public success in this country, of the virtuoso conductor. He has these but he has more. It is possible to say, after a single concert, that at the least he is a musician who feels deeply his mission, who interprets with flaming temperament and communicative power.

The program consisted of the Vivaldi concerto for orchestra and organ in D minor, asedited by Alexander Siloti; Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture, the Brahms "Variations" on a theme of Haydn, Honegger's symphonic movement, "Pacific 231," and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy."

New Music Heard.

The music of Vivaldi and Honegger was heard for the first time in America. The concerto and the Brahms-Handel variations were played in a way calculated to dispose at once of the idea originated somewhere is Europe that Mr. Koussevitsky was irreverent and eccentric in his treatment of classic masters. Both compositions were given straightforward, substantial and healthfily musical readings—the Vivaldi music lacking in places a measure of the fineness of execution which it is reasonable to expect later and onan occasion perhaps of less tension—Handel's work being played with a breadth and musicality which was neither exaggerated nor academic. There was all the clarity of and proportion in this reading that a conservative would have desired and a spontaniety and force most desirable and often missing.

As the concert progressed enthusiasm grew. The Berlioz overture, it is true, had a certain stiffness in the introduction and verged perilously on noise at the conclusion which, nevertheless, evoked a storm of applause. The climax of the concert came with the compositions of Honneger and Scriabin.

Honegger's piece is not only interesting and very well made; it appears as a genuine expression of certain characteristics of this age. "Pacific 231" is a great locomotive. "Pacific 231" is the musical composition concerning which Honegger said, prior to the performance last Spring in Paris: "I have always had a passionate love of locomotives. To me they—and I love them passionately, as other are passionate in their love for horses or women—are living creatures." He has attempted to give a tonal portrayal of the great monster, the joyous giant, as it stands motionless, just breathing; as it starts its movement: as it hurtles through the night at 120 miles an hour. The music is superbly made; it is witty and joyous, full of youth, a laughing welcome to the day and its dynamic power.

The cumulative, hastening rhythms, which extend and metamorphose themselves in different parts of the orchestra in turn generate a song, the music grows in co-ordinated clamor, movement, swiftness. The conclusion is admirably conceived and might not have been carried out so successfully by a less gifted composer. For the thing comes to a stop logically, effectively, in a few measures. The gigantic tonal evolutions as one might call them slow up and with crashing and splendidly discordant harmonic combinations bring the end.

Sweeps His Audience.

A less gifted conductor than Koussevitsky could hardly have failed—provided he could marshal and control its rhythms—in making a success with this piece, and the same thing is true in a degree of "Le Poem De l'Extase," which followed. But this latter work is evidently peculiarly his and he swept his audience from its feet with it. Moreover, he gave the music a character, proportion and signifance which it usually lacks. Any conductor will mount to the final climax, but few conductors will refrain from too quickly anticipating it. Under Koussevitsky the mounting ardors and exultations of whatis essentially a bacchanale, a Venusberg if there ever was one in tones, are held in superb control. They advance and recede, as waves advance and recede, but always advance farther.

And when at last the great climax came, it came with a brilliancy, with a drenching richness of color, which had almost the effet of blinding light on the eyes. Every choir of the orchestra contributed its tint to the rainbow, and there stood Mr. Koussevitsky, his features and his nervous hands betraying his own excitement in the music.

There will, of course, be divisions of opinion concerning his readings, but there was no mistaking the excitement of the audience and the enthusiasm of his welcome. It is plain that there is a new and significant figure among conductors in America today, and that he is at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

American Sat Oct 11

N——A Paper for People

KOUSSEVITZKY SCORES IN 1ST SYMPHONY

Boston Assured of Musical Leader Ranking With Best

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its 44th season yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall. Serge Koussevitzky conducted. The appearance of the new conductor, who came here preceded by a great reputation from abroad, was the principal magnet in drawing the crowded house.

Timid souls who are afraid of the radicalism of the new conductor could find little comfort in yesterday's program, which follows: Vivaldi, concerto in D minor for orchestra with organ (edited by A. Siloti), Berlioz, "Roman Carnival" overture, Brahms, "Variations on a Theme by Haydn." Honegger, "Pacific 231," Orchestral Movement. Scriabin, "The Poem of Ecstasy."

OMITS SYMPHONY.

Never before has a first concert failed to include a symphony. Not only that, but two numbers were played for the first time in America, the Vivaldi piece and the Honegger piece. Add to this fact that Honegger is a musical "Red" of the left, and it begins to look as if insult were added to injury.

Honegger's "Pacific 231" is bewildering music. One hearing left the listener with nothing to catch hold of except the impression of a gigantic locomotive starting slowly, snorting out puffs of smoke and creaking loudly, then gradually picking up speed, till it is in headlong flight at 120 miles an hour. An amazing knowledge and use of orchestral tricks gives the effect of great speed.

CONDUCTING DRAMATIC.

Mr. Koussevitzky's conducting was dramatic. The end of the piece found him dripping with perspiration. On the basis of yesterday's performance, Boston is assured of a conductor who takes rank as one of the greatest in the world, a man of great dramatic and histrionic genius as well as an authoritative musician and skill ful leader.

The orchestra is practically a veteran organization. This is one reason why it played so well, though there was only a week of rehearsing before the opening of the season. The concert will be repeated tonight.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Symphony Orchestra

AT the second pair of Symphony Concerts in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct for the first times hereabouts in a Symphony of Beethoven—the Fifth, in C minor. It fills the second part of his program. He divides the first between Handel's Concerto Grosso in D minor for Strings; a Dance of Debussy transformed by Ravel from piano into orchestral piece; and a long Suite from de Falla's opera-ballet "El Amor Brujo" or "Love the Sorcerer." By sub-titles, it seems to contain for the most part, dances and exercises in magic.

On Thursday evening in Sanders Theater at Harvard University the Symphony Orchestra will begin its annual series of concerts in Cambridge. As in Boston, Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct in Beethoven's Fifth Symphony; Handel's Concerto Grosso in D minor for Strings; the Suite from de Falla's opera-ballet, "El Amor Brujo" or "Love the Sorcerer." To these three pieces, he will add Berlioz's Overture, "Roman Carnival."

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION

OCT 11 1924

Boston Symphony Orchestra

In the much anticipated concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 105 men at the State Armory, Monday evening, November 10, under the management of Ben Franklin, a great deal of interest will be centred in the appearance of the new conductor of the organization, Serge Koussevitzky, who only recently arrived in this country, eager to begin his engagement as head of the world famous organization. Mr. Koussevitzky was born in Tver, North Russia, in 1874, and is described as a man of intense emotions, active and alert, with a fine personality, but with no mannerisms to speak of. His conducting is intense, but his movements reflect his mood, and he has a degree of bodily command that pertains to few conductors. He is said to be a man of immense wealth, and for a long time supported a large orchestra with which he toured Europe and created a sensation. But those who have heard it say that it did not compare with the Boston organization, and that he will be seen and heard to greater advantage with the Boston players. It is in Paris and London where he made his greatest successes, and he never was announced but that an overflow audience greeted him. It is a matter for congratulation that Schenectady lovers of music are to have the opportunity to welcome this great conductor at the head of such a superb body of instrumentalists, and there is little doubt the welcome will be both cordial and hearty. Mail orders for seats sent to Ben Franklin, in care of Cluett and Sons, will be filled in the sequence of receipt, and phone orders to Cluett's will also command prompt attention.

BOSTON, MASS.
POST

OCT 11 1924

THE NEW CONDUCTOR

For the first time in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a Russian takes up the baton as regular conductor of this great organization, our pride and —let us freely admit it—our boast. Its career began with a German for leader, and its latest conductor was a Frenchman. In earlier days a Hungarian, the brilliant Nikisch, directed its musical ways. But the Teutons have had by far the preponderance of encumbency.

With the artistic and musical effect of Koussevitzky's first concert, the Post's musical critic, Mr. Smith, will deal this morning. Enough to say here that the advent of the new conductor marks the beginning of a distinctly fresh era in the annals of the orchestra. Time alone can tell just what the ultimate effect will be on public and performance. But the early augury seems favorable.

THE NEW CONDUCTOR

For the first time in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a Russian takes up the baton as regular conductor of this great organization, our pride and —let us freely admit it—our boast. Its career began with a German for leader, and its latest conductor was a Frenchman. In earlier days a Hungarian, the brilliant Nikisch, directed its musical ways. But the Teutons have had by far the preponderance of encumbency.

With the artistic and musical effect of Koussevitzky's first concert, the Post's musical critic, Mr. Smith, will deal this morning. Enough to say here that the advent of the new conductor marks the beginning of a distinctly fresh era in the annals of the orchestra. Time alone can tell just what the ultimate effect will be on public and performance. But the early augury seems favorable.

Mr. Kussevitzky began his term with the Boston Symphony in its home town yesterday, playing music of Vivaldi, Weber and Wagner, Honegger's "Pacific 231" and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy."

N.Y. Graphic

OCT 11 1924

Live in Today!

Music is catching up with modern life.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra this season will play "Pacific 231," which is the musical interpretation of a big locomotive speeding across the continent at 120 miles an hour.

All great things are great because in some manner they reflect their own times. They are even greater when they accurately forecast the future.

Mankind has always been too absorbed in its daily problems to worry much about the thoughts and tribulations of people long dead and out of date.

This is why Theodore Dreiser, American novelist, will be read when Sabatini has turned to dust.

Dreiser has looked around him.

He has seen the romance of the subway, the elevated, the harbor, Wall Street.

If you are interested in things about you, read Dreiser.

SCHENECTADY
N. Y.
GAZETTE

OCT 11 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

In the coming concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 105 artists at the State Armory Monday evening, November 10, under the management of Ben Franklin, much interest will be centered in the appearance of Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the organization, who only recently arrived in this country. He is described as having a most magnetic personality with no mannerisms to speak of, but intense in his desire to get the most out of the music being interpreted, and to lead his players exactly as he desires them to play. He is a favorite in Europe where he maintained an orchestra at his own expense. There is nothing methodical in his work. With such an organization as the Boston orchestra he is expected to do wonders. Mail orders for seats addressed to Mr. Franklin, in care of Cluett and Sons, will be filled in the sequence of receipt, and telephone orders to Cluett's will also receive prompt attention.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

OCT 11 1924

Boston Symphony Opens Season.

Boston, Oct. 10.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Serge Koussevitsky, noted Russian conductor, opened its 44th annual season here today. The firts programme offered by the new conductor, whose interpretations met vehement applause from the audience and warm praise from critics, included works of both older masters and modern composers.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
TIMES-UNION

OCT 11 1924

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TIMES
OCT 11 1924

* * *

Director Kussevitski, the widely heralded new director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, began his new duties in that city during the present week. The program included compositions by Vivaldi, Wagner, Weber, Scriabin, and "Pacific 231" by Honegger.

* * *

in which aboard the Spanish ... taken under Cape Spartel he had determined upon that voyage to England to present his reckoning to his brother.

He told his story simply and without too great a wealth of detail, yet he omitted nothing of all that had gone to place him where he stood. And she, listening, was so profoundly moved that at one moment her eyes glistened with tears which she sought vainly to repress. Yet he, pacing there, absorbed, with head bowed and eyes that never once strayed in her direction, saw none of this.

"And so," he said, when at last that odd narrative had reached its end, "you know what the forces were that drove me. Another stronger than myself might have resisted and preferred to suffer death. But I was not strong enough. Or perhaps it is that stronger than myself was my desire to punish, to vent the bitter hatred into which my erstwhile love for Lionel was turned."

"And for me, too—as you have told

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
OCT 11 1924

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its ... season yesterday under its new leader, Koussevitzky, which was his first appearance in America.

The ...

BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
OCT 11 1924

... in C major, the Andante Favori in F major.

Saturday evening, Nov. 1, in Symphony Hall, the fourth of the evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Koussevitzky conducting.

Tel. Chelsea 8600

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN
OCT 11 1924

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The forty-fourth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be ... annual series of concerts as guest conductor of the London Symphony and his series of "Concerts" Koussewitsky" in Paris are outstanding events in the European season.

Mr. Koussewitsky's programs for the Brooklyn season will include several new scores, both modern and classic, which have aroused interest abroad, but which have not been heard in this country. The new conductor has also decided upon his soloists, bearing in mind scores with solo parts particularly suited to the genius of each artist. These soloists will include Sergi Rachmaninow, the Russian pianist-composer, who will play the solo part in one of his own concertos, break"

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN
OCT 12 1924

Metropolitan musicians led ...

Koussevitzky Feature of Boston Symphony Concert

Serge Koussevitzky, the great Russian conductor and European celebrity, who opened the season of the Boston Symphony concerts in Boston last Friday, is naturally the center of interest in the pending Boston Symphony series in Brooklyn. These will be given at the Academy under Institute auspices, on the following Friday evenings: Nov. 28, Jan. 2, Jan. 30, March 13, and April 10. The list of soloists which is still to be added to, will include Serge Rachmaninoff, Roland Hayes, and Albert Spalding.

Although Rachmaninoff has appeared on several notable occasions with this orchestra, there is a new interest in his appearance jointly with its Russian conductor in a score of his own. The Russian composer is known the world over as one of the most brilliant pianists of the day, and as one of the leading composers of the Russian school of Music. His symphonies and "Isle of the Dead", his concertos, his marvellous songs and piano pieces have established him as a past master in each field.

NEW YORK
WORLD
OCT 12 1924

New York Season For Koussevitzky.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will give the usual double series of five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall beginning Nov. 27. Mr. Koussevitzky's programs for New York will include several new scores which have not been heard in this country. Nevertheless, the classical repertory will predominate in each series.

The soloists for the New York concerts will include: Roland Hayes in the Thursday evening series, Serge Rachmaninoff in the Saturday afternoon series and Albert Spalding in each series.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER
OCT 12 1924

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKI SAY HIS ART IS COSMOPOLITAN

Serge Koussevitzki, who will conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra here November 13 under the management of Bessie Bellanca, in a statement of attitude on the subject of orchestral programs, modern and classical music, declared: "I would like to make it clear that I am neither modernist nor classicist in my musical preferences. The works of the great classic masters are absolutely indispensable to me, as musician and in my life. No one would less willingly be without them than I. But music is not a static art. Music is continually being made, which is an expression of the period in which it appears. It is necessary for us to know what is being done as it is to know and admire what has been done. As for the value of the new works, the conductor uses his best judgment in producing them. He must leave the rest to the judgment of time."

Koussevitzki said he would take particular care in his concerts in New York, Buffalo and Boston not to perform a disproportionate number of compositions of the Russian schools. "Art is cosmopolitan," he declared, "in the sense that it comes from all countries and, if it is important, has meaning for all peoples."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
N. Y.
CITIZEN
OCT 12 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under its new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, will give the usual series of five Friday evening concerts at the Academy on the following dates: November 28, January 2, January 30, March 13 and April 10. This will be the forty-fourth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

With the personnel exactly the same as that of last year, the interest in the present season of the orchestra centres in the new Russian conductor. Koussevitzky will make his American debut when he opens the season in Symphony Hall, Boston, next Friday afternoon, October 10. His program for this occasion will include:

Concerto for orchestra with organ in D minor (Ed. by S. Soloti), Vivaldi
Overture to "Oberon," ..... Weber
Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," Wagner
Funeral music of Siegfried from "Gotterdammerung," ....Wagner
"Pacific 231," ..... Honegger
"Le Peome de l'extase," ..Scriabin

ANNA PAVLOWA IN BROOKLYN.

Tel. Chelsea 8600

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
OCT 12 1924

The Providence Public Library has a number of informatory articles concerning Serge Koussevitzky, and has placed on order some of the works he is to play with the Boston Symphony this season. Among them are Honegger's "Pacific 231," which was inspired by a locomotive, and Moussorgsky's "Pictures from an Exhibition." Concerning the symphony's new conductor, the library has "Koussevitsky arriving in Boston, assures conservatives they will not be shocked," in the Musical Courier for Sept. 18, and "Koussevitzky is here with new music for Boston Symphony season," in Musical America for Sept. 20. Clippings about the conductor have been placed on a table in the music library.

Information concerning another newcomer to these shores, Ernest Newman, as guest critic of the New York Evening Post, is available in the library. There are his well-known life of Wagner, "Musical Studies," and his translation of Sweitzer's life of Johann Sebastian Bach. A clipping from the New York Post about his works is in the file of newspaper articles.

* * *

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
OCT 12 1924

THREE NEW LEADERS TO MAKE DEBUTS

New York will witness an unusual event this year in the debut of three new orchestral conductors, Sergei Koussevitsky, who replaces Mr Monteux with the Boston Symphony, arrived here a few days ago. His first New York appearance will occur on Thanksgiving night, when the Boston organization comes down to give its annual series. Koussevitsky is perhaps the foremost of Russian conductors. Since 1921 he has given a yearly series of concerts in Paris, where his introduction of numerous musical novelties, as well as his revolutionary readings of the classics have caused a furore.

Wilhelm Furtwangler, also one of Europe's best conductors, and the successor of Nikisch at the Berlin Philharmonic, will be guest conductor for a few of the concerts of the New York Philharmonic orchestra in January.

But most interest centers on the appearance with Philharmonic of Igor Stravinsky, the most startling of the present-day composers, and the most brilliant comet in the musical heavens since the early days of Richard Strauss. The tremendous interest in this Russian titan's works began quite suddenly last season when Mr Monteux introduced his "Sacre du Printemps" for the first time in America. Conductors then found that the name "Stravinsky" on their programs served to pack halls to the doors, and they promptly stepped on each other's toes in their efforts to secure his works, new and old. The Philharmonic society now goes one step farther than merely getting these musical golden eggs. They have captured the brilliant bird itself—at least for a few appearances as conductor early in 1925.

Tel. Chelsea 8600

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON
MASSACHUSETTS
AMERICAN
OCT 12 1924

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Serge Koussevitzky's program for this week's Symphony's concerts includes Handel's "Concerto Grosso" for string orchestra; Debussy's "Dance," orchestrated by

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, new Boston Symphony leader, who will conduct Beethoven's Fifth Symphony this week.

Ravel; "El Amor Brujo" ("Love the Sorcerer"), by Emanuel de Fella, Spanish composer, and Beethoven's fifth symphony.

Tel. Chelsea 8600

THIS CLIPPING FROM BUFFALO,
N. Y.
TIMES
OCT 12 1924

Boston Symphony.

Local music lovers who look forward to hearing Serge Koussevitski conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra here November 13th under the management of Bessie Bellanca, will be interested in the new conductor's statement of attitude on the subject of orchestral programs, modern and classical music. "I would like to make it clear," the celebrated Russian said, "that I am neither modernist nor classicist in my musical preferences. The works of the great classic masters are absolutely indispensable to me, as musician and in my life. No one would less willingly be without them than I. But music is not a static art. Music is continually being made which is an expression of the period in which it appears. It is necessary for us to know what is being done as it is to know and admire what has been done. As for the value of the new works, the conductor uses his best judgment in producing them. He must leave the rest to the judgment to time."

Koussevitski said he would take particular care in his concerts in New York, Buffalo and Boston, not to perform a disproportionate number of compositions of the Russian schools. "Art is cosmopolitan," he declared, "in the sense that it comes from all countries and, if it is important, has meaning for all peoples."

The fiery intensity of Koussevitski's personality and his rugged force have shocked many critics who have accused him of over-vehemence. W. H. Haddon Squire, London music critic, replying to those who have brought this accusation, pointed out that to such critics the "right" interpretation is the one they like, and the wrong, the one they don't. Koussevitski holds that there is no such thing as a single immutably "right" reading for every work. A dozen great conductors would give us a dozen different Ninth Symphonies, each, judged by any existing canons of criticism, are as "right" as the others, Koussevitski holds. He agrees with Arthur Symons that beauty is infinitely various, and he is full of contempt for those tepid conductors who approach and interpret the music of Bach and Beethovan, for example, as if it were written by marble busts.

Tickets for the Boston Symphony concert, may be obtained from Miss Bellanca at the Colonial Flower Shop, No. 230 Delaware Avenue.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
OCT 12 1924

Serge Koussevitzky Assumes Direction of Boston Symphony Orchestra

A Boston audience saw Serge Koussevitzky lead their symphony orchestra for the first time last Friday. It is probably true that countless eyes in the musical world in this country and abroad were turned in that direction. Providence's among them, for our music lovers are looking forward with uncommon interest to the coming here of the new Boston Symphony conductor.

Boston's greeting was warm to the point of expectant enthusiasm. At moments it was tumultuous. The sceptics were outvoted in the fervid applause. As was natural, the audience rose on the new conductor's entrance. It rose again after the Berlioz overture, and at the finish of the programme it showered the newcomer with applause and cheers. The critics called it an ovation, an "exciting session" of music, and a promise of a highly brilliant season. There seemed no doubting the sincerity of the plaudits at the end of each number.

Philip Hale in the Herald, spokesman of the conservatives, reviewed the performance in obviously hopeful mood. Peporting faithfully the audience's continued enthusiasm, he said of Mr. Koussevitzsk:

"He has a commanding figure and that indefinable quality which works its spell on orchestra and audience. When he faces his audience he is neither arrogant nor obsequious. . . . It is evident that he is imaginative; that while he can be sensuous in gaining effects of color, this sensuousness is controlled by a cool head. . . . When he delights in strong contracts, it is not merly to win the applause of the unthinking. He is dramatic but yesterday he was not theatrical."

Warren Storey Smith, writing in the Post, declared that enthusiasm knew no bounds. "Report had included Mr. Koussevitzky among the more demonstrative of conductors," he continued, "and, to be sure, there are moments when, swayed by the music in hand, he lets himself go far more than did the reticent Monteux. Nevertheless his manner is far from sensational. Often he is singularly sparing of gesture: often his expressive left hand hangs idly at his side. But when he would build a climax, enforce a telling stroke or draw from the instruments a melting songfulness, then are Mr. Koussevitzky's gestures equal to the occasion."

Following his selection as leader of one of the most noted orchestras in existence, and as a noted personage himself in the music life of the continent, Mr. Koussevitzky both immediately preceding and since his arrival in this country has been the object of widespread comment and discussion.

His life and musical training, his methods and manner of conducting, his programme-making, his musical likes and dislikes, his height, weight, color of eyes and hair have all gone into the hoppers of the interviewers and critics. Most of this is new to the American public. But a good deal of it has been known to those who keep in touch with the growth and progress of music affairs. Ask a Russian or a Frenchman who Koussevitzky is and the answer is on the tip of his tongue. To the vast majority in this country, his name as well as his fame are things to be made known.

That he will bring something new, if not necessarily "revolutionary," to the programmes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is already apparent. Thise who have followed his performances abroad assure us of that, and his own statements have been in corroboration. He has come out frankly in admitting his interest in the modern composer, his desire to help him, and his eagerness to have his audiences know and appreciate him.

He is keenly alive to the musical forces of the day, and is apparently a keen judge of what is and what is not significant. Yet he is not one of the "moderns" who would throw the classics and what they have to teach into the discard. He recognizes them as "foundations," though his interest is far more than academic. He is truly fond of them as music. In Russia he has given Bach and Beethoven festivals.

At present, though, we are hearing along with Koussevitzky's name those of Stravinsky, Honegger, John Alden Carpenter, Ravel, Moussorgsky Bruckner, old names and new, not so familiar on symphony programmes in this country these days. He promises several premieres and "sensations" along with the classics.

His first programme with the Boston Symphony was an example of his famed originality, broad taste and fertile sympathies. He broke from tradition at the outset. First of all there was no symphony, an omission considered by some extremely radical for the beginning of the season. The rest of the programme, too, was "unconventional." From his native Russian music he chose Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstacy." From "Classic" composers he took Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Haydn. Other items were Honegger's "Pacific 231," a descriptive piece inspired by an American locomotive; a concerto for an orchestra with organ by Vivaldi, and Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival."

Ernest Newman, the British musical critic who is here as "guest" critic on one of New York's newspapers, regards Koussevitzky as the true "classicist," in interpreting the works of the past, not as a romanticist. He bases the comparison on the different interpretations Weingartner and Koussevitzky give Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. Koussevitsky's he regards as the truly "classic;" the German leader's as the "romantic."

He writes in the American Mercury:

"The popular belief, of course, is to the contrary—that the sober, elderly German gentleman shown us in the ordinary German reading is the true Beethoven, while the volcanic spirit that Koussevitzky makes of him is only Koussevitsky himself. I believe this to be a fallacy. The classic is never a classic to himself; he only becomes a classic to later generations. To himself he is a very lively, ardent Romantic. To make for yourself a fancy picture of this classic, a hundred years after his death, and to insist on his behaving himself in the decorous way you think that classics ought to behave, is really to romanticize him.

"Koussevitzky, by playing the Ninth Symphony as if it had been written yesterday by a powerful genius whose muscles were twice the size of those of the ordinary man, gives us, I contend a Beethoven in which Beethoven would recognize himself. Koussevitzky's reading, therefore, is the genuinely classic one; it reproduces for us the vigor and the tension the work must have had for its creator and for the men of his day, not this vigor and tension watered and slackened down through a century of false idealization."

On interpreting the classics, Koussevitzky has been quoted as saying that he cannot always accept with sincerity the traditinal practices and believes they have have often been destructive to masterpieces of the past. That he is an "original" seems to be admitted. "The question is not as to his competence, but what will be thought of his readings," says Mr. Newman. "America will find his musicianship and his orchestral technique equal to any demands that are likely to be made on them.

"Opinions will differ about him, as they do about every conductor. I can speak only of the impression he has made on myself after experience of him in music of all schools and all orders. He has a volcanic temperament, but I have never yet known it to run away with him. I have often found myself disagreeing with him; but I have never disagreed with him on the score that he had lost control over his own fire. On the contrary, it is precisely when his temperament is at boiling point that his hand on the regulator is steadiest and surest. He takes an enormous amount out of himself when he conducts, and the wonder to me always is how he manages to get through the quantity of work he does, and to keep his nerves so steady and his head so cool through it all."

If Koussevitzky is not a "romantic" in his interpretations of the classics, there has been plenty of that element his life. He was born in northern Russia in 1874, and from the first wanted to be an orchestra conductor. It is said that as a boy he would follow itinerant bands about as sometimes happens in this country when the circus comes to town. He early took up the playing of the double bass and is held one of the world's experts on that tremendous instruments. He also learned to play many other instruments.

But, as he says, he always wanted to be an orchestra leader, and the opportunity came when he was onyl 12 years old in his home town of Tver. A Boston Globe interviewer asked him how this came about.

"It was the custom at the theatre to give concerts between the plays," he said. "They were not satisfied with the conductor they had——I do not know why—and they were looking for a new one. Then one of the musicians said, 'There is a boy in the town who knows all the instruments. He can do it.' My father did not approve but finally he consented and I became chef d'orchestre."

"What was the first piece you conducted? was the next query.

"Wilhelm Tell," responded the leader of the Boston Symphony proudly.

During his youthful novitiate as orchestra leader of the theatre in Tver, he also composed music for the plays. A few years later he entered the conservatory at Moscow where he studied orchestra conducting, composition and instrumental playing. He worked on the double bass to obtain a scholarship. With it he joined the Moscow Imperial Opera orchestra, and toured Russia as soloist. Then he established his own symphony orchestra in Moscow, and gave series of concerts and festivals there and in the then named Petrograd.

He soon became famous among his countrymen. In the winters he played in Moscow, and in the summer was accustomed to go on novel and enjoyable musical tours in the Volga. He would charter a boat and with his orchestra, a few soloists and some of his friends aboard would visit the towns along the banks in much the same may theatrical troupes would voyage along the Mississippi in the old days. His last Volga trip was in 1914.

In 1917 he was appointed leader of the Russian State Orchestra, sucessor to the Imperial Orchestra, a position he held for three years. Then he became guest conductor of the London Symphony, and had an orchestra of his own in Paris where the Concerts Koussevitzky in the Paris Opera House became noted events of the season. Before leaving Paris for this country, he was decorated with the Cross of the Legion of Honor.

The war is given as one reason for his moving to France and England, and the fact that he could again have his own orchestra, a reason for his coming farther westward.

"He has a definite credo of the qualifications of a conductor and his contact with his men," says Henrietta Malkiel in Musical America. "' Is it right,' he asks, 'to think that a conductor is only an executant playing the orchestra as one plays an instrument? If that were the case, that instrument would not be alive; it would be able to give only a rigid, dry, reading of the music. To make his work really fertile, he must know how to animate his orchestra, to communicate his inspiration, to wake the artist in each musician, be his role ever so humble, and to make him conscious of the personal responsibility which he must bear in the artistic realization of his work. He must be, finally, a true leader for his orchestra, inspiring his interpretation and coordinating it until it rises to its single goal.' "

Koussevitzky's interviewers have found him a man who breathes vigor, that his hair is beginning to gray and that he has a well-knit figure. A sense of humor is also visible in sparkling eyes and remarks through an interpreter, for as yet he does not trust himself alone along the devious paths of the English language. Horseback riding is one of his favorite relaxations.

Serge Koussevitzky
New Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra

Tel. Chelsea 8800
THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
OCT 12 1924

Music Notes Afield

SERGE KUSSEVITZKY will find room on the Boston Symphony programs for a Symphony by Bruckner not played in Boston since the days of Dr. Muck, and a symphony by Elgar, also a rarity in that city. Prokofieff, the Russian composer, will be unable to visit the United States this Winter; his place will be taken by the Russian pianist Borovsky. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which has not changed its personnel since last year, has begun rehearsals under Kussevitzky. It will visit Cambridge, Oct. 16, Nov. 6, Dec. 4, Jan. 8, Feb. 2 and 26, March 19 and April 2 and 30.

be mailed if self-addressed, with stamped envelope.

2D SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Mr. Koussevitzky's program for the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will include Handel's Concerto Grosso in D minor for string orchestra, the "Danse" of Debussy, which has been orchestrated by Ravel, and "El Amor Brujo" ("Love the Sorcerer"), by De Falla. This score has the following episodes: Introduction and Scena; the "Gitanes" ("Evening"); Circle (Narrative of the Fisherman); Midnight (Sorceries); Ritual Dance of Fire (to dispel evil spirits); pantomime; Dance of the Game of Love; Finale (Morning Chimes). The concerts will end with Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

Herald Sun Oct 12

Tel. Chelsea 8800
THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER
OCT 12 1924

Serge Koussevitzky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who will appear in Buffalo with the Boston Symphony November 13, under local management of Bessie Bellanca, has just arrived in America. The celebrated Russian has been jestingly called the "lightning conductor," not because of his volatile, magnetic personality, but because his engagements are so many and in such widespread area. The last half-year has been extremely busy for Koussevitzky. He spent March and April in London as guest conductor of the London Symphony orchestra, leaving there for Barcelona to conduct the Wagnerian orchestra there. In May he returned to Paris to complete his series of famous "Koussevitzky concerts" and conduct performances of "Boris Godunov" at the Grand Opera, returning to London to conduct a short opera season before taking his summer vacation.

Koussevitzky was born at Tver in northern Russia in 1874. At twelve he conducted the orchestra of the town theater. He graduated from Moscow conservatory and for a considerable period was known as a double bass virtuoso and said to be the finest performer on this instrument in Europe. Koussevitzky's most prominent achievement in Russia was the organization of his orchestra which he evolved, subsidized and conducted in Moscow. With this splendid organization he gave concerts in Moscow and Petrograd and traveled all over Russia. He founded a musical edition and gave many Russian composers encouragement by publishing their works. It was in 1920 that circumstances took him westward, and immediately he became the central figure of orchestral concerts in Paris and London.

Koussevitzky while refusing to be labeled a "modernist" in any exclusive sense, nevertheless has a keen interest in the new music. "I understand that America is very fond of modern music," he said recently, "and I am going to introduce to the American public some Russian compositions which I consider interesting. German music is "in decadence" now. I don't believe we will get much worth while from Germany in the next few years. The new music will come from Spain, from Russia and from France. In Russia there has been a lot of music written quite unknown to the rest of the world up to 1916 when the Bolshevik regime spoiled every intellectual production."

Tickets for the Boston Symphony concert may be obtained from Miss Bellanca at the Colonial Flower shop, No. 230 Delaware avenue.

Tel. Chelsea 8800
THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK
TIMES
OCT 12 1924

ORCHESTRA NOTES.

The Boston Symphony today announces plans for its thirty-ninth season in New York. Conductor Kussevitzky makes his bow here Nov. 27. Three soloists in the later series are Albert Spalding, Rachmaninoff and Roland Hayes.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON,
MASS.
HERALD
OCT 12 192

By WILLA JERDONE

Even Uncle Sam's Market Place, with all its interesting society backing, yielded temporarily to the lure of the first symphony concert, which red-lettered Friday afternoon as well as Saturday evening and at which all Boston music lovers gathered to welcome and applaud the notable new director, M. Koussevitzky. And of the "Market Place"—it surely excelled and eclipsed all its predecessors and closed yesterday with such a lofty record of success that congratulations are pouring in from onlookers as well as fellow workers who have helped to put over the fine

Kelly Dance, Mallory.
Friday, at 2:30, and Saturday, at 8:15, Boston Symphony Orchestra. Second program: Concerto Grosso in D minor, Handel; "Danse," arr Ravel, Debussy; "El Amor Brujo," de Falla (first time in Boston); Fifth Symphony, Beethoven. There will be no soloist.

140

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

BUFFALO
N. Y.
EXPRESS
OCT 12 1924

Local music lovers who look forward to hearing Serge Koussevitzki conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra here on November 13th, under the local management of Bessie Bellanca, will be interested in the new conductor's attitude on the subject of orchestral programmes, of modern and classical music. "I would like to make it clear," the celebrated Russian said, "that I am neither modernist nor classicist in my musical preferences. The works of the great classic masters are absolutely indispensable to me, as musician and in my life. No one would less willingly be without them than I. But music is not a static art. Music is continually being made which is an expression of the period in which it appears. It is as necessary for us to know what is being done as it is to know and admire what has been done. As for the value of the new works, the conductor uses his best judgment in producing them. He must leave the rest to the judgment of time."

Koussevitzki said he would take particular care in his concerts not to perform a disproportionate number of compositions of the Russian schools. "Art is cosmopolitan," he declared, "in the sense that it comes from all countries and, if it is important, has meaning for all people."

Among the

THIS CLIPPING FROM
My Herald
OCT 12 19

Serge Koussevitzky made his Boston Symphony debut in Boston last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, with a program of which the extremes were Vivaldi's concerto in D major and Honegger's "Pacific No. 231." The orchestra, which has a personnel unchanged from last season, will give its usual series of five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts here at Carnegie Hall, on November 27 to 29, January 1 to 3 and 29 to 31; March 12 to 14, April 9 to 11. Five concerts at the Brooklyn Academy of Music will be given on the corresponding Friday evenings. Soloists for the New York series will include Roland Hayes in the Thursday series; Sergei Rachmaninoff in the Saturday series and Albert Spalding in both.

BOSTON, MASS.
GLOBE
OCT 13 1924

STATE WILL GIVE COURSE FOR SYMPHONY HEARERS

The Division of University Extension of State Department of Education, cooperating with the music department of the Boston Public Library, has announced as an additional feature of the Fall program a course in appreciation of symphonies.

The program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be followed by the class and the instructor, Richard G. Appel, will, each Monday, analyze the music to be performed at the Symphony concert of that week.

The first meeting, open to the public, will take place in the Lecture Hall of the Boston Public Library at 4:45 p m. next Monday. This course will be given in two parts of 10 lessons each.

From OCT 13 1924
TELEGRAM
New York City

Koussevitzky Meets Boston.

The most talked of [illegible] conductor in the country today is Sergei Koussevitzky. This thoroughly well advertised gentleman from Russia will not appear in New York until the end of next month. But his American debut took place in Boston Friday and Saturday of last week, when he conducted his first pair of concerts as regular conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, opening in Biston's Symphony Hall the forty-fourth season of that highly esteemed organization.

The program (modified from that originally announced) was as follows:—Vivaldi-Siloti, concerto in D minor for orchestra and organ (first time in America); Berlioz, overture, "The Roman Carnival"; Brahms, Variations on a Theme by Haydn; Honegger, "Pacific 231" (first time in America); Scriabin, "The Poem of Ecstasy."

Without further ado let us listen to the arch-sage of the Hub, Philip Hale, reviewing the Friday concert in the Boston Herad of Saturday.

"How Mr. Koussevitzky will please as a maker of programs," says Mr. Hale, "remains to be seen. Yesterday's was interesting, one designed to please the reactionaries, for if they shuddered, seeing the names of Honegger and Scriabin, those sons of Belial, the program was so arranged that they could leave in peace after hearing music by their beloved Johannes Brahms.

"The concerto by Vivaldi had been played here in its original form at a concert of the Eighteenth Century Symphony Orchestra, led by Mr. Maitlin on February 24 of this year. Mr. Siloti's transcription, with its wood-wind instruments and organ, was played in this country for the first time. The engrossing portion of the work is the beautiful Largo, which was played in a spirit of rival beauty. There was a dazzling performance of The Roman Carnival, in which Mr. Speyer distinguished himself by his solo for the English horn. Our old friend Johannes Brahms was treated with due respect; there was no attempt to 'modernize' his moods, nor was Mr. Koussevitzky's reading painfully academic."

Of the nature of Mr. Koussevitzky's opportunity in taking up the leadership of the Boston band and of his conductorial characteristics as disclosed on Friday, Mr. Hale speaks explicitly and with thoroughness:—

"When Mr. Nikisch succeeded Mr. Gericke, he said after the first rehearsal, delighted by the technical proficiency and euphony of the Boston Orchestra:—'All I have to do now is to poeticize.'

"Mr. Monteux left a superb instrument, the work of his own creation, for Mr. Koussevitzky to play upon.

"No conductor, however expert, and no orchestra, however elastic and responsive, can in a week or ten days become so intimate in relationship that the players are the unfailing interpreters of the conductor's eloquence and passion. Further acquaintance will undoubtedly be to the advantage of these players and their conductor. His talent, his genius will shine the more brilliantly; his limitations, if he has them, will the more clearly appear.

"Yet this in all justice may now be said, Mr. Koussevitzky has a commanding figure and that indefinable quality known as magnetism which works its spell on orchestra and audience. When he faces his public he is neither arrogant nor obsequious. He at once inspires confidence, expectation, curiosity. These are all valuable qualities for a conductor to possess in these nervous, restless, questioning years.

"It is evident that Mr. Koussevitzky is imaginative; that while he can be sensuous in gaining effects of color, this sensuousness is controlled by a cool head. He probably approves the famous paradox of Diderot. He surely sympathizes with the dictum of Mozart: 'Music should sound.' There is no fear in his breast of pedantic saws and cold or stuffed traditions; he thinks for himself; he feels the music in his own way; he hears its appeal without caring how it appealed or appeals to others.

"He knows that melodic figures should be sung, yet he is not given to sentimentalism. He realizes the value of tonal proportion. When he delights in strong contrasts, it is not merely to win the applause of the unthinking. He is dramatic, but yesterday he was not theatrical."

So much for the new conductor. But a particularly exciting piece of modern music was also introduced to America at this concert. Of Arthur Honegger's "Pacific 231" Mr. Hale has this to say:—

"Honegger attempted in his 'Pacific 231' to express in tones not the noise of [illegible] engine, but the visual impression and the physical sensation of it. He wished to depict the 'quiet respiration' of the engine 'in a state of immobility;' then its panting to be off; then the constant gain in speed. The piece is amusing, it even gives the hearer what Athenaeus said was one of music's missions—'a gentlemanlike joy.' No doubt, this music of Honegger's is 'clever,' but cleverness in music quickly palls. Louis Antoine Jullien years in this country excited wild enthusiasm by his 'Firemen's Quadrille,' in which a conflagration, the bells, the rush of the firemen, the squirting and the shout of the foreman, 'Wash her Thirteen!' were graphically portrayed."

Though "The Poem of Ecstas" is by no means new to us, we have sometimes been told that America will never know Scriabin until Mr. Koussevitsky reveals to us his tone poems as they are. And it is at least true that much of the Russian conductor's fame in Paris and London has hung on his extraordinary adventures with those works. Mr. Hale's priceless comment on the Scriabine episode of Friday concludes his account of Mr. Koussevitsky's American debut:—

"Scriabin's hysterical 'Poem of Ecstasy,' with its theosophically Wagnerian pages, its fits and starts, its boisterous swellings and its dying falls, was performed con amore and loudly applauded. Perhaps some day we shall appreciate Scriabin's music and join with Dr. Hull and some others in hailing him 'Master.' Some day, some day!"

PITTS SANBORN.

owing the thanks of a pleased compos[illegible]

Trans-Tulp. Oct 14

Glance and Glow

Mr. Koussevitzky may not doubt the eagerness of his new public to hear him. On an evening in midsummer, as our seasons go, at the beginning of a triple holiday, it again filled Symphony Hall last Saturday; while this second audience was little less rapt and applauding than the first. Only the orchestra seemed to suffer under the strain of a double beginning. On Friday, it had played like so many little masters in ordered flood. Next day, with the best will in the world, it would excel itself; tried too hard; coarsened tone; roughened euphonies; needed the conductor's soothing as well as stimulating hand. As for Mr. Koussevitzky himself, at this second concert he seemed more in the visual vein. His gesture was more frequent, vigorous and graphic. From choir to choir he turned as the music ebbed and flowed among them. Upward and downward his arms flailed the air, winnowing energies. In his glance, in the changes of his countenance, the orchestra might read the mingled precisions and fervors with which he would infuse it. He blew the fires of Skriabin's ecstacies. Brahms and Berlioz and Vivaldi basked in the glow of him. There is passion again at Symphony Hall—and also the measure that, in the exercise of the arts, makes passion potent.

From Post-Chaise to "Pacific"

The modernists can, the modernists do, prevail. The stiffest-backed conservatives admitted that "there was something" in Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring"; while twice last week-end, at Symphony Hall, they with the rest of us, smiled their smiles and clapped their hands over Honegger's "Pacific." The high spirits of the piece are irresistible. As likely as not, the composer took endless pains with it. No musician may hear without admiration the close-knit facture, the unflagging flow of the music, the equal economy and adaptation of means to ends. Through and through these modernists know their craft, neither barren nor bungling. Yet never once in "Pacific" does Honegger lose his gusto. His measures chortle when the big engine at last heaves itself under way. Soon it is in full flight; while as it grinds along, the music sets it, Kipling-wise, to singing a brief and broken song—say of the zest of might and speed steel-shod.

And with what a flourish "Pacific" ends! Here is the old "grand finale" condensed and concentrated into a dozen measures. There is humor, too, amid all this visual and spiritual sensation. Honegger grins, and we listeners with him, at the huge machine, groaning and grunting into life and readiness, freedom and power. In him and in the piece is the artist's veritable spirit, ready to jest at the thing he loves; open-minded to all things that may kindle emotion and expression. A post-chaise crosses music of both Bach and Beethoven. Honegger, still living, prefers the locomotive.

H. T. P.

[illegible] 1924, by L' DIGEST, Inc. 15 CENTS A COPY

Boston Welcomes Koussevitsky in American Debut

Russian Conductor Gives First Concert in Forty-Fourth Symphony Season.

FULL HOUSE GREETS LEADER

Boston, Oct. 11.—Serge Koussevitsky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, succeeding Pierre Monteux, made his first American appearance in the opening concert of the forty-fourth season of the orchestra last night in Symphony Hall. A capacity audience welcomed the Russian leader, and applauded his work throughout the program, which consisted of the Vivaldi-Siloti D minor concerto for organ (first performance in America); Berlioz' Roman Carnival overture; Brahms' Variations on a Theme of Haydn; Honegger's Pacific 231 (first performance in America); and Scriabine's Extase.

The critical reception of Mr. Koussevitsky was as favorable as was that of the audience. Although admitting that first impressions must necessarily be hasty, Philip Hale in the Herald said, "Mr. Koussevitsky has a commanding figure and that indefinable quality known as magnetism, which works its spell on orchestra and audience. . . . It is evident that he is imaginative; that while he can be sensuous in gaining effects of color, this sensuousness is controlled by a cool head. . . . He knows that melodic figures should be sung, yet he is not given to sentimentalism."

H. T. Parker, writing in the Evening Transcript, commented also on these qualities of magnetism, and remarked with enthusiasm on the skill with which the new leader adapts his manner and clear beat to the style of the music in hand, from the classic quiet of Vivaldi to the great heat and passion of Extase, but always, according to this reviewer, it is "Koussevitsky passioning for the music,—not for himself."

The reviewer of the Globe admired the lack of mannerism in Mr. Koussevitsky's leading, writing, "His gestures are always definite commands promptly obeyed." This writer considered the continually sustained interest of the new leader's conducting exceptionally praiseworthy, and believed the Brahms was the low point of the performance, and the Scriabine, with its fierce Russian passion, the high point.

This reviewer found Pacific 231 much less violent than he had expected, with its extreme dissonance nevertheless indicative of economy of material, and of "lyric imagination." Mr. Parker was pleased that Honegger is more than noisily imitative in his sketch of a locomotive. "Veritably," he wrote, "he translates into a new medium visual image, bodily and spiritual thrill. . . . He has added a new energy to tones." Mr. Hale considered the music of Honegger simply "clever" and "amusing," adding that "mere cleverness soon palls."

(Continued on page 8)

New Boston Leader Makes Appearance

(Continued from page 1)

Several New York papers carried reviews of the concert. Mr. Olin Downes in the Times was particularly enthusiastic in his praise of Mr. Koussevitzky's "magnetism" which, he felt, "is particularly valuable for public success in this country of the virtuoso conductor." The reviewer made special mention of the new conductor's success with Le Poeme de l'Extase and Pacific 231. According to him, "he interprets with flaming temperament and communicative power." Mr. Downes summed up his review with the following:

"There will, of course, be divisions of opinion concerning his readings, but there was no mistaking the excitement of the audience and the enthusiasm of his welcome. It is plain that there is a new and significant figure among conductors in America today, and that he is at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

The Herald Tribune correspondent wrote, "Mr. Koussevitzky's program was a rising succession of climaxes, and was held up three times by prolonged applause." He found "exceptional brilliance and color" in Berlioz' Roman Carnival overture, while Honegger's Pacific 231 "was a skillful tour de force." But the "greatest moment of the concert was reached in Scriabin's Poeme de l'Extase, giving the impression that Scriabin had found a new prophet in America."

For the second pair of Boston concerts Mr. Koussevitsky will give Handel's Concerto Grosso in D minor, Debussy's Danse, orchestrated by Ravel; De Falla's El Amor Brujo; and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

140

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

BUFFALO
N. Y.
EXPRESS
OCT 12 1924

Local music lovers who look forward to hearing Serge Koussevitzki conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra here on November 13th, under the local management of Bessie Bellanca, will be interested in the new conductor's attitude on the subject of orchestral programmes, of modern and classical music. "I would like to make it clear," the celebrated Russian said, "that I am neither modernist nor classicist in my musical preferences. The works of the great classic masters are absolutely indispensable to me, as musician and in my life. No one would less willingly be without them than I. But music is not a static art. Music is continually being made which is an expression of the period in which it appears. It is as necessary for us to know what is being done as it is to know and admire what has been done. As for the value of the new works, the conductor uses his best judgment in producing them. He must leave the rest to the judgment of time."

Koussevitzki said he would take particular care in his concerts not to perform a disproportionate number of compositions of the Russian schools. "Art is cosmopolitan," he declared, "in the sense that it comes from all countries and, if it is important, has meaning for all people."

Among the

THIS CLIPPING FROM

My Journal

OCT 12 19

Serge Koussevitzky made his Boston Symphony début in Boston last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, with a program of which the extremes were Vivaldi's concerto in D minor and Honegger's "Pacific No. 231." The orchestra, which has a personnel unchanged from last season, will give its usual series of five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts here at Carnegie Hall, on November 27 to 29, January 1 to 3 and 29 to 31; March 12 to 14, April 9 to 11. Five concerts at the Brooklyn Academy of Music will be given on the corresponding Friday evenings. Soloists for the New York series will include Roland Hayes in the Thursday series; Sergei Rachmaninoff in the Saturday series and Albert Spalding in both.

BOSTON, MASS.
GLOBE
OCT 13 1924

STATE WILL GIVE COURSE FOR SYMPHONY HEARERS

The Division of University Extension of State Department of Education, cooperating with the music department of the Boston Public Library, has announced as an additional feature of the Fall program a course in appreciation of symphonies.

The program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be followed by the class and the instructor, Richard G. Appel, will, each Monday, analyze the music to be performed at the Symphony concert of that week.

The first meeting, open to the public, will take place in the Lecture Hall of the Boston Public Library at 4:45 p m, next Monday. This course will be given in two parts of 10 lessons each.

From OCT 13 1924
TELEGRAM
New York City

Koussevitzky Meets Boston.

The most talked of orchestral conductor in the country today is Sergei Koussevitzky. This thoroughly well advertised gentleman from Russia will not appear in New York until the end of next month. But his American debut took place in Boston Friday and Saturday of last week, when he conducted his first pair of concerts as regular conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, opening in Biston's Symphony Hall the forty-fourth season of that highly esteemed organization.

The program (modified from that originally announced) was as follows:—Vivaldi-Siloti, concerto in D minor for orchestra and organ (first time in America); Berlioz, overture, "The Roman Carnival"; Brahms, Variations on a Theme by Haydn; Honegger, "Pacific 231" (first time in America); Scriabin, "The Poem of Ecstasy."

Without further ado let us listen to the arch-sage of the Hub, Philip Hale, reviewing the Friday concert in the Boston Herad of Saturday.

"How Mr. Koussevitzky will please as a maker of programs," says Mr. Hale, "remains to be seen. Yesterday's was interesting, one designed to please the reactionaries, for if they shuddered, seeing the names of Honegger and Scriabin, those sons of Belial, the program was so arranged that they could leave in peace after hearing music by their beloved Johannes Brahms.

"The concerto by Vivaldi had been played here in its original form at a concert of the Eighteenth Century Symphony Orchestra, led by Mr. Maurino on February 24 of this year. Mr. Siloti's transcription, with its wood-wind instruments and organ, was played in this country for the first time. The engrossing portion of the work is the beautiful Largo, which was played in a spirit of rival beauty. There was a dazzling performance of 'The Roman Carnival,' in which Mr. Speyer distinguished himself by his solo for the English horn. Our old friend Johannes Brahms was treated with due respect; there was no attempt to 'modernize' his moods, nor was Mr. Koussevitzky's reading painfully academic."

Of the nature of Mr. Koussevitzky's opportunity in taking up the leadership of the Boston band and of his conductorial characteristics as disclosed on Friday, Mr. Hale speaks explicitly and with thoroughness:—

"When Mr. Nikisch succeeded Mr. Gericke, he said after the first rehearsal, delighted by the technical proficiency and euphony of the Boston Orchestra:—'All I have to do now is to poeticize.'

"Mr. Monteux left a superb instrument, the work of his own creation, for Mr. Koussevitzky to play upon.

"No conductor, however expert, and no orchestra, however elastic and responsive, can in a week or ten days become so intimate in relationship that the players are the unfailing interpreters of the conductor's eloquence and passion. Further acquaintance will undoubtedly be to the advantage of these players and their conductor. His talent, his genius will shine the more brilliantly; his limitations, if he has them, will the more clearly appear.

"Yet this in all justice may now be said, Mr. Koussevitzky has a commanding figure and that indefinable quality known as magnetism which works its spell on orchestra and audience. When he faces his public he is neither arrogant nor obsequious. He at once inspires confidence, expectation, curiosity. These are all valuable qualities for a conductor to possess in these nervous, restless, questioning years.

"It is evident that Mr. Koussevitzky is imaginative; that while he can be sensuous in gaining effects of color, this sensuousness is controlled by a cool head. He probably approves the famous paradox of Diderot. He surely sympathizes with the dictum of Mozart: 'Music should sound.' There is no fear in his breast of pedantic saws and cold or stuffed traditions; he thinks for himself; he feels the music in his own way; he hears its appeal without caring how it appealed or appeals to others.

"He knows that melodic figures should be sung, yet he is not given to sentimentalism. He realizes the value of tonal proportion. When he delights in strong contrasts, it is not merely to win the applause of the unthinking. He is dramatic, but yesterday he was not theatrical."

So much for the new conductor. But a particularly exciting piece of modern music was also introduced to America at this concert. Of Arthur Honegger's "Pacific 231" Mr. Hale has this to say:—

"Honegger attempted in this 'Pacific 231' to express in tones not the noise of a locomotive engine, 'but the visual impression and the physical sensation of it.' He wished to depict the 'quiet respiration' of the engine 'in a state of immobility;' then its panting to be off; then the constant gain in speed. The piece is amusing, it even gives the hearer what Athenaeus said was one of music's missions—'a gentlemanlike joy.' No doubt, this music of Honegger's is 'clever,' but cleverness in music quickly palls. Louis Antoine Jullien years in this country excited wild enthusiasm by his 'Firemen's Quadrille,' in which a conflagration, the bells, the rush of the firemen, the squirting and the shout of the foreman, 'Wash her Thirteen!' were graphically portrayed."

Though "The Poem of Ecstas" is by no means new to us, we have sometimes been told that America will never know Scriabin until Mr. Koussevitsky reveals to us his tone poems as they are. And it is at least true that much of the Russian conductor's fame in Paris and London has hung on his extraordinary adventures with those works. Mr. Hale's priceless comment on the Scriabine episode of Friday concludes his account of Mr. Koussevitsky's American debut:—

"Scriabin's hysterical 'Poem of Ecstasy,' with its theosophically Wagnerian pages, its fits and starts, its boisterous swellings and its dying falls, was performed con amore and loudly applauded. Perhaps some day we shall appreciate Scriabin's music and join with Dr. Hull and some others in hailing him 'Master.' Some day, some day!"

PITTS SANBORN.

owing the thanks of a pleased composer.

Brahms — Tues. Oct 14

Glance and Glow

Mr. Koussevitzky may not doubt the eagerness of his new public to hear him. On an evening in midsummer, as our seasons go, at the beginning of a triple holiday, it again filled Symphony Hall last Saturday; while this second audience was little less rapt and applauding than the first. Only the orchestra seemed to suffer under the strain of a double beginning. On Friday, it had played like so many little masters in ordered flood. Next day, with the best will in the world, it would excel itself; tried too hard; coarsened tone; roughened euphonies; needed the conductor's soothing as well as stimulating hand. As for Mr. Koussevitzky himself, at this second concert he seemed more in the visual vein. His gesture was more frequent, vigorous and graphic. From choir to choir he turned as the music ebbed and flowed among them. Upward and downward his arms flailed the air, winnowing energies. In his glance, in the changes of his countenance, the orchestra might read the mingled precisions and fervors with which he would infuse it. He blew the fires of Skriabin's ecstacies. Brahms and Berlioz and Vivaldi basked in the glow of him. There is passion again at Symphony Hall—and also the measure that, in the exercise of the arts, makes passion potent.

From Post-Chaise to "Pacific"

The modernists can, the modernists do, prevail. The stiffest-backed conservatives admitted that "there was something" in Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring"; while twice last week-end, at Symphony Hall, they with the rest of us, smiled their smiles and clapped their hands over Honegger's "Pacific." The high spirits of the piece are irresistible. As likely as not, the composer took endless pains with it. No musician may hear without admiration the close-knit facture, the unflagging flow of the music, the equal economy and adaptation of means to ends. Through and through these modernists know their craft, neither barren nor bungling. Yet never once in "Pacific" does Honegger lose his gusto. His measures chortle when the big engine at last heaves itself under way. Soon it is in full flight; while as it grinds along, the music sets it, Kipling-wise, to singing a brief and broken song—say of the zest of might and speed steel-shod.

And with what a flourish "Pacific" ends! Here is the old "grand finale" condensed and concentrated into a dozen measures. There is humor, too, amid all this visual and spiritual sensation. Honegger grins, and we listeners with him, at the huge machine, groaning and grunting into life and readiness, freedom and power. In him and in the piece is the artist's veritable spirit, ready to jest at the thing he loves; open-minded to all things that may kindle emotion and expression. A post-chaise crosses music of both Bach and Beethoven. Honegger, still living, prefers the locomotive.

H. T. P.

1924, by
L' DIGEST, Inc.
15 CENTS A COPY

Boston Welcomes Koussevitsky in American Debut

Russian Conductor Gives First Concert in Forty-Fourth Symphony Season.

FULL HOUSE GREETS LEADER

Boston, Oct. 11.—Serge Koussevitsky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, succeeding Pierre Monteux, made his first American appearance in the opening concert of the forty-fourth season of the orchestra last night in Symphony Hall. A capacity audience welcomed the Russian leader, and applauded his work throughout the program, which consisted of the Vivaldi-Siloti D minor concerto for organ (first performance in America); Berlioz' Roman Carnival overture; Brahms' Variations on a Theme of Haydn; Honegger's Pacific 231 (first performance in America); and Scriabine's Extase.

The critical reception of Mr. Koussevitsky was as favorable as was that of the audience. Although admitting that first impressions must necessarily be hasty, Philip Hale in the Herald said, "Mr. Koussevitsky has a commanding figure and that indefinable quality known as magnetism, which works its spell on orchestra and audience. . . . It is evident that he is imaginative; that while he can be sensuous in gaining effects of color, this sensuousness is controlled by a cool head. . . . He knows that melodic figures should be sung, yet he is not given to sentimentalism."

H. T. Parker, writing in the Evening Transcript, commented also on these qualities of magnetism, and remarked with enthusiasm on the skill with which the new leader adapts his manner and clear beat to the style of the music in hand, from the classic quiet of Vivaldi to the great heat and passion of Extase, but always, according to this reviewer, it is "Koussevitsky passioning for the music,—not for himself."

The reviewer of the Globe admired the lack of mannerism in Mr. Koussevitsky's leading, writing, "His gestures are always definite commands promptly obeyed." This writer considered the continually sustained interest of the new leader's conducting exceptionally praiseworthy, and believed the Brahms was the low point of the performance, and the Scriabine, with its fierce Russian passion, the high point.

This reviewer found Pacific 231 much less violent than he had expected, with its extreme dissonance nevertheless indicative of economy of material, and of "lyric imagination." Mr. Parker was pleased that Honegger is more than noisily imitative in his sketch of a locomotive. "Veritably," he wrote, "he translates into a new medium visual image, bodily and spiritual thrill. . . . He has added a new energy to tones." Mr. Hale considered the music of Honegger simply "clever" and "amusing," adding that "mere cleverness soon palls."

(Continued on page 8)

New Boston Leader Makes Appearance

(Continued from page 1)

Several New York papers carried reviews of the concert. Mr. Olin Downes in the Times was particularly enthusiastic in his praise of Mr. Koussevitzky's "magnetism" which, he felt, "is particularly valuable for public success in this country of the virtuoso conductor." The reviewer made special mention of the new conductor's success with Le Poeme de l'Extase and Pacific 231. According to him, "he interprets with flaming temperament and communicative power." Mr. Downes summed up his review with the following:

"There will, of course, be divisions of opinion concerning his readings, but there was no mistaking the excitement of the audience and the enthusiasm of his welcome. It is plain that there is a new and significant figure among conductors in America today, and that he is at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

The Herald Tribune correspondent wrote, "Mr. Koussevitzky's program was a rising succession of climaxes, and was held up three times by prolonged applause." He found "exceptional brilliance and color" in Berlioz' Roman Carnival overture, while Honegger's Pacific 231 "was a skillful tour de force." But the "greatest moment of the concert was reached in Scriabin's Poeme de l'Extase, giving the impression that Scriabin had found a new prophet in America."

For the second pair of Boston concerts Mr. Koussevitsky will give Handel's Concerto Grosso in D minor, Debussy's Danse, orchestrated by Ravel; De Falla's El Amor Brujo; and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE SCHENECTADY
N. Y.
GAZETTE
OCT 14 1924

Boston Symphony Orchestra at State Armory November 10

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
OCT 15 1924

Koussevitzky to Conduct In Brooklyn Nov. 28

Serge Koussevitzky, the great Russian conductor, who made his debut in Boston last week, when he opened the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as its new conductor, will conduct this season's five concerts by the Boston orchestra at the Academy of Music. The date of the first concert is Nov. 28.

The interest and curiosity of musical America is centered on this coming new figure in our concert halls, and his superlative European reputation, also the success of his debut in Boston, indicate that he will hold the highest regard of our public.

Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
OCT 15 1924

...ranged for a starter.

Raymond Havens, pianist, who is to be soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra here, gives a recital in Jordan hall, Boston, Saturday afternoon, Oct. 25.

The San Carlo Opera Co. will open ...House

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
OCT 15 1924

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
OCT 15 1924

...Big Royalty

LEADERS GET THE BIG MONEY

Aside from the leaders the musicians in the jazz bands are getting big money. They have to work to earn it, but they get it. Two to three hundred dollars a week for an exceptionally good jazz musician is not exceptional.

It is the leaders of jazz, however, who are getting the rich cream. Presumably the leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is looked upon as the premier position in the entire world of instrumental music. Not one of the jazz band kings would look at it for a moment. The Boston Symphony leader gets a salary around $40,000. Such a mere trifle would not interest Paul Whiteman, Vincent Lopez, Ted Lewis or Brook Johns at all.

Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
OCT 16 1924

SYMPHONY BY RADIO

To the Editor of the Post:

Sir—In the papers I see that a course in the appreciation of orchestral music is to be given at the Boston Public Library, presumably to increase interest in the Symphony Concerts. But why bother to do this if only a favored few can attend the concerts? Friday afternoon I waited outside Symphony Hall half an hour and then, like many others, was disappointed. Only those who had parked on the steps for about two hours could get in.

All the tickets had been sold days before, so those of us who could not attend the Saturday evening performances had to take a chance on the rush seats. If the idea of the founder and supporters of the orchestra is to bring the best music within the reach of all (and surely Colonel Higginson did not intend his concerts to be the property of a select few), one could hardly say they had been successful.

Certainly the two million people of Greater Boston are not so dull intellectually as to force a band of talented musicians led by one of the ablest conductors in the world to restrict itself to two performances a week in a small hall because of lack of patronage! There are more than enough patrons for two performances, and a little newspaper and radio propaganda ought to fill the seats at a third one.

The ordinary individual, like you and I, needs only to be taught that he can hear the best music in the world just as easily as he can see a show. This third performance might be given only every other week perhaps, on Wednesday afternoons, say. Then those who cannot go Friday or who feel unable to spend the time and money required for the 24 Friday performances might be able to attend the Wednesday ones, which might possibly be so arranged as to reduce the annual deficit.

Radio might be used to make more performances of the concerts feasible. I do not quarrel with those who really enjoy modern popular music, but I do object to their monopolizing the ether with it. There is only one radio orchestra playing regularly each week, but on Saturday evening all three stations have their blare factories under full steam. Now why could not one of them broadcast the Symphony concerts? The guarantors of the orchestra would lose nothing for those who go now would go anyway.

At best, radio transmission is somewhat unsatisfactory and there is great fascination in watching the musicians. The guarantors might even gain, if radio filled the seats at a third performance so arranged as to reduce the deficit. At the very least, broadcasting would realize the purpose of both the founder, Colonel Higginson, and the conductor, Mr. Koussevitsky, of putting the very best music where the ordinary individual who is interested enough to put forth some exertion can get at it.

DISAPPOINTED.

From the Treasury of the Symphony Orchestra

Balance-Sheet of Three Seasons Past; Pledges for the Season to Come

WE submit herewith [say the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the current program-book] a comparative statement for the years 1922, 1923, and 1924 at the close of business July 31. You will note that the operating income increased $15,000.00, and the operating expense increased almost $20,000.00. The increased expense was due largely to increase in the orchestra salaries of $14,500.00 and an increase in travelling expense of $4,900.00. The increase in salaries was accounted for by an additional number of men in the orchestra, and the increased travelling expenses in connection with passage for Mr. and Mrs. Monteux and the new members of the orchestra.

RECEIPTS:	1922	1923	1924
Gross Income from Concerts	$407,642.32	$423,872.92	$435,445.97
Symphony Hall Rents, etc.	91,007.30	95,849.02	95,833.35
Programs	35,224.78	39,519.09	42,547.28
Sale of Bound Volumes	130.00	265.00	280.50
Interest on Bank Balances	1,173.56	1,412.86	1,831.71
Sundry Receipts		334.26	354.63
Operating Income	$535,177.91	$561,253.15	$576,293.44
Payments	632,717.23	644,539.14	664,332.62
Operating Deficit	$97,539.32	$83,285.99	$88,039.18
Income Endowment Fund and Interest	5,865.44	6,934.06	6,713.80
Net Loss	$91,673.88	$76,351.93	$81,325.38

PAYMENTS:	1922	1923	1924
Expense of Concerts, Rents, Travelling Expenses, Soloists, etc.	$158,101.19	$170,366.58	$165,183.77
Symphony Hall Maintenance	95,174.98	98,643.13	101,401.16
Programmes	29,618.83	32,286.30	35,702.10
Orchestra Salaries	308,150.78	303,124.21	317,661.11
Other Salaries	28,928.13	29,885.00	29,403.25
Insurance	1,833.04	1,845.14	1,998.76
Music	2,095.10	2,122.54	2,248.71
Interest on Notes	569.84	941.96	481.74
Sundry Expense	8,245.84	5,324.28	10,252.02
	$632,717.23	$644,539.14	$664,332.62

We start the year 1924 with pledges to the deficit fund of $52,874.33, which we hope will be increased during the year to at least the amount of the average deficit for the last three years, namely $83,117.00.

...friendly company, besides, will be ... her.

Mass. Oct 15

Here in Boston

For novel number from the younger generation, Mr. Koussevitzky will include in the third pair of Symphony Concerts, on Oct. 24 and 25, Prokofiev's "Scythian Suite," his first piece, it memory serves, to be heard in Boston. Had original plans held, the composer himself would have graced the occasion, playing the piano-part in one of his Concertos. As it is, engagements detain him in Europe.

The orchestral parts of Ravel's arrangement of a Dance out of Debussy's piano-pieces have failed to reach Symphony Hall in time for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday and Saturday. Instead, Florent Schmitt's "Dreams" ("Mirages?") will be played.

The New York Sun hears from ... of a blind violinist playing in the streets for what money chance listeners may give him. As the story goes, he does not choose pieces or scrape strings after the manner of wayfaring fiddlers. Rather he seems skilful and cultivated musician. According to The Sun he is Peter van der Meer, violinist, ten years or more ago, in the Boston Symphony Orchestra; since fallen upon ...

LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
OCT 15 1924

...story, you have the greatest sea drama ever created.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Raymond Havens, pianist, will be the soloist on the occasion of the concert at the Memorial Auditorium, Sunday afternoon, Nov. 2, when the Boston Symphony orchestra gives its first ... concert with Mr. Koussevitsky conducting.

Mr. Havens has been soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra on a dozen occasions and his playing has called forth the commendation of both Mr. Rabaud and Mr. Monteux, under whom he has appeared. Havens is to play the Tschaikowsky concerto with the orchestra.

BOSTON,
MASS.
HERALD
OCT 16 1924

The other pieces to be played by the orchestra are movements from a grand concerto in D minor, by Handel; De Falla's Suite taken from his ballet with songs, "Love the Wizard," to be played for the first time in this country, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

De Falla's ballet, with its scenes of gypsy life, was produced at Madrid in 1915. It then met with little success. De Falla made a suite out of it which was produced in Madrid the next year, conducted by our old friend Arbos, who was for a season concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The ballet was given several times this year at Antwerp. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the suite at one of his concerts in Paris no longer ago than May 8 of this year.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE SCHENECTADY
N. Y.
GAZETTE
OCT 14 1924

Boston Symphony Orchestra at State Armory November 10

Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
OCT 15 1924

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
OCT 15 1924

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
OCT 15 1924

Koussevitzky to Conduct In Brooklyn Nov. 28

Serge Koussevitzky, the great Russian conductor, who made his debut in Boston last week, when he opened the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as its new conductor, will conduct this season's five concerts by the Boston orchestra at the Academy of Music. The date of the first concert is Nov. 28.

The interest and curiosity of musical America is centered on this coming new figure in our concert halls, and his superlative European reputation, also the success of his debut in Boston, indicate that he will hold the highest regard of our public.

Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
OCT 16 1924

...andy for a career.

Raymond Havens, pianist, who is to be soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra here, gives a recital in Jordan hall, Boston, Saturday afternoon, Oct. 25.

The San Carlo Opera Co. will open ...

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
OCT 15 1924

LEADERS GET THE BIG MONEY

Aside from the leaders the musicians in the jazz bands are getting big money. They have to work to earn it, but they get it. Two to three hundred dollars a week for an exceptionally good jazz musician is not exceptional.

It is the leaders of jazz, however, who are getting the rich cream. Presumably the leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is looked upon as the premier position in the entire world of instrumental music. Not one of the jazz band kings would look at it for a moment. The Boston Symphony leader gets a salary around $40,000. Such a mere trifle would not interest Paul Whiteman, Vincent Lopez, Ted Lewis or Brook Johns at all.

From the Treasury of the Symphony Orchestra

Balance-Sheet of Three Seasons Past; Pledges for the Season to Come

WE submit herewith [say the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the current program-book] a comparative statement for the years 1922, 1923, and 1924 at the close of business July 31. You will note that the operating income increased $15,000.00, and the operating expense increased almost $20,000.00. The increased expense was due largely to increase in the orchestra salaries of $14,500.00 and an increase in travelling expense of $4,900.00. The increase in salaries was accounted for by an additional number of men in the orchestra, and the increased travelling expenses in connection with passage for Mr. and Mrs. Monteux and the new members of the orchestra.

RECEIPTS:	1922	1923	1924
Gross Income from Concerts	$407,642.32	$423,872.92	$435,445.97
Symphony Hall Rents, etc.	91,007.30	95,849.02	95,833.35
Programs	35,224.73	39,519.09	42,547.28
Sale of Bound Volumes	130.00	265.00	280.50
Interest on Bank Balances	1,173.56	1,412.86	1,831.71
Sundry Receipts		334.26	354.63
Operating Income	$535,177.91	$561,253.15	$576,293.44
Payments	632,717.23	644,539.14	664,332.62
Operating Deficit	$97,539.32	$83,285.99	$88,039.18
Income Endowment Fund and Interest	5,865.44	6,034.06	6,713.80
Net Loss	$91,673.88	$76,351.93	$81,325.38

PAYMENTS:	1922	1923	1924
Expense of Concerts, Rents, Travelling Expenses, Soloists, etc.	$158,101.19	$170,366.58	$165,183.77
Symphony Hall Maintenance	95,174.98	98,643.13	101,401.16
Programmes	29,618.83	32,286.30	35,702.10
Orchestra Salaries	308,150.78	303,124.21	317,661.11
Other Salaries	28,928.13	29,885.00	29,403.25
Insurance	1,833.04	1,845.14	1,998.76
Music	2,095.10	2,122.54	2,248.71
Interest on Notes	569.34	941.96	481.74
Sundry Expense	8,245.84	5,324.28	10,252.02
	$631,717.23	$644,539.14	$664,332.62

We start the year 1924 with pledges to the deficit fund of $52,874.43, which we hope will be increased during the year to at least the amount of the average deficit for the last three years, namely $83,117.00.

SYMPHONY BY RADIO

To the Editor of the Post:

Sir—In the papers I see that a course in the appreciation of orchestral music is to be given at the Boston Public Library, presumably to increase interest in the Symphony Concerts. But why bother to do this if only a favored few can attend the concerts? Friday afternoon I waited outside Symphony Hall half an hour and then, like many others, was disappointed. Only those who had parked on the steps for about two hours could get in.

All the tickets had been sold days before, so those of us who could not attend the Saturday evening performances had to take a chance on the rush seats. If the idea of the founder and supporters of the orchestra is to bring the best music within the reach of all (and surely Colonel Higginson did not intend his concerts to be the property of a select few), one could hardly say they had been successful.

Certainly the two million people of Greater Boston are not so dull intellectually as to force a band of talented musicians led by one of the ablest conductors in the world to restrict itself to two performances a week in a small hall because of lack of patronage! There are more than enough patrons for two performances, and a little newspaper and radio propaganda ought to fill the seats at a third one.

The ordinary individual, like you and I, needs only to be taught that he can hear the best music in the world just as easily as he can see a show. This third performance might be given only every other week perhaps, on Wednesday afternoons, say. Then those who cannot go Friday or who feel unable to spend the time and money required for the 24 Friday performances might be able to attend the Wednesday ones, which might possibly be so arranged as to reduce the annual deficit.

Radio might be used to make more performances of the concerts feasible. I do not quarrel with those who really enjoy modern popular music, but I do object to their monopolizing the ether with it. There is only one radio orchestra playing regularly each week, but on Saturday evening all three stations have their blare factories under full steam. Now why could not one of them broadcast the Symphony concerts? The guarantors of the orchestra would lose nothing for those who go now would go anyway.

At best, radio transmission is somewhat unsatisfactory and there is great fascination in watching the musicians. The guarantors might even gain, if radio filled the seats at a third performance so arranged as to reduce the deficit. At the very least, broadcasting would realize the purpose of both the founder, Colonel Higginson, and the conductor, Mr. Koussevitsky, of putting the very best music where the ordinary individual who is interested enough to put forth some exertion can get at it.

DISAPPOINTED.

friendly company, besides, with [illegible] her.

Here in Boston

For novel number from the younger generation, Mr. Koussevitzky will include in the third pair of Symphony Concerts, on Oct. 24 and 25, Prokofiev's "Scythian Suite," his first piece, if memory serves, to be heard in Boston. Had original plans held, the composer himself would have graced the occasion, playing the piano-part in one of his Concertos. As it is, engagements detain him in Europe.

The orchestral parts of Ravel's arrangement of a Dance out of Debussy's pianopieces have failed to reach Symphony Hall in time for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday and Saturday. Instead, Florent Schmitt's "Dreams" ("Mirages?") will be played.

The New York Sun hears from Pittsburg of a blind violinist playing in the streets for what money chance listeners may give him. As the story goes, he does not choose pieces or scrape strings after the manner of wayfaring fiddlers. Rather he seems skilful and cultivated musician. According to The Sun he is Peter van der Meer, violinist, ten years or more ago, in the Boston Symphony Orchestra; since fallen upon [illegible]

LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
OCT 15 1924

story, you have the greatest sea drama ever created.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Raymond Havens, pianist, will be the soloist on the occasion of the concert at the Memorial Auditorium, Sunday afternoon, Nov. 2, when the Boston Symphony orchestra gives its first Lowell concert with Mr. Koussevitsky conducting.

Mr. Havens has been soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra on a dozen occasions and his playing has called forth the commendation of both Mr. Rabaud and Mr. Monteux, under whom he has appeared. Havens is to play the Tschaikowsky concerto with the orchestra.

BOSTON,
MASS.
HERALD
OCT 16 1924

The other pieces to be played by the orchestra are movements from a grand concerto in D minor, by Handel; De Falla's Suite taken from his ballet with songs, "Love the Wizard," to be played for the first time in this country, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

De Falla's ballet, with its scenes of gypsy life, was produced at Madrid in 1915. It then met with little success. De Falla made a suite out of it, which was produced in Madrid the next year, conducted by our old friend Arbos, who was for a season concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The ballet was given several times this year at Antwerp. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the suite at one of his concerts in Paris no longer ago than May 8 of this year.

142

Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CLEVELAND, OHIO
PRESS

OCT 16 1924

By DAVIS

MONSIEUR HONEGGER glorifies the locomotive in his symphonic piece "Pacific 231."

This composition is easily understood. It's something like what small-time vaudeville dancers do after they say, "Ladies and gentlemens, with your kind attention, I will now attempt to give you an imitation of a train on the B. & O."

* * *

HONEGGER'S symphonic piece describes the noises made by a locomotive starting up. But once it gets under way his purpose is to express "the physical sensation of a locomotive, not the noise of it."

That is simpler than it may seem. The same thing was done in prose about an ocean liner by Rudyard Kipling.

* * *

HONEGGER'S choo-choo symphony was played by the Boston Orchestra in the first concert this season under Conductor Koussevitzky (who was brought from Paris).

It is news here because it will be played later this season by the Cleveland Orchestra, for the first time in Cleveland.

Boston Transcript critic writes, "No modernist music, except Stravinsky's 'Rite of Spring' has been so heartily applauded at these concerts as was Honegger's 'Pacific 231'."

* * * * * *

That Pacific 231

H. T. P., writing in the Boston Transcript, testifies that whoever has made the feint of sleep in a hotel beside a railroad yard will testify to the fullness of the composer's achievement at the beginning when the locomotive is making steam, preparing for the start getting under way.

"These tones," he says, "were as imitative a music as Strauss ever perpetrated when the sheep bleat or windmills whir in 'Don Quixote'."

Merely imitative music, you understand, is not the highest art.

"A feat, a freak, if the listener will, curious, amusant, but otherwise unimpressive."

"But once his locomotive is gathering speed, once it is hurtling across the night, he writes no imitative music. Veritably he translates into a new medium visual image, bodily and spiritual thrill. The pounding rhythms, the mounting speed, the tonal masses at every instant forging new might and impetus—here is music achieving and expressing an imagery that it has never known before.

"Monsieur Honegger has ceased to be imitative and amusant to the pleasure of audiences Parisian or Bostonian.

"He has added new energy to tones. He has wrought them into new shapes, frenzied them with a new emotion. He has found music not for the great rods and driving wheels, but for the sensations that this steel, in mass and motion, wakes in the human spirit. To evoke its sensations under new experiences has been the perdurable function of music from the days of Bach, be it in church cantata or suite of dances to the days of Stravinsky crashing thru the barbaric 'Rite of Spring'."

* * * * * *

Also in Cleveland

Cleveland, last season, was kept behind the times and given little chance to hear the modernist music which for two seasons has been the concert sensation of New York, Philadelphia and Boston as well as London and Paris.

Against this policy we raised a lamentation and protest that symphonic music in Cleveland was being left unkissed to play the role of Sleeping Beauty.

We undertake to express no judgment of the merits of new symphonic music, or old. That is for Wilson G. Smith.

These notes record the fact that this city, having been kept out of the current of musical progress, is getting into the current. That may perturb some, but it will be more interesting. Something to talk about at any rate. Maybe it won't be necessary to know much about music to talk about Honegger's "Pacific 231."

Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM ATLANTA
GA.
CONSTITUTION

OCT 16 1924

MECHANICAL (?) MUSIC.

THE other current event hinges on the first appearance at the head of The Boston Symphony orchestra of its new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

Boston for some reason or other acted almost like any other American city over the debut of a new artist of whom it expected much and was not disappointed in its first impression. It was quite vociferous in its enthusiasm.

But that is not the point. Koussevitzky is no doubt master of his art, but he will have to turn figurative handsprings to surpass the work of his contemporaries at the head of other great American symphony bands.

The thing that most interests us plain people is the character of the new music he brought over, of which the most startling thing he played at the first concert was Honegger's symphonic movement, "Pacific 231."

Now, "Pacific 231," if you don't know it, is a locomotive. And that is not some obscure musical term, but it means a sure enough, honest-to-goodness iron horse that pulls freight cars or Pullmans, even day coaches and baggage.

The composer is quoted as having said "I have always had a passionate love of locomotives. To me they—and I love them passionately as others are passionate in their love for horses or women—are living creatures."

Olin Downes in the New York Times says of the first performance in Boston. "Honegger has attempted to give a tonal portrayal of the great monster, the joyous giant as it stands motionless, just breathing; as it starts its movement; as it hurtles through the night at 120 miles an hour. The music is superbly made; it is witty and joyous, full of youth; a laughing welcome to the day and its dynamic power."

That was a very human piece for Honegger to write. Cultured Boston rose to it, and yet it is the kind of thing that might reconcile even the musically irreconcilable to listening to a symphony orchestra.

It's up to some American composer now to translate into music the American world fliers' trip around the world. With the buzz of the motors for the basis of instrumentation, there would be all the imaginative possibilities of a thousand and one Arabian nights in the circling of the globe, which contrasted for the fliers scenes as unchanged as in the days when caliphs wandered in the market place in the night for human contacts, with twentieth century life of which Honegger's locomotive is a good symbol.

* * * *

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
OCT 16 1924
From
JOURNAL,
Chicago, Ill.

MUSIC

By EUGENE STINSON

Arthur Honegger's description of a modern locomotive, "Pacific 231," which is to be played Friday and Saturday by the Chicago Symphony orchestra, is the first novelty of Frederick Stock's new season.

The conductor has been in the city only since the first of the month, and little time has been at the disposal of the orchestra for the preparation of two subscription programmes, this evening's "popular" list, and the Honegger work which is to be heard for the first time in Chicago tomorrow.

The advance reports of Honegger's short but complex piece make no secret of its difficulties. It is a very satisfactory, but not novel, indication of the skill of Mr. Stock's men that they have been able to put together under his direction and in so short a time, a work typical of the difficult contemporary music.

The matter of time consumption in rehearsals has always been important. British orchestras, which have practically no rehearsals at all, are acknowledged woefully deficient in the polish Americans demand of their few great orchestras. With the unionization of those wage-earners who make their living by musical tools, the question of rehearsals has now and again grown acute in the history of American orchestras.

Berlin is now feeling the sting of high costs, just as her concert situation is commencing to revive through stabilization of currency. Where the Berlin Philharmonic once spent 1,200 marks on a rehearsal, it must now pay out 2,000. Consequently its repertoire will for the present concern itself chiefly with the standard items; new music, which has always meant much to Germany, will be less frequently heard.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, like the Chicago players, is famous for its virtuosity, which, declining after Karl Muck's retirement as conductor, recovered its excellence under the supervision of Pierre Monteux, who was succeeded last week by Serge Koussevitsky.

On Koussevitsky's debut Oct. 10 he conducted much novel material, and one of the items in his programme was "Pacific 231," given its first American performance at that time. The Russian was thoroughly acquainted with Honegger's composition, which he directed in Paris last summer.

Tel. Chelsea 8860

THIS CLIPPING FROM SYRACUSE,
N. Y.
JOURNAL

OCT 16 1924

BOSTON GIVES CONDUCTOR OVATION

By THE CONCERTGOER.

RECENT accounts of the reception of Serge Roussevitzky, the great Russian, who has just been elected conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, place it as a duplicate of that tendered Vladimir Shavitch, also a Russian, when he was inaugurated as conductor of the Syracuse Symphony. In both Boston and Syracuse the audience rose to its feet spontaneously as masses of flowers were handed up, in appreciation of the conductor's splendid ability.

Great interest is being manifested in the first popular concert of the Syracuse Symphony Orchestra Saturday at 6 P. M., at Keith's, when a program of lighter numbers will be presented. Among these will be the "Overture" from William Tell.. It has been heard in Syracuse many times in a condensed version, but this is the first time, in many years, at least, when the full rendition will be given by a large symphony orchestra.

Carlos Salzado, French harpist, conceded to be the greatest living harpist, will appear in several solos and much is expected of him.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON,
MASS.
HERALD

OCT 16 1924

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony will naturally excite interest. Not the music itself, for Boston has summered and wintered with it, but there will be curiosity concerning Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation.

HUSRDAY, OCTOBER 16, 19

NOTES and LINES

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the Symphony concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening has been slightly changed. The score and parts of Ravel's transcription of Debussy's "Danse" have not arrived, so "Reves," a short piece by Florent Schmitt, has been substituted. It will be the first performance in Boston, if not in this country. The music was written in the Pyrenees a short time before the world war. Schmitt is not unknown in Boston. His "Tragedy of Salome" has been performed here twice and his "Out-of-Door Music" once by the Symphony orchestra. Mr. Longy brought out his "Viennese Rhapsody" at one of Mrs. R. J. Hall's concerts. Schmitt's songs for four voices were performed at a Boston Opera House concert, and later by the Cecilia, and the Cecilia produced his 46th Psalm. Chamber music by Schmitt has been performed here.

Schmitt was born in Lorraine of Alsatian parentage. At the Paris Conservatory he received the Prix de Rome in 1900. He was called to the French colors in 1914. It has been said of him that "isolated, almost fiercely solitary, he has no systems, no dogmas." He has never joined a school; still less has he wished to be a chief.

The other pieces to be played by the orchestra are movements from a grand concerto in D minor, by Handel; De Falla's Suite taken from his ballet with songs, "Love the Wizard," to be played for the first time in this country, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

De Falla's ballet, with its scenes of gypsy life, was produced at Madrid in 1915. It then met with little success. De Falla made a suite out of it which was produced in Madrid the next year, conducted by our old friend Arbos, who was for a season concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The ballet was given several times this year at Antwerp. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted the suite at one of his concerts in Paris no longer ago than May 8 of this year.

Beethoven's Fifth Symphony will naturally excite interest. Not the music itself, for Boston has summered and wintered with it, but there will be curiosity concerning Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
OCT 17 1924

Herald
Thurs. Oct 16

Programs in Prospect

At the Symphony Concerts of next week, Mr. Koussevitzky will lead the orchestra through these pieces:

Concerto in D Major.....Emanuel Bach
Prelude to the Opera, "Khovantchina"
Musorgsky
Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bee"
Rimsky-Korsakov
Scythian Suite .....Prokofiev
Fourth Symphony .....

At [illegible] Hall on Tuesday evening, Oct. 28, Mr. Bedetti, the master-violoncellist of the Symphony Orchestra will play these numbers, with Mr. Arthur Fiedler as pianist:

Sonata No. 10.....Valentini
Suite in C Major for Violoncello Alone....Bach
Georgian Rhapsody .....Cherepnin
Arioso .....Bach
Spanish Dance .....Granados
Piece in C-sharp Minor.....Boulanger
Andalusian Fantasia .....Cassado

If Mme. Gluck at Symphony Hall on Saturday afternoon, repeats, as she is likely to do, the program of her recent concert in New York, she will sing:

Air, "With Verdure Clad," from "The Creation,".....Haydn
My mother bids me bind my hair.....Haydn
Warnung .....Mozart
Oh! Sleep, Why Dost Thou Leave Me?..Handel
Der Kuss .....Beethoven
O Thou Billowy Harvest Field....Rakhmaninov
Song of the Shepherd Lel...Rimsky-Korsakov
Two Folksongs of Little Russia.....Zimbalist
Die Post .....Schubert
Canzonetta .....Loewe
Botschaft .....Brahms
Bird of the Wilderness.....Horsman
Time of Parting.....Hadley
Fairy Tales .....Wolff
The Cunnin' Little Thing.....Hageman
Red, Red Rose.....

"LOVE THE SORCERER"

Pieces from de Falla's Ballet at the Symphony Concerts Tomorrow — A Ghostly Folk Tale for Scenario—The Course and Quality of the Music

MANUEL DE FALLA, "most European of Spanish musicians and most Spanish of European musicians," returns to the Symphony Concerts of tomorrow and Saturday in a Suite drawn from his ballet (with occasional voices) "El Amor Brujo" or "Love the Sorcerer." The music was written in 1915 to a scenario by Martinez Sierra, the Andalusian playwright, one of whose comedies, "Cradle Song," was acted last winter no farther away than Cambridge. At Madrid, in Antwerp and elsewhere, it has been mimed, danced and sung in the theater. From the music, moreover, de Falla chose and strung together a Suite for Orchestra, added last May to the repertory of the "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris. Less one number that requires singing voices, it will be repeated this evening at the concert of the Symphony Orchestra at Harvard, and again, in regular course, at Symphony Hall.

From Dr. Zederbaum, Mr. Koussevitzky's secretary, comes the following outline of the fable that de Falla's music enfolds and illustrates: "Candelas, an Andalusian girl, in the bloom of youth and warm with passion, has known the pleasures and pains of a gypsy lover, inconstant himself but jealous of her, high-tempered and masterful, cruel underneath his fascination. Now he is dead; but the memory and the dread of him haunt and harass her. She believes him a ghost, amorous and jealous as in life, enforcing his will upon her. She fears and quails before the recollection and the wraith . . . But the spring brings a new lover, the youth Carmelo, comely, gallant and ardent. Candelas returns his affection. Yet, whenever they meet, whenever they would exchange caresses, the ghost of the gypsy steals between, frightening them apart. Carmelo is desperate; Candelas saddens and withers as one under a spell.

"Timely, however, the wit of the lad finds the way of escape. The gypsy, he remembers, was a fickle fellow ready to pursue any tempting girl. Lucia, Candelas's friend, is the trap to catch him. Again Carmelo seeks Candelas; again the ghost intervenes and menaces. Yet there in the room is also Lucia. The girl catches the gypsy's eye; entices him, toys with him. While the wraith courts Lucia, Carmelo and Candelas may at last exchange their vows. So is the game of love played and won. The dawn breaks; the bells chime. The ghost is laid at last. Over death is life triumphant, and love again is conqueror. Along the way, it has been sorcerer too."

Manuel de Falla, pianist and composer, enthusiastic nationalist of penetrating sensibilities and irreproachable sense of proportion is not unknown to Boston. Last year his symphonic "Nights in the Gardens of Spain," considered in Europe one of the most praiseworthy of the more recently completed compositions, met with an unflattering reception, and not too warm comment. In the same composer's "Love the Sorcerer," this season brings a brighter, more colorful piece, a ballet, completed in 1915.

On the works written within the last dozen years does Spain base her claim to a vital and growing national school of music. The amount and the quality of her compositions permit Spaniards the claim. The development is the direct outgrowth of a musical renaissance which reached Spain only after it had been established twenty years or longer in Russia and France. On the Iberian Peninsula, the prophet of that renaissance was Felipe Pedrell, occupying a position similar in importance and scope to that of Glinka in Russian music. Pedrell collected Spanish folk songs and legends and wrote a triology incorporating some of the tales much as Wagner had done. Best of all, Pedrell discerned and cleared new musical paths, and advised young musicians. He was guide and mentor to the students he taught. Among his pupils at the Madrid Conservatory was Manuel de Falla, who studied composition with him, and whom he encouraged in his finally accomplished plan of going to Paris to better his understanding of music, national and universal.

Only at the outbreak of the war did Falla return to Spain, after an absence of seven years. Since 1907 he had lived in Paris, befriended by Debussy, Ravel, and Dukas from the earliest and most difficult days of his sojourn there until he left the French capital for his home. Falla had not gone to Paris to study music. That he had already done at the Madrid Conservatory. In 1905, his opera, "La Vida Breve," colorful, nationalistic, had won the prize of the "Academia de Bellas Artes." Falla went to Paris to absorb that musical atmosphere which he felt necessary to his proper artistic development, and which he knew he could not obtain at that time in Madrid. Yet he did not forsake his native Spanish tendencies. Always at heart he remained a Spaniard, and never allowed the surrounding French atmosphere to absorb his native personalities.

When he returned after his long absence he formed the National Society of Music to offer to young musicians the encouragement which had been denied him. He travelled extensively through his own country, and finally made a home for himself in the romantic Alhambra at Granada. There he completed work on his ballet "Love the Sorcerer," and saw it performed in Madrid, in April, 1915.

A splendid success resulted. The ballet, a work of exquisite finish and meticulous care, is yet music pure and simple, and has immediate sensuous delight. It is full of national color—not the psuedo-Spanish of foreign composers, but a more native, deep and subtle art—an expressive, evocative rendition of the Spanish spirit, possessing a universal appeal. It's [illegible] to further litigation and appeal."

"LOVE THE SORCERER"

Continued from Page Ten

combination of national characteristics and a strongly personal trend make it a work of individuality. The Oriental elements perpetuated by the gipsies, and the impression of fierce and elemental Romany pride fuse in an exotic and arresting creation.

Falla uses a small orchestra for his work, but he has included the piano. He emphasizes the use and effectiveness of solo instruments. He mutes his entire orchestra, instrument by instrument. In various sections, scattered glissandi, sliding runs, plucked strings are employed to intensify the atmosphere. Sudden changes from pianissimo to fortissimo, in the Dance of Terror, precede a charming and picturesque "récit" in The Magic Circle. An ethereal Midnight, slow and quiet, gives place to a Ritual Dance which contains masterly groupings of instruments.

The Pantomime announces and develops the theme of the opening section. Sharp dissonances in the piano occur before a coda of rare quiet and beauty: harp-like chords in the piano accompaniment; [illegible] solo oboe, rubato. The Danse du Jeu d'Amour, with syncopations, and [illegible] strings, leads without pause to the love finale, "Les Cloches du Matin."

The music of the ballet is free from literary and pictorial elements. Never does it become subservient to the stage. It is simple, natural. Erudition does not show from every page. One finds no conventional display. Rather Falla gives depth and amplitude, and, by the same token, [illegible] musical substance. C.

UNTO CAMBRIDGE ALSO

For the First Time Mr. Koussevitzky Conducts at Harvard—Audience and Auditorium—Handel Through a Temperament and Beethoven from a Master of Rhythm —De Falla Obscured

AS the convenient French phrase runs, Mr. Koussevitzky "continues his débuts." Last evening the public of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge saw and heard him for the first time; filled Sanders Theater to the last seat; gave every sign of interest and pleasure. Even in the gallery above his head hung those who would look and listen. For the excitement of him, de Falla's Suite from the ballet, "Love the Sorcerer," was applauded, though it baffled. In turn the conductor had his first experience hereabouts of a wooden-walled and highly resonant auditorium. No doubt, he rejoiced when it gave him back every flying detail of the Finale to a Concerto Grosso from Handel. To some ears, the Beethoven of the Fifth Symphony sounded pent within these narrow spaces. Yet they reverberated magnificently to Mr. Koussevitzky's vigors with the music. Students of his ways also discovered that his version of a given piece varies hardly at all with time and place. Again he repeated Berlioz's Overture, "Roman Carnival"; and, as he made it to sound a week ago in Symphony Hall, so now it sounded in Sanders Theater. Not a recollected stroke or shading seem altered.

Otherwise the music heard in Cambridge last evening was the music played in Boston this afternoon. According to Mr. Koussevitzky's custom, it began with three parts of a Concerto Grosso from Handel. The conductor indeed cherishes these ancient pieces; but he plays them in a fashion of his own. Line they are and line he keeps them. Yet he courts every opportunity for tonal color. Handel wrote a slow-paced, largely unfolding Air. Mr. Koussevitzky stretched to the utmost every curve of the music, lingered over every convolution, carried it onward and upward in a spiral of intense tone. It was sumptuous and sensuous to hear; but as plainly it was Handel through a temperament. Akin were the flick and the race of figures through the finale—sheer excitement under Mr. Koussevitzky's whipping; but Allegro Moderato on Handel's pages. Slowly streamed the beginning of the Overture—the very state and splendor of such music—but were not those long-held chords rather of the conductor's than of Handel's making?

More by this temperament did Beethoven profit. Upon the Fifth Symphony Mr. Koussevitzky laid the hand of power, as one who would set it newly aflame with the composer's passion. At will he lifted the orchestra to its utmost sonorities. At will, as in the transition from Scherzo to Finale, he held it almost in suspensive rustle. For it, he phrased, as by a human voice, the songful measures of the Andante. Deep were the euphonies. At every turn, moreover, the conductor was master of line, progress, ascent. He began in turbulence; he seemed to fling in contrasts; but his sea of sound broadened, deepened, mounted; while never was it opaque. The song of the Andante was measured. To the utmost Mr. Koussevitzky would prolong and intensify its beauty. He was all for gradients; yet unbroken, even unruffled held the curve. Above every other faculty, Mr. Koussevitzky's sense of rhythm beat through the symphony deepening the glow, intensifying the sweep, re-kindling the passion. Rhythm tossed through the first movement; was wing to the second; conjured up the creep and the leap of the transition, marshalled the reiterant elation of the Finale. There will be debate of Mr. Koussevitzky's pace. Irresistible was his rhythm. Since Dr. Muck's day, there has been none such in our concerts.

For the composers around the corner only de Falla had his day in Cambridge and dubious day it seemed. With reason, these men of our time write their ballets and mimed dramas. Music proffers them no freer field for invention, imagination, handiwork. Less wisely do they draw from such music their orchestral Suites for the concert-hall. Originally, de Falla's "Love the Sorcerer" was ballet of action, ballet even with songs, in the theater of Madrid. As scenario out of gypsy folk-ways, Martinez Sierra devised a fable for the stage as well as for music. Then the inevitable concert-piece played in Paris, played in London played over-seas. Faintly last evening a string of sub-titles hinted at course, scene, episode and atmosphere. The listener tried to hear it as "absolute music," but as often heard it as music that outside the theatre, away from the dancing and the miming, is but half itself. It sounded direct and sparse. Now and again it was angular and bare. Often rhythm quickened it—into native wildness, tortured dance, hint of uncanny rites. In this fragment was warmth of song; in that enfolding atmosphere. In a third were the mimes at play? Not once, however, did the obscurity, the confusion, of impression quite lift. A ballet remained a ballet. Suite or no suite, it usually does.

H. T. P.

Trans. Friday
Oct 17

UNTO CAMBRIDGE ALSO

For the First Time Mr. Koussevitzky Conducts at Harvard—Audience and Auditorium—Handel Through a Temperament and Beethoven from a Master of Rhythm —De Falla Obscured

AS the convenient French phrase runs, Mr. Koussevitzky "continues his débuts." Last evening the public of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge saw and heard him for the first time; filled Sanders Theater to the last seat; gave every sign of interest and pleasure. Even in the gallery above his head hung those who would look and listen. For the excitement of him, de Falla's Suite from the ballet, "Love the Sorcerer," was applauded, though it baffled. In turn the conductor had his first experience hereabouts of a wooden-walled and highly resonant auditorium. No doubt, he rejoiced when it gave him back every flying detail of the Finale to a Concerto Grosso from Handel. To some ears, the Beethoven of the Fifth Symphony sounded pent within these narrow spaces. Yet they reverberated magnificently to Mr. Koussevitzky's vigors with the music. Students of his ways also discovered that his version of a given piece varies hardly at all with time and place. Again he repeated Berlioz's Overture, "Roman Carnival"; and, as he made it to sound a week ago in Symphony Hall, so now it sounded in Sanders Theater. Not a recollected stroke or shading seem altered.

Otherwise the music heard in Cambridge last evening was the music played in Boston this afternoon. According to Mr. Koussevitzky's custom, it began with three parts of a Concerto Grosso from Handel. The conductor indeed cherishes these ancient pieces; but he plays them in a fashion of his own. Line they are and line he keeps them. Yet he courts every opportunity for tonal color. Handel wrote a slow-paced, largely unfolding Air. Mr. Koussevitzky stretched to the utmost every curve of the music, lingered over every convolution, carried it onward and upward in a spiral of intense tone. It was sumptuous and sensuous to hear; but as plainly it was Handel through a temperament. Akin were the flick and the race of figures through the finale—sheer excitement under Mr. Koussevitzky's whipping; but Allegro Moderato on Handel's pages. Slowly streamed the beginning of the Overture—the very state and splendor of such music—but were not those long-held chords rather of the conductor's than of Handel's making?

More by this temperament did Beethoven profit. Upon the Fifth Symphony Mr. Koussevitzky laid the hand of power, as one who would set it newly aflame with the composer's passion. At will he lifted the orchestra to its utmost sonorities. At will, as in the transition from Scherzo to Finale, he held it almost in suspensive rustle. For it, he phrased, as by a human voice, the songful measures of the Andante. Deep were the euphonies. At every turn, moreover, the conductor was master of line, progress, ascent. He began in turbulence; he seemed to fling in contrasts; but his sea of sound broadened, deepened, mounted; while never was it opaque. The song of the Andante was measured. To the utmost Mr. Koussevitzky would prolong and intensify its beauty. He was all for gradients; yet unbroken, even unruffled held the curve. Above every other faculty, Mr. Koussevitzky's sense of rhythm beat through the symphony deepening the glow, intensifying the sweep, re-kindling the passion. Rhythm tossed through the first movement; was wing to the second; conjured up the creep and the leap of the transition, marshalled the reiterant elation of the Finale. There will be debate of Mr. Koussevitzky's pace. Irresistible was his rhythm. Since Dr. Muck's day, there has been none such in our concerts.

For the composers around the corner only de Falla had his day in Cambridge and dubious day it seemed. With reason, these men of our time write their ballets and mimed dramas. Music proffers them no freer field for invention, imagination, handiwork. Less wisely do they draw from such music their orchestral Suites for the concert-hall. Originally, de Falla's "Love the Sorcerer" was ballet of action, ballet even with songs, in the theater of Madrid. As scenario out of gypsy folk-ways, Martinez Sierra devised a fable for the stage as well as for music. Then the inevitable concert-piece played in Paris, played in London played over-seas. Faintly last evening a string of sub-titles hinted at course, scene, episode and atmosphere. The listener tried to hear it as "absolute music," but as often heard it as music that outside the theatre, away from the dancing and the miming, is but half itself. It sounded direct and sparse. Now and again it was angular and bare. Often rhythm quickened it—into native wildness, tortured dance, hint of uncanny rites. In this fragment was warmth of song; in that enfolding atmosphere. In a third were the mimes at play? Not once, however, did the obscurity, the confusion, of impression quite lift. A ballet remained a ballet. Suite or no suite, it usually does.

H. T. P.

144

Oct 17

THE CAMBRIDGE SENTINEL

KOUSSEVITZKY CONQUERS CAMBRIDGE

Like the noble Roman, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, came and conquered in the first Cambridge concert of the Sanders Theater series given

Serge Konssevitzky-Maestro

Thursday night. The sweeping power, vivid grace and tensity of emotive appeal that electrified the audiences of last week, was disclosed to the cultural cream of Cambridge.

What this capable Russian would do with Beethoven's tumultous 5th Symphony, was the theme of the hour, and his triumph was unquestioned. A lithe, virile figure, he rode the whirlwind and directed the storm of emotion that Beethoven expressed with such tremendous power in terms of music. Power that is real, ever rises to meet power and Mr. Koussevitzky played those poignant melodies and massive harmonies, as Beethoven alone rendered them in the life.

The magnificence of Handel's D Minor Concerto Grosso, the flamboyant themes of Berilioz Roman Carnival, the tenuous modernity of the Falla's Love the Sorcerer, were eloquently interpreted but the first half of the program paled before the glory that is Beethoven. Rarely has a Cambridge audience been so stirred, out of its customary sedateness than by the magic wand of this accomplished Slav.

Yes, Koussevitzky has conquered Cambridge.

man, will be used.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Trans. Oct 18

Symphony Orchestra

FOR the third pair of Symphony Concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next, another Concerto of the ancients—Emmanuel Bach's in D major—begins Mr. Koussevitzky's program. Then follow three Russian pieces, all new to Boston: the Prelude to Musorgsky's opera, "Khovantchina," a Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bee," from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "Tsar Saltan"; the "Scythian Suite" of the younger and wilder Russian, Prokofiev. Brahms's Symphony in E minor, No 4, will fill the second part of the concert. It passes for the conductor's masterpiece in the music of that composer.

THIRD SYMPHONY

The third Boston Symphony program is announced by Serge Koussevitzky for the concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall. There will be: Bach's Concerto in D; Mousaorgsky's, Prelude, "Khovantchine"; Rimsky-Korsakov's, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee"; Prokoviev's, Scythian Suite; and Brahms', Symphony No. 4.

TRANSCRIPT SAT... Oct 18

Symphony

BAFFLING MODERNS, STIRRING CLASSICS, ALSO KOUSSEVITZKY

SECOND AFTERNOON OF THE NEW CONDUCTOR

Calm Before Storm at Symphony Hall—Once More Schmitt Is Dull and de Falla Blows Hot and Cold—Then Beethoven Panoplied in Passion and Power—Handel Staid or Handel Sensuous?

IN calm, yesterday, went the first part of the Symphony Concert. Mr. Koussevitzky, as it were, had been discovered. Matrons and maidens had looked upon him and found him good to behold. His "stage-deportment" was impeccable and, by paradox, also interesting. His tranquil incomings and outgoings, quiet bows, poise between pieces, were all flawless. Yet when he flung up an arm to check ill-timed clapping, or with outspread and embracing gesture gathered the orchestra into better placed plaudits, there was no doubting the quick mind, the ready will. True, Mr. Koussevitzky, actually conducting, abounded in tense and energetic play of body. His countenance upon occasion reflected the fervors within. His eye, as well as hand, broadcast them. With his own lips he would now and then shape exacting measures. His down-beat could be electrically precise. His upper might sweep the air with curve and climax. Yet what were all these things but the draughts of his spirit blowing the flame of performance? The heat, the light, were inspiriting to feel. At a first concert our most decorous dowagers, our least sensitive demoiselles, had paid to Mr. Koussevitzky the homage of excitement. At the second, what was there to do but wait the return of that agreeable sensation?

Obviously Monsieur Florent Schmitt, writing a piece named "Dreams," could hardly bring back the golden moment. One after another, the conductors at Symphony Hall have played him. Dr. Muck introduced him. Le bonhomme Rabaud included him in a round of Parisian composers. Mr. Monteux gave him occasional room. The Cecilia once went astray into his choral music. His Quintet for Piano and Strings well nigh filled a winter evening. Yet from "The Tragedy of Salome" at Dr. Muck's hands to "Dreams" by way of Mr. Koussevitzky, Monsieur Schmitt has left hearers cold. It is quite true that, composing, he imitates no one; but a negative, rather than a positive, individuality is a dull virtue in concert-hall or theater. Monsieur Schmitt can contrive a musical design; and the listening mind is more impressed by his care and pains than by his invention. Presumably, he sees and remembers visions; experiences and recollects emotions; but neither the one nor the other outflow from the music into which he would infuse them. He writes it with well-considered device from abundant resource. Yet seldom in it goes tang or thrill.

Modern routine-piece and nothing else is "Dreams"—tone poem in little, waxing, culminating, waning. It contains motivs and "ideas" that leave not a trace behind; development that more dulls than sharpens the point; rhythm, modulation, color, transition, that strain for the desired effect, and by a hand's breadth miss it. With all its brevity, the music is persistently restless. Seemingly, the dreams now wrenched, now soothed; but not once is the listening imagination stirred. Once more communicating fire burns not from Monsieur Schmitt. In "Dreams" even a Koussevitzky may not kindle it.

No more could the de Falla of "Love the Sorcerer" quite summon the desired excitements, though he brought conductor, band and audience appreciably nearer them. De Falla wrote his music originally for the theater—a ballet with songs and even speeches, mimed and danced in the trappings of the stage. Revised for another medium—the orchestra unassisted; transferred to another place—the concert-hall, the earlier flavors may have lessened, the earlier implications clouded. Certainly neither the sub-titles of the program-book nor the "argument" prefixed to the score were exactly lamps to the hearer's groping feet. Worse still the intrinsic and veritable Spanish quality in de Falla's music is to most of us a sealed book. His own countrymen extol it. Various commentators harp upon it. Fine-tempered Spaniards undoubtedly thrill to it. Yet we others know only that de Falla will not ply the surface-tricks nor accept the traditional matter of Spanish music conventionalized. Unmistakably Laparra wove this Spanish note into his opera, "Habanera." Ravel has been known to catch and convey it. Yet from de Falla, it somehow evades many an ear.

A native wildness, as at the beginning, sometimes sounded from this music of "Love the Sorcerer." Again it was thin, piercing, agile and fitful, as with the voice of gypsy-fiddles remembered. Once more, and it raised luminous atmosphere about what may have been some tranquil scene. There were dances bare and angular, now graphic with sensation released, now uncanny with hint of magic rite and evil exoroised. Toward the end the measures softened and glowed, then swelled and dazzled, full-voiced. No doubt, the triumph of life and light over death and darkness that—the books say—is the underlying "idea." Possibly it was easier to discover [illegible] later. In the eddied into Bethoven's fierce contrasts. Superb was the fire of the tone, the energy of the rhythm. Spaciously and in splendor, over heights and depths, curved the reiterated and haunting song of the slow movement, and not a line wavered. The rhythmic vigors renewed themselves at the beginning of the Scherzo. Quick was the pace and sharp the contours. As a conductor of power and imagination, neither more or less, Mr. Koussevitzky let fall the harmonic veils, threaded in the mystery, summoned the suspense of the famous transition. His particular touch upon it was the tremor that quivers uncanny between sound and silence. With the outburst of the Finale, there was only to evoke new splendors of full-throated tone, larger magnificences of phrase and period, new sweeps of progress, new ardors of rhythm, repetitions that blazed or clanged.

To. Mr. Koussevitzky, the Fifth Symphony is of an heroic, an epical Beethoven. Throughout he would have it sound as a music of passion and power, might and magritude. Mystery may once cross it—in the transition. Brooding may for a while haunt it—through the Andante. Elsewhere it shall stream and stride, toss and leap and cry to heaven in surge and flood inexhaustible. To these ends Mr. Koussevitzky bends his every means and makes his every choice—shapes contours, marshals gradients, arrays climaxes, chooses tempi, whips rhythm, distributes accent and emphasis. The music in itself, the performance in the outcome, alike justify him. Long before it was classic, out of Beethoven this Fifth Symphony also flamed.

In Mr. Koussevitzky's ears, Handel writing Concerti Grossi for string choir in King George's London was also ardent composer. Into the particular Concerto of yesterday the composer set an Air. The conductor prolonged the phrases, caressed the contours, deepened tone the while, until the music rose sumptuous and sensuous upon the ear, velvety, deep-textured. In contrast, light were the rhythms and racing the figures through the little Finale. Stately was the course of the Overture, dignified, eloquent, precise and square-toed. There was Handel's music and there also was Mr. Koussevitzky's temperament passioning itself for whatever kindles it, outpouring itself upon whatever it lays hold. Possibly the composer would have found the cup not only full but running over. Even from the conductor, though less than the evening before at Cambridge, it was a bold and a heady brew. H. T. P.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

NORWICH
CONN.
BULLETIN

OCT 18 1924

Will Conduct Boston Symphony Orchestra

Koussevitzky, famous Russian musician, who has been engaged to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season. For the past four years he has been one of the outstanding figures in musical circles of London and Paris but this is his first visit to the U. S. Koussevitzky was first known in Russia as a remarkable virtuoso on the double-bass; but he then assembled his own orchestra from Russia's best instrumentalists and toured the whole Empire, even chartering a steamer and sailing the length of the Volga.

Oct 18
aftn Oct 31

Post Oct 18 BC

SYMPHONY GLORIFIES BEETHOVEN

Koussevitzky Makes Music of the Fifth Marvellous

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Not the suite from Manuel DeFalla's "Love the Sorcerer" nor Florent Schmitt's tone-poem "Reves," both heard for the first time in Boston, but a certain Fifth Symphony by one Ludwig van Beethoven proved the most engrossing, the most exciting music in the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon.

THE BEETHOVEN OF MIGHT

Mr. Koussevitzky, so we had many times been told, is minded to play the music of Beethoven in such fashion that it may make upon the audiences of today at least something of the overpowering impression that it made upon those who were the first to hear it. To gain this end he does not have recourse to the deplorable device of revising Beethoven's instrumentation, nor does he find it necessary to resort to unwarrantable extravagances of accent, pace and dynamics. Rather by approaching Beethoven's scores as one unprejudiced by traditional "readings," he has been able to recreate them in his own mind, perceiving to the fullest their potential expressiveness, while by reason of his animating effect upon the orchestra before him, he succeeds in endowing them with renewed vitality.

Such, in brief, was the prevailing account of Mr. Koussevitzky's conducting of Beethoven that had preceded him hither, and yesterday it was made clear that the Beethoven Mr. Koussevitzky would have us hear, is in very truth the Titan of music that tradition has made of him. In the torrential close of the first movement and in the mounting climaxes of the Finale of the Fifth Symphony, there was heard in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon that Beethoven who upon his death bed shook a defiant fist at the thunder, who in his proud scorn of titles shrugged his shoulders at the noblest of Vienna's nobility.

The Andante a Tone-Poem

From the first Mr. Koussevitzky's Fifth Symphony reveals that conductor's independence of thought. Not with exaggerated emphasis, but with violent impulsiveness does he take the celebrated eighth-notes of the opening, nor, once launched upon the first movement, does he let it run its course metronome-wise. For once it was possible to understand how Berlioz could find here "the terrible rage of Othello" and "a frenetic delirium which explodes in frightful cries."

Again with no posturing or sentimentalizing, Mr. Koussevitzky made of the Andante a rarely expressive tone-poem, with recurring moments of majestic force, while in his hands the Scherzo became for the time a thing of mystery, even of terror. At a furious pace must the double-basses play their famous passage in the Trio (here spoke Koussevitzky the double-bass virtuoso) and in the finale the horns, the trumpets, the long-withheld trombones, all must give of their utmost.

Transition Made Impressive

Not within long memory has a Boston audience heard the marvelous transition from Scherzo to Finale accomplished with such impressiveness. After the stride and sweep, the compelling power of the mighty March, the recurrence of the Scherzo came not, as has sometimes been the case, as irrelevant intrusion, but as psychological necessity, while the final progress of the March heaped tumult on tumult, splendor upon splendor.

Through the first portion of yesterday's concert the audience, although by no means unappreciative of conductor and orchestra, displayed no unwonted enthusiasm. Between the divisions of the Symphony Mr. Koussevitzky with upraised hand bade all applause to cease, but at its end the long-restrained plaudits burst forth as a pentup torrent suddenly released. Recalled again and again to the platform, Mr. Koussevitzky at length summoned the band to its feet. Upon both Mr. Burgin and Mr. Bedetti he bestowed a fervent handshake, then with an eloquent raising of the arms he expressed to the orchestra as a whole his gratitude for the support it had given him.

DeFalla's Suite

So much, then, for a masterly performance of a masterpiece. For the rest the concert of yesterday furnished less stirring pleasures. The Suite from DeFalla's choreographic fantasy is, indeed, music of singular fascination that must work a potent spell when heard as accompaniment to the action that it would point and enhance. Much to be preferred to DeFalla's "Nights in the Gardens of Spain," played here last spring, this music is truly Spanish, although DeFalla's Spain is here the grim Spain of sinister and superstitious Gypsies, not the conventional Spain of bullfights and boleros, of malaguenas and mantillas.

The other "novelty," the morbid, phantasmagoric "Reves" of Schmitt, is a piece that, truth to tell, did not greatly convince, despite Mr. Koussevitzky's care and eloquence with it. Instead, coming after the dignity and the grave beauty of a Concerto Grosso (in D minor) of Handel, it seemed for the most part little more than futile striving.

The passing of almost 200 years has left the lustre of Handel's simple music undimmed. A bare decade finds Schmitt's complicated score definitely "dated."

Herald Sat Oct 18

FINE SYMPHONY PROGRAM GIVEN

Conductor Koussevitzky Wins High Praise for Performance

BEAUTIFUL HANDEL MUSIC IS ENJOYED

By PHILIP HALE

Mr. Koussevitzky's program for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony hall yesterday afternoon was as follows: Handel, four movements from Concerto Grosso, D minor, op. 6, No. 10; Florent Schmitt, Reves, op. 68, No. 1; De Falla, "Love the Sorcerer"; Beethoven, Symphony No. 5.

Debussy's Danse for piano, orchestrated by Ravel, had been announced, but as the score and parts did not arrive in time for rehearsal, Schmitt's "Reves" was substituted. As the program book had already been made up, information about this piece was unavoidably omitted.

It was good to hear the sturdy allegros and the beautiful air of Handel again; to be reminded that Handel wrote other music than "Messiah" and the Largo, the monstrous transcription of Xerxes's little air in a forgotten, or neglected, opera. John F. Runciman was right in saying: "Mr. George Frederick Handel is by far the most superb personage one meets in the history of music. He alone, of all the musicians, lived his life straight through in the grand manner." He also wrote in the grand manner. No one has equalled him in pomp and dignity. And this giant of a man could express a tenderness known only to him and Mozart, for Schubert, with all his melodic wealth and sensitiveness, could fall at times into sentimentalism, and Schumann's intimate confessions were sometimes whispered. Handel in his tenderness, was always manly. No one has approached him in his sublimely solemn moments! Music that is Miltonic. And with what apparently simple means this music soared to celestial heights!

Orchestral, chamber and vocal music by Florent Schmitt has been heard in Boston in the course of the last dozen years. He is probably more favorably known by his "Tragedy of Salome" than by his other compositions.

He has been called "the wild boar of the Ardennes," an isolated, almost savagely solitary" person. Hearing his "Reves," one was tempted to spell "boar" differently.

For this music, written in the Pyrennees a year or so ago, before the great war, purposing to illustrate rhapsodis sentences of a French writer that dangerously approach "hifalutin," is swollen, preposterous, full of sound and fury signifying nothing. There is a mighty struggle to express dreams and clouds. And what dreams! Possibly the ingenious Herr Freud of Vienna could explain their meaning, but this explanation might be unfit for publication except in a journal devoted to medicine or psychology.

Mr. Koussevitzky is to be thanked for acquainting the audience with De Falla's delightful suite, which was performed for the first time in America with Jesus Sanroma, pianist. The suite is derived from a fantastic ballet with songs that was produced at Madrid nine years ago. (The ballet was performed several times at Antwerp early this year.) No doubt the music would be still more effective played for theatrical performance, but, unlike many suites derived from stage-works, it is charming and engrossing as absolute music, interesting melodically, rhythmically, and by surprising color. This suite is not of the conventional type written by those who know not Spain; nor is it persistently in the dance vein. There are exquisite relieving episodes of a haunting nature.

Jacques Riviere, considering Ravel's Spanish Rhapsody, wrote in a manner that to some will seem paradoxical: "There is torpidity in all Spanish dancing, which is the union of fury and sleep. The dancers always seem to be on the point of awaking themselves by their cries; they stamp with their feet, they curve their arms, they bend their bodies, they rail at themselves by way of encouragement. But their whirlwind remains sluggish." This may be true of Spanish dancing, which, so Spaniards say, is caricatured here, even by our own "interpretative artists," but there is no suggestion of torpidity in De Falla's Suite, which has more racial character than his "Nights in the Gardens of Spain" played here last March.

Those who feared lest Mr. Koussevitzky would give a sensational, theatrical performance of the Fifth Symphony; that he would startle the ultra-conservative by his licentious treatment, must have been bitterly disappointed. He gave a conspicuously sane and noble performance. Perhaps the Andante was taken a shade slower than is customary—after all it is an Andante con moto—but by his choice of pace fine points in the detail were deftly brought out. Admirable was his contrasting the main body of the Scherzo with the tumultuous Trio. The mysterious transition to the Finale was never more mysterious, and the stately beginning of the Finale, for once not hurried shouting, led to a vital reading of pages that have to some seemed, when treated too respectfully, that is perfunctorily, a falling off from the grandeur of the first measures.

For Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretations and the orchestral performance throughout the concert there is nothing but praise.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: C. P. E. Bach, Concerto, D major, arranged by Steinberg; Moussorgsky, Prelude to "Khovantchina"; Rimsky-Korsakov, "Flight of the Bumble Bee" from "Tsar Saltan"; Prokoviev, Scythian Suite; Brahms, Symphony No. 4.

KOUSSEVITZKY CHEERED AGAIN AT SYMPHONY

By E. F. HARKINS.

Serge Koussevitzky's interpretation of Beethoven's fifth symphony won another ovation for him at yesterday's Symphony concert.

Serge Koussevitzky

The enthusiasm of the Symphony patrons is noteworthy as an instance of keen, spontaneous appreciation of masterly conducting.

Even after Koussevitzky's debut a week ago the conservatives, clinging to old idols, said the real test of the Russian's worth would come with the "Fifth." The test came and was met magnificently. Koussevitzky revitalized this most popular of the Beethoven symphonies, giving the time-honored work a swing and sweep, a lyric charm, a dramatic surge missed by nine conductors out of ten—yes, 99 out of 100.

It was not a radical reading, but it was far from academic. The glorious music seemed reborn. It was a consummately fine effort on the new conductor's part. His is the genius which takes infinite pains. His insistence upon full value for every measure is no less remarkable than his imagination.

NEW BALLET MUSIC

Equally captivating was the performance of "Love the Sorcerer," a ballet suite by Manuel de Falla, Spanish composer, a work new to the United States. It is a brilliant picture of gypsy life, full of color, piquant melody and passionate outbursts. The performance delighted the audience.

In both of these numbers the orchestra renewed the great reputation it enjoyed years ago. Florent Schmitt's weird "Dreams"—a nightmare study, apparently—and Handel's "Concerto Grosso" in D minor are also on this week's program.

KOUSSEVITZKY IN CLASSIC SYMPHONY

Globe Sat. Oct 18

New Conductor Interprets Beethoven's Fifth

Koussevitzky ended his second Boston program yesterday afternoon with the first classic symphony he has conducted here. Beethoven's C minor, the most frequently heard work in the standard symphonic reportory, gave the new Russian conductor a chance to prove to the Boston Symphony audiences that he is no mere modernist, but a musician of wide and deep sympathies.

His Beethoven is his own interpretation of the music, moving, eloquent, with extraordinary rhythmic vitality. It was very warmly applauded.

The concert began with Handel and offered two new modern pieces. Schmitt's "Daydreams," opus 68, No 1; and a suite from de Falla's ballet "Love the Sorcerer."

The new conductor is obviously going to do away with one nuisance of long standing at Boston Symphony concerts. He will not permit applause between the movements of a concerto, suite or symphony. He checked the automatic applauders, with whom handclapping is a mere nervous reaction, more than once yesterday by a sharp gesture. There was no mistaking the meaning of his upraised hand. Only after the first movement of the Beethoven did the audience disregard his obvious desire. After suffering frequent annoyance for years, it is a great and unexpected pleasure to find a conductor able and willing to stop well-intentioned, but ill-timed applause.

Nobody without a strong and yet infinitely subtle sense of rhythm can excel as an interpreter of Beethoven. Koussevitzky vitalises all music by his clear phrasing, his delicately graduated accentuation, his instinct for a tempo rubato which is not exaggerated, and for strict time which is as sure and often as solemn as fate. These qualities stand him in good stead when he conducts the Fifth Symphony.

The most difficult task of the interpreter in this masterpiece is to make the repetition in the finale of the dramatic transition from scherzo to finale, something more than an anticlimax. It is as though the conquering hero having found that his first entrance into his kingdom was thrilling, tried to repeat the same experience before the shouting had died down.

Nobody knows what Beethoven meant by the passage. There is no obvious irony, yet otherwise the thing is an enigma. Koussevitzky so planned the large outlines of his interpretation that the much-mooted anticlimax became merely part of what in fiction would be called the "falling action."

He sees his classics as whole compositions, not page by page. He gave full value, by the way, to every passage where his own instrument, the double bass, has one of its rare chances to dominate the tonal masses.

Koussevitzky does not ask the tradition, and he may sometimes omit noticing the metronome mark before deciding on his tempi. His slow movement yesterday was almost an adagio, but the pace was solemn rather than sluggish. He goes his own way in interpretation, as every interpreter must, except for the meager indications of the printed music beyond which we have no sure guide to Beethoven's mind and soul. No grave indiscretion and many felicities distinguished Koussevitzky's version of the C minor.

A rather dull Handel concerto, in a too carefully polished performance; a well meaning and, in its way, original piece by Florene Schmitt, called "Reves," and some rather confused and tantalizing excerpts from De Falla's ballet "Love, the Sorcerer," were less interesting than the Beethoven. De Falla has now abandoned the idiom of Debussy in part for that of Stravinsky. As before he can say amusing and entertaining things of his own with this derivative technic.

These ballet tunes are often almost banal, for all the clever rhythm and orchestration.

J. M. Sanroma, well known here as a promising young pianist, played the piano part in De Falla's piece. It is not a solo, though seemingly about as difficult. Mr Sanroma, as was fitting, behaved as one of the orchestra, which, pro tempore, he was.

P. R.

KOUSSEVITZKY ADVISES LEGION

Post Sun Oct 19

Koussevitzky's Novel Ideas

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

That by some, and perhaps by many, the potential interest of a symphony concert is measured in terms of the soloist announced for that particular afternoon or evening there is, in the words of the Grand Inquisitor, "no probable possible shadow of doubt."

Recall, for example, how, in years gone by, the line of applicants for "rush" seats has waxed when a Farrar or a Kreisler was to sing or play, and how it has dwindled when the soloist has been "some one you never heard of" or, as was now and then the case, there was no soloist at all.

Yet, while that attitude is but a natural reflection of the American fetish for big names that has been responsible also for the "star" system so deplored by our operatic and theatrical managers, as applied to a symphony concert it is manifestly erroneous and wrong-headed.

Music for Its Own Sake

First of all, in any given concert the time allotted to the soloist is, of necessity, but a small part of the whole. The conductor are unjustly and unfittingly relegated to a poor second place. And thirdly, while there are notable exceptions, it is too often true that the piece or pieces contributed by the "assisting artist" are intrinsically of slight interest. How few, after all, are the violin or piano concertos worth hearing for their own sake, and how inconsequential are too many of the airs sung at symphony concerts throughout the land!

To say all this is by no means to urge that all soloists be banned from all symphony concerts forever more, although there are some who would shed no tears over even such wholesale dismissal. But, as in all things, there is a happy middle ground. There is, and always will be, some music old and new, eminently worth the hearing, that is possible only when a pianist, violinist or singer assists the orchestra. A ban on soloists would have deprived last season's audiences at our own symphony concerts of the exquisite "Scheherazade" of Ravel in a memorable performance by Vera Janacopulos, the orchestra and Mr. Monteux, while few events of that same season exceeded in interest Mr. Rosenthal's playing of Chopin's Concerto in E minor.

Within certain reasonable limits, too, a symphony orchestra must of course be run as a business institution, and, whatever the artistic advantages or disadvantages of assisting artists, if the public wants them the public must have them—that is, unless the public can be persuaded to support the orchestra for its own sake.

Here in Boston it is that, precisely, which has happened this year. Not within long recollection has the advance announcement of soloists listed so few names—and never before has the demand for tickets been so great. That the Friday concerts should be sold out on subscription is nothing new, but the near approach to a similar condition of things for Saturday evenings is a decided novelty.

Needless to say, it is Mr. Koussevitzky who has wrought this miracle. For the first time in many years the Symphony Orchestra has as its conductor one who has excited popular interest and curiosity as no array of soloists, however brilliant and distinguished, might have excited them. At last it is as it should be—it is the conductor and the orchestra who hold first place.

In this matter of soloists Mr. Koussevitzky holds to one sound principle: namely, that the sole justification for such embellishment to a symphony concert is the performing of some composition that is possible only with a soloist, and if that soloist may be the composer giving voice to his own music, so much the better. Thus we will have this year two of the foremost Russian composers, Rachmaninoff and Stravinsky, each as pianist in his own concerto.

Then, too, we are to hear from Albert Spalding the new violin concerto of Respighi and from Richard Burgin the still newer concerto of Prokofiev, two novelties of genuine significance. And with assurance it may be said that the other soloists of the season, Mme. Matzenauer, the pianist Cortot and Borovsky and our own Maier and Pattison, will be heard primarily for the interest of the music they will perform, and only secondarily for the interest attaching to [illegible]

AND MUS

Globe Sun Oct 19

Interpreting Orchestral Music

The current discussion of Koussevitzky whose initial success as conductor of the Boston Symphony has been sensational, concerns itself, among other things, with his interpretations of standard and modern orchestral music. Interpretation is one of those blanket terms that everybody uses and nobody thinks of defining, like "democracy," "liberty," "religion." Yet in the definition of "interpretation" as applied to the conducting of orchestral music lies the crux of the discussion of Koussevitzky's merits.

Some people are sure to claim that his Beethoven conducting is "not in the classic tradition," "not the real Beethoven," "only his personal interpretation of the Fifth Symphony," etc. What do such comments mean when one thinks them over? What is the conductor's job, anyhow?

Take the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven. What information is within the reach of conductors and others interested in its interpretation as to how it should be performed? Turn to the printed music. This symphony was published during Beethoven's lifetime and he presumbly corrected and revised the proofs of the original edition of the score. The standard complete edition of Beethoven published in Germany some 40 years ago offers revisions supposedly in accordance with the best information as to Beethoven manuscript and variant readings.

In the case of any Beethoven work the printed notes are without doubt substantially correct as the composer wrote them. The authorities have speculated about the repeated double bass passage in the trio of the scherzo, as to whether two extra measures have gotten in by a printer's error, but in general the current text is indisputably correct.

If, then the orchestra plays the correct notes as written is not Beethoven's Fifth Symphony receiving a correct interpretation? Obviously wrong notes should not be tolerated. There is, however, a case for the conductors who correct Beethoven's scoring for orchestra by adding instruments or by distributing parts differently. Even reputed classicists like Muck sometimes do this.

Their object is to make passages which are not satisfactory to the ear as printed sound better by clarifying them without adding to the musical ideas or subtracting from them. This is legitimate, just as the parallel process of dropping out muddy notes from the bass in the piano sonatos of Beethoven is justifiable. But the strict "classic" commentators denounce such tampering with texts that to them are sacred.

Colorless Correctness

Suppose no tampering is resorted to and every note played as written, or at least as printed. The effect will prove intolerably colorless, not because Beethoven's music is so, but because musical notation is a very imperfect means of conveying musical ideas.

Printed music gives the notes to be played and the time value of them. It does not as a rule give the phrasing or accentuation. Tempi are indicated either by the conventional Italian terms andante, allegro, etc, or by metronome marks, or by both. Beethoven usually uses both methods, and adds descriptive phrases like "con brio." Softness and loudness are indicated by conventional abbreviations "pp," to "ff" making a scale of loudness. Strong accents on off beats are indicated. But all this is by no means enough to ensure either a correct or a vivid rendering of Beethoven's or anybody's music.

If you obey the metronome strictly your preformance will be intolerably mechanical, lacking in shadings in nuances of expression. One man's andante may seem to another an allegretto and to yet another an adagio, so vague are musician's notions of the meaning of these terms.

If you accent only first beats of measures and other notes specially marked to be accented everyone will find your performance lifeless. Every note in a good performance of any piece receives some degree of stress or accent and it is thus the gradation of accents from almost none to a very great deal which distinguishes the superior from the mediocre performer.

Musicians often phrase the same passage differently. Notice how good amateur and professional pianists phrase, say the first four measures in Mozart's A major piano sonata and you will have an illustration of the point in question. There are two ways and we do not know which was Mozart's.

So it often is with Beethoven. Musical notation assumes that everyone but a beginner knows by instinct how to phrase music. Only the best musicians can do it well, and their practice is not identical in many instances.

The point of all this is simply that we do not know, and have no clear evidence in the printed music as to how Beethoven or any other composer intends his music to be interpreted. There is often hearsay evidence on such points. Pianists whose teachers studied with teachers who studied with teachers who studied with Chopin often claim to preserve the secret of Chopin's interpretation of his own music. But we do not actually know how to interpret Chopin or Beethoven except by the inner light.

The "Classic" Beethoven

The current fashion of interpreting Beethoven is of German origin and goes back chiefly to von Buelow. It is called the "classic" way, because its authors believed themselves to be reconstructing Beethoven's own. But Beethoven was not an academic commentator on music or on life. He was a man of almost ungovernable emotions, as countless anedotes of his life as well as his music prove. His music ought not to be treated with the archeologist's reverence for strange cold relics of the past, unless one thinks the time has come to put it on the shelf forever.

The interpreter of Beethoven ought to be a person in some ways akin to Beethoven by temperament. No cold-blooded person is adequate to the task. Mr Koussevitzky is not cold blooded. He ought to be a person with a wide range of feeling, from the grotesque to the sublime. Mr Koussevitzky seems possibly such a person.

One great musician's reading of Beethoven will differ from another great musician's reading of the same work. Nobody can say with authority as long as each steers by the indications of the printed text, which we have found to be inadequate, which interpretation is correct.

Every great interpretation of a great masterpiece of music is really essentially an improvisation, but an improvisation strictly limited by the indications of the composer's intention vouchsafed in the printed music. The indications added by editors may of course be disregarded by any one except beginning students.

[illegible] for a final illus-

146

BOSTON'S RUSSIAN CONDUCTOR AND JAZZ

At All Events Serge Koussevitzky Is Not Afraid of American Horn Blowing

By DIANA RICE

AND now out of the frozen wastes of Northern Russia comes Serge Koussevitzky, heralded as one of the most daring orchestral leaders of the age. A man, some say, whose convictions do not entirely conform to the orthodox in music, but who has had the courage to blaze new trails along old paths. Trails that have already led him successfully through the capitals of Europe and have now brought him across the Atlantic to wield the baton for the Boston Symphony Orchestra. New York will watch him with the greatest of interest. Paris and London, though calling Koussevitzky a radical, have nevertheless gathered him into their musical arms. But, as has been pointed out elsewhere, Paris and London are, after all, a long way from Boston Common. The new conductor is known to approve of jazz.

It was 8:30 the other morning when the writer telephoned the Boston home of the newly arrived conductor of symphonies, to be greeted with the word that he had gone for a "petite promenade." He would be back in half an hour. So in half an hour she found her way to the pleasant red brick Massachusetts Colonial house, with its white trimmings, set beside the landscaped shores of Jamaica Pond, where Serge Koussevitzky has established his household for the coming season. A miniature Boston bull pup welcomed the visitor, so quickly has this ménage from the land of samovars and droskies adopted the customs of a country where these particular things are alien.

Koussevitzky came into the sunny living room with a low bow. Had his biographers not written him down as 50 the average observer would lower the figure by ten. He is of middle height, with no tendency to the heaviness of middle age. Or it may be the daily morning walk takes care of that. At any rate, if it did not, his energy would. For it is this energy that immediately impresses the visitor. Volcanic, some critics call him. Energy in movement and energy in conversation; and an amazing energy behind the quiet reserve of the man. His dark hair is heavy and there are yellow lights in eyes some novelists would describe as "flashing."

A small table stood in front of a straight-backed chair close to the grand piano—it was toward this piano that Koussevitzky instinctively turned when he entered the room—but it was in the straight-backed chair he settled himself first. His first word was about America.

"I liked it before I came, but I like it much better now." And pointing toward the green stretches outside, "It is more beautiful than I had expected it would be."

The writer had come to talk about jazz and the influence it might have, if any, on future music. It seemed a difficult subject to open up with a great conductor who lives in classics. However, Koussevitzky answered the question immediately and directly, as seems his way.

"Yes, of course, I like jazz." And picking up the fragile table he moved it away from him and brought it back again—his way apparently emphasizing his remarks, as he did the same thing frequently through the talk that followed. One way perhaps of expending some of that energy which he seems to have in so great an abundance. Then warming to the subject of modern music, the dance instinct, jazz (here at last was an artist acclaimed by critics as of the first rank who was not afraid to talk about jazz), he continued:

"Jazz is an important contribution to modern musical literature. It has an epochal significance. It should not be downed. It is not an indication of bad taste. It is not superficial. It is fundamental. Jazz comes from the soil, where all music has its beginning. It marks the turbulence of the times, the energy and bustle of a people. It is good music because it responds to the longings of a people. If it went against their natures it would not be good music."

According to Koussevitzky, musicians did not know the value of the trombone, the trumpet and other wind instruments—the instruments he associates with jazz—until modern music brought them into prominence. There were, of course, among the older composers those who brought out to some degree the brasses, drums, &c., which formed the background of an orchestra. Beethoven over a century ago wrote into his Second Symphony a more ambitious part for the double bass than had ever before been attempted. At that time Dragonetti, the Venetian, was the only bass viol soloist of note, and authorities say there have been but three or four famous ones. The story goes that the great Beethoven was so impressed by the possibilities of the double bass after hearing Dragonetti play upon it that he immediately went home and set to work on a score which gave to the large, unwieldy instrument a new and important place in the orchestral world. So it has been with other instruments to which musical practice now gives a more prominent place.

In this development Koussevitzky sees a natural change in music as expressed in jazz and other modern compositions. On his first program in Boston appears a selection entitled "Pacific 231," and, as might be surmised, it is written around a modern steam engine of American make, though the composer is a Swiss. It is in the rendition of this type of piece no less than his original reading of old classics (and there is a composition of the eighteenth century on the same program with the steam engine) that has won for Mr. Koussevitzky the name of radical. This and similar pieces he will present to his American audiences because he feels that these reflect the spirit of the age in which they are written. Then the question came up whether tuneful music is bad music.

"That," interrupted the virtuoso, while his table was dragged from and returned to its vantage point, "that is my hobby. All music is melodious if the melody is properly brought out. It is only a case of familiarity. The cook may prefer the hurdy-gurdy to Ravel, that greatest of moderns. But if she hears Ravel often enough she will find melody in his music. Music is like love. Light love may seem delicious, but it does not last. Deep love does. It is the same in literature and in music. A frothy melody is sung on all lips and lasts a couple of months, but a great melody never dies. That which is fundamental in music always endures, whether it is jazz or Beethoven. Beethoven's pieces are tuneful and can be played to reveal this."

And here Koussevitzky indicated that we might expect some changes in the way he would play the old standbys—those he played at all.

"Music changes with the times," he continued. "Nobody liked Beethoven at first. A friend of mine in Berlin, a great collector of manuscripts, has an old journal commenting upon the Third Symphony of Beethoven's, the day after it was played. 'What awful music,' runs the account. 'No one will ever stand it. It was the worst thing I ever listened to.' When Wagner was first played the people put their fingers in their ears. It may be the same with the new Russian composers and with the French modernists, many of whose compositions have never been heard in this country, and exist only in manuscript. It will take time to understand them and to like them. The modernists are searching. They are groping for the truth. That is their contribution to composition. True music has melody. It is tuneful."

It was in the City of Tver, which appears on most maps in clear black letters showing it to be a city of importance, that small boy Serge learned his first scales and solos. At the age of 6 he played the piano so well that even in a musical household it was a matter of comment. He went with other boys of his age to the local schools and at the age of 12 began to conduct an orchestra in one of the theatres. It was here, too, that he composed his first music. Dramatic bits for the provincial playhouse of his home town. But the musical conservatory at Moscow had already begun to beckon the ambitious composer and before he was 15 he was enrolled in the Moscow Philharmonic Society as a student of composition and orchestral conducting.

Here he qualified for a scholarship by studying and mastering the double bass, and for several years toured the principal cities of Russia as a virtuoso of this little-known instrument. A friend who recently heard Koussevitzky improvise on his famous Amati, which he brought with him to Boston, said that he never before realized the similarity between the double bass and the 'cello, or the beautiful tones of the former.

Serge Koussevitzky.

Photo by Garo.

Berlin also added a chapter to the life of the young musician in his early twenties. For it was here that he passed some time in studying the interpretation of the best classical and modern music. An orchestra which he organized from the students of the Berlin School of Music added still further to his experience as a conductor. In 1909 he returned to Moscow, where he established his own symphony orchestra.

Those were in the days when the Moscow Imperial Opera drew to its glittering proscenium music lovers from all over the world. And it was in this home of the Czars that Koussevitzky and his band of artists played the music of modern European composers. Debussy was his friend and came to Moscow on his invitation to perform his own works. Scriabin, too, that other modern of moderns whose early and tragic death cut short a meteoric career, was an intimate of Koussevitzky. But it was before this that the pioneering conductor used to take his orchestra of eighty-five musicians on those long tours down the River Volga into neighborhoods rarely visited by such talent. Here along the banks of the river concerts were given at the principal cities. Over a distance of 2,325 miles traveled this orchestra of first-class musicians. And then came the revolution.

But music still continued in Russia. Koussevitzky was appointed director of the State Orchestra under Kerensky. Kerensky disappeared and the reign of the Soviets began. still Koussevitzky played his concerts.

"We were cold and wore our mittens," said the Russian. And the picture of an orchestra in mittens is hard for us to conjure up. This was during the years of famine, when no one in Russia had enough to eat, and Koussevitzky and his band of players starved with the rest of their unhappy countrymen. In 1920 a vacation was granted him and he came to France.

"I was a sorry sight," and he smiled ruefully, "with swollen hands—broken in health. It was to be a three months' vacation. But I could not go back."

Russia, according to Koussevitzky, has not become as radical musically as it has politically. It was, in fact, with considerable difficulty that he succeeded in giving programs of his own choice during his last year in Russia. There was a strong conservative element who objected to music of the modern school.

This is the man who is bringing to America the modern music he thinks Americans should understand. For he says: "There is no progress in clinging always to the old, especially in this great America, with all its promise.

"Here everything is ahead of you. In Europe so much is behind us. There is no reason why in time America should not produce great composers. It is yet a very young country. It takes time. Of course I am a musician, why not? My father was a musician. My grandfather was a musician. My mother's brothers were all musicians." And it was this mother who taught Koussevitzky to play the piano.

"Your McDowell," he continued, "did some very good work. And there is another American, the young Alexander Steinert, who has great promise. But if America does not yet create it does a wonderful thing—a lawyer told me the word yesterday (Koussevitzky still finds his English words with difficulty)—it cultivates. Americans may be said to be cultivaters of music. And whenever things do not grow easily people take more pains to make them grow, to nourish them. And so Americans are nourishing their music. You pay more attention to music than any other country in the world. America has the greatest orchestras in the world. Why shouldn't America in the future produce great music?"

When Koussevitzky brings the Boston Symphony to New York at Thanksgiving time he will bring also some of the much-talked-of manuscripts never before played in America. One of these, "Paintings from the Picture Show," by Moussorgsky, has been specially arranged for the conductor by Maurice Ravel.

REDUCTION

RATIO

17x

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

1.0

1.1

1.25

1.4

1.6

1.8

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm

A5

A4

A3

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

4.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

[illegible] The program and dates and [illegible] tickets will be issued.

According to the first thought, the opening piece of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program for Friday afternoon and Saturday evening was to be Liadov's "From the Apocalypse," in which the composer attempted to portray in tones the mighty angel, dressed in a cloud, with a rainbow on his head and a voice like a roaring lion. New York heard this composition and was not seriously perturbed. In its place Mr. Koussevitzky has chosen Maximilian Steinberg's arrangement of a concerto by Philipp Emanuel Bach. Steinberg married Rimsky-Korsakov's daughter and for the wedding Stravinsky wrote his "Fireworks," which has been played in Boston at least twice. Steinberg, when last heard of, was teaching composition and orchestration at the Leningrad Conservatory.

The prelude to Moussorgsky's posthumous opera, "Khovantochina," will follow. Rimsky-Korsakov edited and orchestrated this opera, which treats of the struggle between old and new Russia long ago. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted a performance at the Paris Opera in April, 1923. The first performance of "Khovantochina" was at Leningrad in 1885.

Rimsky-Korsakov will be represented by "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," in scherzo movement, from "The Fairy Tale of the Tsar Saltan." This excerpt is not in the suite derived from the opera. It may be remembered that Mr. Monteux brought out two movements of the Suite.

Prokoviev's "Scythian" Suite will be performed. It is said to be as wild and barbaric as were the ancient Scythians, whose distressing manners were graphically described by Herodotus.

The Symphony will be Brahms's No. 4 (E minor) with its "massive and concrete" Chaconne for a finale.

works by 20th century composers.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Serge Koussevitzky announces the following program for the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening: Bach's concerto in D; Moussorgsky's prelude, "Khovantchina"; Rimsky-Korsakov's "Flight of the Bumble Bee"; Prokoviev's "Scythian Suite" and Brahms' fourth symphony.

OBJECT TO 'LENINGRAD'

Patrons of Symphony Blame New Director for Soviet Name of Russian Capital in Program —Koussevitzky Denies Responsibility

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Conductor, Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Name Repugnant to Him for Personal Reasons

SUFFERED MUCH FROM BOLSHEVISM

Trustees Decline to Comment Upon Matter

Surprised and somewhat irritated that St. Petersburg—or more recently Petrograd—should be referred to repeatedly as "Leningrad" in the programme books of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor, said last night he had hesitated to voice a protest in fear of offending some of those in control of the famous musical organization who had induced him to assume its leadership.

JUMPED AT CONCLUSIONS

Several Symphony patrons have become highly indignant over what they declare to be the deliberate flaunting in the face of the Boston public of a word they regard as too suggestive of Bolshevism and the red government of the Russian Soviets.

This indignation was directed toward Koussevitzky, whom they thought had insisted on "Leningrad" as the name of the capital city of his native land, and who some accused of using the sacred programmes of the Boston Symphony to air his political views.

Stone throwing near the fairgrou...

DISCORD OVER USE OF "LENINGRAD"

Continued From First Page

"If we are expected to pay reverence to Lenin to please the new leader of our Symphony Orchestra, it may be desirable to look for a new conductor in spite of the undoubted musical ability of our Russian visitor," declared, yesterday, Courtenay Guild, head of several of the city's leading musical organizations.

Hated Word With Conductor

But it is all a misunderstanding, Koussevitzky explained last night to a Post reporter at his home on Pond street, Jamaica Plain. No American citizen could possibly have such vigorous objections to the word "Leningrad" as he does; it is associated with painful memories, he said.

Courtenay Guild, who is president of the Handel and Haydn Society, the Apollo Club and the Harvard Musical Association, and a director of the Harvard Alumni Chorus, was so indignant when he found "Leningrad" plastered through the Symphony [illegible] even used as the name of the principal Russian university nearly a century ago, that he dashed off the following editorial in the Commercial Bulletin, a weekly newspaper he owns:

Bad Taste in Names

"As the name of Lenine is abhorrent to Americans who value the blessings of civilization, and as our government has refused to recognize the usurping oligarchy that is called the soviet government of Russia, it comes as a shock to conservative Bostonians to find the city that was known as St. Petersburg until ten years ago referred to as "Leningrad" on the program of the Boston Symphony Concerts.

"Not once only but four times does the obnoxious Leningrad appear on the first program of the season, and while there may be some excuse for using the name for the city today, what possible justification can be offered for stating that a brilliant musician who died in 1873 was a pupil of the Leningrad Conservatory?

"There can hardly be a doubt that the people of America would rather honor the memory of the man who founded and built St. Petersburg than that of the man who nearly destroyed it and caused the death of millions of its fellow countrymen. If we are expected to pay reverence to Lenine to please the new leader of our Symphony Orchestra, it may be desirable to look for a new conductor in spite of the undoubted musical ability of our Russian visitor."

Complain to Trustees

It was learned yesterday that the complaints had been brought to the attention of the officers and trustees of the Symphony Orchestra. Several of these gentlemen were seen by a Post reporter, but they declined to make any statement at present, saying the matter was one for the [illegible]

[illegible] more prejudiced against "Leningrad" than any of the indignant Bostonians. "St. Petersburg or Petrograd, as they called it during the great war—is a wonderful monument to that great Russian, Peter the Great," he protested, "so it is as silly to call it 'Leningrad' as it would be to call the monument to your own General Washington by another name of some small person of this generation.

Robbed of Fortune by Them

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenin and Trotsky. I have left my country because of them and the terrible things they have done. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone. They took it from me.

"I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called 'Leningrad' in the programmes of our orchestra. But I hesitated to speak about it to others than my wife and secretary. I stifled my prejudice against this very objectionable word because I feared I might offend some of my good Boston friends."

MONDAY, OCTOBER 29, 1924

OPPOSES NAME OF 'LENINGRAD'

Koussevitzky Favors "Petrograd" on Symphony Program

Serge Koussevitzky, new Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, expressed dissatisfaction at the use of the name "Leningrad" in place of "St. Petersburg" or "Petrograd" in the Symphony program notes of last week, in just as emphatic manner as [illegible] done by Courtenay Guild, one of the orchestra's patrons.

Guild, brother of a former ambassador to Russia, had taken the Symphony officials to task editorially in the columns of his Commercial Bulletin for the introduction of the revolutionary nomenclature of the historic city. It was pointed out today by the Soviet [illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible]

[

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

Herald Trib Oct 19

According to the first thought, the opening piece of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program for Friday afternoon and Saturday evening was to be Liadov's "From the Apocalypse," in which the composer attempted to portray in tones the mighty angel, dressed in a cloud, with a rainbow on his head and a voice like a roaring lion. New York heard this composition and was not seriously perturbed. In its place Mr. Koussevitzky has chosen Maximilian Steinberg's arrangement of a concerto by Philipp Emanuel Bach. Steinberg married Rimsky-Korsakov's daughter and for the wedding Stravinsky wrote his "Fireworks," which has been played in Boston at least twice. Steinberg, when last heard of, was teaching composition and orchestration at the Leningrad Conservatory.

The prelude to Moussorgsky's posthumous opera, "Khovantochina," will follow. Rimsky-Korsakov edited and orchestrated this opera, which treats of the struggle between old and new Russia long ago. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted a performance at the Paris Opera in April, 1923. The first performance of "Khovantochina" was at Leningrad in 1885.

Rimsky-Korsakov will be represented by "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," in scherzo movement, from "The Fairy Tale of the Tsar Saltan." This excerpt is not in the suite derived from the opera. It may be remembered that Mr. Monteux brought out two movements of the Suite.

Prokoviev's "Scythian" Suite will be performed. It is said to be as wild and barbaric as were the ancient Scythians, whose distressing manners were graphically described by Herodotus.

The Symphony will be Brahms's No. 4 (E minor) with its "massive and concrete" Chaconne for a finale.

Advertiser Sun. Oct 19

works by 20th century composers.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Serge Koussevitzky announces the following program for the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening: Bach's concerto in D; Moussorgsky's prelude, "Khovantchina"; Rimsky-Korsakov's "Flight of the Bumble Bee"; Prokoviev's "Sythian Suite" and Brahms' fourth symphony.

147

OBJECT TO 'LENINGRAD'

Post Mon. Oct 20

Patrons of Symphony Blame New Director for Soviet Name of Russian Capital in Program —Koussevitzky Denies Responsibility

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Conductor, Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Name Repugnant to Him for Personal Reasons

SUFFERED MUCH FROM BOLSHEVISM

Trustees Decline to Comment Upon Matter

Surprised and somewhat irritated that St. Petersburg—or more recently Petrograd—should be referred to repeatedly as "Leningrad" in the programme books of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor, said last night he had hesitated to voice a protest in fear of offending some of those in control of the famous musical organization who had induced him to assume its leadership.

JUMPED AT CONCLUSIONS

Several Symphony patrons have become highly indignant over what they declare to be the deliberate flaunting in the face of the Boston public of a word they regard as too suggestive of Bolshevism and the red government of the Russian Soviets.

This indignation was directed toward Koussevitzky, whom they thought had insisted on "Leningrad" as the name of the capital city of his native land, and who some accused of using the sacred programmes of the Boston Symphony to air his political views.

stone throwing near the fairgrou...

DISCORD OVER USE OF "LENINGRAD"

Continued From First Page

"If we are expected to pay reverence to Lenin to please the new leader of our Symphony Orchestra, it may be desirable to look for a new conductor in spite of the undoubted musical ability of our Russian visitor," declared, yesterday, Courtenay Guild, head of several of the city's leading musical organizations.

Hated Word With Conductor

But it is all a misunderstanding. Koussevitzky explained last night to a Post reporter at his home on Pond street, Jamaica Plain. No American citizen could possibly have such vigorous objections to the word "Leningrad" as he does; it is associated with painful memories, he said.

Courtenay Guild, who is president of the Handel and Haydn Society, the Apollo Club and the Harvard Musical Association, and a director of the Harvard Alumni Chorus, was so indignant when he found "Leningrad" plastered through the Symphony programme and even used as the name of the principal Russian university nearly a century ago, that he dashed off the following editorial in the Commercial Bulletin, a weekly newspaper he owns:

Bad Taste in Names

"As the name of Lenine is abhorrent to Americans who value the blessings of civilization, and as our government has refused to recognize the usurping oligarchy that is called the soviet government of Russia, it comes as a shock to conservative Bostonians to find the city that was known as St. Petersburg until ten years ago referred to as "Leningrad" on the program of the Boston Symphony Concerts.

"Not once only but four times does the obnoxious Leningrad appear on the first program of the season, and while there may be some excuse for using the name for the city today, what possible justification can be offered for stating that a brilliant musician who died in 1873 was a pupil of the 'Leningrad Conservatory'?

"There can hardly be a doubt that the people of America would rather honor the memory of the man who founded and built St. Petersburg than that of the man who nearly destroyed it and caused the death of millions of his fellow countrymen. If we are expected to pay reverence to Lenine to please the new leader of our Symphony Orchestra, it may be desirable to look for a new conductor in spite of the undoubted musical ability of our Russian visitor."

Complain to Trustees

It was learned yesterday that the complaints had been brought to the

MONDAY, OCTOBER 20, 1924

OPPOSES NAME OF 'LENINGRAD'

Koussevitzky Favors "Petrograd" on Symphony Program

Serge Koussevitzky, new Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, expressed dissatisfaction at the use of the name "Leningrad" in place of "St. Petersburg" or "Petrograd" in the Symphony program notes of last week, in just as emphatic manner as had been done by Courtenay Guild, one of the orchestra's patrons.

Guild, brother of a former ambassador to Russia, had taken the Symphony officials to task editorially in the columns of his Commercial Bulletin for the introduction of the revolutionary nomenclature of the historic city. It was pointed out today by the Symphony conductor that he personally objected to the name, but that he had hesitated to enter a protest for fear of offending officials of the orchestra.

Mr. Guild, who is president of the Handel and Haydn Society, the Apollo Club and the Harvard Musical Association, and a director of the Harvard Alumni Chorus, expressed indignation in his editorial at finding "Leningrad" used to designate the Russian city that was formerly St. Petersburg and more latterly Petrograd and also used as the name of the principal Russian university 100 years ago.

COMPLAINTS TO TRUSTEES

Complaints about the use of the word have been made to the officers and trustees of the orchestra. Several of these last night declined to discuss the matter. They said that it was a question for the trustees as a whole to consider and that a statement might be forthcoming after their meeting on Wednesday.

Mr. Koussevitsky, however, was more prejudiced against the use of the word than those who had voiced complaint. No American, he said last night, could possibly have such vigorous objections to its use as he had, it being associated with painful memories.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenin and Trotzky," he said. "I have left my country because of them and the terrible things they have done. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone. They took it from me.

"I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called 'Leningrad' in the programs of our orchestra. But I hesitated to speak about it to others than my wife and secretary. I stifled my prejudice against this very objectionable word because I feared I might offend some of my good Boston friends."

Conductor Would Prefer "Petrograd"

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY

NO 'LENINGRAD' FOR CONDUCTOR

Herald Mon. Oct 20

Koussevitzky Says Name on Symphony Program Is Distasteful to Him

LEFT RUSSIA OWING TO THE BOLSHEVIKI

In answer to an editorial published in the Commercial Bulletin, owned by Cuurtenay Guild, in which objection was stated to the use of "Leningrad" in the program books of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky, the new conductor of the orchestra, last night said that he himself had privately objected to the use of the word. He had, however, hesitated to voice his objection for fear of offending some of those in control of the orchestra.

Mr. Guild, who is president of the Mandel and Haydn Society, the Apollo Club and the Harvard Musical Association, and a director of the Harvard Alumni Chorus, expressed indignation in his editorial at finding "Leningrad" used to designate the Russian city that was formerly St. Petersburg and more latterly Uetrograd and also used as the same of the principal Russian university 100 years ago.

COMPLAINTS TO TRUSTEES

Complaints about the use of the word have been made to the officers and trustees of the orchestra. Several of these last night declined to discuss the matter. They said that it was a question for the trustees as a whole to consider and that a statement might be forthcoming after their meeting on Wednesday.

Mr. Koussevitsky, however, was more prejudiced against the use of the word than those who had voiced complaint. No American, he said last night, could possibly have such vigorous objections to its use as he had, it being associated with painful memories.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenin and Trotzky," he said. "I have left my country because of them and the terrible things they have done. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone. They took it from me.

"I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called 'Leningrad' in the programs of our orchestra. But I hesitated to speak about it to others than my wife and secretary. I stifled my prejudice against this very objectionable word because I feared I might offend some of my good Boston friends."

Patrons of Symphony Blame New Director for Soviet Name of Russian Capital in Program —Koussevitzky Denies Responsibility

MONDAY, OCTOBER 20, 1924

OPPOSES NAME OF 'LENINGRAD'

Koussevitzky Favors "Petrograd" on Symphony Program

Serge Koussevitzky, new Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, expressed dissatisfaction at the use of the name "Leningrad" in place of "St. Petersburg" or "Petrograd" in the Symphony program notes of last week, in just as emphatic manner as had been done by Courtenay Guild, one of the orchestra's patrons.

Guild, brother of a former ambassador to Russia, had taken the Symphony officials to task editorially in the columns of his Commercial Bulletin for the introduction of the revolutionary nomenclature of the historic city. It was pointed out today by the Symphony conductor that he personally objected to the name, but that he had hesitated to enter a protest for fear of offending officials of the orchestra.

Mr. Guild, who is president of the Handel and Haydn Society, the Apollo Club and the Harvard Musical Association, and a director of the Harvard Alumni Chorus, expressed indignation in his editorial at finding "Leningrad" used to designate the Russian city that was formerly St. Petersburg and more latterly Petrograd and also used as the name of the principal Russian university 100 years ago.

COMPLAINTS TO TRUSTEES

Complaints about the use of the word have been made to the officers and trustees of the orchestra. Several of these last night declined to discuss the matter. They said that it was a question for the trustees as a whole to consider and that a statement might be forthcoming after their meeting on Wednesday.

Mr. Koussevitzky, however, was more prejudiced against the use of the word than those who had voiced complaint. No American, he said last night, could possibly have such vigorous objections to its use as he had, it being associated with painful memories.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenin and Trotzky," he said. "I have left my country because of them and the terrible things they have done. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone. They took it from me.

"I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called 'Leningrad' in the programs of our orchestra. But I hesitated to speak about it to others than my wife and secretary. I stifled my prejudice against this very objectionable word because I feared I might offend some of my good Boston friends."

Conductor Would Prefer "Petrograd"

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Conductor, Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NO 'LENINGRAD' FOR CONDUCTOR

Koussevitzky Says Name on Symphony Program Is Distasteful to Him

LEFT RUSSIA OWING TO THE BOLSHEVIKI

In answer to an editorial published in the Commercial Bulletin, owned by Cuurtenay Guild, in which objection was stated to the use of "Leningrad" in the program books of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky, the new conductor of the orchestra, last night said that he himself had privately objected to the use of the word. He had, however, hesitated to voice his objection for fear of offending some of those in control of the orchestra.

Mr. Guild, who is president of the Mandel and Haydn Society, the Apollo Club and the Harvard Musical Association, and a director of the Harvard Alumni Chorus, expressed indignation in his editorial at finding "Leningrad" used to designate the Russian city that was formerly St. Petersburg and more latterly Uetrograd and also used as the same of the principal Russian university 100 years ago.

COMPLAINTS TO TRUSTEES

Complaints about the use of the word have been made to the officers and trustees of the orchestra. Several of these last night declined to discuss the matter. They said that it was a question for the trustees as a whole to consider and that a statement might be forthcoming after their meeting on Wednesday.

Mr. Koussevitsky, however, was more prejudiced against the use of the word than those who had voiced complaint. No American, he said last night, could possibly have such vigorous objections to its use as he had, it being associated with painful memories.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenin and Trotzky," he said. "I have left my country because of them and the terrible things they have done. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone. They took it from me.

"I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called 'Leningrad' in the programs of our orchestra. But I hesitated to speak about it to others than my wife and secretary. I stifled my prejudice against this very objectionable word because I feared I might offend some of my good Boston friends."

Name Repugnant to Him for Personal Reasons

SUFFERED MUCH FROM BOLSHEVISM

Trustees Decline to Comment Upon Matter

Surprised and somewhat irritated that St. Petersburg—or more recently Petrograd—should be referred to repeatedly as "Leningrad" in the programme books of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor, said last night he had hesitated to voice a protest in fear of offending some of those in control of the famous musical organization who had induced him to assume its leadership.

JUMPED AT CONCLUSIONS

Several Symphony patrons have become highly indignant over what they declare to be the deliberate flaunting in the face of the Boston public of a word they regard as too suggestive of Bolshevism and the red government of the Russian Soviets.

This indignation was directed toward Koussevitzky, whom they thought had insisted on "Leningrad" as the name of the capital city of his native land, and who some accused of using the sacred programmes of the Boston Symphony to air his political views.

stone throwing near the fairgrou...

DISCORD OVER USE OF "LENINGRAD"

Continued From First Page

"If we are expected to pay reverence to Lenin to please the new leader of our Symphony Orchestra, it may be desirable to look for a new conductor in spite of the undoubted musical ability of our Russian visitor," declared, yesterday, Courtenay Guild, head of several of the city's leading musical organizations.

Hated Word With Conductor

But it is all a misunderstanding. Koussevitzky explained last night to a Post reporter at his home on Pond street, Jamaica Plain. No American citizen could possibly have such vigorous objections to the word "Leningrad" as he does; it is associated with painful memories, he said.

Courtenay Guild, who is president of the Handel and Haydn Society, the Apollo Club and the Harvard Musical Association, and a director of the Harvard Alumni Chorus, was so indignant when he found "Leningrad" plastered through the Symphony programme and even used as the name of the principal Russian university nearly a century ago, that he dashed off the following editorial in the Commercial Bulletin, a weekly newspaper he owns:

Bad Taste in Names

"As the name of Lenine is abhorrent to Americans who value the blessings of civilization, and as our government has refused to recognize the usurping oligarchy that is called the soviet government of Russia, it comes as a shock to conservative Bostonians to find the city that was known as St. Petersburg until ten years ago referred to as "Leningrad" on the program of the Boston Symphony Concerts.

"Not once only but four times does the obnoxious Leningrad appear on the first program of the season, and while there may be some excuse for using the name for the city today, what possible justification can be offered for stating that a brilliant musician who died in 1873 was a pupil of the 'Leningrad Conservatory'?

"There can hardly be a doubt that the people of America would rather honor the memory of the man who founded and built St. Petersburg than that of the man who nearly destroyed it and caused the death of millions of his fellow countrymen. If we are expected to pay reverence to Lenine to please the new leader of our Symphony Orchestra, it may be desirable to look for a new conductor in spite of the undoubted musical ability of our Russian visitor."

Complain to Trustees

It was learned yesterday that the complaints had been brought to the attention of the officers and trustees of the Symphony Orchestra. Several of these gentlemen were seen by a Post reporter, but they declined to make any statement at present, saying the matter was one for the trustees to consider and that they might have something to say next Wednesday.

Then the reporter called on Mr. Koussevitzky and found he was decidedly more prejudiced against "Leningrad" than any of the indignant Bostonians. "St. Petersburg—or Petrograd, as they called it during the great war—is a wonderful monument to that great Russian, Peter the Great," he protested, "so it is as silly to call it 'Leningrad' as it would be to call the monument to your own General Washington by another name of some small person of this generation.

Robbed of Fortune by Them

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenin and Trotsky. I have left my country because of them and the terrible things they have done. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone—all gone—they took it from me.

"I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called 'Leningrad' in the programmes of our orchestra. But I hesitated to speak about it to others than my wife and secretary. I stifled my prejudice against this very objectionable word because I feared I might offend some of my good Boston friends.

"I thank you so much for coming to me. Now the matter is cleared up. I hope we shall never again see that word in the programmes of the Boston Symphony orchestra. I think that in a few years—perhaps five years, surely within ten—Russia will recover her sanity and this great and beautiful city will again be known to all the world as St. Petersburg or even Petrograd."

INFORMATION OBSCURED

148 Oct 21-22 After Oct 31

Herald Tues Oct 21

"Leningrad"

Mr. Courtenay Guild and some others seem to be perturbed because the word "Leningrad" stands in the place of Petrograd, or St. Petersburg, in the program books of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It occurred to them that Mr. Koussevitzky had suggested or ordered the "substitution." The suspicion was wholly unwarrantable, ridiculous in fact, for the eminent conductor bears no good will toward the soviet government of Russia; he has suffered at its hands.

Unfortunately "Leningrad" is now the name of the city founded by Peter the Great in the marshes of the Neva in 1703, the city long known as St. Petersburg, or, in some countries as Petersburg. After the revolution the name was changed to Petrograd. The soviet government has changed Petrograd to Leningrad, and as Leningrad it is now known, however one may deplore the fact. "Leningrad" is the word recognized in political and journalistic circles.

If in the years to come the name of Washington, D. C., should be changed by a wild-eyed government to Bryanville, the capital would then be known as Bryanville in all circles, foreign and domestic.

Herald Oct 23

THE BOSTON HERALD, TH

NOTES and LINES

By PHILIP HALE

A concerto by C. P. Emanuel Bach will be played at the Symphony concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening. This concerto has an interesting history. As a quintet it was performed by The Society of Ancient Instruments in Paris. The quintet of strings was composed of violon quinton, viola d'amore, viol da gamba and bass viol. Mr. Koussewitzky was at the concert and was so pleased by the music that he obtained the composition and purposed to orchestrate it, but he finally handed it to Maximilian Steinberg, the son-in-law of Rimsky-Korsakov. The manuscript is in the Charles Guilion collection at Bourg-en-Bresse, France.

The Prelude to Moussorgsky's opera, "Khovantchina" is supposed to portray the coming of dawn. The scene is the Red Square in the Kremlin. The story is about the struggle between Old Russia and New Russia at the end of the 17th century. Rimsky-Korsakov revised and orchestrated this posthumous work. The Russian Symphony Society in New York performed the Prelude 19 years ago.

Rimsky-Korsakov's "Flight of the Bumble Bee" is practically a Scherzo (with voice parts) in his fairy opera, "Tsar Saltan." The stage direction is: "Out of the sea a bumble-bee rises and encircles the swan."

We are told that Prokoviev wishes his name to be spelled, since he has been away from Russia, Prokofieff. His "Scythian" suite, as the pieces just mentioned, will be played here for the first time. It is said to be wild and barbaric. The movements are entitled the Adoration of Veles and Ala; the Enemy God and the Dance of the Black Spirits; Night; the Glorious Departure of Lolly and the Procession of the Sun. The names of the Scythian gods that appear in Prokofieff's program are far from being those figuring in Herodotus. The Suite, produced at Leningrad in 1916, was played for the first time in this country at Chicago in 1918.

The symphony this week will be Brahms's, No. 4, E minor.

Notes and Lines: Herald Oct 23

I would suggest that the short piece on the Symphony program of last Saturday night, of which no account was given in the book, should be performed again at an early concert; following an equal space of time in which the members of the orchestra should each play on his instrument as he pleased without regard to the others, excepting as instinct should dictate. I think the Symphony audiences would then be in a position to realize that the piece in question was really music, and also to what extent it was music. SENEX.

The reference is to Florent Schmitt's "Reves." There was no description of it in the Program Book for the simple reason that "Reves" was substituted after the book was on the press, for Debussy's Danse orchestrated by Ravel. —Ed.

For Jewish Tribune Oct 24

Under its new conductor, Serge Koussovitzky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the usual double series of 5 Thursday evening, and 5 Saturday afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall, on the following dates: November 27 and 29, January 1 and 3, January 29 and 31, March 12 and 14, and April 9 and 11. Serge Koussovitsky made his American debut last Friday [illegible] of the Boston Symphony season, in Symphony Hall, [illegible] the programme of the occasion included: Vivaldi's, Variations on a Theme by Haydn; Honegger's, "Pacific 231"; and Scriabin's, "Le Poeme de l'extase. The Russian conductor will put on his New York programme several new scores which he has introduced in Europe with much success, but which are still unheard in this country. The classical repertory will form the bulk of each series.

Koussovitzky was born in Tver, Northern Russia, in 1874. At the age of twelve, he conducted the town theatre orchestra. At the Moscow conservatory, he was required to study either a brass instrument or the double bass. He chose the latter, became a remarkable virtuoso, toured Europe with his double bass, and composed for it. So narrow a field could not hold him and in 1909 he organized and subsidized the Koussovitsky and Rimsky-Korsakov festival, etc. Each summer he took his forces the length and breadth of his country, e[illegible] chartering a Volga steamer. He gave free concerts in countless provincial towns where symphonic music had been unknown.

Mr. Koussevitzky proposes the following program for the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theater at Cambridge on Thursday evening, Nov. 6.

Concerto in D major for Orchestra.... C. P. E. Bach
Venusberg Music for the Opera, "Tannhäuser" ..... Wagner
Prelude to the Opera, "Khovantchina" ..... Musorgsky
Scherzo of the Bee from the Opera, "Tsar Saltan" ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Symphony in E minor, No. 4..... Brahms

Musical America hears of two concerts

Amer. Hebr. Oct 24

SYMPHONY RENDITION THRILLS

A varied and interesting program and Serge Koussevitzky's dramatic conducting were the features of yesterday's Symphony concert. There were three selections new to Boston, a prelude to the opera "Khowantchina" by Moussorgsky, a glowing tone poem depicting dawn in a Moscow square; Rimsky - Korsakov's "Flight of the Bumble Bee," a Scherzo from "Tsar Saltan," and Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite." The music of the last named is certainly wild and something new to Boston ears. There is not so much color in Prokofieff's Suite, but he attains prodigious effects by a relentless rhythm, and a use of the strings that made the music at time stab like a dagger.

There is one place in the third movement when the strings hold on to one note for measure after measure, sounding fortissimo all the time, and it gives just this effect of stabbing. This music, so eloquently rendered by Mr. Koussevitzky and an orchestra already playing in what baseball writers would call mid-season form, is decidedly stimulating, and makes us wait for more music by the composer.

C. P. E. Bach's "Concerto for Orchestra" in D major opened the concert, and Brahms E minor symphony closed it. At least one listener was a bit disappointed in Mr. Koussevitzky's rendering of the Symphony, but others may have felt differently. To that listener the fault was that the rhythmic line was at times sacrificed for dramatic effects. Aside from that the work was eloquently played.

The concert will be repeated this evening.

Herald Sat Oct 25

SYMPHONY IN RUSSIAN WORKS

Conductor and Orchestra Give Magnificent Performance

FIRST TIME HERE FOR MOST OF MUSIC

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third concert of the season yesterday afternoon. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted. The program was as follows: Emanuel Bach, concerto for orchestra, D major (arranged by M. Steinberg); Moussorgsky, prelude to the opera "Khovantchina"; Rimsky - Korsakov, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee" from "Tsar Saltan"; Prokofieff, Scythian suite; Brahms, Symphony No. 4, E minor.

The music by the composers, except Brahms, was played for the first time in Boston. Bach's concerto was played for the first time in the United States, as was probably the case with Rimsky-Korsakov's Scherzo.

The ancient Scythians, wildly savage, had horrid manners and customs. Herodotus tells us at pleasing length how they sacrificed one in a hundred of their enemies to Mars; how in battle they scalped their foes and drank their blood; how they burned false prophets among their many soothsayers; how they stranged servants of their dead king and seated them upon horses stuffed with chaff to place about the monument. Truly a splendidly barbarous folk.

And in his Scythian Suite Prokofieff has written superbly barbaric music.

This music is something more than roaring, blaring dissonance; something more than eccentric experimentation in harmonic schemes and daring orchestration. The Suite is deftly planned; broadly conceived; carried out with rare dramatic intensity.

We are not told where Prokofieff found the story from which he drew the short argument of his Suite; the invocation to the sun-god Veles and the sacrifice to the Scythians' favorite idol Ala, the daughter of this god; where he read of the evil-god who dances deliciously with seven subterranean pagan monsters. The moon-maidens console Ala for the great harm done her in darkness by this evil-god. Then Lolli, to save her, fight the evil one. The sun-god smites the wicked deity, and the Suite ends with a tonal portrayal of sunrise.

This Suite was produced at Leningrad in 1916. The composer was then 25 years old. The first performance in this country was at Chicago in 1918, when Prokofieff was in the United States.

No matter how wild this music is there is admirable method in the madness; there is a refreshing mastery in the development of the composer's purpose. He knew what he wanted; he gained his effects: they are not episodic, spasmodic, but skilfully continuous. He has an individually melodic vein; his harmonic schemes are his own, as is the orchestral voice. And throughout the Suite there is singular dramatic intensity.

The third movement "Night" is perhaps the most remarkable in the revelation of poetically dramatic feeling. This is not the night of Walt Whitman:

"Night of south winds! Night of the large few stars!
Still nodding night! Mad, naked summer night."

There is "the blackness of darkness": a night in which Nature herself shudders and is afraid; a night when the Demon is master and strange, sinister deeds are wrought.

Compare this movement with the magnificent finale with its amazing climax, one of the most original pages in the whole literature of music.

Attention for this Suite was well prepared by Mr. Koussevitzy. There was the delightful concerto of Emanuel Bach, reverently arranged by Rimksky-Korsakov's son-in-law, with its beautiful Air for a second movement, an enchanting melody announced by the English horn. Then came the Prelude to "Khovantchina," noteworthy for exotic melody and "atmosphere." And just before the Suite was "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," which in Rimsky-Korsakov's fairy opera rises from the sea to buzz around the Swan-maiden; a dazzling virtuoso piece, played brilliantly by the orchestra, with Mr. Laurent noteworthy in solo passages.

It was a great afternoon for Russia.

The fourth symphony of Brahms was performed with unusual elasticity. Too often the performance of this work reminds one of the criticism passed on the interpretation of Hamlet in "Great Expectations": Massive and concrete. But Mr. Koussevitzky brought out the poetry, as he respected the austere and solid, at times grim, almost forbidding basic structures. The lyric passages were sung; they were given time for breath; transitional passages for once did not seem matter-of-fact. In a word the performance was romantic, not metronomic. Ultra-conservatives may whisper that the symphony was Russianized; which, being interpreted, means that it was engrossing.

The great audience was enthusiastic, and with good reason, for the program was most interesting, and conductor and orchestra covered themselves with glory.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Weber, Overture to "Oberon;" Roussel, Symphony, B flat (first time in America; Wagner, Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser," Siegfried's Funeral Music from "Dusk of the Gods," and the Prelude to "The Mastersingers."

WILL BE FRENCH

Advertiser

Y, OCTOBER 25, 1924

NOVELTIES AT THE SYMPHONY

Three novelties are on this week's Symphony program, the prelude to the Moussorgsky opera, "Khovantchina," the "Bumble Bee" scherzo from a Rimsy-Korsakoff opera, "Czar Saltan," and Serge Prokovieff's "Scythian Suite."

The operatic pieces are delightful; the Prokofieff piece a prodigy of technic and imagination, a tone drama of ancient barbarism. All three, in fact, are tonal pictures, the first depicting sunrise in the famous Red Square in Moscow, the second the flight of bee, amazingly vivid, and the third the story of Lolli, a Scythian hero, with the sun coming up like thunder as Lolli routs the wicked god and saves the idol Ala. The Prokovieff suite is of uneven merit. It was glorified by a dazzling performance at yesterday's matinee, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting as usual in a masterly manner.

Emmanuel Bach's classic orchestral concerto in D major opens the program and Brahms' E minor symphony closes it. For richness of both lyric and dramatic qualities the performance of these familiar works was indeed memorable.

There was hearty applause after every number, including an ovation for conductor and orchestra after the "Bumble Bee" scherzo.

AMUSEMENTS

[illegible] other week to play [illegible]

Herald Oct 25 Sat

Symphony in Third Program

Serge Koussevitzky conducted his third concert with the Boston Symphony orchestra yesterday afternoon to another interested audience.

Opening with Bach's Concerto in D Major, arranged by Maximillian Steinberg, the conductor again gave display of his depth of feeling, his fine imaginings and his skill as director. There was no interrupting applause between the movements. (How quickly we understand.)

The delightful prelude to the opera "Khovantchina," by Moussorgsky, was second choice. Heard here for the first time, its initial performance exquisitely rendered, will leave vivid memory. Under the conductor's careful and interpretive direction it seemed altogether too short.

A most descriptive and felicitous gem was "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," also heard here for the first time. It proved a delightful variation expressive of the Rimsky-Korsokov whose fantastic opera-pantomime "Le Coq D'or" was heard here in 1918 for the first time.

Again Mr. Koussevitzky saved the Symphony for the closing number—this time giving the much honored place to Brahms and his Symphony No. 4 in E minor, with its four contrasting movements, which after the long Scythian Suite of Prokofieff seemed an arduous task for the conductor and one not beyond the keen appreciation of all present.

FOURTH SYMPHONY

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, in Symphony Hall, Serge Koussevitzky will present the following program at the fourth [illegible] of Symphony concerts: Weber's Overture to [illegible]; Albert Roussel's Symphony in B flat (first time in America); and three of Wagner's excerpts—Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," the funeral music of Siegfried from "Dusk of the Gods," and the overture to "The Master Singer of Nuremburg."

---

man.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Orchestras Trans. Oct 25 Sat

AT the Symphony Concerts of next week Mr. Koussevitzky will divide the program between the sharp-edged Symphony in B flat of the Parisian Roussel, and miscellaneous from Wagner and Weber. As d'Indy's Second Symphony—now a semi-classic—was debated in its day so in these later years of grace has Roussel's sharpened tongues and pens. At last we Bostonians may also part company over it. The preceding and subsequent miscellany, in which Mr. Koussevitzky should excel, traverses the Overture to "Oberon"; the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger"; the Bacchanal from "Tannhäuser"; the music for the dead Siegfried in "Götterdämmerung."

In annual visit to Boston, the Philhar-

INFORMATION OBSCURED

148 Oct 21-22 After Oct 31

Herald Tues Oct 21

"Leningrad"

Mr. Courtenay Guild and some others seem to be perturbed because the word "Leningrad" stands in the place of Petrograd, or St. Petersburg, in the program books of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It occurred to them that Mr. Koussevitzky had suggested or ordered the "substitution." The suspicion was wholly unwarrantable, ridiculous in fact, for the eminent conductor bears no good will toward the soviet government of Russia; he has suffered at its hands.

Unfortunately "Leningrad" is now the name of the city founded by Peter the Great in the marshes of the Neva in 1703, the city long known as St. Petersburg, or, in some countries as Petersburg. After the revolution the name was changed to Petrograd. The soviet government has changed Petrograd to Leningrad, and as Leningrad it is now known, however one may deplore the fact. "Leningrad" is the word recognized in political and journalistic circles.

If in the years to come the name of Washington, D. C., should be changed by a wild-eyed government to Bryanville, the capital would then be known as Bryanville in all circles, foreign and domestic.

Advertiser

THE BOSTON HERALD, TH

NOTES and LINES

By PHILIP HALE

A concerto by C. P. Emanuel Bach will be played at the Symphony concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening. This concerto has an interesting history. As a quintet it was performed by The Society of Ancient Instruments in Paris. The quintet of strings was composed of violon quinton, viola d'amore, viol da gamba and bass viol. Mr. Koussewitzky was at the concert and was so pleased by the music that he obtained the composition and purposed to orchestrate it, but he finally handed it to Maximilian Steinberg, the son-in-law of Rimsky-Korsakov. The manuscript is in the Charles Guillon collection at Bourg-en-Bresse, France.

The Prelude to Moussorgsky's opera, "Khovantchina" is supposed to portray the coming of dawn. The scene is the Red Square in the Kremlin. The story is about the struggle between Old Russia and New Russia at the end of the 17th century. Rimsky-Korsakov revised and orchestrated this posthumous work. The Russian Symphony Society in New York performed the Prelude 19 years ago.

Rimsky-Korsakov's "Flight of the Bumble Bee" is practically a Scherzo (with voice parts) in his fairy opera, "Tsar Saltan." The stage direction is: "Out of the sea a bumble-bee rises and encircles the swan."

We are told that Prokoviev wishes his name to be spelled, since he has been away from Russia, Prokofieff. His "Scythian" suite, as the pieces just mentioned, will be played here for the first time. It is said to be wild and barbaric. The movements are entitled the Adoration of Veles and Ala; the Enemy God and the Dance of the Black Spirits; Night; the Glorious Departure of Lolly and the Procession of the Sun. The names of the Scythian gods that appear in Prokofieff's program are far from being those figuring in Herodotus. The Suite, produced at Leningrad in 1916, was played for the first time in this country at Chicago in 1918.

The symphony this week will be Brahms's, No. 4, E minor.

Notes and Lines:

I would suggest that the short piece on the Symphony program of last Saturday night, of which no account was given in the book, should be performed again at an early concert; following an equal space of time in which the members of the orchestra should each play on his instrument as he pleased without regard to the others, excepting as instinct should dictate. I think the Symphony audiences would then be in a position to realize that the piece in question was really music, and also to what extent it was music. SENEX.

The reference is to Florent Schmitt's "Reves." There was no description of it in the Program Book for the simple reason that "Reves" was substituted after the book was on the press, for Debussy's Danse orchestrated by Ravel. —Ed.

Jewish Tribune Oct 24

Under its new conductor, Serge Koussovitzky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the usual double series of 5 Thursday evening, and 5 Saturday afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall, on the following dates: November 27 and 29, January 1 and 3, January 29 and 31, March 12 and 14, and April 9 and 11. Serge Koussovitsky m[illegible] merican debut last Friday [illegible] of the Boston Symph[illegible] season, in Symphony Hall, [illegible] he programme of the occasion [illegible]ded: Vivaldi's, Variations on a Theme by Haydn; Honegger's, "Pacific 231"; and Scriabin's, "Le Poeme de l'extase. The Russian conductor will put on his New York programme several new scores which he has introduced in Europe with much success, but which are still unheard in this country. The classical repertory will form the bulk of each series.

Koussovitzky was born in Tver, Northern Russia, in 1874. At the age of twelve, he conducted the town theatre orchestra. At the Moscow conservatory, he was required to study either a brass instrument or the double bass. He chose the latter, became a remarkable virtuoso, toured Europe with his double bass, and composed for it. So narrow a field could not hold him and in 1909 he organized and subsidized the Koussovitsky and Rimsky-Korsakov festival, etc. Each summer he took his forces the length and breadth of his country, [illegible] chartering a Volga steamer. He gave free concerts in countless provincial towns where symphonic music had been unknown.

Mr. Koussevitzky proposes the following program for the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theater at Cambridge on Thursday evening, Nov. 6.

Concerto in D major for Orchestra.... C. P. E. Bach
Venusberg Music for the Opera, "Tannhäuser" ..... Wagner
Prelude to the Opera, "Khovantchina" Musorgsky
Scherzo of the Bee from the Opera, "Tsar Saltan" ..... Rimsky-Korsakov
Symphony in E minor, No. 4..... Brahms

Musical America hears of two concerts

SYMPHONY RENDITION THRILLS

A varied and interesting program and Serge Koussevitzky's dramatic conducting were the features of yesterday's Symphony concert. There were three selections new to Boston, a prelude to the opera "Khowantchina" by Moussorgsky, a glowing tone poem depicting dawn in a Moscow square; Rimsky - Korsakov's "Flight of the Bumble Bee," a Scherzo from "Tsar Saltan," and Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite." The music of the last named is certainly wild and something new to Boston ears. There is not so much color in Prokofieff's Suite, but he attains prodigious effects by a relentless rhythm, and a use of the strings that made the music at time stab like a dagger.

There is one place in the third movement when the strings hold on to one note for measure after measure, sounding fortissimo all the time, and it gives just this effect of stabbing. This music, so eloquently rendered by Mr. Koussevitzky and an orchestra already playing in what baseball writers would call mid-season form, is decidedly stimulating, and makes us wait for more music by the composer.

C. P. E. Bach's "Concerto for Orchestra" in D major opened the concert, and Brahms E minor symphony closed it. At least one listener was a bit disappointed in Mr. Koussevitzky's rendering of the Symphony, but others may have felt differently. To that listener the fault was that the rhythmic line was at times sacrificed for dramatic effects. Aside from that the work was eloquently played.

The concert will be repeated this evening.

Herald Sat Oct 25

SYMPHONY IN RUSSIAN WORKS

Conductor and Orchestra Give Magnificent Performance

FIRST TIME HERE FOR MOST OF MUSIC

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third concert of the season yesterday afternoon. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted. The program was as follows: Emanuel Bach, concerto for orchestra, D major (arranged by M. Steinberg); Moussorgsky, prelude to the opera "Khovantchina"; Rimsky - Korsakov, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee" from "Tsar Saltan"; Prokofieff, Scythian suite; Brahms, Symphony No. 4, E minor.

The music by the composers, except Brahms, was played for the first time in Boston. Bach's concerto was played for the first time in the United States, as was probably the case with Rimsky-Korsakov's Scherzo.

The ancient Scythians, wildly savage, had horrid manners and customs. Herodotus tells us at pleasing length how they sacrificed one in a hundred of their enemies to Mars; how in battle they scalped their foes and drank their blood; how they burned false prophets among their many soothsayers; how they stranged servants of their dead king and seated them upon horses stuffed with chaff to place about the monument. Truly a splendidly barbarous folk.

And in his Scythian Suite Prokofieff has written superbly barbaric music.

This music is something more than roaring, blaring dissonance; something more than eccentric experimentation in harmonic schemes and daring orchestration. The Suite is deftly planned; broadly conceived; carried out with rare dramatic intensity.

We are not told where Prokofieff found the story from which he drew the short argument of his Suite; the invocation to the sun-god Veles and the sacrifice to the Scythians' favorite idol Ala, the daughter of this god; where he read of the evil-god who dances delisiously with seven subterranean pagan monsters. The moon-maidens console Ala for the great harm done her in darkness by this evil-god. Then Lolli, to save her, fight the evil one. The sun-god smites the wicked deity, and the Suite ends with a tonal portrayal of sunrise.

This Suite was produced at Leningrad in 1916. The composer was then 25 years old. The first performance in this country was at Chicago in 1918, when Prokofieff was in the United States.

No matter how wild this music is there is admirable method in the madness; there is a refreshing mastery in the development of the composer's purpose. He knew what he wanted; he gained his effects: they are not episodic, spasmodic, but skilfully continuous. He has an individually melodic vein; his harmonic schemes are his own, as is the orchestral voice. And throughout the Suite there is singular dramatic intensity.

The third movement "Night" is perhaps the most remarkable in the revelation of poetically dramatic feeling. This is not the night of Walt Whitman: "Night of south winds! Night of the large few stars! Still nodding night! Mad, naked summer night."

There is "the blackness of darkness": a night in which Nature herself shudders and is afraid; a night when the Demon is master and strange, sinister deeds are wrought.

Compare this movement with the magnificent finale with its amazing climax, one of the most original pages in the whole literature of music.

Attention for this Suite was well prepared by Mr. Koussevitzy. There was the delightful concerto of Emanuel Bach, reverently arranged by Rimksky-Korsakov's son-in-law, with its beautiful Air for a second movement, an enchanting melody announced by the English horn. Then came the Prelude to "Khovantchina," noteworthy for exotic melody and "atmosphere." And just before the Suite was "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," which in Rimsky-Korsakov's fairy opera rises from the sea to buzz around the Swan-maiden; a dazzling virtuoso piece, played brilliantly by the orchestra, with Mr. Laurent noteworthy in solo passages.

It was a great afternoon for Russia.

The fourth symphony of Brahms was performed with unusual elasticity. Too often the performance of this work reminds one of the criticism passed on the interpretation of Hamlet in "Great Expectations": Massive and concrete. But Mr. Koussevitzky brought out the poetry, as he respected the austere and solid, at times grim, almost forbidding basic structures. The lyric passages were sung; they were given time for breath; transitional passages for once did not seem matter-of-fact. In a word the performance was romantic, not metronomic. Ultra-conservatives may whisper that the symphony was Russianized; which, being interpreted, means that it was engrossing.

The great audience was enthusiastic, and with good reason, for the program was most interesting, and conductor and orchestra covered themselves with glory.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is as follows: Weber, Overture to "Oberon;" Roussel, Symphony, B flat (first time in America; Wagner, Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser," Siegfried's Funeral Music from "Dusk of the Gods," and the Prelude to "The Mastersingers."

WILL BE FRENCH

Sat. Oct 25 Advertiser

Y, OCTOBER 25, 1924

NOVELTIES AT THE SYMPHONY

Three novelties are on this week's Symphony program, the prelude to the Moussorgsky opera, "Khovantchina," the "Bumble Bee" scherzo from a Rimsy-Korsakoff opera, "Czar Saltan," and Serge Prokovieff's "Scythian Suite."

The operatic pieces are delightful; the Prokofieff piece a prodigy of technic and imagination, a tone drama of ancient barbarism. All three, in fact, are tonal pictures, the first depicting sunrise in the famous Red Square in Moscow, the second the flight of bee, amazingly vivid, and the third the story of Lolli, a Scythian hero, with the sun coming up like thunder as Lolli routs the wicked god and saves the idol Ala. The Prokovieff suite is of uneven merit. It was glorified by a dazzling performance at yesterday's matinee, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting as usual in a masterly manner.

Emmanuel Bach's classic orchestral concerto in D major opens the program and Brahms' E minor symphony closes it. For richness of both lyric and dramatic qualities the performance of these familiar works was indeed memorable.

There was hearty applause after every number, including an ovation for conductor and orchestra after the "Bumble Bee" scherzo.

AMUSEMENTS

Symphony in Third Program

Serge Koussevitzky conducted his third concert with the Boston Symphony orchestra yesterday afternoon to another interested audience.

Opening with Bach's Concerto in D Major, arranged by Maximillian Steinberg, the conductor again gave display of his depth of feeling, his fine imaginings and his skill as director. There was no interrupting applause between the movements. (How quickly we understand.)

The delightful prelude to the opera "Khovantchina," by Moussorgsky, was second choice. Heard here for the first time, its initial performance exquisitely rendered, will leave vivid memory. Under the conductor's careful and interpretive direction it seemed altogether too short.

A most descriptive and felicitous gem was "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," also heard here for the first time. It proved a delightful variation expressive of the Rimsky-Korsokov whose fantastic opera-pantomime "Le Coq D'or" was heard here in 1918 for the first time.

Again Mr. Koussevitzky saved the Symphony for the closing number—this time giving the much honored place to Brahms and his Symphony No. 4 in E minor, with its four contrasting movements, which after the long Scythian Suite of Prokofieff seemed an arduous task for the conductor and one not beyond the keen appreciation of all present.

FOURTH SYMPHONY

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, in Symphony hall, Serge Koussevitzky will present the following program at the fourth [illegible] of Symphony concerts: Weber's Overture to [illegible]"; Albert Roussel's Symphony in B flat (first time in America); and three of Wagner's excerpts—Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," the funeral music of Siegfried from "Dusk of the Gods," and the overture to "The Master Singer of Nuremburg."

man, [illegible]

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Orchestras

AT the Symphony Concerts of next week Mr. Koussevitzky will divide the program between the sharp-edged Symphony in B flat of the Parisian Roussel, and miscellaneous from Wagner and Weber. As d'Indy's Second Symphony—now a semi-classic—was debated in its day so in these later years of grace has Roussel's sharpened tongues and pens. At last we Bostonians may also part company over it. The preceding and subsequent miscellany, in which Mr. Koussevitzky should excel, traverses the Overture to "Oberon"; the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger"; the Bacchanal from "Tannhäuser"; the music for the dead Siegfried in "Götterdämmerung."

In annual visit to Boston, the Philhar-

REDUCTION

RATIO

14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY

Transcript Sat Oct 25

Symphony Concert

DAY UNTO RUSSIANS, DAY FOR PLEASURES, DAY ALSO OF POWER

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS AGAIN AT ZENITH

Composers and Conductor, Orchestra and Audience in Full Fettle—Brahms and a Bach According to Koussevitzky—From Musorgsky Pictorial and Rimsky Amusing to the Splendors and Savagery of Prokofiev

LIKE a river, running deep, bright and full from many a source, was the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon. Plentiful and various was the pleasure; and clear were the springs whence it flowed. . . . Audiences approve, for example, Mr. Koussevitzky's departures from custom and precedent in program-making. No mistaken notion of dignity deters him from fanciful and expert trifles—say Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scherzo of the Bee," now heard for the first time in Boston and clapped on Friday to the last echo of the buzz. He is aware that length is no avenue to interest and, without a flicker of hesitation, he chooses such brief pieces as Honegger's "Pacific," a fortnight ago, or the Prelude to Musorgsky's opera, "Khovantchina," upon the list of yesterday. An eighteenth-century Concerto has begun three programs. Through years hard to count the public of the Symphony Concerts has enjoyed such music, even when the performance fell short of the sonorous voice, the sinewy line, the ample progress that Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra lend to it.

So far, moreover, the conductor's novel numbers—save only Monsieur Schmitt's accidental commonplaces—have won the general ear. Honegger's rhapsody was clapped and clapped again. The listener "who knows what he likes" was surer of his satisfactions with de Falla's ballet than were some of the connoisseurs. The bumble-bee of Friday left only the sting of pleasure. The Prelude to "Khovantchina" held every ear rapt; while Prokofiev's "Scythian Suite" ended, literally and figuratively, in a blaze of glory. Back to the victorious day when "The Rite of Spring" first sounded through Symphony Hall, went the applause.

The orchestra, no less, is new source of stimulation and delight. All that Mr. Monteux asked, it gave him back. Mr. Koussevitzky asks more and as fully receives it. In splendor, suavity and suppleness, with that mingling of precision and vibrancy, flow and stride, which is life to such music, the string-choir moved yesterday through Emanuel Bach's Concerto Sensuous pleasure and pictorial illusion were the coloring and the gradation of tone in the whole orchestra through Musorgsky's Prelude. A band of virtuosi buzzed with that sea-born bee. The piercing radiance, the surging depths, the mounting flood of the brass-choirs in the "Scythian Suite" were revelation. Red and gold, they saw, heard and sounded. Count also the darkling color, rhythmic life, keen-set contrasts and sharp-set modulations of the tonal-mass,—opening and closing through Brahms's Fourth Symphony—and the tale of an orchestra at the height of its prowess and the top of its bent is no more than half told.

Mr. Koussevitzky may well persuade, command and inspirit such a band. He enforces precision; preserves the unfolding line, the upspringing march which shape musical form and order musical motion. Yet he knows and practises all the freedoms of pace, rhythm, curve and accent which are the spirit that giveth life. His hand is alert and his ear sensitive with every degree and tint of tone. He would have his orchestral phrase, accent and color like the living voice it is. His contrasts are contrasts; his climaxes climaxes. Outpoured are the riches, outflung is the vitality of the chosen music. From itself and from himself, Mr. Koussevitzky characters it. And all this to an audience that even on Fridays comes alert, stays alert, beating high in sensation and pleasure. Toward zenith the Symphony Concerts rise again.

With reason, hearing Emanuel Bach's Concerto played as chamber-piece for ancient instruments, Mr. Koussevitzky heard in it also a Concerto for strings, flute, oboes, horn and bassoon out of a modern orchestra. The first movement unfolds in broad line and ample spacing. Spare and sinewy is the counterpoint, energetic and cumulative the rhythm. It invites such magnificence as the string choir and Mr. Koussevitzky now summoned. Of the paternal Sebastian himself might have been these amplitudes and freedoms. The ensuing slow movement gave the wind-choir finer and choicer opportunity; yet quicker came the impression of a music that departed from mid-eighteenth century formula and mood. It ran in no song-ful periods unfolding and far-spreading, Handel-like. The elder Bach took a simpler, directer, barer way with such effusions of his music-making mind and heart. Here, rather, was the younger Emanuel, anticipating both the Mozartian mood of melancholy and the Mozartian grace of treatment. Here sang sentiment; here went elegant and artful modulation. The finale, by way of contrast, tripped almost Haydn-like; and upon any eighteenth-century Allegro Mr. Koussevitzky spares not in quickening pace.

At the other end of the program, the Brahms of the Fourth Symphony was clearly the romantical, the songful, Brahms of the conductors in this present day from Toscanini and Nikisch to Stokowski and Koussevitzky. The granitic Brahms of Hans Richter, as "massive and concrete" as that apostle himself, is on the runway to oblivion. Quite down it "the romantics" have thrust the generation that would also have Brahms abstruse, opaque, remote and therefore, like so many other gods, to be revered. Our applauded masters are all for a Brahms vitalized and vivid, luminous and lambent. Mr. Koussevitzky, making way through the Scherzo, sharpened the rhythms, until they nearly danced, intensified the contrasting song until it was well-nigh sentimental, and the "austere" Brahms very like a German Michael singing of a Sunday across his sun-lit garden. Passing to the finale, that intricate orchestral Chaconne, the conductor was all for contrast with the successive variations—etched measures finely sharpened say in the wood-winds; massed measures with the whole orchestra piled upon them; upswelling progress from ground-bass theme to deep and full-flung close.

With a like impetus, Mr. Koussevitzky filled the first movement. Under his plastic hand, the swaying measures of the beginning seemed at each return freshly characterized. In vigorous motion entered and recurred, advanced and receded, the larger-voiced periods, Brahms's every development and variation upon them deepened or sharpened. Transition and contrast, ardor and edge, voices interwoven, parting and gathering—a music not only vitalized but dramatized, the conductor's temperament as wing and release to the more hesitant composer. Yet again with the slow movement—Brahms persistently reiterating, varying, developing and deriving; Mr. Koussevitzky holding fast to this generative progress, but heightening every turn of it; while over all he spread a tone as mellow, warm and sober as the musing heart from which the music sings. Into even a Beethoven of the Fifth Symphony, a Brahms of the first or the fourth, every conductor has a right to infuse himself. Thereby the music gains a two-fold life.

Through all else in the concert, the Russians rose to conquer. Rimsky's "Scherzo of the Bee" is the merest trifle; but, being fanciful, high-humored and apt, it is livelier pleasure than several score German and German-American tone-poems, five hundred times as long. In the name of the Nine Muses all at once, why should we not be merry at a Symphony Concert? We are human; composers are human; so also is some of their music. Besides does not Rimsky's bee rise out of the sea—first, and last, feat of the kind in all recorded entomology. . . . The Prelude to "Khovantchina" is Musorgsky at the "tone-painting" of which he was many-sided master. By this time, everyone knows his vast and multi-colored tonal tapestry of the crowning of Tsar Boris. Ears that closely heed will also remember the measures that hint at the bleak and thin Forest of Cromy, snow-laden under leaden skies. As etching is the music with that nearness to the object that was Musorgsky's delineative aim. Akin is the Prelude of yesterday—music of the dawn breaking over quarter of ancient Moscow, the Red Square of turbulent mercenaries and hunted, hiding, dreading outcasts. There is no evocation of nature and the orchestra in the grand style; no rising sun and blare of brass. Only the pale light creeping into the eastern sky, touching roof and cupola and belfry; only the stir, still drowsy and smothered, of awakening life; only the echo of pious matins from distance borne. The light recedes; the life hushes to another sleep. Upon a pause of silence waits the beginning of a sombre drama. Over a music of bare line Musorgsky lays his thin half tints of color. Upon ear the measures take form; upon the imagination the illusion is wrought.

Rhythm is mighty, and it shall prevail—much more than all the harmonies of all the modernists from Ravel into Schönberg. Thrice in his "Scythian Suite" Prokofiev is master of it; then at the beginning the barbarians invoke their Sun-God; when the monsters of the Evil-God dance wildly, grotesquely, filthily; when, finally, the hero, Lolli, strides forth victorious, the Sun-God rises again, and all his hosts acclaim the darting beams. Like Stravinsky's in "The Rite of Spring," these rhythms sweep and pound in barbarian frenzy, in demoniacal fury. The whole orchestra shakes and shivers, bounds and and plunges with them. So do devils dance in the dreams and exorcisms of savage men. So do wild tribes march to battle or to rite.

Color is also mighty, and it shall prevail beyond all the modulations of either the primitives or the sophisticates among the modernists. Once Prokofiev summons it when he drives his orchestra, choir upon choir, into the blaze and sweep of piercing sound with which the "Scythian Suite" ends. At last music has achieved the apotheosis of the Sun. The heavens are radiant; the earth is drenched; frenzied are the tribes of men. There is color again, when through the shadows of Night—as the third division is labelled—phantoms flit and wan lights flicker. For ghostly half-tint there are pallors on Prokofiev's tonal palette. But all of it is glare. Savage are the lust and upon the evocation of the beginning. When the sacrifice proceeds they fall away and the whole music fades and shatters. Into mystery is ferocity riven and shredded. By these signs is Prokofiev composer of imagination, as again in the fantastic grotesquerie haunting the music of the Evil-God, his monsters and the Night.

Ask of this Russian savagery, and it answers with a music of clang and clash, swirl and flood—tribal cry to tribal god. Ask of him power and sweep and splendor, and he opens the final pages incandescent above all music of our day. Ask of him grotesque, now bestial, now phantom-like, and he looses his dancing monsters, packs in shrilling night-visions. It is true that the "Scythian Suite" are sterile and shapeless intervals, brief, bare and spotty. Little they matter beside this wild and savage and primitive imagination wielding, hammer and battle-axe, the forged and tempered weapons of modern music. Genius or something very like it, is in the deed.

H. T.

"SCYTHIAN SUITE" AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Herald Oct 25

C. P. E. Bach and Brahms Stir Koussevitzky

Koussevitzky has followed a formula in making his first programs. Yesterday for the third time he began the symphony concert with an 18th century concerto, in a modern arrangement. For the second time he ended with a familiar symphony, played without applause between movements. Before the intermission again came the modern new piece, this time Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite," which is promised us on every program.

A concerto by Carl Philip Emanuel Bach, arranged at the request of Koussevitzky by Maximilien Steinberg from an original for five "ancient instruments," made more than amends for its lack of archeological correctness by its plaintive and moving andante, and its spirited allegros. What does it matter that a piece is an arrangement, if the arrangement is as it stands musically and aesthetically satisfactory, as in this case? Conductor and orchestra gave a stirringly eloquent performance.

Koussevitzky prefaced the "Scythian Suite" by two fragments from Russian operas, the prelude to Musorgsky's "Khovantschina," and a brief scherzo called "The Flight of the Bumblebee" from Rimsky Korsakov's "Tsar Saltan." The names signed to these works are deservedly illustrious. The audience applauded both numbers with great gusto, which few showed despite their much clapping for the music of Prokoieff.

Yet both pieces are at once too fragmentary and too trivial to deserve inclusion on Boston Symphony programs.

In the old days, Henschel and Gericke won over the local public to the idea of symphony concerts by putting Handel's "Largo" and other gems now relegated to the "Pops," on the programs, along with first performances of Brahms and other then unpopular masters.

Symphony orchestras in smaller American cities still sugar bitter pills for their audience in this way. But in Boston we have been for 25 years beyond that stage of musical culture, thanks to the conductors and to a discriminating minority of the audience. No lowering of the standard of program-making should now be tolerated. And operatic scraps and snippets have long been tabu.

Musorgsky's prelude is good third-rate Italian opera with a Russian accent, like the too celebrated garden scene in "Boris." Rimsky's scherzo is a rather inferior version of the "Bee" by that Schubert whose sole distinction is that he was not "the" Schubert.

Prokofieff's "Scythian Suite" is too self-consciously barbaric. It varies between "andantino," with dissonances perturbing innocence, and "tempestuoso" in several keys at once. There is a "dance of the pagan monsters," which sounds much like American jazz of the sort the composer no doubt enjoyed during his recent residence in Chicago. It made one wish Koussevitzky would some day follow the example of Rudolph Ganz with the St Louis Symphony and put a real jazz piece on the program. Koussevitzky's "Rites of Spring," when he gives it, is going to be dazzling. His marvellous sense of rhythm vitalized what did not strike one as really original music. Unless, perchance, Stravinsky derives from Prokofieff, instead of vice versa. Even so, one must remember that Wagner, harmonically speaking, derived from Liszt.

Koussevitzky does a great service to Brahms in conducting his Fourth Symphony as though there were in the music no hint of pedantry. The orthodox interpreters have so often lent Brahms' music all the defects of orthodoxy that an intense and personal interpretation is a relief, even when it does not strictly obey Brahms' directions. Those who dub Brahms dull should listen to Koussevitzky's conducting. It is dramatic, but never theatrical. The audience again unmistakably showed its enthusiasm for the new conductor, whose personal triumph keeps growing.

Next week the novelty is a symphony by the French modernist, Roussel, said to be in his post-Stravinsky manner and not in the post-Debussy style of other works of his already heard here. The other numbers are Wagner excerpts, and the "Oberon," overture of Weber, as announced for the first concert but not then played. The "Meistersinger" prelude is added.

P. R.

FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT PROGRAM

At the fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr. Koussevitzky will present for the first time in this country the Symphony in B flat, Op. 23, by Albert Roussel, the distinguished French composer. The concert will open with the overture to "Oberon." The second part will be filled by Wagner's Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser," the funeral music of Siegfried from "Dusk of the Gods," and the overture to the "Meistersingers of Nuremburg."

Suffocating Perfumes

How a Subscriber to Symphony Concert Could Not Enjoy the Music

The Herald has received the following letter:

"For many years I was a regular subscriber to the Boston Symphony concerts, in fact, had season tickets for over 25 years, and as almost all the money I made over current expenses goes towards music in different forms I think I may say I am quite fond of it. Often I even stand in the waiting line on Friday afternoons, which shows, I think, the love I bear for the youngest art. As you see, I have sat all over Symphony Hall.

"In the upper gallery on Friday afternoon the audience is always attentive. Rarely does any one do anything to interrupt the enjoyment of the music. In the back part of the first gallery when the lights are not dimmed the audience often rattles the programs which they are able to read. Also they bring on Saturday nights bundles in paper bags, which are secreted under the seats, and usually during the most beautiful passages feet and skirts come in contact with said packages, which, with the turning of rattling paper leaves, make noises not agreeable to one who has an acute hearing.

"Often there I have also encountered an undue use of perfume, but a week ago Friday afternoon, when I sat on the floor in the seat of a regular subscriber, I had the most disagreeable experience I've ever encountered. I was surrounded by very well-dressed women, but some one near me was simply reeking with some excessively pungent perfume. Any odor is disagreeable to me, but that particular one was about the strongest I have ever smelt. I did hear the first two numbers, but by the time de Falla's ballet music was played, the hateful odor began to get in its deadliest work. Soon the stage and musicians began to blur to my vision, and only by a mighty effort of will did I succeed in not collapsing entirely. When I reached the corridor, a cold perspiration covered the backs of my hands and my forehead. And so I was cheated out of hearing the Fifth Symphony, led by our wonderful new conductor, just because some woman saw fit to deluge herself with a vilely reeking perfume. The tendency has been growing on our public for some time, and I think it is about time to call a halt to such a nuisance."

What would this poor woman have done if she had seen the performance of "The Song of Solomon" in Paris in 1891? There was an appeal to the nose as well as the eye and ear. For the first "device," the music was in D major, the color bright orange, and the hall was perfumed with violet. Each scene had its particular perfume. And when "A Trip to Japan in 16 Minutes" was performed at the Carnegie Lyceum in New York, Oct. 28, 1902, a newly invented apparatus spread perfumes in the hall. This was "the first experimental perfume concert in America."

Our correspondent should have called an usher, pointed out the offender and said: "Sir, remove that smell." Then she could have enjoyed De Falla's charming music and sat, untroubled, through the symphony.

in G minor.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts this week Serge Koussevitzky will present for the first time in this country the Symphony in B flat by Albert Roussel, French composer. The other numbers will be Weber's "Oberon" overture, the bacchanale from "Tannhauser," the funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods" and the "Meistersinger" overture.

Koussevitzky is now planning to give this week the Wagner and Weber he dropped from the opening Symphony program after the first announcement of it. A new symphony by Roussel, a Frenchman, whose other music heard here has not made a deep impression, and the "Meistersinger" prelude are the other numbers.

6 Post Oct 25

SYMPHONY ELOQUENT IN BRAHMS

Great Fourth Is More Than Match for Moderns

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

One fact made clearer with each succeeding Symphony concert is that, contrary to many expectations, Mr. Koussevitzky is proving himself no specialist in the music of the moderns.

At the concert of yesterday afternoon, three pieces by modern or relatively modern music-makers stood upon the programme: Musorgsky's Prelude to Khovantchina"; a Scherzo, "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Tsar Saltan," and Prokefiev's "Scythian Suite," all played for the first time in Boston.

BACH AND BRAHMS

And yet, although Musorgsky's charming Prelude was most poetically played, although the performance of Rimsky-Korsakov's deft and tricksome Scherzo was a marvel of orchestral virtuosity, and although the barbaric music of Prokofiev was played with a superb fire, power and sweep, still the keenest delight of the afternoon lay not in any of these things.

Rather was it to be found in the exquisitely moulded performance of the Andante lento molto from a concerto of Philipp Emanuel Bach (as orchestrated by Maximilian Steinberg) and in Mr. Koussevitzky's puissant and persuasive reading of the Fourth Symphony of Brahms.

Makes Symphony Sing

In the recollection of Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation, at the first concert of the season, of the Variations on a Theme by Hadyn and of that of the E minor Symphony yesterday, an anti-Brahmsite may be newly defined as one who has not been privileged to hear that composer's orchestral music performed under the leadership of this conductor. Surely not since the days of Nikisch has the Fourth Symphony of Brahms sounded in Boston as yesterday it sounded. Gone was the stodginess and, if you will, the sogginess that some inevitably associate with Brahms in orchestral composition. Instead, there stood forth yesterday a music incessantly eloquent, a music now lyrical, now impassioned; now portentous and now grippingly dramatic.

From first to last the symphony sang. To cite a single outstanding instance, unforgettable was the delivery of the melting phrase that comes as afterthought to the second theme of the first movement. Again, richly, broadly, streamed the song of the 'cellos in the Andante.

Music of Divers Emotions

To the third movement Mr. Koussevitzky brought a rhythmic incisiveness strangely exhilarating, and no mere series of academic variations on a fine-measure theme was the final Chaconne. Here instead was music of mood, music of many and divers emotions progressing to a rarely stirring climax that, like the end of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony a week ago, caused the audience to manifest and whole-hearted enthusiasm.

In Mr. Koussevitzky's version of this, surely the most eloquent of Brahms' four symphonies, some may perchance miss the grave, reposeful beauty that certain conductors find in the first movement, the sacerdotal solemnity with which they endow the Andante. There is, indeed, in Mr. Koussevitzky's performance a suggestion that Brahms, the arch-typical Teuton, had in him a trace of Slavic fire and passion. But if Mr. Koussevitzky's temperament has a little colored and transformed what we are generally pleased to believe (whether or not erroneously) was the temperament of the august and hieratic Brahms, there is no denying that Mr. Koussevitzky also vitalizes and dramatizes this music in amazing degree.

Brahms of Flesh and Blood

For the moment the listener is well convinced that thus and thus only did the music first sound in the mind of the composer. For the moment, too, it is possible to believe that the Brahms legend has done that composer more harm than good. Perhaps he was after all a man of flesh and blood and not a mere sublimation of academic musical procedure. Assuredly it was a composer whose feeling ran strong and deep who could sense the range of human moods and thus weave them into an organic musical structure.

Not the least happy feature of the symphony concerts under Koussevitzky's rule is that conductor's resurrections from the music of the 18th century and his supremely eloquent interpretation of that music. Granted that the first and third movements of this Concerto of Philip Emanuel Bach's do not noticeably diverge from the set ways of 18th century music, the beautiful Andante that comes between seems to have been written a hundred years before its time. There need be found no more convincing evidence of the originality of the greatest of the three composer sons of Johann Sebastian than the chief theme of this Andante, which in one turn of melody and harmony suggests, and forcibly, the theme of Amfortas' suffering in "Parsifal"—a theme that represents the furthermost development of Wagner's harmonic idiom.

Of Singular Charm

As in "Boris," so in "Khovantchina" Rimsky-Korsakov was the good angel of Musorgsky. To him, indeed, fell the entire task of orchestrating this last opera of his comrade; and to judge by the Prelude heard yesterday this orchestration is in Rimsky's happiest vein. Picturing the coming of dawn over the Red Square in the Kremlin at Moscow, the Prelude is music of singular imaginativeness and charm. And oddly enough, it suggests in no uncertain fashion the Prelude to the third act of "Tosca" that would portray the coming of dawn over the house-tops of Rome.

Such remarkable bit of tone-painting is Rimsky-Korsakov's own Scherzo, and it is a miracle of orchestral lightness, a spray of water through which the sun throws prismatic colors.

Prokofiev's Suite

And slight as it is it would seem better worth rehearing than the much-vaunted Suite of Prokofiev. With magnificent stride of pageantry and power does this Suite begin, and its final picture of the sunrise is one of dazzling brilliance. But between comes much that seems but futile sound and fury, the inarticulate striving to voice the moods and the scenes made vivid in the "Sacre" of Stravinsky. Where Stravinsky grips, Prokofiev but amuses or mildly stirs. Dissonance he provides in plenty, but compared to the dissonance of Stravinsky it seems a thing superficial rather than fundamental and integral.

The younger composer may not here achieve the extraordinary independence and daring that characterize his predecessor's harmonic thought. The Scythian Suite, the only one of his more important pieces yet heard in Boston, hardly proclaims Prokofiev a great creator. Yet for a youth of 23, it was no mean accomplishment.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

Leningrad, That Raised Mild Rumpus at Boston Symphony, Not Recognized by U.S.

The word "Leningrad" on a Boston Symphony Orchestra programme last week certainly stirred things up.

This form was substituted for the old name "Petrograd."

Because of the widespread interest in the case these new facts are of interest.

Which Is Correct?

Suppose we should dishonor the memory of George Washington by taking his name from the capital of the United States and replacing it with the name of some far from great man of today.

This would be the same sort of thing as it is to use Leningrad in place of Petrograd or St. Petersburg, says Serge Koussevitzky, Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The many changes in name of the Russian city that was born St. Petersburg, matured as Petrograd and is dying as Leningrad, are no official concern of the United States State Department, according to Washington officials. As is well known, America has not recognized the Soviet government, and so has no official communication whatever with Russia. The only official Russian agent in this country is the financial agent of the Kerensky regime, who has his office in New York.

As Leningrad was Petrograd under Kerensky, it is Petrograd to the United States government, but privately, if the government wished any communications to go to the Russian capital, they would be addresed Leningrad.

For the Soviet government has issued notice that no mail addressed to Petrograd will be delivered. Hence if you do not wish your mail to be destroyed, it must be addressed Leningrad. What government mail does go to the changeling city is addressed to Leningrad.

Irish City Changed Name

Our State Deartment has nothing to say if a foreign city wishes to change its name. It is considered purely a domestic affair of the foreign government. When the Irish Free State decided that the name of Queenstown was entirely to British, and decreed that the port should be known as Cobh, the State Department here raised no objections, but after its recognition of the Irish Free State, acceded to that government's wishes in the matter.

The Swedish government has given notice that after Jan. 1, its capital, Christiania, shall be known as Oslo, because Christiania is too Danish for the sovereignty of Sweden. Without strenuous objection, the State Department, after Jan. 1, will address its Christiania mail to Oslo.

As for the use of private citizens in this country of the words Petrograd or Leningrad, it is merely a matter of individual taste.

Peter the Great, for whom Petrograd was named originally | Lenine, for whom Petrograd has been renamed by the Soviets

Where Name Came From

"St Petersburg—or Petrograd, as they called it during the World war—is a great monument to that great Russian, Peter the Great."

That is the emphatic rejoinder of Serge Koussevitsky, leader of Boston Symphony Orchestra, when people ask whether he is in sympathy with calling the Russian capital by its Soviet name, Leningrad, which has been used in the notes in the first two Symphony programmes.

Mr. Koussevitsky protests at the thought that Lenin, late chief of the Soviets, should be considered as great a Russian as Peter, and his memory perpetuated by replacing Peter's name as the designation of the seat of the Russian government.

But a Soviet law takes every precaution to compel the use of the name Leningrad, not only by Russians but by foreigners dealing with that country.

This third name for the same city marks the third of three tremendous chapters in the history of Russia.

The second chapter was the change to Petrograd.

One of the last acts of Czar Nicholas II as a full-fledged autocrat was at the beginning of the World war, when he issued an imperial ukase, or direct decree to the nation, ordering that St. Petersburg be known from that time as Petrograd and that alone.

As his army clashed with the forces of Austria and Germany, a cry went up that German interests in Russia were exerting pressure. Strong suspicions were gossiped around, linking the Czarina with the propaganda, for she had been born a German princess. It is true that her presence had attracted many of her countrymen to Russia, and had secured favoring circumstances for their residence there.

Powerful German Faction

Also there was a powerful German faction descended from ancestors who had intrenched themselves in business and other pursuits in the old days of Peter and Catherine. They were rich and important. The war fanned flames of hate against them, the desire to rid the country of them, of their influence and their memory.

Every mention of the name St. Petersburg became obnoxious, because of the German-sounding termination, "burg." It did not matter that the name was over 200 years old. Nor did it count that the name was derived from the language of Holland, and not Germany. Since it had a German sound, it was best for it to go. And so the Czar decreed.

The new name, Petrograd, was thoroughly Russian. A great deal of importance was fastened upon it because of its symbolism, for Russians are fond of symbols. In speaking and writing Petrograd, they indicated their pride of national spirit and their anti-German sentiment.

Now we come to the first chapter in the history of the city.

"Father of His Country"

And the original naming of St. Petersburg, we discover, has something in common with the naming of Washington, D. C. For both capitals bear the names of men who were voted the title: "Father of His Country."

Peter had defeated Sweden, which, up to that time, had been a foremost military power. Following the treaty of Nystad, his victory was celebrated with a solemn thanksgiving in the Troista Cathedral in Petersburg. After this ceremony, the Czar went to the Senate. And to great acclaim the chancellor hailed him as:

"Father of the Fatherland, Peter the Great and Emperor of all Russia."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
ADVERTISER
OCT 3 1924

NEW SYMPHONY LEADER HAILED

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was introduced to its new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, yesterday, when it met for the first rehearsal. E. Sohier Welch, representing the trustees, did the introducing, and the orchestra gave a rousing welcome.

Serge Koussevitsky.

Mr. Koussevitzky made a brief speech.

The famous Russian said in part that an orchestra with art as its sole aim was a rare phenomenon. It was this quality in the Boston Symphony which brought him to America.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BOSTON,
MASS.
HERALD
OCT 3 1924

LEADER KOUSSEVITZKY TAKES OVER SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday assembled for the first time under Serge Koussevitzky and began the season's rehearsals. E. Sohier Welch of the board of trustees introduced the new conductor to the players.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
OCT 3 1924

THE NEW, THE OLD, AS MUSIC PAUSES UPON ITS COURSE

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY'S WAY WITH AUDIENCES

Late-Comers, Interruptions and Programs—The People's Orchestra and Guest Conductors—Malcolm Lang Takes Over the Cecilia—Mr. Samuel and Bach—A "Concert-Course," in New York—Incidents and Opinions

LIKE most conductors Mr. Koussevitzky dislikes applause between the divisions of a Concerto or a Symphony. Taking his courage in his hands, he has persuaded even miscellaneous Parisian audiences to forego these interruptions. Gently but persistently he intends to bring the more docile Bostonians of Symphony Hall to a like state of mind and habit. For the change Mr. Monteux was already paving the way. Toward the end of last season, one or another piece did pass unbroken and undisturbed by too eager plaudits. The more observant, the quicker-witted, had begun to understand and respect the restraining gesture. One obstacle, however, held firm. Mr. Monteux preferred to begin a concert with a Symphony. Willing or unwilling, he must pause after the first movement for the tardy. While he waited for them, they who would clap seized the opportunity, and once more the lesson of silence was unlearned.

Mr. Koussevitzky takes a different course. He prefers to set a Symphony at the end or in the middle of his program. For beginning he usually chooses an ancient piece that, however divided, passes succinctly and swiftly. He keeps the pauses too brief for any sort of interruption. Only at the end may the belated enter. The middle hour of the concert will also protect his Symphonies and Concertos. All comers have then arrived. None is quite ready to depart. Yet the final piece, unless it is as close-knit and continuous as Skriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" next week, will open pitfalls. As there are those who have never heard the first act of any opera in the repertory of the Metropolitan, so there are those who have next to never heard the last number on a Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall. Unless Mr. Koussevitzky casts a spell upon them, his pause, however short, will be their signal for departure. Wait he must or have the rustle of skirts and the impact of closing doors added to his tuneful choir. There are observers on the side-lines who look forward to a duel that will be as pretty as it is polite.

Here in Boston

For a fifth season, beginning on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 2, at the St [illegible] ter, the People's Sym[illegible] resur[illegible] wi[illegible]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
OCT 3 1924

SYMPHONY MEETS NEW CONDUCTOR

Koussevitzky Makes Brief Speech at Rehearsal

At 10 o'clock yesterday morning the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra assembled at Symphony Hall for the first rehearsal of the season and were then and there introduced to the orchestra's new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

Led to the platform by E. Sohier Welch of the orchestra's board of trustees, Mr. Koussevitzky was by him formally presented to the band, and after much applause made a brief speech of greeting.

GLAD OF OPPORTUNITY

The fame of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said Mr. Koussevitzky in substance, had spread all over Europe, and it gave him great pleasure to be called to lead an organization of such repute.

Furthermore, he said that an orchestra which existed solely for art was now practically unknown on the other side of the Atlantic, and above any other consideration it was this quality in the Boston Symphony Orchestra which drew him to our shores.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE SCHENECTADY
N. Y.
GAZETTE
OCT 4 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Ben Franklin has announced that he will present the Boston Symphony orchestra of 105 musicians, under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky at the state armory. Monday, November 10. The concert will present for the first time in this section, Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the organization, who comes from Europe with references and econiumns. The assisting artist will be a pianist, known in this territory. The armory will be specially decorated for the event. Seats may be ordered at once through Mr. Franklin, in care of Cluett and Sons, Schenectady.

REDUCTION RATIO 14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
OCT 4 1924

Serving the Muse on the Volga-Banks

Drifting Down to Astrakhan with Koussevitzky and His Orchestra —A Barnstorming Jaunt de Luxe

DURING the spring of 1914 it was my good fortune to be the guest of Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on his last memorable concert tour of the Volga. These famous tours, of which he made only three all told, were among the most unique, the most interesting and the most dramatic musical events of our time. My wife and I were the only Americans ever invited by Koussevitzky to make the tour with him, and I was the only journalist among the half dozen invited guests who went down the Volga with him in 1914. I was not invited as a journalist, however, but as a personal friend of Koussevitzky.

Koussevitzky, whom I have known intimately for more than twenty years, is an idealist with very lofty aims, and he visited those remote towns on the Volga in the role of a great musical missionary, preaching the gospel of the beautiful to the inhabitants of all the larger towns on the banks of that majestic river. Possessed as he is of great wealth, the financial outcome of the tour was a matter of indifference to Koussevitzky. Indeed, the commercial idea did not enter into his calculations at all and the trips were undertaken, as a matter of fact, at great pecuniary loss, because of the enormous expenses involved. And this notwithstanding the fact that regular theater prices of admission were charged and eagerly paid by the enthusiastic audiences that crowded the theaters along the route.

Koussevitzky spent fully $100,000 a year out of his own pocket, over and above the income derived from his concerts, in maintaining his orchestra of one hundred men. He paid them high salaries which assured them a good living and they were pledged to give their services to him only. Thus he was enabled to rehearse to his heart's content and to fully impress his own will upon his musicians—an ideal often longed for but seldom attained by other conductors.

Koussevitzky is the only professional musician of our times wealthy enough to maintain a private orchestra of this character. He founded this orchestra in 1909 at Moscow, recruiting it from the best performers obtainable. Its personnel was made up almost exclusively of Russian players. In fact the only foreigner that I recall was the leader of the double-basses, who was a Dane. The concert master, a very able violinist, was from Tiflis. The first flute was brother of Josef Lhevinne, the famous Russian pianist. When I made the tour with Koussevitzky he had been drilling this orchestra for five years and he had already brought it up to a high pitch of proficiency.

Koussevitzky's first experiences as a symphonic conductor had been gained some years before with the Philharmonic Orchestra of Berlin where he resided from 1903 to 1909 and where he gave annually a series of concerts at which he introduced many new Russian works. As a preliminary to the Berlin concerts he had practised for a year with his own private orchestra which he had founded in Berlin, recruited largely from advanced students of the Royal High School.

A special steamer had been chartered by Koussevitzky for the trip which covered 2500 miles, or the entire navigable portion of the Volga. With the one hundred players and their wives, the numerous personnel of the management and the invited guests we numbered about 200 souls on board besides the crew. There were only twelve of us in the first cabin, however, and a merry life we led during the four weeks required to make the trip from Tver to Astrakhan.

When my wife and I arrived in Moscow the middle of April, 1914, Koussevitzky was still busy with his rehearsals putting on the finishing touches for the Volga programmes. We spent two delightful weeks as his guest in his beautiful home on the Smolensky Boulevard. It required thirteen servants to run Koussevitzky's establishment, from which fact an idea may be gained of the sumptuous style in which the Koussevitzkys lived.

Koussevitzky did not cater to the primitive musical understanding of his Volga audiences; on the contrary he served them with rather heavy musical fare. The programs varied and included Beethoven's Eroica and Seventh Symphonies, his E-Flat and G Major piano concertos with Edouard Risler of Paris as soloist; Liszt's Symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," Rachmaninov's Second Symphony, Rimsky-Korsikov's "Easter Festival" Overture, Weber's Invitation to the Dance, Skryabin's Second Symphony, Chaikovsky's Fifth and numerous smaller work.

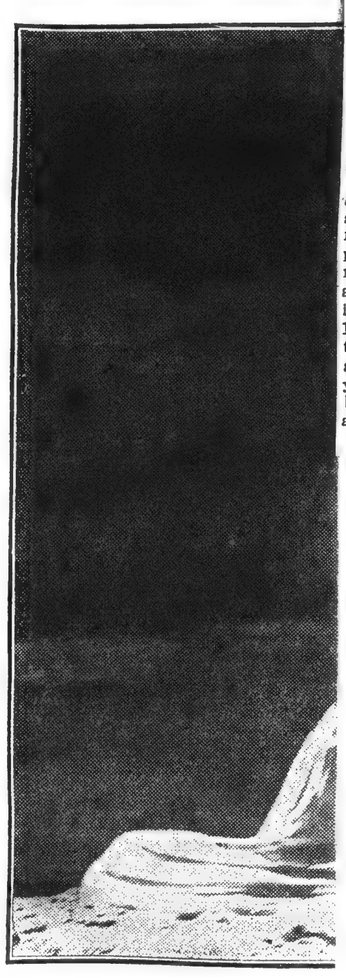
I was deeply interested in observing the effect that such music, magnificently played, made on those audiences. Although musically uncultured they were very intelligent and highly receptive. They displayed an instinctive feeling for the lofty and the beautiful and reacted to Koussevitzky's spirited readings as a high strung horse does to a master hand at the bridle. The enthusiasm was genuine and spontaneous and the auditors listened with rapt attention. It was like watching the face of an unspoiled child while listening to a beautiful fairy tale and, indeed, to those Russians on the remote Volga this was a veritable fairyland of beauty that Koussevitsky revealed to them. Before his advent they had never heard a symphony orchestra and had never even seen many of the instruments. At Saratow a deputation of the citizens called on Koussevitsky at his hotel and requested that he place the harps at the front of the stage at the concert in order that the people could see and admire those beautiful golden instruments.

At Jaroslav, Kostroma, Nizhni Novgorod, Kassan, Samara, Saratov and Astrakhan two concerts each were given. Thus we had a three-days' stay at all of the more important cities, which afforded us plenty of time for sightseeing. The life along that majestic stream was very picturesque and colorful. Jaroslav, with its many beautiful churches and cathedrals with their multi-colored domes and strange architecture, was like a scene from the Arabian Nights. At Kostroma, a town of 45,000 inhabitants, where the first Romanoff was crowned more than three hundred years ago, we saw a statue to Glinka, the father of modern Russian music. During our stay in Moscow we attended the opera nightly with the Koussevitzkis and one of the many Russian works we heard was Glinka's romantic opera, "A Life for the Czar." Nizhni Novgorod, celebrated for its great annual fairs, we found to be a very quaint and interesting place.

Kassan, the ancient city of the Tartars, presented many Oriental touches. We climbed an old tower built by the Tartars more than a thousand years ago. Samara is the terminal of the great Siberian Railway, and is a much more modern town than the others, with great avenues and parks. The railway bridge across the Volga at Samara is a remarkable structure. From this point on the Volga averages two miles in width, but sometimes it broadens out to eight miles. Saratov, with 150,000 inhabitants, is the largest of all the Volga cities. In some respects it is a modern town and in others it belongs to the Middle Ages. Astrakhan, where the Volga empties into the Caspian Sea, has a population of 125,000, and is the center of the great fish and caviar trade of the Volga and the Caspian Sea. We found a very mixed population there, including many Persians.

There were no concert halls anywhere along the route, the theaters being the only available auditoriums. But I was astonished at the size and elegance of some of these theaters, which seated from two thousand to three thousand people and were well appointed in every respect.

A few hundred miles north of Astrakhan we visited a tribe of Kalmucks, a wild nomadic people living in tents something after the manner of our Indians. Strange to say these half-savage people were worshippers of Buddha and carried a Buddhist Temple about with them on their wanderings over the trackless steppes. When the tribe saw the big steamer approaching



Scene
Ismene,

their shore they thought that the Czar had come to make them a visit and they turned out in full force to welcome us. The men proved to be very friendly and I took some interesting snapshots of them, but the women were very shy and would not be photographed, believing that the camera was an instrument of the devil.

Koussevitzky, aside from possessing great natural gifts as a musician, has enjoyed the unique advantage of having been able to develop along original lines, following his own ideals only, without being hampered by the necessity of catering to anyone. His conducting is very original, always interesting, and extremely fascinating.

He has never followed beaten paths but has been inclined rather to break away from tradition. Arthur Nikisch was his ideal and he profited greatly from Nikisch's example during the years he resided in Berlin. Koussevitzky cannot be called a "second Nikisch" however. He is not "second" to anyone. He is a "first." He has blazed out a trail of his own and his reading of the classics as well as of the moderns is highly original in conception and delivery. His technical command is complete and he possesses a volcanic temperament but it is always kept within bounds. Although his interpretations are highly subject they are always under objective control. He feels the composer's message with great intensity and he has a wonderful capacity for presenting his listeners with a vivid picture, perfect in every detail, of his own illumined inner image of the score.

Koussevitzky has a wonderful feeling for dynamics, for light and shade, for strong contrasts. His ideas of tempi in reading the classics are often at variance with the traditional ideas, but his unerring musical instincts always keep him within reasonable artistic limits. With all of his originality Koussevitzsky is never bizarre or freakish. His strong magnetic personality immediately establishes a contact with the orchestra and with his audience. Added to all of these remarkable attributes is his stage presence of great charm.

Koussevitzsky first became famous not as a conductor but as a virtuoso on the contra-bass. The story of how he came to be a devotee of this unwieldy instrument has never yet been told in America. When he applied for admission to the Moscow Conservatory at the age of fourteen he asked for a scholarship as he was too poor to pay tuition. The only scholarship available at that time was for the double-bass, so he took up the study of this instrument not from choice but from necessity in order to get into the conservatory.

Under the instruction of the celebrated Rambassec his interest was thoroughly aroused and he soon saw the possibilities of exploiting the bass as a solo instrument, such as had not been attempted since the days of Dragonetti, more than a century ago. For Koussevitzsky plays the regulation four-string bass, tuned to fourths, whereas Botessini, who attained world-wide fame as a soloist during the middle of the last century, played a small size three-string bass which he tuned to fifths like the 'cello. Koussevitzsky became so proficient on this instrument that he was appointed leader of the double-basses in the orchestra of the Moscow Imperial Opera, a magnificent body of musicians.

While he was playing in the Moscow Orchestra a romantic love affair and marriage suddenly lifted him into a position of great affluence. Among the regular box holders at the Opera was the multi-millionaire M. Ouschkoff, one of the richest men in Russia. His charming young daughter Natalia, an ardent music lover, was a frequent occupant of her father's box and she fell in love with the handsome double-bass player in the orchestra. She contrived to meet him and the love affair which followed finally culminated in marriage and Koussevitzky became the wealthiest professional musician in the world, for Madame Koussevitzky recognized her husband's genius and she placed the great wealth which her father had settled upon her at Koussevitzky's disposal for the furtherance of his artistic aims.

For some years after his marriage Koussevitzky toured Europe as a virtuoso. It was in this capacity that I first heard him and met him in Berlin more than twenty years ago. Koussevitzky, who is now fifty years old, was then in his late twenties. I heard him many times as a soloist on the bass and I shall never forget the impression of his brilliant, fiery playing. He drew a tone of remarkable sweetness and purity from his ponderous instrument and he possessed an astonishing technical facility, running up and down the huge fingerboard with the ease, accuracy and elegance that Casals displays on the 'cello.

At that period Koussevitzky wrote numerous compositions for the bass, among them being a concerto which I heard him play at one of his Berlin concerts. Those concerts were very much in vogue twenty years ago. The distinguished Russian frequently had the assistance of Henri Casadessu, the famous viola d'amour of Paris, and the charming old 17th and 18th Century duets for viola d'amour and double-bass which they played together created a veritable furore. Koussevitzky's appearances in Russia with Shalyapin, with whom he frequently joined, attracted capacity audiences.

I once traveled from Berlin to Leipzig to hear him as soloist with the world famous Gewandhaus Orchestra under Arthur Nikisch. On that occasion he played two of his own transcriptions for double-bass, Mozart's Concerto for Bassoon and Max Bruch's Kol Nidrei. Koussevitzky played magnificiently and the staid and conservative audience gave him royal welcome.

No other professional musician of our times has done so much to foster promising young musical talents as Koussevitzky. During the six years he lived in Berlin, from 1903 to 1909, I was intimately associated with him and to my personal knowledge he was then supporting and financing a large number of young composers and music students, mostly his own country people. Koussevitzky also gave half a million rubles ($250,000) for the establishment of a publishing house in Moscow which became internationally known as the "L'Edition Russe de Musique," which was founded for the purpose of publishing the works of and furthering the interests of talented young Russian composers. Though he has been less than a month in Boston, he is already seeking out the younger Americans.

ARTHUR M. ABELL

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
OCT 4 1924

KOUSSEVITZKY KNOWS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's new conductor, Serge Koussevitzky in his little speech introducing himself to the members of the organization of which we are all so proud, said that an orchestra which existed solely for art was now practically unknown on the other side of the Atlantic, and above any other consideration it was this quality in the Boston Symphony Orchestra which drew him to our shores.

Koussevitzky knows whereof he speaks, and it is a fine thing to find him realizing thus early the spirit that created the orchestra, that kept it alive and that has assured its future. It was the stir of art in the mind of Henry L. Higginson, not the desire for money or fame, that brought our magnificent band into the world and has kept it free from commercialism and safe against all ill-advised attempts to make it an adjunct of organized labor.

THIS CLIPPING FROM COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH
OCT 5 1924

The Boston Symphony recently gave two full performances of Beethoven's Ninth symphony to accommodate all who wanted to hear it.

151
THIS CLIPPING FROM
Star
Schenectady, N
OCT 4 1924

Boston Symphony Coming November 10

In the realms of music, no attraction is as great as a symphony orchestra, and when the orchestra is the Boston Symphony, then it is that we have the finest musical attraction to be presented. To continue further in this argument the ability, artistry and personality of the conductor are things of high consideration, and we are therefore to have increased pleasure at the State Armory, Schenectady, Monday evening, Nov. 10, when Ben Franklin presents the Boston Symphony of 105 men, because on that occasion we shall have the pleasure of welcoming Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor who begins his engagement this season with this orchestra. It is hardly necessary to speak of the excellence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for it is a well known fact that among orchestral bodies it stands at at the head and has done so for years.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
OCT 4 1924

Boston Symphony November 13.

Serge Koussevitzky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who will appear in Buffalo with the Boston Symphony November 13, under the local management of Bessie Bellanca, has just arrived in America. The celebrated Russian has been jestingly called the "lightning conductor," not because of his volatile, magnetic personality, but because his engagements are so many and in such widespread area. The last half-year has been extremely busy for Koussevitzky. He spent March and April in London as guest conductor of the London Symphony orchestra, leaving there for Barcelona to conduct the Wagnerian orchestra there. In May he returned to Paris to complete his series of famous "Koussevitzy Concerts" and conduct performances of "Boris Gudunov" at the Grand opera, returning to London to conduct a short opera season before taking his summer vacation.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSBURG, PENN.
PRESS
OCT 5 1924

NEW CONDUCTOR HEADS SYMPHONY THIS SEASON

Serge Koussevitsky, the new leader of the Boston Symphony orchestra, arrived in this country last week, and great things are expected of the young Russian conductor, who is the man of the hour in Europe, and whose fame has long preceded him in this country.

A concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra is always an event of great importance, and their visit to Pittsburgh this season has double interest with Koussevitsky as leader. This orchestra opens the symphony season at Syria mosque on Friday night and Saturday matinee, Nov. 14 and 15. Different programs will be presented at the concerts, which will be the rule throughout the season with all the orchestras in this course.

Following the Boston, the second pair will be given by the Cleveland, with Sokoloff conducting, and Elsa Alsen, Wagnerian dramatic soprano, as soloist. The third will be the Cincinnati, with Fritz Reiner conductor, and Viola Mitchell, violin soloist; Minneapolis, with Verbrugghen, conductor, on Feb. 6 and 7; the New York Philharmonic, Mengelberg, conductor, on March 13-14, and the Detroit, Gabrilowitsch, conductor, March 27-28, featuring Maier, Pattison and Shattuck, piano soloists.

REDUCTION RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

152

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
POST
OCT 5 1924

Symphony's New Leader "Law Unto Himself"

Koussevitzky's First Program Shows Independence of Mind and Action

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Boston's orchestral season is indeed well-nigh upon us. Before the present week is ended the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have begun its 44th season, and Mr. Koussevitzky's first appearance before an American audience will have passed into history.

And second only in interest to Mr. Koussevitzky's actual conducting, upon which no report may be made for another six days, is the announcement of his first two programmes.

Prospective Programmes

It was not unreasonable to suppose that, whatever his individual bent as programme-maker, the new conductor of our orchestra would at the outset follow in the footsteps of his immediate predecessors. From him then might easily have come the sort of list that has been hallowed by long usage, a list that for its principal item should contain one of the major symphonies of Beethoven, flanked by an overture by Wagner and by a tone-poem of Liszt or of Richard Strauss.

But not for Mr. Koussevitzky was such stereotyped procedure. Rather his first programme is eloquent of independence of mind and originality of action. Plainly Mr. Koussevitzky is a law unto himself. And that is as he would wish.

First of all this inaugural programme contains no symphony—in itself a daring stroke. Usually it is only in mid or late season that a conductor ventures a symphony-less symphony concert. On an opening programme such an omission is nothing short of heretical. And furthermore the name of Beethoven—or of any other of the greater "classical" composers—is conspicuous by its absence.

But if Beethoven is neglected Brahms is not for replacing the two Wagnerian experts originally announced will come the Hamburg master's Variations on a Theme by Hadyn, one of the most genial and most grateful of his orchestral pieces.

Again Mr. Koussevitzky has made a programme not predominantly Teutonic, but rather one that is broadly representative, and the conductor's catholicity of taste is at once made apparent. From the hand of the Italian Vivaldi, contemporary of Bach and Handel, comes the first item: a concerto for orchestra with organ, attributed to Bach until the pianist Alexander Siloti not long ago discovered the original manuscript. By Mr. Siloti the concerto has now been transcribed and modernized, and of it Mr. Koussevitzky speaks warm words of praise.

Mr. Koussevitzky's selection of this piece for first place upon his first programme is in accord with his well established custom of restoring to the orchestral repertory neglected pieces from the hands of the less known ancients. Hence his Vivaldi Concerto is quite certain to be followed, later in the season, by the pieces by Locatelli, Riegel, Boccherini and Philip Emmanuel Bach which in European concert halls he has made peculiarly his own.

Finally as a Russian famed for his reading of Russian music, Mr. Koussevitzky pays tribute to his own country in choosing for his closing number Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstacy," a feverish and voluptious music in the interpretation of which he is said to excel all other conductors. Here then will be disclosed Mr. Koussevitzky astride one of the most famous of his conductorial war-horses, while immediately preceding Scriabin's poem comes another piece with which he has elsewhere created a marked sensation—the Swiss-French Honegger's musical picture of a 33-ton American locomotive—"Pacific 231."

With the addition, then, of Berlioz's overture, "The Roman Carnival," which is sure to receive at Mr. Koussevitzky's hands a stimulating performance, the items, a trifle oddly assorted, that make the programme of this first concert are here duly listed.

More conventional in content and in structure is the programme for the following pair of concerts, those of October 17 and 18. On it first of all hitherto neglected German classics have their innings. This particular concert, in fact, which will begin with a "Concert Grosso" of Handel and will end with the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven, might, in the eyes of the conservatives, seem a more suitable list for the opening of the season.

But let us be duly thankful that Mr. Koussevitzky has no inclination to do the obvious and the expected thing. Were he more conventionally minded the season to come would assuredly be devoid of many of its potential and prospective excitements.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BUFFALO
NEW YORK
EXPRESS
OCT 5 1924

Serge Koussevitzky, now conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who will appear in Buffalo with his orchestra on November 13th, under the local management of Bessie Bellanca, has just arrived in America. The celebrated Russian has been jestingly called the lightning conductor, not because of his volatile, magnetic personality, but because his engagements are so many and in such widespread area. The last half-year has been extremely busy for Koussevitzky. He spent March and April in London as guest conductor of the London Symphony orchestra, leaving there for Barcelona to conduct the Wagnerian orchestra. In May he returned to Paris to complete his series of famous Koussevitzky concerts and conduct performances of Boris Godunov at the Grand Opera, returning to London to conduct a short opera season before taking his summer vacation. Koussevitzky was born at Tver, in Northern Russia, in 1874. At twelve he conducted the orchestra of the town theater. He graduated from the Moscow conservatory and for a considerable period was known as a double bass virtuoso and was said to be the finest performer on that instrument in Europe. Koussevitzky's most prominent achievement in Russia was the organization of an orchestra which he evolved, subsidized and conducted in Moscow. With this splendid organization he gave concerts in Moscow and Petrograd and traveled all over Russia. He founded a Russian musical house which gave many Russian composers encouragement by publishing their works. It was in 1920 that circumstances took him westward and immediately he became the central figure of orchestral concerts in Paris and London. Koussevitzky has a keen interest in ne wmusic. "I understand that America is very fond of modern music," he said recently, "and I am going to introduce to the American public some modern Russian compositions which I consider interesting. German music is in decadence now. I don't believe we will get much worth while from Germany in the next few years. The new music will come from Spain, from Russia and from France. In Russia there has been a lot of music written quite unknown to the rest of the world up to 1916, when the Bolshevik regime spoiled every intellectual production." The Bolsheviki wanted to make Koussevitzky musical commissary in 1916, but he refused, realizing that the duties of the position, which involved full control of all things musical in Russia, would interfere too much with his work as conductor of the Moscow orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER
OCT 5 1924

We spoke last week of Koussevitsky, the new leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the remarkable programmes he gave in Paris. The season of that organization begins simultaneously with ours. The Boston Herald gives the first two programmes as follows:

First programme, October 10-11:
Concerto for orchestra (arr. by A. Siloti), Vivaldi
Overture to "Oberon" ..... Weber
Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser" ..... Wagner
Funeral March of Siegefried, from "Goetterdaemmerung" ..... Wagner
"Pacific 231" ..... Honegger
(First performance in America)
Poem of Ecstasy ..... Scriabin

Second programme, October 17-18:
Concerto Grosso in D minor (for strings), Handel
"Danse" ..... Debussy-Ravel
"El Amor Brujo" ("Love Magic") .. De Falla
(First Performance in America)
Symphony in C minor No. 5 ..... Beethoven

Mr. Koussevitsky is not afraid to begin with Honegger and Scriabin. Is the red flag really to fly on Symphony Hall, as Mr. Hale suggests? Some of us will regret that the Boston players no longer visit this city. They have quite recovered the distinction which was theirs up to the unfortunate collapse of the Muck regime. So, at least, we judge from the comments of Mr. Hale, and there is no better judge than he.

While we are on the subject of pro-

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE PORTLAND
ME.
TELEGRAM
OCT 5 - 1924

Bringing new scores with which to startle a nation and carrying an impressive bass viol, Serge Koussevitzky arrived on Friday, Sept. 12, on the Aquitania from Russia, to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In his lapel he wore, a bit apologetically, the red ribbon of the Legion d'Honneur, bestowed on him by the French Government two days before he sailed. In his pocket he carried contracts assuring him of the rights to the first performances of half a dozen works by modern composers.

At the Boston Symphony concerts this season he will give for the first time in America Moussorgsky's Tableau d'une Exposition, especially orchestrated for the conductor by Maurice Ravel; Arthur Honegger's Pacific 231 and Serge Prokofieff's Suite Scythe, which he gave in Paris last year. Igor Stravinsky will play his new piano concerto which had its premiere at the Concerts Koussevitzky in Poris last Spring and thet conductor who sponsored his Sacre du Printemps in Paris last year will probably lead several others works of the composer.

Although Mr. Koussevitzky is known as the "apostle of the moderns" he will not devote himself exclusively to giving performances of their works. He wants to present unusual programs; that is, programs which have not become platitudinous through repetition, and will include several symphonic works of the old masters which are so seldom heard that they are almost new. Boccherini's almost unknown Symphony in C and Locatelli's Funeral Symphony, written in memory of his wife, he presented to London audiences last year and he will offer them in Boston and New York this season.

It is for Pacifio 231, however, that he shows the greatest enthusiasm. "It is not only a new work," he says, "it is something which has never been done before. Its form, its thematic construction, the very sounds produced, are different from any music I have ever heard. It is stupendous. It is almost devastating. Its saving grace is its shortness. It lasts only six or seven minutes. If it were longer the audience would probably leave the hall."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
GLOBE
OCT 5 1924

Koussevitzky obviously from his choice of program means to prove to his first Boston audiences that he is a dramatic, a dynamic conductor. Instead of beginning with Beethoven he offers the C minor Symphony only at the second pair of concerts, and offers at the first concert a vivid assortment. Neither reviewers nor public should make up their minds about Koussevitzky on the basis of the first few concerts. He may not do himself justice under the stress of the most important debut of his career. It should not be overlooked that the conductorship of the Boston Symphony is the most important position he has yet essayed to fill. Or he may surpass himself at the first few concerts and dazzle the audience, only to slump later. One ought to keep an open mind, listen to his conducting for one's self, whether or not one intends to talk or write about it afterward, and then form an independent opinion. Snap judgments and casual chatter, whether favorable or unfavorable to Koussevitzky, will be unfair to the importance of the orchestra in the musical life of this community. The best thing yet come to hand about his conducting is that Ernest Newman admires it. The opinions of this critic are deservedly widely respected.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. PAUL, MINN.
PIONEER PRESS
OCT 5 1924

logue would [illegible] Pacet, Philadelp
[illegible] the possession of te three, one American and two Dutch. S
The Boston Symphony orchestra has had a succession of directors. George Henschel, Wilhelm Gericke, Arthur Nikisch, Max Fiedler, Henri Rabaud and Pierre Monteux are to be followed by Serge Koussevitzky. Well, Russians are the fashion. They sing differently, act differently, write differntly and compose differently. Presently we shall see if one conducts differently. Safonoff did it without a baton and Stokowski does it without a score. Now if the orchestras could only play without conductors—but what a dreadful thought!

THIS CLIPPING FROM NEW ORLEANS
LA.
ITEM
OCT 5 - 1924

"See-Ded Dwun Dye" Not Chinese But English As Sung

Sir Henry Wood, so long and so closely associated with Queen's hall, London, and who has recently been offered the appointment of conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is a stickler for clear enunciation in singing. An amusing incident is related in a recent issue of Pearson's Weekly to illustrate the case in point.

Lecturing on the subject of enunciation one day, Sir Henry Wood puzzled his hearers by addressing them as follows:

"See-ded dwun dye at thee yorgorn, an wuz zweerey and eel ut eese—"

His audience looked puzzled, as well they might.

"Now," proceeded Sir Henry, "this isn't Esperanto, neither does it happen to be Chinese or Choctaw, or any other outlandish lingo.

"It is merely how many singers render the first two lines of the 'Lost Chord,' whics are, translated into ordinary English, 'Seated one day at the organ, I was weary and ill at ease.'"

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT
OCT 6 1924

Incidents and Prospects

A note from Mr. Monteux in Paris hints at a busy winter, though, after his modest habit, he chooses to call it a "resting and peaceful one." He will conduct, it seems, in concerts in England, at Stockholm and, possibly, in Paris; while he will return to the theatre as conductor of occasional performances of French operas in Switzerland, Spain, Vienna and Scandinavian cities. Decidedly, work is still pleasure to Pierre Monteux.

If Mr. Koussevitzky holds to present plans, Boston will hear in the course of the winter or spring, Skriabin's "Prometheus," the "Poem of Fire," that he set above all his other music and in which he added a "color-organ" to the sounding choirs of the orchestra. Very shabbily, of old in New York, the Russian Symphony orchestra twice played the piece, colors and all. Subsequently conductors in America have dodged, rather than overlooked it.

Mr. Hayes will next be heard in Boston at a concert in Symphony Hall on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 30. H. T. P.

NEW YORK
EVE. WORLD
OCT 10 1924

KOUSSEVITSKY TO GIVE "LOCOMOTIVE" MUSIC

Boston Symphony Plays Honegger's Piece To-Day.

BOSTON, Oct. 10.—Modernism in music will play a part in the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, former leader of the Russian State Orchestra, and the first piece of novel music will be played to-day in the form of a symphonic interpretation of the mechanics of a locomotive. "Pacific 231," the piece is called, and in it Arthur Honegger, its author, expresses by percussion and wind instruments, with occasional emphasis of tamtam, drum, horns and trumpets against the counterpoint of a string choir, the big locomotive at rest and in action.

In the words of Honegger, whose pieces were first played at Koussevitsky's concerts in Paris last spring, "the music begins with the quiet breathing of the machine at rest. Then follow the straining start, the gathering speed, the progress from mood to mood, as a 300-tone train hurtles through the dark night racing 120 miles an hour."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK TIMES
OCT 11 1924

KOUSSEVITZKY GETS OVATION IN BOSTON

Conductor Is Warmly Received by Audience in His Symphony Hall Debut.

GIVES "POEM OF ECSTASY"

The Music of Vivaldi and Honegger Heard for the First Time in America.

By OLIN DOWNES.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Mass., Oct. 10.—Serge Koussevitzky made his American début this afternoon in Symphony Hall as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is a conservative statement to say that he made an excellent impression upon the audience, which rose to greet him when he appeared on the platform, and remained at the end of the concert to applaud him long after the last score of Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" had sounded.

Mr. Koussevitzky is not the prima donna type of conductor that some have called him, but he is a striking figure on the stage. His authority is so complete that it is sensed before it is demonstrated, and when there is an occasion for a dramatic gesture he can make one. His gestures, however, are not excessive. There were moments when he allowed the orchestra to play itself, giving the players their heads, with no animating affort on his part save the extremely mobile play of feature and communicating eye. At other moments he was the imperious leader, a hand and forefinger outstretched in command, a picture of dynamic, compelling energy. In a word, Mr. Koussevitzky has the qualities and the "magnetism" especially valuable for public success in this country, of the virtuoso conductor. He has these but he has more. It is possible to say, after a single concert, that at the least he is a musician who feels deeply his mission, who interprets with flaming temperament and communicative power.

The program consisted of the Vivaldi concerto for orchestra and organ in D minor, as edited by Alexander Siloti; Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture, the Brahms "Variations" on a theme of Haydn, Honegger's symphonic movement, "Pacific 231," and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy."

New Music Heard.

The music of Vivaldi and Honegger was heard for the first time in America. The concerto and the Brahms-Handel variations were played in a way calculated to dispose at once of the idea originated somewhere in Europe that Mr. Koussevitsky was irreverent and eccentric in his treatment of classic masters. Both compositions were given straightforward, substantial and healthily musical readings—the Vivaldi music lacking in places a measure of the fineness of execution which it is reasonable to expect later and on an occasion perhaps of less tension—Handel's work being played with a breadth and musicality which was neither exaggerated nor academic. There was all the clarity of and proportion in this reading that a conservative would have desired and a spontaneity and force most desirable and often missing.

As the concert progressed enthusiasm grew. The Berlioz overture, it is true, had a certain stiffness in the introduction and verged perilously on noise at the conclusion which, nevertheless, evoked a storm of applause. The climax of the concert came with the compositions of Honegger and Scriabin.

Honegger's piece is not only interesting and very well made; it appears as a genuine expression of certain characteristics of this age. "Pacific 231" is a great locomotive. "Pacific 231" is the musical composition concerning which Honegger said, prior to the performance last Spring in Paris: "I have always had a passionate love of locomotives. To me they—and I love them passionately, as others are passionate in their love for horses or women—are living creatures." He has attempted to give a tonal portrayal of the great monster, the joyous giant, as it stands motionless, just breathing; as it starts its movement; as it hurtles through the night at 120 miles an hour. The music is superbly made; it is witty and joyous, full of youth, a laughing welcome to the day and its dynamic power.

The cumulative, hastening rhythms, which extend and metamorphose themselves in different parts of the orchestra in turn, generate a song; the music grows in coordinated clamor, movement, swiftness. The conclusion is admirably conceived and might not have been carried out so successfully by a less gifted composer. For the thing comes to a stop logically, effectively, in a few measures. The gigantic tonal evolutions, as one might call them, slow up and with crashing and splendidly discordant harmonic combinations bring the end.

Sweeps His Audience.

A less gifted conductor than Koussevitsky could hardly have failed—provided he could marshal and control its rhythms—in making a success with this piece, and the same thing is true in a degree of Le Poem de l'Extase," which followed. But this latter work is evidently peculiarly his and he swept his audience from its feet with it. Moreover, he gave the music a character, proportion and signifance which it usually lacks. Any conductor will mount to the final climax, but few conductors will refrain from too quickly anticipating it. Under Koussevitsky the mounting ardors and exultations of what is essentially a bacchanale, a Venusberg if there ever was one in tones, are held in superb control. They advance and recede, as waves advance and recede, but always advance further.

And when at last the great climax came, it came with a brilliancy, with a drenching richness of color, which had almost the effect of blinding light on the eyes. Every choir of the orchestra contributed its tint to the rainbow, and there stood Mr. Koussevitsky, his features and his nervous hands betraying his own excitgment in the music.

There will, of course, be divisions of opinion concerning his readings, but there was no mistaking the excitement of the audience and the enthusiasm of his welcome. It is plain that there is a new and significant figure among conductors in America today, and that he is at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HERALD
OCT 11 1924

Koussevitzki Conducts First American Concert

Boston Symphony Hall Holds Record Crowd, Freely Applauding Russian's Work

Special to The New York Herald Tribune

BOSTON, Oct. 10.—Serge Koussevitzky, the new Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, began his American career this afternoon at the opening concert of the season in Symphony Hall. All the reserved seats had been taken by subscription, and the line for the "rish" seats in the balcony formed early in the morning and had reached a record size by the time the doors were opened. When the conductor appeared on the platform orchestra and audience rose to greet him.

Mr. Koussevitzky's program was a rising succession of climaxes, and was held up three times by prolonged applause. There was exceptional brilliance and color in Berlioz's "Roman Carnival" overture, while Honegger's musical description of a locomotive, "Pacific 231," was a skillful tour-de-force, received with applause. The greatest moment of the concert was reached in Scriabin's "Poeme de l'Extase," giving the impression that Scriabin had found a new prophet in America. But no tradition apparently was violated in Mr. Koussevitzky's reading of Brahms's Variations, played with fine balance.

The Russian conductor will make his New York debut with the Boston Symphony at Carnegie Hall on Thanksgiving night, November 27.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST
OCT 11 1924

KOUSSEVITSKY WINS APPLAUSE

Scores Triumph in Boston Debut as Conductor of Symphony Orchestra

Boston, Oct. 11.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the leadership of Serge Koussevitsky, noted Russian conductor, opened its forty-fourth season here yesterday. The first program offered by the new conductor, whose interpretations drew vehement applause from the audience and warm praise from critics, included works of older masters and modern composers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION
OCT 16 1924

Boston Symphony Concert and Lecture Not to Conflict

Many of the people who are interested both in the Boston Symphony concert at the State Armory, Monday evening, November 10th, and the lecture of the English poet, Walter de la Mare, at Union College on the same night, will be pleased to know that President Richmond and Mr. Franklin have made arrangements so that there will be no conflict. The lecture has been arranged for seven o'clock, and will be over before the Symphony program begins, Mr. Franklin giving assurance that this willl not take place until 8:30 o'clock. Thus those interested in both events will be able to attend them and get full value. It will be remembered that a similar arrangement had to be made on the last appearance of the Boston Symphony in this city, and that it worked to the satisfaction of all concerned.

Oct 16
after Oct 31

LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
OCT 16 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Because Serge Koussevitzky, Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, wants to make his first extra-Boston appearance a notable event, the orchestra will appear in Lowell on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 2, without a soloist.

Raymond Havens, pianist, had already been announced as soloist for the concert but when Librarian Rogers visited the Auditorium and took stage measurements he reported to Manager Brennen of the symphony that the stage would have to be built out if Mr. Havens were to play the Tschaikowsky concerto.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
OCT 17 1924

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

"Conductor, orchestra and audience regarded every tradition; fulfilled every rite," said H. T. Parker, esteemed musical critic of the Boston Transcript the day after the first concert of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra under its new director, Serge Koussevitzky.

The orchestra will come to the Lowell Memorial Auditorium, Sunday, Nov. 2, for its first concert this season outside Boston. Tickets at Steinert's Oct. 25. Mail orders now.

NEW YORK
ESTABLISHED 1881
From OCT 18 1924
TRAVELER
Boston, Mass.

SYMPHONY GIVES SECOND CONCERT

A magnificent performance of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony was heard by subscribers to yesterday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor.

Many misgivings that might have been caused by advance reports of Koussevitzky's new ways with old music may now be set at rest. He is no idol smasher. He does not take it upon himself to improve upon Beethoven. Rather his difference lies in a sweeping aside of tradition, here a new pace, there a different shading from that which has always been done, and, most noteworthy, the whole taken with a reverence that brings out the best of even the least considerable passages, and with a fire that gives new warmth to music often heard.

It is Mr. Koussevitzky's custom to place the symphony last on the program, after the intermission. So yesterday the Beethoven Fifth was what it should be—a glorious climax.

De Falla's suite, "Love the Sorcerer" ("El Amor Brujo") was heard for the first time in America. Originally a ballet, it is music of the superstitious gypsies rather than the Spanish dance music of clinking castanets more familiar to us, thoroughly Spanish yet not conventionally so. Mr. De Falla's music fills the ear and the imagination.

In place of the Debussy-Ravel "Danse" first announced, the tone-poem "Reves," by Florent Schmitt, was played. In spite of a careful performance, this did not impress, coming after a beautiful and noble rendering of Handel's Concerto Grosso. Jesus Sanroma joined the orchestra as pianist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE CINCINNATI, OHIO
BILLBOARD
OCT 18 1924

KOUSSEVITZKY WINS WARM APPLAUSE IN BOSTON

Boston, Oct. 11.—Serge Koussevitzky made his American debut in Symphony Hall as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. From the conclusion of the first number until the close of the program enthusiasm grew among the audience and certainly the new conductor was warmly received by the music lovers.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BOSTON, MASS.
CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR
OCT 18 1924

Serge Koussevitzky's Second Boston Program

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Boston. The program:

Handel—Concerto Grosso in D minor, op. 6, No. 10.
Schmitt—"Rêves," op. 68, No. 1.
DeFalla—"Sl Amor Brujo."
Beethoven—Symphony No. 5 in C minor, op. 67.

Florent Schmitt's "Rêves" was played for the first time in Boston and DeFalla's Suite for the first time in America.

The interest of this concert centered round Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. Why a Beethoven symphony, and particularly the fifth or third, should be considered a test of a conductor's abilities is a difficult question to answer. Yet such is the habit of concertgoers and music lovers as well as professional musicians. There is music which requires greater intellectual power for its proper interpretation; there is music of much greater emotional depth. But perhaps after all there is one in which these qualities are united in better proportions.

For his program of last week, Mr. Koussevitzky chose pieces which led up to brilliant and vigorous climaxes. Even the Concerto by Vivaldi was not without a stirring close, aided by the imposing sonority of the organ. Beethoven's Fifth Symphony contains such a climax as well, but its relation to preceding movements is somewhat different from that of Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" or Berlioz's "Carnival Romain" or Brahms Variations. Then, too, once it has arrived, it is difficult to maintain, and the long-continued exultation of this final movement, unless carefully handled, borders dangerously near an anti-climax. The quieter mood of the Andante con moto and the Scherzo is a difficult one to maintain, and yet on its proper maintenance depends the entire effect of the final outburst.

Last week it was evident that in building up a quick, overpowering crescendo Mr. Koussevitzky was adroit, masterly even; and so yesterday afternoon was he equally adroit in the great crescendo which unites the Scherzo with the Finale. But in the Andante and Scherzo itself he was less successful. The Andante dragged unmercifully. Tempo marks are but general directions, but surely Beethoven did not write "con moto" without reason. And the Scherzo itself was wanting in that mystery which is its most salient characteristic. For these reasons the Finale lost greatly in effect and the whole symphony seemed tame, even tepid. The opening measures of the first movement, ordinarily so pregnant with meaning, were yesterday but perfunctory. This is certainly not music which brings out Mr. Koussevitzky's best powers as a conductor. And as the conductor seemed ill at ease in this part of the program, so did the orchestra. There was an uncertainty of attack to which audiences of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are not accustomed, above all in the music of Beethoven. The tone of the violoncellos and violas in the opening theme of the Andante was not full voiced, and the passages in the Scherzo were confused and indistinct. Not so was this symphony played at the concluding concert of last season.

Florent Schmitt's "Reves" will hardly add to the composer's reputation. Its harmonic and melodic schemes follow formulas which are by now thoroughly conventionalized and fast becoming trite. Yet the undiscriminating audience, under the spell of a new conductor, gave it hearty rounds of applause. Apparently, even after so short a time.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
OCT 18 1924

* * *

The first New York concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given on November 21. Three soloists to be heard with the orchestra later in the season in New York are Rachmaninoff, Albert Spaulding, and Roland Hayes. The programs to be presented will be announced later.

* * *

154

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. JOSEPH, MO.
PRESS
OCT 18 1924

SCORES WITH BATON

KOUSSEVITSKY THRILLED BOSTON AT RECENT DEBUT.

Becomes Music Lion of Staid Back Bay Residents and Is Immensely Popular With Members of His Orchestra.

BY PIERRE V. R. KEY.

NEW YORK, Oct. 18.—All the signs point to the probability that Serge Koussevitsky will stir up matters in New York during the present music season. Mr. Koussevitsky is the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. At his recent debut in Boston—which was his American debut as well—the Russian roused staid Bostonians as they have not been roused before by a Boston Symphony leader, which is saying much. When frigid Back Bay residents are moved to remain after the close of a symphony program and applaud feverishly it indicates that something most unusual must have happened. So for the moment Koussevitsky is the music lion of the Hub; and I have it on indisputable authority that he is immensely popular with the members of his orchestra. He has taken hold with a big, authoritative sweep and the men like it.

Report has it that during the first rehearsal he said to the musicians: "You play amazingly well, but I'd like to see you put more of yourselves into your playing. We want finish, but not so much of it that warmth and color are made to suffer."

Made a Hit With Men.

That made a hit with the men, and they were quick to obey. So the classic Vivaldi concerto for orchestra and organ went at the opening concert with something more than sheer beauty of tone and technical clarity and precision; it breathed with life. The Brahms' "Variations on a Hayden Theme" also pulsed vigorously. As for the Honneger's "Symbonic Movement, Pacific 231" (suggested to the composer by his impressions of a great steam locomotive) and Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstacy," they thrilled the auditors present on that occasion when Boston forgot to be altogether prim and precise.

This is the first time Koussevitsky has had at his disposal an orchestra of the very first rank. In Europe he had to put up with what was available, and very few rehearsals. Pierre Monteaux rebuilt the Boston Symphony into an organization almost, if not actually, as admirable as it was in the days when it was regarded as the peer of any in this country. And now Koussevitsky has this superb instrument at his disposal.

Interesting Fireworks.

Experts are of the opinion that he will stir New York as he stirred Boston. If that happens he will doubtless arouse the antagonism of the Philadelphia Orchestra patrons, who have placed metaphorically on a pedestal the dynamic Leopold Stokowski; and the adherents of Willem Mengelberg, of the New York Philharmonic, may also have some remarks to make.

Wherefore our orchestral future in this town promises some interesting fireworks. Koussevitsky is to make his first appearance here on Thanksgiving night. There ought to be something doing that evening.

Alma Gluck Returns.

received a vocal setback ons ago, Alma Gluck oc-place in the affections
s the country over.
singing were of an pleasure to od when

pany, and in concert, he will give a satisfactory account of himself.

And Anna Pavlowa is back, preparing for what is announced as her farewell tour of this country in an extensive fashion. Charles Hackett, the American tenor, has just arrived after a pronounced success in Australia . . . and like his colleagues he is wearing a smile.

Other Concerts.

A bright day and invigorating air on a recent big day musically here brought forward (in addition to other concerts already commented on in this column) three others, and they were moderately well attended.

One of these concerts was given by the New York Chamber Music Orchestra, conducted by Max Jacobs; the second was a violin recital with Hugo Kortschak making his first appearance here this season, while the third introduced to New Yorkers a Western soprano, Anna Burmeister.

The Chamber Orchestra concert offered some compositions of an intimate character which revealed genuine charm, works not commonly played by larger organizations . . . and in them were some creditable interpretative accomplishments. Alma Simpson, soprano, sang some solos in a none too agreeable manner.

Mr. Kortschak is a serious musician who has gained recognition for his ensemble playing. With Francis Moore co-operating he was heard in a sonata for violin and piano, by David Stanley Smith, an interesting composition splendidly performed.

The singing of Miss Burmeister had in it elements to admire. She has a smooth and serviceable voice and the style of one who has the right to ask public consideration.

[Copyright, 1924.]

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
OCT 18 1924

Boston Symphony.

Serge Koussevitzky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, coming to Elmwood Music hall Nov. 13, under local management of Bessie Bellanca, conducted his first concert in America October 10, in Symphony hall, Boston. Rumors had come from across the Atlantic concerning the celebrated Russian. According to reports Koussevitzky had been setting European audiences by the ears with new scores and rousing his hearers to wonder by surprisingly fresh and vital readings of the classics. As an interpreter he has been sharply attacked and more valiantly defended. All have agreed, however, that he is a musician of unquenchable conviction and a leader of tremendous force and absolute control. According to Boston music critics the high expectations with which America has awaited Koussevitzky's arrival were fully and brilliantly justified in the Boston concert. Warren Storey Smith, writing in the Boston Post made it clear that Mr. Koussevitzky's manner is not sensational. "Often he is singularly sparing of gesture," said Mr. Smith, "often his expressive left hand hangs idly by his side. But when he would build a climax, enforce a telling stroke or draw from the instruments a melting songfulness, then are Mr. Koussevitzky's gestures equal to the occasion."

Philip Hale in the Boston Herald said: "Mr. Koussevitzky has a commanding figure and that indefinable quality known as magnetism which works its spell on orchestra and audience. When he faces his public he is neither arrogant nor obsequious. He at once inspires confidence, expectation, curiosity. They are all valuable qualities for a conductor to possess in these nervous, restless questioning years. It is evidence that Mr. Koussevitzky is imaginative; that while he can be sensuous in gaining effects of color, this sensuousness is controlled by a cool head."

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO
ILL.
HERALD-EXAMINER
OCT 18 1924

'Pacific 231' Is Success but Not Music, Gunn Says

BY GLENN DILLARD GUNN.

KOUSSEVITZKY and the Boston Symphony beat Stock and the Chicago Symphony to the first American performance of Honeger's "Pacific 231" by one week. That, I believe, is the principal news in connection with this latest symphonic piece by a distinguished musical bolshevik.

To explain how this record got away from us it is rumored that the Boston conductor used an oil can in place of a baton. Not only would it set the stage, so to speak, for the first entrance of a locomotive into the symphony concert, but it might help him to get the effect of speed which the composer describes in his program notes, but which was entirely missing among the many impressions provided by the piece.

* * *

Honeger confesses that he has never outgrown his youthful regard for trains and engines. This is by no means an unusual psychological experience. But with the egotism of genius the composer assumes that it is. One may call Honeger a genius with entire confidence that the statement will go unchallenged. In this piece he succeeds in making a congress of musical instruments play for ten minutes without producing a sound which can be called truly musical. I do not believe that it has been done before and it demands a vast technical knowledge of the orchestra.

The tonal description of a locomotive getting under way was sufficiently accurate. To my senses, accustomed to the traffic of Chicago boulevards, Honeger's engine never seemed to attain a speed that would have invited the unfavorable attention of Chief Collins. But for ten minutes the Chicago Symphony Orchestra sounded as though the Illinois Central had crossed Michigan av. Since that was the composer's intention, I suppose one may call the work a success.

* * *

Music that este all c

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
COMMERCIAL
OCT 18 1924

KOUSSEVITZKI IS TO APPEAR HERE NOV. 13

Leader of Boston Symphony Orchestra Is Very Highly Rated.

Serge Koussevitzki, new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra coming to Elmwood Music hall November 13th under local management of Bessie Bellanca, conducted his first concert in America October 10th in Symphony Hall, Boston. According to the Boston music critics, the great expectations roused by reports of Koussevitzki's success in Europe and rumors of his vivid personality and daring interpretations of the classics, were fully and brilliantly justified in his Boston appearance. The Boston Globe declared: "Serge Koussevitzki will make the Boston Symphony orchestra once more the first in the world, if the deep impression he made on his first Boston audience is any test.

"As a conductor Koussevitzki shows few traces of mannerisms that have won other orchestra leaders the nickname "prima donna of the baton." Any one leading an orchestra must make various and repeated gestures as signals to the players. Koussevitzki's gestures are always definite commands promptly obeyed by orchestra. He has no difficulty in securing vivid pianissimo and fortissimo effects. He makes the players chop off their rests evenly. There will be little straggling behind the beat of his baton, and one surmises no player would willingly anticipate it.

"Any orchestra, however good the individual players may be, will not achieve its collective best as an orchestra unless ruthlessly and continuously driven by a leader whom it willingly obeys. There is every inidication that Koussevitzki is such a leader."

Tickets for the Boston Symphony concert may be obtained from Miss Bellanca at the Colonial Flower shop, 230 Delaware avenue.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK,
N. Y.
EVENING POST
OCT 18 1924

Serge Koussevitzky, new conductor Boston Symphony Orchestra

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE
OCT 18 1924

Pacific (231) Makes Second American Trip

Stock Is Conductor and Journey Successful.

BY EDWARD MOORE.

Pacific (231) made its second American trip yesterday afternoon. It would have been the first had not Boston beaten Chicago to it by a week. Pacific (231) is a French locomotive. It is also a piece of orchestral music by Arthur Honneger, attempting to portray the visual impression and physical sensation of itself in full flight.

So Mr. Stock became its second conductor, with Serge Koussevitsky as the first—the pun is just a trifle too obvious. It is composed quite according to the best modern French canons. good deal of noise, considerable exhilaration from the feeling of motion, and no nonsense about conventional beauty. It is interesting enough to cause a desire to hear it again, but I am afraid one would be able to believe in it quite as implicitly if it had been named "A Battle Between White Corpuscles and Scarlet Fever Germs," or "What the Democrats Really Did in the Convention."

Good cheer was evidently in Mr. Stock's mind when he put this program together for the Chicago Symphony orchestra. It began with Chabrier's light hearted "Bourrée Fantasque," and continued with Rachmaninoff's second symphony, which is one of my two favorites among the modern symphonies. The other is Cesar Franck's. After the dozenth hearing the Rachmaninoff work grows a bit thick to the ear in several spots, the middle of the first movement for one, but its splendid, exultant vitality carries it along, and would carry it along through considerably worse technical writing.

This concluded the first half. After the intermission came the piece on the subject of coal burning mileage, then the scherzo from Reger's "Romantic Suite," a lovely bit of imagining. Finally there was the set of dances from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor," reminiscent of the time when the Diaghileff Ballet Russe came to the Auditorium and brought a new view of what is possible in the art of the dance. Like others of their race and kind, the "Prince Igor" dances have the merit of sounding as though they were worth something artistically, whether they are or not.

The program will be repeated tonight.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD
OCT 19 1924

He was engaged for the annual festival next year.

Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made a pronounced success on his debut with that organization, at its first concert this season, in Boston last week. He received almost an ovation, the audience remaining at the end of the program to applaud him long after the last ...ore of Scriabine's "Poem of E...stasy" had sounded.

...r. and Mrs. Josef Kaspar

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ST. PAUL, MINN.
PIONEER PRESS
OCT 19 1924

'Pacific 231' Glorifies The Mechanical Age

Work by Honegger, French Modernist, Given First American Hearing by Koussevitzky, New Conductor of Boston Orchestra.

BY CHARLOTTE M. TARSNEY.

Early last spring at the famous "Concerts Koussevitzky," in Paris, the distinguished Russian conductor, now leader of the Boston band, played a novel work by Arthur Honegger, Parisian modernist, entitled "Pacific 231." But seven minutes were required by the terse composer to express in musical terms his conception of a giant locomotive plunging forward in the night. In it he honored the accomplishment of the mechanical age. Paris hailed the number with intense approval, the excitement occasioned at its first performance being so keen that "Pacific 231" had to be repeated immediately and again included on a program offered by Koussevitzky the following week.

The American premiere of the new work occurred a few days ago in Boston where it was played at the first pair of symphony concerts conducted by the new leader. The staid audiences of the Hub were not aroused to such enthusiastic outbursts of applause as greeted it in the French capital but the work is recognized on all sides as a most unusual contribution to symphonic literature.

"Pacific 231" is a symphonic movement composed to the glory of locomotives. To the composer they are "living beings" and Pacific 231 is the type of heavy locomotive "for heavy loads at high speed." The composer has not attempted mere imitation of the noises of the giant. His aim rather has been to "transcribe into a musical work a visual impression and a physical joy." In the words of Honegger, himself "the music begins with the quiet breathing of the machine at rest. Then follow the straining start, the gathering speed, the progress from mood to mood, as a 300-ton train hurtles through the dark night racing 120 miles an hour. With gradually decreasing power the movement slows down the brakes subdue all this dynamism, the monster triumphantly arrives on a broad and sumptuous tune."

Treatment Is Bold.

Every commentator has remarked the robust, bold treatment of the theme and complimented its high lyrical quality and wonderful rhythmic sweep. One of the Paris reviewers says "the number reveals careful and masterly workmanship and the score's solidly massed structure is amazingly sonorous. Drums, quiet at the outset, mark with increasingly rapid rhythms, the course of the design. The horns and trumpets bandy rhythms and counterpoint with string choir. Often the sonorous brass reinforces. Occasionally it opposes an antagonistic rhythm to that maintained by wood and strings.

"Yet these details of percussion and wind present no explanation of the unusual sonority obtained. The secret lies in the remarkable treatment of the strings. At the outset, violoncellos and double basses divide themselves so that Honegger has a choir of eight groups. Quickly he reduces the number to six, and then to five, concentrating and strengthening the musical substances. The resounding basses and bassoons announce a descending chromatic scale, which recurs constantly. While varying rhythms contrast and lend vigor, Honegger develops from a few fragments the theme announced about midway by the English horn and clarinet. Immediately afterward begins an almost fugal section. All the instruments share. There is a brief interlude of development and then a recurrence of the theme in the woodwinds against intricate passages for strings. The intricacy spreads to other instruments; the percussion grow frenzied; the tam-tam sounds; dissonances mass themselves; heavier and still heavier sonorities emerge — all is fortissimo, rhythmical, overwhelming. Then, quickly, the end."

Boston reviewers call the work "extraordinary orchestral writing" and hold that while it is truly modern and therefore noisily dissonant, the music is less violent and more lyrically imagined than one might suppose from reading about it.

Fascinated By Locomotives.

According to Dr. Vladimir Zederbaum, secretary to Koussevitzky, Honegger has long been fascinated by locomotives. From childhood the monsters interested him and his hobby as he grew to manhood was to collect drawings, designs and the like-all about locomotives. They stirred in him lively sensations and he always hinted that sooner or later he would translate these sensations into music.

Honegger is a Swiss who has lived most of his life in France and gone through most of his studies there, so that he is looked upon as belonging to the modern French school. A member of the sometimes maligned and more often over-rated "Group of Six" he has outstripped his associates, his musical accomplishments outranking theirs in unquestioned fashion. He is the real symphonist among the Six. His works besides orchestral pieces include some chamber music, "King David" a modern oratorio, and a ballet or mimed symphony as he calls it, entitled "Horace Victorieux." The composer is in his early thirties.

Koussevitsky a Sensation.

Serge Koussevitzky, the new conductor of the Boston orchestra, created a sensation not only with the new work but with his entire first program. He is described as showing few traces of the mannerisms that have won orchestral leaders the nickname "prima donna of the baton." One of the reviewers stated that "each number on the miscellaneous program was obviously not an arrangement of notes to be reproduced mechanically in accurate accordance with the printed page but a living, breathing thing. Any orchestra, however good the individual players may be, will not achieve its collective best as an orchestra unless ruthlessly and continuously driven by a leader whom it willingly obeys. There is every indication that Koussevitzky is such a leader."

Another, commenting on the triumph scored by the noted leader at his first appearance in this country claims that "by every sign a symphony season of rare excitement lies before us."

Koussevitzky was the conductor of the hour in Paris. A man of considerable wealth as well of commanding personality, his concerts have been packed to the doors. It is claimed that on the conductor's stand he is a figure to watch as well as to hear. Tall, with dark hair that is graying, with nervous hands and face which sensitively reflects his mood and with a degree of bodily command that pertains to few conductors he is said to compel most effective co-operation from his men.

From Northern Russia.

Koussevitzky was born in Tver, in the northern part of Russia, in 1874. He was leading a theater orchestra in his home town at the age of 12, keeping at the post for two years. Part of his duties were to compose whatever music might be needed.

When he was 14 Koussevitzky went to Moscow to continue his studies. He practiced upon the double-bass, soon acquiring such extraordinary facility that he was appointed soloist in the Imperial opera orchestra and succeeded his teacher, the celebrated Rambaussec, as professor of the conservatoire.

Then, for 10 years, Koussevitzky toured Europe as a virtuoso. He composed a number of works for his instrument, including a concerto, that have been much played.

In 1907 he formed out of the pupils of the Berlin Hochschule fur Musik an orchestra with which he worked for two years, studying chiefly the classics and Wagner. He returned to Russia in 1909 and organized the Koussevitzky orchestra that soon became so famous; it was made up of the best players from the other Russian orchestras. The men were engaged by the year and were barred from giving their services to any other organization or at any other concerts than those of Koussevitzky.

The formal Moscow and Petrograd seasons ending at Easter, Koussevitzky in the spring gave Beethoven festivals, Bach festivals, Tschaikowsky festivities, Rimsky-Korsakoff festivals, etc., in the two capital towns. In the summer, for many years, he toured the provinces with his orchestra, taking it and various distinguished soloists into villages that had not only never heard an orchestra before but had not even seen certain of the instruments.

Appointed director of Russian State orchestras after the revolution of 1917, Koussevitzky remained at home until 1920. His famous Paris concerts were begun the next year.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT
OCT 19 1924

It is a matter for especial regret that there is as yet no announcement of a concert to be given here this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as the critics are giving unstinted praise to the new leader, Serge Koussevitsky, who conducted in Boston on October 10th, for the first time in this country.

A new fashion inaugurated by the leader which met with earnest approval was shown in that the members of the orchestra did not enter one by one or in small groups, as heretofore. Neither did they "tune or prelude" as has been their custom, but remained quietly in their places. The entire orchestra remains on the stage for the entire concert, so that the seats are occupied at all times and the annoying exits and entrances of the musicians between numbers are eliminated.

At the close of an elaborate review written by a leading musical critic after Koussevitsky's appearance in Boston is added; "if yesterday's concert, both in its program and in the playing of it may be taken for a sign of what is to come during the present season, the patrons of the Boston Symphony may look forward to a winter of unalloyed delight."

PITTSBURG, PA.
GAZETTE TIMES
OCT 19 1924

New Boston Symphony Rouses Frigid Resident

Staid Audience Remains Long After Close of Program and Applauds Feverishly—Soloists Fill Halls.

By PIERRE V. R. KEY.

NEW YORK, Oct. 18.—All the signs point to the probability that Serge Koussevitsky will stir up matters in New York during the present music season. Mr. Koussevitsky is the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. At his recent debut in Boston—which was his American debut as well—the Russian roused staid Bostonians as they have not been roused before by a Boston symphony leader, which is saying much. When frigid Back Bay residents are moved to remain after the close of a symphony program and applaud feverishly it indicates that something most unusual must have happened. So for the moment Koussevitsky is the music lion of the Hub; and I have it on indisputable authority that he is immensely popular with the members of his orchestra. He has taken hold with a big, authoritative sweep and the men like it.

Report has it that during the first rehearsal he said to the musicians. "You play amazingly well, but I'd like to see you put more of yourselves into your playing. We want finish, but not so much of it that warmth and color are made to suffer."

That made a hit with the men and they were quick to obey. So the classic Vivaldi concerto for orchestra and organ went at the opening concert with something more than sheer beauty of tone and technical clarity and precision; it breathed with life. The Brahms Variations on a Hadyn theme also pulsed vigorously. As for the Honneger symphonic movement, Pacific 231 (suggested to the composer by his impressions of a great steam locomotive) and Scriabin's Poem of Ecstasy, they thrilled the auditors present on that occasion when Boston forgot to be altogether prim and precise.

This is the first time Koussevitsky has had at his disposal an orchestra of the very first rank. In Europe he had to put up with what was available, and very few rehearsals. Pierre Monteaux rebuilt the Boston Symphony into an organization almost, if not actually, as admirable as it was in the days when it was regarded as the peer of any in this country. And now Koussevitsky has this superb instrument at his disposal.

Experts are of the opinion that he will stir New York as he stirred Boston. If that happens he will doubtless arouse the antagonism of the Philadelphia Orchestra patrons, who have placed metaphorically on a pedestal the dynamic Leopold Stokowski; and the adherents of Willem Mengelberg of the New York Philharmonic, may also have some remarks to make.

Wherefore our orchestral future in this town promises some interesting fireworks. Koussevitsky is to make his first appearance here on Thanksgiving night. There ought to be something doing that evening.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS
OCT 19 1924

NEW CONDUCTORS TO VISIT NEW YORK

Three Debuts To Mark Present Orchestral Season.

New York will witness an unusual event this year in the debut of three new orchestral conductors. Sergei Koussevitsky, who replaces Mr. Monteux with the Boston Symphony, reached America recently. His first New York appearance will occur on Thanksgiving night, when the Boston organization comes down to give its annual series. Koussevitsky is perhaps the foremost of Russian conductors. Since 1921 he has given yearly series of concerts in Paris, where his introduction of numerous musical novelties, as well as his revolutionary readings of the classics have caused a furore.

Wilhelm Furtwangler, also one of Europe's best conductors, and the successor of Nikisch at the Berlin Philharmonic, will be guest conductor for a few of the concerts of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra in January.

But most interest centers on the appearance with the Philharmonic of Igor Stravinsky, the most startling of the present-day composers, and the most brilliant comet in the musical heavens since the early days of Richard Strauss. The tremendous interest in this Russian Titan's works began quite suddenly last season when Mr. Monteux introduced his "Sacre du Printemps" for the first time in America. Conductors then found that the name "Stravinsky" on their programs served to pack halls to the doors, and they promptly stepped on each other's toes in their efforts to secure his works, new and old. The Philharmonic Society now goes one step farther than merely getting these musical golden eggs. They have captured the brilliant bird itself—at least for a few appearances as conductor early in 1925.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
OCT 19 1924

to success.

Serge Koussevitzky, the great Russian conductor and European celebrity, who opened the season of the Boston Symphony concerts last Friday week in Boston, is naturally the centre of interest in the pending Boston Symphony series in Brooklyn. These will be given at the Academy of Music under Institute auspices on the following Friday evenings—Nov. 28, Jan. 2, Jan. 30, March 13 and April 10.

The list of soloists includes Sergei Rachmaninoff, Roland Hayes and Albert Spalding. Each of these Mr. Koussevitzky has engaged to appear in scores of particular symphonic interest and importance.

156

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT
OCT 19 1924

Pierre Key's Music Article

By PIERRE V. R. KEY

New York, Oct. 18.

All the signs point to the probability that Serge Koussevitsky will stir up matters in New York during the present music season. Mr Koussevitsky is the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. At his recent debut in Boston—which was his American debut as well—the Russian roused staid Bostonians as they have not been roused before by a Boston Symphony leader, which is saying much. When frigid Back Bay residents are moved to remain after the close of a symphony program and applaud feverishly it indicates that something most unusual must have happened. So for the moment Koussevitsky is the music lion of the Hub; and I have it on indisputable authority that he is immensely popular with the members of his orchestra. He has taken hold with a big authoritative sweep and the men like it.

Report has it that during the first rehearsal he said to the musicians: "You play amazingly well, but I'd like to see you put more of yourselves into your playing. We want finish, but not so much of it that warmth and color are made to suffer."

That made a hit with the men, and they were quick to obey. So the classic Vivaldi concerto for orchestra and organ went to the opening concert with something more than sheer beauty of tone and technical clarity and precision; it breathed with life. The Brahms Variations on a Haydn theme also pulsed vigorously. As for the Honneger symphonic movement, Pacific 231 (suggested to the composer by his impressions of a great steam locomotive) and Scriabin's Poem of Ecstasy, they thrilled the auditors present on that occasion when Boston forgot to be altogether prim and precise.

This is the first time Koussevitsky has had at his disposal an orchestra of the very first rank. In Europe he had to put up with what was available, and very few rehearsals. Pierre Monteux rebuilt the Boston Symphony into an organization almost, if not actually, as admirable as it was in the days when it was regarded as the peer of any in this country. And now Koussevitsky has this superb instrument at his disposal.

Experts are of the opinion that he will stir New York as he stirred Boston. If that happens he will doubtless arouse the antagonism of the Philadelphia Orchestra patrons, who have placed metaphorically on a pedestal the dynamic Leopold Stokowski; and the adherents of Willem Mengelberg, of the New York Philharmonic, may also have some remarks to make.

Wherefore our orchestral future in this town promises some interesting fireworks. Koussevitsky is to make his first appearance here on Thanksgiving night. There ought to be something doing that evening.

Anna Gluck Returns.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
UNION
OCT 19 1924

By PIERRE V. R. KEY.

New York, Oct. 18.

All the signs point to the probability that Serge Koussevitsky will stir up matters in New York during the present music season. Mr. Koussevitsky is the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. At his recent debut in Boston—which was his American debut as well—the Russian roused staid Bostonians as they have not been roused before by a Boston Symphony leader, which is saying much. When frigid Back Bay residents are moved to remain after the close of a symphony program and applaud feverishly it indicates that something most unusual must have happened. So for the moment Koussevitsky is the music lion of the Hub; and I have it on indisputable authority that he is immensely popular with the members of his orchestra. He has taken hold with a big, authoritative sweep and the men like it.

Report has it that during the first rehearsal he said to the musicians: "You play amazingly well, but I'd like to see you put more of yourselves into your playing. We want finish, but not so much of it that warmth and color are made to suffer."

That made a hit with the men, and they were quick to obey. So the classic Vivaldi concerto for orchestra and organ went at the opening concert with something more than sheer beauty of tone and technical clarity and precision; it breathed with life. The Brahms Variations on a Haydn theme also pulsed vigorously. As for the Honneger symphonic movement, Pacific 231 (suggested to the composer by his impressions of a great steam locomotive) and Scriabin's Poem of Ecstasy, they thrilled the auditors present on that occasion when Boston forgot to be altogether prim and precise.

This is the first time Koussevitsky has had at his disposal an orchestra of the very first rank. In Europe he had to put up with what was available, and very few rehearsals. Pierre Monteux rebuilt the Boston Symphony into an organization almost, if not actually, as admirable as it was in the days when it was regarded as the peer of any in this country. And now Koussevitsky has this superb instrument at his disposal.

Experts are of the opinion that he will stir New York as he stirred Boston. If that happens he will doubtless arouse the antagonism of the Philadelphia Orchestra patrons, who have placed metaphorically on a pedestal the dynamic Leopold Stokowski and the adherents of Willem Mengelberg of the New York Philharmonic, may also have some remarks to make.

Wherefore our orchestral future in this town promises some interesting fireworks. Koussevitsky is to make his first appearance here on Thanksgiving night. There ought to be something doing that evening.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ALBANY, N. Y.
KNICKERBOCKER PRESS
OCT 19 1924

By PIERRE V. R. KEY.

NEW YORK, Oct. 18.

ALL the signs point to the probability that Serge Koussevitsky will stir up matters in New York during the present music season. Mr. Koussevitsky is the new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. At his recent debut in Boston—which was his American debut as well—the Russian roused staid Bostonians as they have not been roused before by a Boston Symphony leader, which is saying much. When frigid Back Bay residents are moved to remain after the close of a symphony program and applaud feverishly it indicates that something most unusual must have happened. So for the moment Koussevitsky is the music lion of the Hub; and I have it on indisputable authority that he is immensely popular with the members of his orchestra. He has taken hold with a big, authoritative sweep and the men like it.

Pierre V. R. Key

Report has it that during the first rehearsal he said to the musicians: "You play amazingly well, but I'd like to see you put more of yourselves into your playing. We want finish, but not so much of it that warmth and color are made to suffer."

That made a hit with the men, and they were quick to obey. So the classic Vivaldi concerto for orchestra and organ went at the opening concert with something more than sheer beauty of tone and technical clarity and precision; it breathed with life. The Brahms Variations on a Haydn theme also pulsed vigorously. As for the Honneger symphonic movement, Pacific 231 (suggested to the composer by his impressions of a great steam locomotive) and Scriabin's poem of ecstasy, they thrilled the auditors present on that occasion when Boston forgot to be altogether prim and precise.

This is the first time Koussevitsky had had at his disposal an orchestra of the very first rank. In Europe he had to put up with what was available, and very few rehearsals. Pierre Monteux rebuilt the Boston Symphony into an organization almost, if not actually, as admirable as it was in the days when it was regarded as the peer of any in this country. And now Koussevitsky has this superb instrument at his disposal.

Experts are of the opinion that he will stir New York as he stirred Boston. If that happens he will doubtless arouse the antagonism of the Philadelphia orchestra patrons, who have placed metaphorically on a pedestal the dynamic Leopold Stokowski; and the adherents of Willem Mengelberg, of the New York Philharmonic, may also have some remarks to make.

Wherefore our orchestral future in this town promises some interesting fireworks. Koussevitsky is to make his first appearance here on Thanksgiving night. There ought to be something doing that evening.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
TIMES
OCT 19 1924

Koussevitzky in Boston.

Serge Koussevitzky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra coming to Elmwood Music Hall November 13th under local management of Bessie Bellanca, conducted his first concert in America on October 10th, in Symphony Hall, Boston. Rumors had come from across the Atlantic concerning the celebrated Russian. According to reports, Koussevitzky had been setting European audiences by the ears with astounding new scores and rousing his hearers to wonder by surprisingly fresh and vital readings of the classics. As an interpreter he has been sharply attacked and more valiantly defended. All agreed, however, that he is a musician of unquenchable conviction and a leader of tremendous force and absolute control. According to Boston music critics, the high expectations with which America has awaited Koussevitzky's arrival were fully and brilliantly justified in the Boston concert. The somewhat reticent Monteux has been succeeded by a man of vivid force and eloquent personality and the newcomer was welcomed with warm enthusiasm. Warren Storey Smith, writing in the Boston Post, made it clear that Mr. Koussevitzky's manner is not sensational. "Often he is singularly sparing of gesture," said Mr. Smith, "often his expressive left hand hangs idly by his side. But when he would build a climax, enforce a telling stroke or draw from the instruments a melting songfulness, then are Mr. Koussevitzky's gestures equal to the occasion." Philip Hale in the Boston Herald said: "Mr. Koussevitzky has a commanding figure and that indefinable quality known as magnetism which works its spell on orchestra and audience. When he faces his public he is neither arrogant nor obsequious. He at once inspires confidence, expectation, curiosity. They are all valuable qualities for a conductor to possess in these nervous, restless, questioning years. It is evident that Mr. Koussevitzky is imaginative; that while he can be sensuous in gaining effects of color, this sensuousness is controlled by a cool head."

Tickets for the Boston Symphony concert may be obtained from Miss Bellanca at the Colonia Flower Shop, No. 230 Delaware Avenue.

* * *

Chamber M...

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BUFFALO, N. Y.
EXPRESS
OCT 19 1924

Serge Koussevitzky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, coming to Elmwood Music hall on November 13th under local management of Bessie Bellanca, conducted his first concert in America on October 10th in Symphony hall, Boston. According to reports from abroad Koussevitzky had been setting European audiences by the ears with astounding new scores, and rousing his hearers to wonder by surprisingly fresh and vital readings of the classics. It was agreed that he is a musician of unquenchable conviction and a leader of tremendous force and absolute control. According to Boston music critics, the high expectations with which America has awaited Koussevitzky's arrival were fully and brilliantly justified in the Boston concert. Warren Storey Smith in the Boston Post made it clear that Mr. Koussevitzky's manner is not sensational. "Often he is singularly sparing of gesture," said Mr. Smith, 'often his expressive left hand hangs idly by his side. But when he would build a climax, enforce a telling stroke or draw from the instruments a melting songfulness, then are Mr. Koussevitzky's gestures equal to the occasion." Philip Hale in the Boston Herald said: "Mr. Koussevitzky has a commanding figure and that indefinable quality known as magnetism which works its spell on orchestra and audience. When he faces his public he is neither arrogant nor obsequious. He at once inspires confidence, expectation, curiosity. They are all valuable qualities for a conductor to possess in these nervous, restless questioning years. It is evidence that Mr. Koussevitzky is imaginative; that while he can be sensuous in gaining effects of color, this sensuousness is controlled by a cool head."

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER
OCT 19 1924

THIS CLIPPING FROM
N. Y. Herald
OCT 19 1924

...conducting.

In Boston Serge Koussevitzky is continuing his policy of presenting at least one contemporary work at each Boston Symphony concert. For his third pair of concerts, next Friday and Saturday, a largely Russian program is announced—Liadoff's "From the Apocalypse," Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovantchina," Rimsky-Korsakoff's "The Flight of the Bumble Bee," Prokofieff's Scythian Suite and Brahms's Fourth Symphony.

Serge Koussevitzky, new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, coming to Elmwood Music hall November 13 under local management of Bessie Bellanca, conducted his first concert in America on October 10 in Symphony hall, Boston. Rumors had come from across the Atlantic concerning the celebrated Russian. According to reports Koussevitzky had been setting European audiences by the ears with astounding new scores and rousing his hearers to wonder by surprisingly fresh and vital readings of the classics. As an interpreter he has been sharply attacked and more valiantly defended. All agreed, however, that he is a musician of unquenchable conviction and a leader of tremendous force and absolute control. According to Boston music critics the high expectations with which America has awaited Koussevitzky's arrival were fully and brilliantly justified in the Boston concert. The somewhat reticent Monteux has been succeeded by man of vivid force and eloquent personality and the newcomer was welcomed with warm enthusiasm.

Philip Hale in the Boston Herald said: "Mr. Koussevitzky has a commanding figure and that indefinable quality known as magnetism which works its spell on orchestra and audience. When he faces his public he is neither arrogant nor obsequious. He at once inspires confidence, expectation, curiosity. They are all valuable qualities for a conductor to possess in these nervous, restless questioning years. It is evidence that Mr. Koussevitzky is imaginative; that while he can be sensuous in gaining effects of color, this sensuousness is controlled by a cool head."

Tickets for the Boston Symphony concert may be obtained from Miss Bellanca at the Colonial Flower shop, No. 230 Delaware avenue.

Oct 19
after
Oct 31

Tel. Chelsea 0000

THIS CLIPPING FROM

PITTSBURGH, PA.

~~POST~~

OCT 20 1924

"Leningrad" Ordered Out of Boston Symphony Program

Boston, October 20.—(Associated Press.)—Complaints made to the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra, will result in having the Soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing, it is stated.

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the orchestra, today disclaimed responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenine and Trotzky," he said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than $1,000,000 in your money, and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the programs of our orchestra."

THIS CLIPPING FROM

NEW YORK, N. Y.

EVENING POST

OCT 20 1924

PROTESTS FORCE "LENINGRAD" OFF BOSTON SYMPHONY LISTS

Soviet Name of Old St. Petersburg Will Be Cut in Programs—Director of Orchestra Adds His Complaint, Saying Reds Robbed Him

Boston, Oct. 20.—Complaints made to officers and trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra will result in having the Soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing in future, it was intimated today.

Serge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the symphony orchestra, made public a statement disclaiming responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenin and Trotsky," M. Koussevitzky said. "I left my country because of them.

"I had a foraune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone. They took it from me.

"I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the programs of our orchestra. I hesitated to speak about it because I feared I might offend some of my good Boston friends."

Among those protesting against the use of of the name was Courtnay Guild, president of the Handel and Hayden Society; the Apollo Club and the Harvard Musical Association. In an editorial in his weekly newspaper Mr. Guild said in part:

"If we are expected to pay reverence to Lenin to please the new leader of our symphony orchestra it may be desirable to look for a new conductor in spite of the undoubted ability of our Russian visitor."

THIS CLIPPING FROM

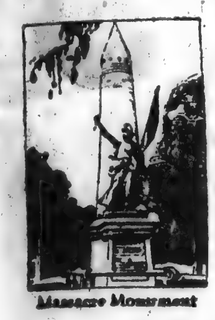
NEW YORK, N. Y.

EVENING POST

OCT 20 1924

Boston

Bayard Tuckerman, jr., who will entertain Prince of Wales at Savin Hill Farm, South Hamilton, during his brief visit to New England, says Prince will arrive Wednesday afternoon.



Massacre Monument

At invitation of executive committee of Greater Boston Federated Churches' campaign to bring about better relations between employer and employee in industry nearly score of Boston Central Labor Union delegates will speak from pulpits throughout city Sunday, November 16.

In bitter attack on Ku Klux Klan, in which he denounces Protestant clergy for not speaking against this "un-Christly" manifestation, Rabbi Stephen S. Wise of New York opens season of Ford Hall forum before 5000 people, 2000 others failing to gain admission.

Laborers employed by city will petition Mayor for wage of $5 a day. Men have been paid $4.50 a day since April, when they received increase of 50 cents.

Serge Koussovitzky, new Russian leader of Boston Symphony Orchestra, says he supports complaint of Courtenay Guild, a patron, against use of name Leningrad in place of Petrograd in official program, at same time declaring that those who blame him for substitution are jumping at hasty and unfair conclusions.

THIS CLIPPING FROM THE

NEW YORK N. Y.

TELEGRAM

OCT 20 1924

Koussevitzky and Beethoven.

Sergei Koussevitzky, the man of the hour in American concerts, conducted Beethoven for the first time on this side of the Atlantic Friday and Saturday of last week in Boston. Philip Hale, reviewing in the Boston Herald the Boston orchestra's second program of the season, speaks of Mr. Koussevitzky's treatment of the Fifth Symphony as follows:—

"Those who feared lest Mr. Koussevitzky would give a sensational, theatrical performance of the Fifth Symphony; that he would startle the ultra-conservative by his licentious treatment, must have been bitterly disappointed. He gave a conspicuously sane and noble performance. Perhaps the tandante was taken a shade slower than is customary—after all it is an andante con moto—but by his choice of pace fine points in the detail were deftly brought out. Admirable was his contrasting the main body of the scherzo with the tumultuous trio. The mysterious transition to the finale was never more mysterious, and the stately beginning of hne finale, for once not hurried shouting, led to a vital reading of pages that have to some seemed, when treated too respectfully, that is perfunctorily, a falling off from the grandeur of the first measures.

"For Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretations and the orchestral performance throughout the concert," adds Mr. Hale, "there is nothing but praise."

The rest of the program had comprised four movements from Handel's Concerto Grosso in D minor; Florent Schmitt's "Reves," and a suite from Manuel de Falla's Spanish ballet, "Love the Sorcerer." Jesus Sanroma, unmistakably a Spaniard, was the assisting pianist in the de Falla music.

106-110 SEVENTH AVE. NEW YORK

ESTABLISHED 1881

From Star-Eagle OCT 20 1924

Newark, N. J.

"LENINGRAD" BARRED BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Russian Leader Objects to Honoring Soviet Rule in Programs.

BOSTON, Oct. 20 (AP).—Complaints made to the officials and trustees of the Boston Symphony orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra will result in having the Soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing in future, it was intimated today. Serge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the Symphony orchestra, made public a statement disclaiming responsibility for use of the name.

"I would be the last to wish to honor Lenine and Trotzky," he said. "I have left my country because of them. I had a fortune of more than a million dollars in your money and it is gone. They took it from me. I could not understand why the capital city of my country should be called Leningrad in the programs of our orchestra. I hesitated to speak about it because I feared I might offend some of my good Boston friends."

Among those protesting against the use of the name was Courtenay Guild, president of the Handel and Haydn society, the Apollo club and the Harvard Musical association. In an editorial published in a weekly newspaper which he owns, Mr. Guild said:

"If we are expected to pay reverence to Lenine to please the new leader of our Symphony orchestra it may be desirable to look for a new conductor in spite of the undoubted ability of our Russian visitor."

THIS CLIPPING FROM

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

EVE. UNION

OCT 20 1924

Boston Symphony Orchestra to Omit Word "Leningrad" from Programs, Following Complaints

BOSTON, Oct. 20—Complaints made to the officials and trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra over the use of the name Leningrad instead of St. Petersburg or Petrograd in programs of the orchestra will result in having the Soviet name for the Russian capital of imperial days eliminated from orchestra printing in future, it was intimated today. Serge Koussevitzky, Russian director of the Symphony Orchestra, made public a statement disclaiming responsibility for use of the name.

